℣. 14. The Lord upholdeth all that fall, &c.] Not all that fell in Adam, as all mankind did; nor all that fall into ſin, as every man does; and therefore not thoſe that fall into hell: but this is to be underſtood of the ſubjects of Chriſt's kingdom, of which the pſalmiſt is ſpeaking; who does that which no mortal king can do, as Aben Ezra obſerves: another king raiſes up one, and depreſſes another; ſupports one, and lets another fall: but the Lord upholds all his people and ſubjects with the right hand of his righteouſneſs; though they are liable to fall into ſin, and in many inſtances do fall, and into various temptations and afflictions; yet he ſuſtains and upholds them, that they ſhall not fall finally and totally by ſin, nor be overwhelmed and cruſhed by their heavy afflictions. Or, all that are falling[g]; he either upholds and keeps them that they ſhall not fall, at leaſt ſo as to periſh; or he holds them by his right hand when they are fallen, and raiſes them up again; and bears them up under all their exerciſes, ſo that they are not utterly caſt down and deſtroyed, Pſal. xxxvii. 24. And raiſeth up all thoſe that be bowed down; with a body of ſin, under which they groan, being burdened, and which preſſes them ſore; with Satan's temptations, like the woman in the goſpel, bound together by him; and with various troubles and afflictions; but the Lord raiſes and bears them up under all, and comforts and refreſhes them.

℣. 15. The eyes of all wait upon thee, &c.] Not of all creatures, the beaſts of the field, the fiſhes of the ſea, and fowls of the air, as in Pſal. civ. 27, 28. but of all the Lord's people, who are ſubject to fall and be depreſſed: theſe, as they look unto him for deliverance and ſalvation, and wait upon him for it, and expect it from him; ſo their eyes are directed to him for their ſpiritual food, as well as for their temporal bread, and aſk it of him, and wait to have it from him. And thou giveſt them their meat in due ſeaſon; the meat which endures to everlaſting life; the fleſh of Chriſt, which is meat indeed; the doctrines of the goſpel, which, as ſome of them are milk for babes, others are meat for ſtrong men, or ſtrong meat for experienced believers: and theſe are given forth under Chriſt's direction, by his miniſtring ſervants, who are his wiſe and faithful ſtewards, that give to every one of the family their portion of meat in due ſeaſon, which is the word fitly ſpoken; and when it is ſo, how good it is! Luke xii. 42. Prov. xv. 23. This is food convenient for them, given out in his time[h], as in the original; either in the Lord's time, which he ſees beſt; or in their time, as the Syriac verſion, when they moſt need it, and it will do them moſt good.

℣. 16. Thou openeſt thine hand, &c.] Not of providence, but of grace, in which all things are, and from whence they come; and which the Lord opens liberally and bountifully, and gives out all things richly to enjoy; all things pertaining to life and godlineſs; grace here, with all the ſupplies of it, and glory hereafter. And ſatisfieſt the deſire of every living thing; not of every ſavage creature; every lion, bear, wolf, &c. for then there would be no living in ſome parts of the world: nor of every carnal, luſtful, worldly and covetous man; who never ſay they have enough, or are ever ſatisfied: but of every one that is made ſpiritually alive, quickened by the Spirit and grace of God; theſe deſire ſpiritual things, ſpiritual food, more grace, and more communion with God, and conformity to Chriſt; and theſe deſires are before the Lord; and ſooner or later they are ſatisfied, they have what they deſire; eſpecially this will be their caſe, when they awake in the divine likeneſs. The words may be rendered, and ſatisfies every living one with that which is acceptable; with favour[i]; with good-will; with loving-kindneſs, which is better than life: ſo Naphtali is ſaid to be ſatisfied with favour, Deut. xxxiii. 23. as all living ſaints are or will be.

℣. 17. The Lord is righteous in all his ways, &c.] Chriſt is righteous in all the ways of providence, in which he is jointly concerned with his Father: there are ſome of the ways of providence, which are now intricate and perplexed, are unſearchable and paſt finding out, and cannot be eaſily reconciled to the juſtice and faithfulneſs of God, reſpecting the proſperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous; but theſe will ere long be made manifeſt, and they will appear to be juſt and true. And ſo in all his ways of grace, in all his decrees; in the choice of ſome to everlaſting life, and the leaving of others; with reſpect to either of theſe, there is no unrighteouſneſs in him: nor in the redemption of men, for which an adequate price is given; and in which mercy and truth, righteouſneſs and peace meet together; nor in the juſtification of a ſinner, which is not done without a righteouſneſs, but in ſuch manner that God is juſt whilſt he is the juſtifier of him that believes in Jeſus; nor in the pardon of ſin, which is upon the foot of a ſatisfaction made to the juſtice of God, by the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt; nor in eternal life, the gift of God through Chriſt, which none inherit but righteous ones. Chriſt is righteous in all his ſuretyſhip-engagements, which he has punctually performed, and in the execution of all his offices; in doing which, righteouſneſs and faithfulneſs are the girdle of his loins and reins: and ſo likewiſe he is and will appear righteous in his judgments on his and his people's enemies, in the deſtruction of Antichriſt and his followers. And moreover, he is righteous in all the ways he preſcribes for his people to walk in, in all his commandments and ordinances; which are all holy, juſt and good. And holy in all his works; in all his works of providence; doing no evil, though he ſuffers it for wiſe ends, and overrules it for good: and in all his works of grace; in election, which is through holineſs and to it; in the redemption of his people, which is from a vain converſation, and that they might be a peculiar people zealous of good works; in the vocation of them with an holy calling, and to holineſs; in bringing them to glory, which is through regeneration and ſanctification. It may be rendered, is merciful or bountiful in all his works[k]; all he does flowing from his grace, mercy and goodneſs.

℣. 18. The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, &c.] He is not only nigh unto them in relation, being their near kinſman, brother, father, huſband and head, but with reſpect to place and preſence; not in a general way, as he is the omnipreſent God, and ſo nigh to all, and from whoſe preſence there is no fleeing; but in a ſpecial way, he is ſo nigh to them, as he is not unto others, Deut. iv. 7. He is in their hearts, and dwells there by faith, and they dwell in him; his blood is ſprinkled in their conſciences, and his righteouſneſs is unto them and upon them; his ſalvation is brought near to them, to their very hearts, and they are nearer that than when they firſt believed; he is nigh to them that call upon him, for Chriſt is equally called upon as the Father; ſee 1 Cor. i. 2. Acts vii. 59. and xxii. 16. ſo as to give them what they aſk of him, and to help them in all their times of need. To all that call upon him in truth; in faith and with fervency, conſtantly and importunely, and in the ſincerity and uprightneſs of their hearts; with true hearts, cordially and affectionately; their hearts and mouths agreeing together, as Kimchi obſerves.

℣. 19. He will fulfil the deſire of them that fear him, &c.] That have the true fear of God put into their hearts; that fear him, not with a ſervile, but godly fear; that fear the Lord and his goodneſs, and are true worſhippers of him, in a ſpiritual and evangelic manner; for the fear of God includes the whole worſhip of him, private and public: and the Lord grants to ſuch whatever they deſire of him, in his fear, under the direction of his Spirit, according to his will, and in ſubmiſſion to it. Do they deſire good things of him, temporal or ſpiritual? there is no want of any good thing to them that fear him; how ſhould there, when ſuch great goodneſs is laid up for them? Do they deſire his preſence, and the diſcoveries of his love? the Sun of righteouſneſs ariſes on them that fear his name, and his ſecrets are with them, and his mercy is upon them from everlaſting to everlaſting. Do they deſire his protection from enemies? the angel of the Lord encamps round about them, and the Lord himſelf is their help and their ſhield. He alſo will hear their cry, and will ſave them; that is, he will hear and anſwer their prayer, which they put up to him in their diſtreſs: they cry to him, either mentally or vocally, in their troubles, and his ears are open to their cries, and they enter into them; and he regards them, and ſaves them out of them; out of their temporal and out of their ſpiritual troubles; he ſaves them with a temporal and with an eternal ſalvation.

℣. 20. The Lord preſerveth all them that love him, &c.] All do not love Chriſt, none but thoſe that are born again, and believe in him: love to Chriſt is a fruit of the Spirit, and accompanies faith in him; it flows from the love of Chriſt ſhed into the heart, and from a view of his lovelineſs, and a ſenſe of his benefits; and where it is true and genuine, it is ſuperlative and ſincere, and ſhews itſelf by a regard to his truths and ordinances, to his people, ways and worſhip: and ſuch the Lord preſerves often in times of public calamity; and from the evil of ſin, the dominion of it; from Satan's temptations, from being devoured and deſtroyed by him; and from a final and total falling away; he preſerves them to his kingdom and glory, which is promiſed to them that love him. But all the wicked will he deſtroy; he will conſume them from off the earth, ſo that the wicked ſhall be no more; he will deſtroy the man of ſin, and all his adherents; all the enemies of Chriſt, thoſe that do not love him, but oppoſe him, his goſpel, kingdom and intereſt; the beaſt and falſe prophet, with all that attend them, ſhall be cut off; the day of the Lord, like an oven, ſhall burn up all that do wickedly, and ſhall leave them neither root nor branch: this will eſpecially be true at the day of judgment, when the wicked ſhall be ordered to everlaſting fire; and they ſhall go into eternal puniſhment, when they ſhall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God. Kimchi interprets this of future time, when there ſhall not be a wicked man left in the world, and compares it with Mal. iv. 1.

℣. 21. My mouth ſhall ſpeak the praiſe of the Lord, &c.] Always, at all times, as long as he lived; and particularly when all the Lord's people ſhall be brought ſafe to glory, and the wicked deſtroyed; when, as Kimchi obſerves, he ſhould live again with the dead that ſhall be raiſed. And let all fleſh bleſs his holy name for ever and ever; not every animal, or irrational creature; nor carnal men, but ſpiritual men; ſuch as are praying ones, that come to a God hearing prayer: theſe ſhould be praiſing ones; ſuch who have hearts of fleſh given them, and are ſenſible of divine favours, as well as of their ſinfulneſs and unworthineſs; Jews and Gentiles, all ſorts of men called by grace, all fleſh on whom the Spirit of God is poured; theſe are all excited to praiſe and bleſs the holy name of the Redeemer, with the words and by the example of the pſalmiſt. And thus the pſalm ends as it begun, with praiſe and bleſſing.

PSALM CXLVI.

THIS pſalm is intitled by the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Ethiopic and Arabic verſions, Hallelujah, of Haggai and Zechariah; and by Apollinarius, the common hymn of them: and the Syriac inſcription is ſtill more expreſs, "it was ſaid by "Haggai and Zechariah, prophets, who came up "with the captivity out of Babylon." Theodoret ſays, this title was in ſome Greek copies in his time; but was not in the Septuagint in the Hexapla: nor is it in any other Greek interpreters, nor in the Hebrew text, nor in the Targum; though ſome Jewiſh commentators, as R. Obadiah, take it to be an exhortation to the captives in Babylon to praiſe the Lord: and Kimchi interprets it of their preſent captivity and deliverance from it; and obſerves, that the pſalmiſt ſeeing, by the holy Spirit, the gathering of the captives, ſaid this with reſpect to Iſrael; and ſo refers it to the times of the Meſſiah, as does alſo Jarchi, eſpecially the laſt verſe; and which, though they make it to ſerve an hypotheſis of their own, concerning their vainly-expected Meſſiah; yet it is moſt true, that the pſalm is concerning the Meſſiah and his kingdom, to whom all the characters and deſcriptions given agree.

℣. 1. Praiſe ye the Lord, &c.] Or hallelujah; which, in the Greek and Vulgate Latin verſions, is the title of the pſalm; but is rather the beginning of it; and is an exhortation to men, eſpecially to the ſaints, to praiſe the Lord, the Lord Chriſt, the Lord of the world, who has created it and upholds it; the Lord of lords, David's Lord; and the Lord of all his people, by creation, redemption and grace; and from whom they receive all bleſſings and mercies, temporal and ſpiritual, and are therefore under the higheſt obligations to praiſe him. Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoul; the pſalmiſt does not put others upon that he does not chooſe to do himſelf; but, as the ſweet pſalmiſt of Iſrael, and prophet of the church, leads the way and ſets an example; and not only ſtrikes his harp and pſaltery, and with his tongue, mouth and lips, ſhews forth the praiſe of the Lord; but engages his heart, his ſoul, in this work; which, as it was capable of it, ſo moſt agreeable to the Lord, who requires the heart in his ſervice, and to be worſhipped in ſpirit and in truth: and this being the better and more noble part of man, making melody in it to the Lord, and engaging all the powers and faculties of it in ſuch an employment, muſt be acceptable to him.

℣. 2. While I live, will I praiſe the Lord, &c.] As he had good reaſon to do, ſince he had his life from him, and was upheld in it by him; who alſo favoured him with the mercies and comforts of life; and that every day, being renewed to him every morning, and continued all the days of his life; which determined him throughout the whole of it to praiſe the Lord: nay, he had his ſpiritual life from him, with all the bleſſings of it; which are laſting, everlaſting ones, and had hope of eternal life with him. I will ſing praiſes unto my God, while I have any being; or while I am[l]; not only in this world, but in the world to come; for men have a being or exiſtence after death, and the ſaints have a moſt comfortable and happy one then; and will be more capable of ſinging praiſes to their incarnate God, and which will be their work to all eternity; ſee Pſal. civ. 33.

℣. 3. Put not your truſt in princes, &c.] Not in foreign princes, in alliances and confederacies with them; nor in any at home. David did not deſire his people to put their truſt in him, nor in his nobles and courtiers; but in the Lord Chriſt, who, as he is the object of praiſe, is alſo the proper object of truſt. Princes, though ever ſo liberal and bountiful, as their name ſignifies, and therefore called benefactors, Luke xxii. 25. or ever ſo mighty and powerful, wiſe and prudent, yet are not to be depended upon; they are changeable, fickle and inconſtant; and oftentimes not faithful to their word, but fallacious and deceitful; men of high degree are a lie, Pſal. lxii. 9. wherefore it is better to truſt in the Lord Jehovah, in whom is everlaſting ſtrength; who gives all things richly to enjoy; who is unchangeable, and ever abides faithful; ſee Pſal. cxviii. 8, 9. Nor in the ſon of man, in whom there is no help; or ſalvation[m]: not in any mere man born of a woman; not in Abraham, the father of the faithful, of whom the Jews boaſted, as the Midraſh; nor in Moſes, as Arama; nor in Cyrus, as R. Obadiah; no, nor in David himſelf, nor in any of the princes; for how great ſoever they look, or in whatſoever honour and eſteem they may be, they are but ſons of men; are frail mortal men, and die like men, though they may be called gods, as they are by office: but no man, or ſon of man, let him be what he will, is to be truſted in; there is a curſe on him that does it, Jer. xvii. 5. There is indeed a Son of man that is to be truſted in, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; but then he is God as well as man, the true God; the great God, God over all, bleſſed for ever; were he not, he would not be the proper object of truſt, for there is no help or ſalvation in a mere creature; even kings and princes cannot help and ſave themſelves oftentimes, and much leſs their people; their ſalvation is of God, and not from themſelves, or from their armies; Pſal. xxxiii. 16. and cxliv. 10. Prov. xxi. 31. There is help in Chriſt, on whom it is laid, and where it is found; there is ſalvation in him, but in no other; he is the author and giver of it, and therefore he, and not another, is to be truſted in.

℣. 4. His breath goeth forth, &c.] That is, the breath of a ſon of man, of any and every one of the princes; it goes forth continually, and is drawn in again as long as a man lives; but at death it goes forth, and returns no more till the reſurrection: the breath which the Lord breathed into man, and which is in his noſtrils while he lives, and is very precarious. And when it is taken away, he dies, and He returneth to his earth; from whence he was taken, and of which he was made; upon which he lived, where he dwelt, and in which he took delight and pleaſure, minding earth and earthly things, and which is now all he has; who, though he may have had many large eſtates and poſſeſſions, nay, have ruled over many kingdoms and countries, yet his property of earth is now no more than the length and breadth of a grave; he returns to earth as ſoon as he dies, becoming a lump of clay; and particularly when he is interred in it, and when by corruption and worms he is turned into it. In that very day his thoughts periſh; in the day, hour and moment he dies: not that the ſoul ceaſes, or ceaſes to think at death; it is immortal, and dies not; and as it exiſts in a ſeparate ſtate after death, it retains all its powers and faculties, and, among the reſt, its power of thinking; which it is capable of exerciſing, and does, as appears from the caſe of the ſouls under the altar, Rev. vi. 9. But the meaning is, that at death all the purpoſes and deſigns of men are at an end; all their projects and ſchemes, which they had formed, and were purſuing, now come to nothing; whether to do good to others, or to aggrandize themſelves and families; and therefore ſuch mortal creatures are not to be depended upon, ſince all their promiſes may fail; nay, even their good deſigns may be fruſtrated; ſee Job xvii. 12.

℣. 5. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, &c.] The God of the patriarch Jacob, the Meſſiah, who is that God that fed him all his life, the Angel that redeemed him from all evil, with whom in the form of a man he wreſtled, when he had power over God, and ſaw him face to face; the God of the poſterity of Jacob, the Angel of Jehovah's preſence, who went before them by day and night in the wilderneſs, and ſaved and carried them all the days of old; the God of ſpiritual Jacob, or Iſrael, the church of the choſen, redeemed, and called ones; the God of every Iſraelite indeed, of every true believer, as he was Thomas's Lord and God: now happy is that man that has him for his help, who helps his ſervant Iſrael, all his people out of the ſad eſtate of ſin and miſery into which they are brought; helps them to all the bleſſings of grace, and to all the ſupplies of it in their time of need; helps them under all their infirmities, temptations and afflictions; helps them in all their way to heaven, and againſt every enemy of their ſouls; and at laſt helps them to everlaſting glory and happineſs. Whoſe hope is in the Lord his God; in Immanuel, God with us, God manifeſt in the fleſh; Chriſt the hope of Iſrael and the Saviour thereof; who is our hope, and in all his people the hope of glory; not only the author and giver of the grace of hope, but the object, ground, and foundation of it: now happy is that man whoſe hope alone is in him; who hopes for ſalvation, pardon, righteouſneſs and eternal life through him and him only; ſuch are ſafe and ſecure who, as priſoners of hope, turn to him their ſtronghold; thoſe ſhall want no good thing that hope and truſt in him; they have peace now through his blood and righteouſneſs, and ſhall be ſaved with an everlaſting ſalvation; ſee Jerem. xvii. 7, 8.

℣. 6. Which made heaven and earth, the ſea, and all that therein is, &c.] This and the following verſes are a deſcription of that divine perſon, even Chriſt, who is the help and hope of his people; and every character of him is a reaſon for faith and hope in him; all things are made by him, which are in the whole compaſs of creation, the heaven, earth, and ſea, and all in them; the fowls of the airy heaven, the ſun, moon, and ſtars, the hoſts of the ſtarry heavens, and the angels the inhabitants of the third heaven; the beaſts of the field, and cattle of a thouſand hills; and man, the chief of God's works on earth; and the innumerable fiſhes of the ſea, great and ſmall; and he that made all theſe what is it he cannot do? he muſt be the mighty God, and a mighty Saviour, and the proper object of truſt and hope; ſee John i. 1—3. Col. i. 16. Heb. i. 2, 10. Which keepeth truth for ever; the truth of doctrine, who as Mediator is full of it, and by whom it came; and as the prophet of the church concealed it not from the great congregation, the law of truth being in his lips, as the antitype of Levi; the truth of the promiſes, which are all yea and amen in him; every promiſe being made to him, and being in him, as the promiſe of eternal life, with all others, which are ſafely kept by him, and he will ſee them performed; the truth of all his engagements with his Father, as the ſurety of his people; to take their nature, obey, ſuffer, and die for them, which he has truly and punctually made good, being faithful to him that appointed him; and the truth of all his ſayings, concerning his preſence with his church and miniſters unto the end of the world, and of whatſoever ſhould befal them, from his reſurrection and aſcenſion to his ſecond coming.

℣. 7. Which executeth judgment for the oppreſſed, &c.] All judgment being committed to Chriſt as mediator, he executes it on the behalf of his oppreſſed ones, and breaks in pieces their oppreſſors; being oppreſſed with ſin, and lying under the power of it, he condemned it in his fleſh, wrought out a righteouſneſs to juſtify from it, and redeemed them from all their iniquities; being oppreſſed by Satan, and led captive by him, he took them as a prey from the mighty, and led captivity captive; and when oppreſſed by the world he is on their ſide and takes their part, and thoroughly pleads their cauſe, and ſuffers no weapon formed againſt them to proſper; and will ere long deſtroy antichriſt and his followers, and bring down his judgments on them, ſo that men of the earth ſhall no more oppreſs; and eſpecially at the laſt judgment, he, the righteous judge, will render tribulation to them that have troubled his people, and ſet the crown of righteouſneſs on their heads; ſee Pſal. x. 18. and lxxii. 4. Which giveth food to the hungry; in a literal ſenſe, he gave manna and quails to the hungry Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, fed five thouſand with five loaves and two ſmall fiſhes, and four thouſand with ſeven loaves and a few fiſhes, when here on earth; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, to ſuch as are in a ſtarving and famiſhing condition, and hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs, he gives himſelf, the bread of life, and his grace, the water of life; he gives them to eat of the hidden manna, and of the tree of life; he gives them his word, his goſpel, which is milk for babes and meat for ſtrong men; he gives them his ordinances, which are a feaſt of fat things, and ſo he fills and ſatisfies their hungry ſouls. The Lord looſeth the priſoners; ſuch as were bound by diſeaſes and infirmities of body, he looſed in the days of his fleſh here; and ſome that were held with the cords of death he raiſed from the dead, Luke xiii. 11, 12. Matt. xi. 5. and his people, who are in a ſpritual ſenſe priſoners of ſin, Satan, and the law, being ſhut up and held under by them, he proclaims liberty to them, and the opening the priſon to them that are bound; he opens the priſon-doors and ſays to the priſoners, Go forth; he delivers them from the power of ſin, the ſlavery of Satan, and the bondage of the law, and brings them into a ſtate of liberty, Iſa. lxi. 1. and xlix. 9. yea all the priſoners in the grave he will looſe at the laſt day, he has the key of hell and death, and will open thoſe priſons and ſet them free; they ſhall come forth, ſome to the reſurrection of life, and others to the reſurrection of damnation.

℣. 8. The Lord openeth the eyes of the blind, &c.] Who are corporally blind, the eyes of many ſuch were opened by Chriſt when here on earth, and one who was born blind; and ſuch who are ſpiritually blind as to any knowledge of divine things, of God in Chriſt, of the way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt, of the Spirit and his operations, of their ſtate and condition by nature, or of the things of the goſpel; the eyes of many ſuch he opens ſo as to ſee their ſin and danger, their want of righteouſneſs, and need of Chriſt and ſalvation by him; this is uſually done by means of the miniſtry of the word, which is as an eye-ſalve; but the work is Chriſt's, and a work of almighty power it is; ſee Iſa. xxxv. 4, 5. The Lord raiſeth them that are bowed down; as he did in a literal ſenſe the poor woman that was bowed together, Luke xiii. 11, 12, 16. and as he does in a ſpiritual ſenſe ſuch as are heavy laden with ſin, and preſſed with the burden of it; that are depreſſed with Satan's temptations, and labour under ſore afflictions and exerciſes; all which he ſupports his people under, and delivers them out of; and chears and refreſhes their ſouls with diſcoveries of his love and grace unto them; ſee Pſalm cxlv. 14. The Lord loveth the righteous; not ſelf-righteous perſons; theſe are not loved by God the Father, who preferred a publican to one of them; nor by Chriſt, who came not to call them to repentance; nor by the Spirit, who reproves and convinces men of ſelf-righteouſneſs; nor by angels, who rejoice at one ſinner that repents more than over ninety and nine juſt perſons who in their own opinion need no repentance: but ſuch who are righteous through Chriſt's righteouſneſs imputed to them, and there are none righteous in any other way; and theſe Chriſt loves, not for any righteouſneſs in them, or done by them; nor does his love flow from his own righteouſneſs upon them, for he loved them from all eternity; and his engaging and undertaking to work out a righteouſneſs for them, and the bringing in of that righteouſneſs, were the fruits and effects of his love to them, and evidences of it; he ſuffered for them when they were in themſelves unjuſt; he died for them when ſinners, ungodly, and enemies; nevertheleſs as they are clothed with his perfect righteouſneſs, and are introduced unto him and preſented before him in this raiment of needlework, this clothing of wrought gold, this fine linen clean and white; he takes delight and pleaſure in them, and they appear a glorious church, without ſpot or wrinkle or any ſuch thing.

℣. 9. The Lord preſerveth the ſtrangers, &c.] The life of them, as he did the daughter of the Greek, a Syrophenician woman, and a Samaritan, by healing them of their diſeaſes, Mark vii. 26—29. Luke xvii. 16—18. and in a ſpiritual ſenſe he preſerves the lives and ſaves the ſouls of his people among the Gentiles, who are aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers to the covenant of promiſe; for theſe he laid down his life a ranſom, and became the propitiation for their ſins; to theſe he ſends his goſpel, which is the power of God to ſalvation unto them. He relieveth the fatherleſs and widow; in their diſtreſſes and troubles, who have no helper; a wonderful inſtance of his relieving a widow in the moſt diſconſolate circumſtances, we have in raiſing the widow of Naim's ſon to life, and reſtoring him to his mother, Luke vii. 12—15. in him the fatherleſs, and all that in a ſpiritual ſenſe are deſtitute of help in the creatures, and ſee they are ſo, find mercy; nor will he leave his people comfortleſs, or as orphans and fatherleſs ones, but will and does come and viſit them, relieve and ſupply them with every thing convenient for them; though his church here on earth may ſeem to be as a widow, he being in heaven at the right hand of God, yet he cares for her in the wilderneſs, and provides for her ſupport, where ſhe is nouriſhed with the word and ordinances, and will be until he comes again; ſee Hoſea xiv. 3. John xiv. 18. Rev. xii. 14. But the way of the wicked he turneth upſide down; ſo that they cannot find it; nor their hands perform their enterprize; their ſchemes and counſels are all confounded and blaſted by him, and all their policy and power are not able to prevail againſt his church and people; ſee Pſalm i. 6.

℣. 10. The Lord ſhall reign for ever, &c.] The Meſſiah, who is King of kings and Lord of lords; and in this he is ſuperior to them, they reign but for a while, but he for evermore; the throne of majeſty and glory on which he ſits is for ever and ever; his kingdom is an everlaſting kingdom; of his government, and the peace of it, there will be no end; he is King of ſaints now, and reigns in their hearts, and in his churches, and in the world; and he will reign with his people, and they with him, a thouſand years on earth; and then they will reign together to all eternity; ſee Pſal. xlv. 6. Iſa. ix. 7. Dan. ii. 44. Both Jarchi and Kimchi refer this to the Meſſiah and his kingdom; the note of the former is, "he ſhall confirm his kingdom in "the redemption or ſalvation of his children;" and of the latter, "it ſhall be ſaid he is king over "all, after he has executed judgment on the wick"ed in the valley of Jehoſhaphat." Even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations; he who is Zion's God, is Zion's King, head over all things to the church; and this is her joy and comfort in every age, that her God and her King reigns, and will reign for evermore; and eſpecially in a glorious manner in the latter day; ſee Iſa. lii. 7. and as all this is a ſolid ground and foundation of truth in the Lord, and ſerves to encourage ſaints to make him their help and hope; and ſhews how happy they are that have him as ſuch; ſo it is matter of praiſe and thankſgiving; hence it follows, Praiſe ye the Lord; or hallelujah; and ſo the pſalm ends as it began.

PSALM CXLVII.

THIS pſalm is thought to be written by David, and according to Theodoret predicts the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the rebuilding of Jeruſalem by Zorobabel, which ſeems to be grounded on ℣. 2. tho' the words there agree well enough with the times of David; hence the title in the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Syriac verſions, and Apollinarius, is as the preceding; the Syriac adds, "concerning Zorobabel and Joſhua the prieſt, and Ezra, who were ſolicitous and diligent in building Jeruſalem." Aben Ezra, and other Jewiſh writers, think it foretels the future rebuilding of Jeruſalem, and the reſtoration of the Jews from their preſent captivity, and refer it to the times of the Meſſiah; and ſo far it may be right, that it reſpects Chriſt and the praiſe of him, on account of his nature and works; and may take in the converſion of the Jews. It ſeems to be written by the ſame perſon, and on the ſame account, as the preceding pſalm.

℣. 1. Praiſe ye the Lord, &c.] When he ſhall reign, as Kimchi connects this pſalm with the preceding; the arguments uſed to engage men to this work are taken partly from the nature of it, as in the next clauſes; and partly from what the Lord is and does, as in the following verſes. For it is good to ſing praiſes unto our God; it being agreeable to his revealed will, what he enjoins, approves of, and accepts, and is profitable to his people, as well as makes for his glory; ſee Pſalm xcii. 1. Some render it, becauſe he is good, as in Pſal. cvi. 1. and cvii. 1. but the accents, and what follows, will not admit of this ſenſe. For it is pleaſant; to our God; with which the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Ethiopic and Arabic verſions join this clauſe; the ſacrifice of praiſe is more pleaſing to the Lord than any ceremonial ſacrifice, eſpecially when offered from a grateful heart in the name of Chriſt, and with a view to his glory; and it is pleaſant to ſaints themſelves, when grace is in exerciſe, and they make melody in their hearts to the Lord. And praiſe is comely; is due to the Lord, and becomes his people to give it to him; it is but their reaſonable ſervice, and a beautiful and lovely ſight it is to ſee the choſen, redeemed, and called of the Lamb, harping with their harps, and ſinging the ſong of redeeming love.

℣. 2. The Lord doth build up Jeruſalem, &c.] Literally, after the Babyloniſh captivity, according to ſome; or rather when taken from the Jebuſites by David; or ſpiritually the church, which is often called Jeruſalem, even the goſpel-church, of which Chriſt is the builder, his miniſters are inſtruments, his people are the materials, and which, though now greatly fallen to decay, will be rebuilt by him in the latter day; when his work will be revived among his ſaints, his goſpel more powerfully preached, his ordinances more purely adminiſtered, and multitudes of ſouls converted; and which will be matter of praiſe and thankſgiving, as it is now matter of prayer; ſee Pſal. li. 18. and cii. 13, 16. Jer. xxx. 18, 19. He gathereth together the outcaſts of Iſrael; the exiles from Babylon, as ſome; or rather ſuch who in the times of the Judges had been carried captive by their neighbours, or fled from their cities in the times of Saul for fear of the Philiſtines; and who were gathered to their own country, cities and houſes, when David began to reign. Spiritually this regards the whole Iſrael of God, the elect of God, whether Jews or Gentiles, and the out-caſts of them; ſo called, not becauſe ever caſt out or caſt off by the Lord, being received into his favour, covenant and church; but either becauſe caſt out of the company of profane men, as evil and unworthy; or caſt out of Iſrael, the church of God, very juſtly, for offences given; but being brought to repentance, are reſtored and gathered in again: or rather this may repreſent the Lord's people as in a ſtate of nature, like the wretched infant caſt out into the open field, ſcattered up and down in the world, in a ſtate of diſtance from God, Chriſt and his people; theſe are gathered by Chriſt in redemption, who came to ſeek and collect them together; and by his Spirit in converſion, when he gathers them to himſelf, and into his fold; and this as it is an occaſion of joy to angels and ſaints, is matter of praiſe and thankſgiving to the outcaſts themſelves, thus gathered in. The Septuagint render it, to the diſperſion or diſperſed of Iſrael; ſee John vii. 35.

℣. 3. He healeth the broken in heart, &c.] Chriſt is a phyſician; many are the diſeaſes of his people; he heals them all by his blood, ſtripes, and wounds; and among the reſt their broken hearts, which none can cure but himſelf; hearts broken by the word, as a hammer, accompanied with a divine power; which have a true ſenſe of ſin, and godly ſorrow for it; are truly contrite, ſuch as the Lord has reſpect unto, dwells with, and accepts of; and theſe he heals, and only he, by pouring in oil and wine, as the good Samaritan; or by applying pardoning grace and mercy to them, ſtreaming through his blood. And bindeth up their wounds; or griefs[n]; and ſo gives them eaſe, health, and peace, for which they have abundant reaſon to call upon their ſouls to bleſs his name and ſing his praiſe; ſee Pſal. ciii. 1—3. compare with this Iſa. lxi. 1. Luke x. 30—34.

℣. 4. He telleth the number of the ſtars, &c.] Which no man can do exactly; ſee Gen. xv. 5. Job xxv. 3. the ancient aſtronomers pretended to tell them, as Aratus and Eudoxus[o], and fixed their number at a thouſand and odd; but then theſe were only ſuch as were of ſome magnitude and influence, and ſuch as commonly appeared; but ſince the uſe of teleſcopes many are ſeen which were not before; and eſpecially thoſe cluſters of them in the milky way cannot be diſtinctly diſcerned and told; but the Lord that made them can tell their exact number. Aben Ezra thinks this is ſaid with reſpect to the outcaſts of Iſrael ſcattered throughout the whole earth, as the ſtars are in the upper orb; and that as the Lord knows the one, he knows the other; which is not amiſs, eſpecially ſpiritually underſtood. He calleth them all by their names; not that he calls one Jupiter and another Venus, &c. as the heathens have done; but the ſenſe is, that he has as perfect, diſtinct, and exact knowledge of them as we have of any perſons or things that we can call by name, and more ſo; ſee Iſa. xl. 26. This may be applied to the ſaints, who are like to ſtars for the light they receive from Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs, and are a number which no man can number; but Chriſt knows them all diſtinctly and exactly, and can call them by name, and holds them in his right hand, and will preſerve them; and they ſhall ſhine for ever like ſtars, yea like the ſun in the kingdom of his Father; ſo Arama interprets this of the righteous, who are compared to ſtars; ſee Dan. xii. 4. Rev. ii. 1.

[o] Vid. Auguſtin. de Civ. Dei, l. 16. c. 23.

℣. 5. Great is our Lord, and of great power, &c.] Our Lord is our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Lord of the whole earth; the Lord of his own people by creation, by redemption, by marriage, and by the conqueſt of his grace, and their voluntary ſubmiſſion to him; he is great in his perſon, offices and grace, and therefore greatly to be praiſed; ſee Pſal. cxlv. 3. and particularly his power is very great, as appears in the creation of all things out of nothing by him; in the ſuſtentation and ſupport of the world and all things in it; in the redemption of his people, from the hand of their powerful enemies; in beginning, carrying on, and perfecting a work of grace on their hearts by his Spirit and power; and in the preſervation of them unto eternal life, through a thouſand dangers and difficulties: at his reſurrection all power in heaven and earth were given him as Mediator; and in the latter day he will take to himſelf his great power and reign; and in the laſt day will raiſe the dead out of their graves. His underſtanding is infinite; it reaches to all things, not to the ſtars of heaven only, as in ℣. 4. but to the fowls of the air, to the beaſts of the field, and cattle upon a thouſand hills; to all on the ſurface of the earth, or in the bowels of it; and to the fiſhes of the ſea: it reaches to all men, and to all the thoughts of their hearts, the words of their mouths, and the actions of their lives; it reaches to all things paſt, that have been, to every thing preſent, and to whatſoever is to come; it includes not only the knowledge of all things that are, or certainly will be, but of all things poſſible, or which he could bring into being if he would; it is concerned not only with the quality and nature of things it perfectly underſtands, but with the quantity of them; even all things in creation and providence, which are without number and paſt finding out by men; and ſo his underſtanding is without number and cannot be declared, as the word ſignifies.

℣. 6. The Lord lifteth up the meek, &c.] The lowly and humble ſouls, ſuch as are made ſo by the Spirit of God; he ſhews them their ſinfulneſs, and want of righteouſneſs; the inſufficiency of their own, and need of Chriſt's; blowing a blaſt upon all their goodlineſs, ſo bringing down their natural pride and haughtineſs, and cauſing them to ſubmit to Chriſt, that he alone might be exalted; ſuch as learn of him, who is meek and lowly, and become the followers of the humble Jeſus; who being partakers of his grace, have low thoughts of themſelves, as if the leaſt of ſaints and chief of ſinners; and higher thoughts of others; who aſcribe all they have and are to the grace of God; and who make no boaſt of, nor place any truſt in any thing they do; who quietly ſubmit to every adverſity, patiently bear all the injuries, affronts, and reproaches of men; and are ſilent under every afflictive diſpenſation of providence: theſe humble ones the Lord exalts in due time; he lifts up their ſpirits, he cheers and refreſhes their ſouls; raiſes them to a high eſtate of grace, ſets them among princes, gives them honour here, and a crown and kingdom hereafter; theſe ſhall inherit the new earth, in which will dwell righteouſneſs; ſee Matt. v. 5. He caſteth the wicked down to the ground; or humbles them to the ground[p]; he abaſes the proud and brings them into a low eſtate, ſometimes in this world; however in the next he caſts them down to hell, even into the loweſt hell, which is the portion of all wicked men, of all proud and haughty ſinners; ſee Iſa. xxvi. 5. compare with theſe expreſſions Luke i. 51, 52. and xiv. 11. and xviii. 14. Aben Ezra by the meek underſtands the outcaſts of Iſrael; and by the wicked the kings of the Gentiles, ſubject to Iſrael.

℣. 7. Sing unto the Lord with thankſgiving, &c.] Theſe are the words of the pſalmiſt unto the Iſraelites, according to Aben Ezra and Kimchi; but may be an exhortation to all men, eſpecially good men; who are capable of obſerving the following things concerning providential goodneſs and ſpecial grace, on account of which they are called upon to ſing unto the Lord: or to anſwer[q]; to ſing alternately, or by reſponſes; the word is uſed for ſinging, Hoſ. ii. 15. ſee Exod. xv. 21. and intends vocal ſinging, as the next clauſe inſtrumental ſinging, as Kimchi obſerves. However, the Lord is the object of it, to whom praiſe is to be ſung for all the great and good things done by him, and that with thankſgiving to God for them; which, though a diſtinct thing from ſinging, and may be done without it, as in prayer; yet ſinging ought never to be without that; ſee Eph. v. 19, 20. Sing praiſe upon the harp unto our God; an inſtrument of muſic uſed in the times of the Old Teſtament; an emblem of the heart, and of making melody in it to the Lord: the hearts of believers are the harps of God, on and with which they ſing unto him, when they ſing aright, and theſe are in proper tune.

℣. 8. Who covereth the heaven with clouds, &c.] Which are exhalations of vapours out of the earth, and of waters out of the ſea, by the ſun, and formed into clouds; which are carried about in the air, and let down in ſhowers of rain upon the earth, in proper places, for the good of the inhabitants; and ſometimes, when neceſſary, the heavens are covered and become black with them, as in the times of Ahab, 2 Kings xviii. 35. and though they look dark, dull and melancholy, yet are for great uſefulneſs: hereby, as it follows, rain is prepared for the earth, to make it fruitful, to bring forth an increaſe for men and beaſts; and is a wonderful diſplay of the wiſdom, power, and goodneſs of God, for which he is to be praiſed. This may be either an emblem of afflictive diſpenſations of providence, which ſometimes make a dark and cloudy day, a day of clouds and thick darkneſs; eſpecially when the Lord covers himſelf with a cloud, or hides his face from his people; their ſins, as clouds, interpoſing between him and them; and yet theſe afflictions and deſertions, though not joyous, but grievous, tend to make the ſaints more holy, humble and fruitful: or elſe, of the churches being ſupplied with goſpel-miniſters; the heaven, and ſo the kingdom of heaven, often ſignifies the church of God or Chriſt; conſiſting of men, partakers of the heavenly calling, being born from above; and in which the goſpel and ordinances, that come from heaven, are miniſtered; and which, for the communion had with God, and the privileges of it, is as it were the ſuburbs and gate of heaven. Miniſters of the word are clouds full of the rain of heavenly and evangelic doctrine, which they drop and diſtil as the rain and dew upon the mowen graſs; and the covering the heavens with them, may denote the plenty ty of them, or a ſufficient number of them, as in the firſt times of the goſpel: all which are of God, who gives to his churches paſtors after his own heart; and commands and directs thoſe where to drop the rain of doctrine, and where not, for which he is to be praiſed; ſee Iſa. v. 6. Who prepareth rain for the earth; which is purely his preparation, production and gift, to water the earth and make it fruitful, and is what none of the vanities or idols of the Gentiles could give; and what he prepares in the clouds, the heavens are covered with: to this the word of God and the evangelic doctrine is compared, becauſe of its original; it is of God, and from heaven; it is diſpenſed and falls by divine direction, and ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another; and often in great plenty, as at the firſt, ſo in the laſt times of the goſpel-diſpenſation; and brings many bleſſings of grace and goodneſs with it; and like rain, is cooling, ſoftening, refreſhing and fructifying; and this is prepared of God, and ordained by him before the world was, for the good of his people; ſee Deut. xxxii. 2. Iſa. lv. 10, 11. 1 Cor. ii. 6. Who maketh graſs to grow upon the mountains; which would be otherwiſe dry and barren; but by the clouds letting down rain upon them, graſs grows on them for the cattle on a thouſand hills. Mountains, in a figurative ſenſe, ſignify churches, high, ſtrong, well-founded, viſible, and where God makes a feaſt of fat things for his people, Iſa. xxv. 6. graſs denotes true believers, they of the city which flouriſh like graſs; to which they are like, for their weakneſs in themſelves, their number, verdure and fruitfulneſs, and for their growth in the church; which is greatly owing to the goſpel and ordinances as means, the rain of goſpel-doctrine, the pure, ſincere and unadulterated word of God; by which ſouls grow in grace, and in the knowledge of divine things; ſee Pſal. lxxii. 16. Rev. ix. 4. 1 Pet. ii. 2, 3.

℣. 9. He giveth to the beaſt his food, &c.] Thro' the plenty of graſs growing upon the mountains, by the rain falling from the clouds of heaven upon them: theſe cannot provide for themſelves, but the Lord feeds them; and they wait upon him for their food, and receive it of him, Pſal. civ. 27, 28. How much more will he feed his own people, both with temporal and ſpiritual food; though in their fallen ſtate they are become like the beaſts, of which they are ſenſible when called by grace, and own and acknowledge it! Pſal. xlix. 12. and lxxiii. 22. Prov. xxx. 2. And to the young ravens which cry; which are particularly mentioned, becauſe contemptible creatures, and of no uſe and ſervice to men, and by the ceremonial law were impure to the Jews; and the rather, becauſe, as naturaliſts obſerve, they are very early turned out of their neſts, or forſaken by their dams: and this particular inſtance of the care of providence is elſewhere obſerved, Job xxxviii. 41. Luke xii. 24. Arama takes notice of the preſervation of this creature in the ark, and the uſe of it to Elijah. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Ethiopic and Arabic verſions, render it, that call upon him; that is, upon God and to him; they are expreſly ſaid to cry, Job xxxviii. 41. The ancient fathers interpret this figuratively; and by the ravens, underſtand the Gentiles; and by their young ones, Chriſtians that ſpring from them, who call upon the true God.

℣. 10. He delighteth not in the ſtrength of the horſe, &c.] It has been his will and pleaſure to give the horſe ſtrength for the uſe and ſervice of men, both for labour and war; and as this is a creature of his, and the work of his hands, it muſt be agreeable to him, Job xxxix. 19. yet a horſe, though prepared for the battle, is a vain thing for ſafety, which is only of the Lord; neither can it deliver any by its great ſtrength; nor are a king and his country ſaved by the multitude of an hoſt, or by a large cavalry: nor are theſe what the Lord delights in, nor does he ſave men for the ſake of them; though a well-mounted cavalry may be a pleaſing ſight to men, and they may raiſe their expectations, and promiſe themſelves great things from them; yet theſe are of no account with God, who can ſave as well without them as with them, Prov. xxi. 31. Pſal. xxxiii. 16, 17. The Targum is, “he delighteth not in the ſtrength of thoſe that “ride on horſes;” that are well mounted, and pride themſelves in it; and are equipped for war, and are mighty to engage in it, and prepared to make their eſcape in danger: Kimchi's note is, “he delighteth “not in man, who puts his confidence in the “ſtrength of the horſe; ſee Pſal. xx. 8. Iſa. xxxi. 1. He taketh not pleaſure in the legs of a man; in which his ſtrength lies, and of which he is apt to glory; but ſhould not, it being diſpleaſing to God; who delights not therein, but in loving-kindneſs, judgment and righteouſneſs, Jer. ix. 23, 24. not in the legs of a man of war, as Arama; which are ſtrong to ſtand his ground, or ſwift to flee away when hard preſſed; ſee Amos ii. 14, 15. ſo the Targum, “he takes no pleaſure in the legs of men that run;” that are ſwift to run races, or to flee in battle; to this ſenſe are the notes of Jarchi and Kimchi. It ſeems to intend the infantry in an army, as the cavalry before; and both intimate, that neither horſe nor foot are to be truſted in for ſafety, how pleaſing or promiſing they may be, ſince God ſeeth not as man does: or reference may be had to athletic exerciſes, of horſe and foot-races, of wreſtling, combats, &c. men may delight in, but God does not. What are pleaſing to him, are exerciſes of a ſpiritual kind; ſuch as fleeing to Jeſus, the ſtrong tower; running the chriſtian race, to obtain the incorruptible crown; wreſtling againſt principalities and powers, and ſuch acts of grace as are next mentioned.

℣. 11. The Lord taketh pleaſure in them that fear him, &c.] With a filial and godly fear; that ſerve and worſhip him, privately and publickly, with reverence and love: as appears by the goodneſs he lays up for them; the good things he communicates to them; the diſcoveries of his love, covenant and grace, they have from him; the guard he ſets about them; his eye of providence and grace over them; and his heart full of love, pity and compaſſion to them; ſee Pſal. xxxiii. 18. In thoſe that hope in his mercy; not general, but ſpecial; not in the abſolute mercy of God, but as diſplayed in Chriſt; and great encouragement there is to hope in it, from the plenty of it in his heart; from the inſtances of it among men; and from the bleſſings of grace and ſalvation that ſpring from it: and in ſuch the Lord takes pleaſure; hope is his own grace, and mercy is his delight; and he is pleaſed with thoſe that exerciſe hope upon it: not that the graces of fear and hope, and the exerciſe of them, are the cauſe and motives of God's delight in his people, which, as they were conſidered in Chriſt, was before the world was, or thoſe graces were in them; but theſe deſcribe and point out the perſons who are openly and manifeſtly the objects of his delight and pleaſure. Plutarch[r], an heathen writer, ſeems to have been acquainted with this and the preceding verſe, and to refer to them, when he ſays, "it is "ſomewhere ſaid, that God is not a lover of horſes, "nor of birds, but of men, and deſires to dwell "with thoſe that are eminently good; nor does he "refuſe nor deſpiſe the familiar converſe of a man "divine and wiſe."

℣. 12. Praiſe the Lord, O Jeruſalem, &c.] The inhabitants of it, as Kimchi; not Jeruſalem in a literal ſenſe, for this reſpects future time, as Aben Ezra; the world to come, the times of the Meſſiah: and intends the ſpiritual Jeruſalem, as Arama; that which is free, the mother of us all; the goſpel-church, and the members of it; which have great reaſon to praiſe the Lord, for their ſpecial bleſſings and peculiar privileges; ſee Gal. iv. 26, 27. Heb. xii. 22, 23. Praiſe thy God, O Zion; not the houſe and family of David, as R. Obadiah; nor the prieſts and Levites in the temple, as others; but the ſame as before, the church and people of God; the mount Zion God has loved and choſe for his habitation; the city of our ſolemnities in goſpel-times; the perfection of beauty, and joy of the whole earth; whoſe God and King is Chriſt; and whom Zion and all her children ſhould praiſe, being her incarnate God, Immanuel, God manifeſt in the fleſh. With this verſe the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions, begin the pſalm.

℣. 13. For he hath ſtrengthened the bars of thy gates, &c.] Of Jeruſalem, of Zion the church of God. Gates are for the letting in of perſons into the city of our God; which are Chriſt, faith in him, and a profeſſion of it; ſee Iſa. xxvi. 1, 2. bars are for the ſecurity of thoſe that are in it, and to keep out the enemy: and theſe ſtrengthened, denote the utmoſt ſafety of the true members of Chriſt and his church; who have nothing to fear from their ſpiritual enemies, ſin, law, Satan, the world, death and hell: God is on their ſide; Chriſt is the munition of rocks unto them; the holy Spirit is in them, who is greater than he that is in the world; and angels are guards about them; all which is matter of praiſe, and a ſufficient reaſon for it. He hath bleſſed thy children within thee; multiplied them and made them fruitful, increaſed the number of them; even the ſpiritual children of the church, brought forth to Chriſt by her; born in her, thro' the miniſtry of the goſpel; and brought up by her, with the ordinances of it. Theſe in the firſt times of the goſpel were very numerous, and will be ſo again in the latter day, like the drops of the morning-dew; and are and will be bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings, with pardoning, juſtifying, adopting and ſanctifying grace, and with eternal life; for which the Lord's name is to be praiſed.

℣. 14. He maketh peace in thy borders, &c.] Which are uſually moſt infeſted by enemies. It may denote the univerſality of peace throughout the land, in all the parts and borders of it; and be underſtood of the outward peace of the church with her enemies, and of the abundance and continuance of it in the latter day; and of that concord and harmony that ſhall be among the members of it; and alſo of that inward, ſpiritual conſcience-peace, each enjoy through believing; and which is in and from Chriſt, and flows from his blood and righteouſneſs, applied for pardon and juſtification; and is another reaſon for praiſing the Lord. And filleth thee with the fineſt of the wheat; or, fat of the wheat [s]: the beſt of it; ſee Deut. xxxii. 14. which is the choiceſt of grain, and makes the beſt of bread, and eſpecially the fineſt flour of it; and to be filled and ſatisfied with this, or to have enough of it, is a great temporal bleſſing. Here it may be underſtood ſpiritually of the goſpel, which may be compared to wheat and the fineſt of it, for its excellency and purity, for its ſolidity and ſubſtantiality; with which the chaff of human doctrine is not to be mentioned, Jer. xxiii. 28. and for its ſalutary, nouriſhing and ſtrengthening virtue; and eſpecially of Chriſt, the ſum and ſubſtance of it, ſometimes compared to a corn of wheat, John xii. 24. for his ſuperior excellency to all others, and the purity of his nature; for his great fruitfulneſs, and for being ſuitable food to his people; the bread of life, for which he is prepared by his ſufferings and death; which may be ſignified by the beating out of the corn, and grinding the wheat, and making it into bread, fit for uſe: and for this ſpiritual food, believers are abundantly thankful, and have reaſon to praiſe the Lord.

℣. 15. He ſendeth forth his commandment upon earth, &c.] Which Kimchi interprets of rain, which cauſes the wheat to grow; ſince afterwards mention is made of ſnow, and of hoar-froſt and ice. Aben Ezra underſtands it of the decree of God, which he executes on earth. The Targum, of the memra, or Word of the Lord; the eſſential Word, the Meſſiah; whom the Lord ſent on earth to perform the great work of redemption and ſalvation; and who came ſpeedily, and tarried not, when the fulneſs of time was come, as follows. It may deſign God's word of providence, which anſwers to his word of power in the firſt creation of all things; and which orders every thing done in the earth, and is inſtantly obeyed; which agrees with ℣. 18. and Pſal. cxlviii. 8. Or rather, the word of the goſpel; the doctrines and ordinances of divine revelation, agreeable to ℣. 19, 20. and ſo may have reſpect to the miſſion of the apoſtles of Chriſt, and miniſters of the word, to go into all the earth, and preach the goſpel to every creature. His word runneth very ſwiftly; ſo the goſpel did in the firſt times of it, like lightning, from one end of the heaven to the other; the words of it went into all the world, and the ſound of it unto the ends of the earth; it had a free courſe, and was glorified: and ſo it will in the latter day, when many ſhall run to and fro, and knowledge ſhall be increaſed; ſee Rom. x. 18. 2 Theſſ. iii. 1. Dan. xii. 4.

℣. 16. He giveth ſnow like wool, &c.] For colour as white as wool; ſo the Targum and Kimchi: and for the manner of its falling, lightly and gently as a lock of wool; which for its thinneſs and fineneſs it alſo reſembles. Hence the ancients uſed to call ſnow εριωδες υδωρ, woolly water [t]; and Martial [u] gives it the name of denſum vellus aquarum, a thick fleece of waters: ſo another poet [w] calls clouds, flying fleeces of wool, to which they ſometimes ſeem like; Pliny [x] calls it the froth of the celeſtial waters. And it is like wool for its uſefulneſs to the earth; for as wool covers the ſheep, and cloaths made of it cover men, and keep them warm; ſo ſnow falling upon the earth, covers it and keeps it warm, and ſecures the wheat and other fruits of the earth from the injuries of the cold: and this lies among the treaſures of the Lord, and he brings it out from thence, and commands it to be on the earth; and it is an uſeful gift of his providence, for which his name is to be praiſed; ſee Job xxxvii. 6.

and xxxviii. 22. The Jews have a ſaying, as Arama obſerves, that one day of ſnow is better than five of rain. In the third year of Valens and Valentinianus, with the Atrebates (a people in the Netherlands) real wool fell from the clouds mixed with rain [y]. Several bleſſings of grace are ſignified by this figure; as pardon of ſin, the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and the efficacy of the word of God, Pſal. li. 7. Iſa. i. 18. and lv. 10, 11. Lam. iv. 7. He ſcattereth the hoar-froſt like aſhes; which is the dew congealed by the intenſe cold of the air in the night-ſeaſon [z]: this for its colour looks like aſhes, and for its infinite number of particles may be compared to them; which are ſpread here and there, and every where; over gardens, fields, lands, herbs, plants and trees, as if they were ſtrewed with aſhes. And to hot aſhes it may be compared, becauſe of its burning nature, ſhriveling up leaves, herbs and plants, as if burnt; hence called pruina in the Latin tongue [a]. The manna is compared to this for its ſmallneſs, Exod. xvi. 14. which was typical of Chriſt, the hidden manna, and of the miniſtry of the goſpel; little, mean and contemptible, in the eyes of carnal men; torturing and tormenting to them, as the fire that came out of the mouths of the witneſſes; and is the ſavour of death unto death to ſome, while it is the ſavour of life unto life to others.

℣. 17. He caſteth forth his ice like morſels, &c.] Divided like morſels, as the Targum; cut into pieces like morſels of bread. This ſeems to have reſpect to hail-ſtones, which ſometimes fall like pieces of ice, and are very prejudicial to the fruits of the earth: this was one of the ten plagues of Egypt; and whereby alſo many of the Canaanites were deſtroyed in the times of Joſhua, Exod. ix. 23. Joſh. x. 11. and there is an exceeding great ſtorm of hail yet to come, very dreadful; ſee Rev. xvi. 21. This is expreſſive of the wrath, vengeance and judgments of God upon men, by which he is known in various perfections of his nature; as his power, juſtice and holineſs, for which he is celebrated, Iſa. xxx. 30. Who can ſtand before his cold? which he has purpoſed and promiſed ſhall be; for he has ſaid, that cold and heat ſhall not ceaſe, as long as the earth remains; and which he appoints and orders to be, for by the breath of God froſt is given, Gen. viii. 22. Job xxxvii. 10. and this is ſometimes and in ſome places ſo very vehement, that it is intolerable; men are obliged to keep within doors, to make them fires, and put on more cloaths; and the hands of every man are ſealed up from buſineſs; even the beaſts go into their dens, and remain in their places, or get what ſhelter they can; ſee Job xxxvii. 7, 8. And if there is no ſtanding before his cold, who can ſtand before the heat of his anger, or his furious wrath and indignation, when it is poured out like fire? ſee Pſal. lxxvi. 7. Nahum i. 5, 6. Rev. vi. 15—17.

℣. 18. He ſendeth out his word, and melteth them, &c.] The ſnow, the hoar-froſt and ice: this he does by a word of his, who can freeze the earth and waters, and thaw them at his pleaſure; by ordering the ſun to break forth with great heat, or rain to fall in great plenty; of both which Kimchi interprets his word; as well as by cauſing a warm wind to blow, as follows. He cauſeth his wind to blow, and the waters to flow; the ſouth-wind particularly; then the waters which were ſtill and motionleſs, flow as before, or more abundantly. Thus the hearts of men in a ſtate of nature, are like frozen earth or waters; they are cold, and without the heat of love, and affection to God and Chriſt, and ſpiritual things; they are as hard as a ſtone, and without any motion or deſire after things divine and heavenly: but when the Lord ſends his word, attended with a divine power and efficacy, it breaks and melts them; when the ſouth-wind of the bleſſed Spirit blows upon them, or his grace becomes effectual in convincing them of ſin, righteouſneſs and judgment; and when the Sun of righteouſneſs ariſes on them with healing in his wings; with which being warmed, they are looſened, and flow to the Lord and his goodneſs for all ſpiritual bleſſings.

℣. 19. He ſheweth his word unto Jacob, &c.] From the things of nature and providence, the pſalmiſt paſſes to the bleſſings of grace and goodneſs; for which the Lord is to be praiſed, particularly for his word and ordinances. The Targum interprets this of the words of the law; and indeed the law, or decalogue, was given only to the Iſraelites, the poſterity of Jacob; as alſo the ceremonial and judicial laws; and even the whole ſcripture, the oracles of God, were committed to them in a very peculiar manner: all which diſtinguiſhed them from the Gentiles, and gave them the preference to them; ſee Deut. iv. 6—8. Rom. iii. 1, 2. and ix. 4. But the goſpel-part of the word is alſo included; the word of grace, peace, reconciliation, righteouſneſs, eternal life and ſalvation, which was firſt publiſhed to the Jews: it was ſhewn unto them, for it cannot be known by any without a revelation; the goſpel, and the things of it, are hidden things to natural men, and could never have been diſcerned by any, had they not been ſhewn by the Lord; as they are externally in the miniſtration of the word, and internally and effectually by the Spirit of God; who is the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of divine things. His ſtatutes and his judgments unto Iſrael; the ordinances of divine worſhip under the former diſpenſation, which were peculiar to literal Iſrael; and thoſe of the goſpel-diſpenſation, which belong to the ſpiritual Iſrael, Jews and Gentiles; and which are ſhewn and directed to in the word, to be obſerved by them; and both the goſpel, and the ordinances of it, are inſtances of divine favour, for which the Lord is to be praiſed.

℣. 20. He hath not dealt ſo with any nation, &c.] Or every nation [b]; or all the nations under the heavens; only with the Jewiſh nation: theſe only for many hundreds of years were favoured with the divine revelation, with the word and ordinances of God; with the law and with the goſpel, and with the ſervice and worſhip of God; as well as with promiſes and prophecies of Chriſt, and good things to come by him. Theſe were not communicated to any one nation or body of people beſides them; only now and then, to one here and there among the Gentiles: the goſpel was firſt preached to them at the coming of Chriſt, and after them to the Gentiles, when rejected by them. And as for his judgments, they have not known them; by which are meant, not the providential diſpenſations of God, which are unſearchable and paſt finding out, till made manifeſt; nor puniſhments inflicted on wicked men, unobſerved by them; but the word of God, and the ordinances of it, which the Gentile world for many ages were unacquainted with; ſee Pſal.

Pſal. xix. 9. Praiſe ye the Lord; as literal Iſrael had reaſon to do, for thoſe diſtinguiſhing inſtances of his favour and goodneſs; and as the ſpiritual Iſrael of God every where have; and particularly our Britiſh Iſrael, who are highly favoured with the privileges of having the word of God purely and powerfully preached, and his ordinances truly and duly adminiſtered; at leaſt in ſome parts of it, and that more than in any other nation under the heavens.

PSALM CXLVIII.

THIS pſalm ſeems to have been written about the ſame time, and by the ſame perſon as the preceding; even by the pſalmiſt David, when he was in profound peace and at reſt from all his enemies; and the kingdom of Iſrael was in a well-ſettled and proſperous condition, both with reſpect to things civil and eccleſiaſtical, as appears from ℣. 14. And as it may reſpect future time, the times of the Meſſiah, of whom David was a type, it will have its accompliſhment in the latter day, when there will be juſt occaſion for all creatures in heaven and earth to praiſe the Lord; and which the evangeliſt John in viſion ſaw and heard them doing, Rev. v. 11—13. Aben Ezra ſays, this pſalm is exceeding glorious and excellent, and has deep ſecrets in it; in which the pſalmiſt ſpeaks of two worlds, the upper and the lower. As for the title of this pſalm, the Septuagint, Syriac and Ethiopic verſions, and Apollinarius, intitle it as the two preceding.

℣. 1. Praiſe ye the Lord, &c.] Or hallelujah; which in ſome verſions, and with ſome interpreters, is the title of the pſalm; expreſſive of the ſubject-matter of it, the praiſe of the Lord; and is an exhortation of all creatures to it. Praiſe ye the Lord from the heavens; that is, thoſe that are of the heavens; let their praiſes of the Lord, of his perfections, works and benefits, reſound from thence; the angels of heaven particularly, who have their habitation and reſidence there, and ſometimes deſcend from thence on ſpecial buſineſs, by the order and appointment of their great Creator and Maſter: ſo the Targum, "praiſe the Lord, ye holy creatures "from heaven." Though ſome take the phraſe, from heaven, to be deſcriptive of the Lord, the object of praiſe, who is the Lord from heaven; the character of Chriſt, the ſecond Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 47. who is from above; came down from heaven to do the will of God; and was in heaven, as to his divine perſon, while here on earth in human nature, working out the ſalvation of men; for which he juſtly deſerves the praiſe of all in heaven and in earth. But as all creatures are diſtinguiſhed in this pſalm into celeſtial and terreſtrial, called upon to praiſe the Lord; this ſeems to be the general character of the celeſtial ones, perſons, bodies and things; as the phraſe from the earth, ℣. 7. includes all in the terraqueous globe. Praiſe him in the heights; either in the higheſt heavens where he dwells, or with the higheſt notes of praiſe that can be raiſed; ſee Pſal. cxlix. 6. Luke ii. 14. The Targum is, "praiſe him, all the hoſts of angels on high;" or the high hoſts of angels: but theſe are particularly mentioned in the next verſe.

℣. 2. Praiſe ye him, all his angels, &c.] The Targum adds, who miniſter before him: the miniſtring ſpirits, the angels of Jehovah, even of Chriſt, who are his creatures and at his command; and whom he ſends forth to miniſter to others, Heb. i. 7, 14. And great numbers there are of them, thouſands and tens of thouſands, yea, an innumerable company; and all of them are under obligation to praiſe the Lord for their creation: for inviſible ſpirits, as well as viſible bodies, even the celeſtial thrones, dominions, principalities and powers, were created by him, by Chriſt, Col. i. 16. And for their preſervation in their beings, and confirmation in that happy eſtate in which they were created; being choſen and ſecured in Chriſt, the head of all principality and power, and ſo ſtood whilſt others fell: and alſo for the various excellent powers, and faculties and properties, they are endowed with; they excel in ſtrength, are poſſeſſed of great agility and ſwiftneſs; have a large ſhare of knowledge, of things natural, civil, moral, ſpiritual and evangelical; are perfectly holy, and without ſin; and happy in the enjoyment of God, in whoſe preſence they always are, and whoſe face they continually behold; and will ever remain in this ſtate, being immaterial and immortal beings. And as praiſe is their duty, it is their work; in this they were employed at the creation of all things, then theſe ſons of God and morning-ſtars ſang and ſhouted for joy; and at the incarnation of Chriſt, when they worſhipped him; at the converſion of every ſinner; and frequently join the church in this ſervice, and will be concerned in it to all eternity: and when the pſalmiſt calls upon them to engage in it, it does not ſuppoſe that they were deficient in it, or backward to it, or that he had any authority over them to require it of them; but it ſhews his great deſire that the Lord might be praiſed by the nobleſt creatures, and in the beſt manner that could be, and how much his heart was in this work; and he does it to ſtir up himſelf and others the more unto it, from this conſideration; that if thoſe heavenly creatures ſhould praiſe the Lord, then much more ſuch as he and others, who were ſo very unworthy of the divine favours, and ſo much beholden to the Lord for them. Praiſe ye him, all his hoſts; meaning either the angels as before, ſometimes called the hoſts of heaven, and the heavenly hoſt; there being armies and legions of them, and theſe encamping about the ſaints in a military way; ſee 2 Kings xxii. 19. Luke ii. 13. Matt. xxvi. 53. Pſal. xxxiv. 7. or elſe the celeſtial bodies, the ſun, moon and ſtars, as follow, ſometimes called the hoſt of heaven; and who are repreſented as militant, Gen. ii. 1. 2 Kings xxi. 3. Judg. v. 20.

℣. 3. Praiſe ye him, ſun and moon, &c.] The ſun praiſes the Lord, the Creator of it, by doing the work conſtantly it is appointed to do; to rule by day, and give light and heat to the earth, and the inhabitants of it; and ſo is the cauſe of man's praiſing the Lord for the benefits they receive from it; for its enlightening, warming and refreſhing rays; and for the precious fruits brought forth by it. And ſo the moon likewiſe doing its office, ruling by night, and reflecting the light of the ſun upon the earth, and producing precious fruits, alſo praiſes its Maker, and is the occaſion of others praiſing him; ſee Pſal. cxxxvi. 1, 7, 8, 9. Deut. xxxiii. 14. Praiſe him, all ye ſtars of light; which are very beneficial in the night-ſeaſon, eſpecially to mariners and travellers, and ſhed their benign influences upon the earth and things in it; which are a means of praiſing the Lord, and in their way they do it, Pſal. cxxxvi. 1, 9. Acts xxvii. 20. Job xxxviii. 31. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read it, ſtars and light, wrongly; the ſtars are luminous bodies and ſhine in their own light[c], though the moon with a borrowed light from the ſun.

℣. 4. Praiſe him, ye heaven of heavens, &c.] All the heavens, the airy and ſtarry heavens; and the third heaven, the reſidence of God, angels and ſaints: theſe are made by the Lord, and declare the glory of his power, wiſdom and goodneſs, and ſhew forth his handy work, Pſal. xix. 1. A voice was heard from heaven, praiſing Jehovah the Son, when on earth in our nature; a cloud of the lower heavens received him when he went from hence, and in the clouds thereof he will come again: the higheſt heavens opened to receive him, and will retain him until the reſtitution of all things; and from hence he will deſcend to judge the world in righteouſneſs, Matt. iii. 16. and xvii. 5. Acts i. 9. and iii. 21. Rev. i. 7. And ye waters that be above the heavens; divided by the firmament from the waters below; and are no other than the thick clouds, in which the waters are bound up, and not rent, but at the pleaſure of God, Gen. i. 7. Job xxvi. 9. ſo Seneca[d] calls the clouds the celeſtial waters. And theſe give men occaſion to praiſe the Lord, that thoſe vaſt bodies of water that are over their heads, are not let down in ſuch large quantities upon them as would deſtroy them; and that they are carried about from place to place, and let down in ſoft and gentle ſhowers, to water and refreſh the earth, and make it fruitful, ſo that it brings forth food for man and beaſt. The Targum is, "ye waters, that by the Word (of "the Lord) hang above the heavens;" in which is diſplayed the glory of amazing power, wiſdom and goodneſs. The moſt ancient Syrians and Arabians were thoroughly perſuaded, that beyond the bounds of the viſible heavens, there was a great ſea, without any limits; which ſome[e] ſuppoſe to be the waters here meant.

℣. 5. Let them praiſe the name of the Lord, &c.] Set forth the glory of the nature and perfections of God, and celebrate the praiſe of them; even all celeſtial creatures, the angels, the hoſts of heaven, the ſun, moon and ſtars; the heavens, and the heaven of heavens, and the waters above them; and that for the following reaſons. For he commanded, and they were created; they are all his creatures, and therefore ſhould praiſe him: he is the father of ſpirits, of angelic ſpirits, as well as the ſpirits of men; and the father of lights, of all the luminaries of the heavens; and he has made the heavens themſelves, and all their hoſts, and the firmament dividing the waters above and below; and all this by an almighty fiat, at a word of command; he ſpoke, and they came into being at once, Heb. xii. 9. James i. 17. Pſal. xxxiii. 6, 9.

℣. 6. He hath alſo ſtabliſhed them for ever and ever, &c.] The angels are made immortal, and ſhall never die; and they are confirmed in their ſtate of happineſs by Chriſt, and ſhall always continue in it; the hoſts of heaven being created by him conſiſt in him, and will remain as long as the world does; hence the duration and never-failing ſtate of other things, even of good men and their felicity, are expreſſed by them; ſee Pſal. lxxii. 5, 7. and lxxxix. 36, 37. He hath made a decree which ſhall not paſs; concerning thoſe creatures and their duration, which ſhall never paſs away, or be fruſtrated or made void; but ſhall always continue and have its ſure and certain effect; ſee Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. and xxxiii. 25. and is true of every decree of God which is eternal and infruſtrable, and is always fulfilled, Iſa. xiv. 27. and xxv. 1. and xlvi. 10.

℣. 7. Praiſe the Lord from the earth, &c.] Let his praiſe reſound from all creatures on earth, and reach him in the higheſt heavens; this phraſe comprehends all terreſtrial beings afterwards particularly mentioned; all in the terraqueous globe, all that ariſe from it, are upon it, or within it. Ye dragons, and all deeps; either land-dragons, or rather ſea-dragons, the water or ſea being the proper place of them, Pſal. xliv. 19. and lxxiv. 13, 14. theſe, as cruel, as poiſonous and pernicious as they are, are made to honour and praiſe the Lord, Iſa. xliii. 20. and ſuch as are myſtically ſignified by them, as Satan, tyrannical and perſecuting princes; and antichriſtian ones, as Pharaoh king of Egypt, Rome pagan and papal; out of whom the Lord has or will get himſelf praiſe in the deliverance of his people from them, and in the deſtruction of them, and in the confeſſions they have been obliged to make of him, Rev. xii. 3, 9, 10, 16, 17. and xiii. 2. Iſa. xxvii. 1. Exod. ix. 16. theſe ſeem to be ſet in contraſt with the angels. The word is uſed for the great whales the Lord made, which are thought to be the ſame with the leviathan of Job; of whom ſo many things are ſaid, which declare the power and wiſdom of God in the formation of it, Gen. i. 21. Job xli. 1, &c. and theſe may be put for the innumerable creatures in the ſea, which in their way ſhew forth the praiſe and glory of God, Pſal. civ. 24—26. as all deeps do, deep waters, eſpecially, the depths of the ſea, and the inhabitants of them; where the wonders of God are to be ſeen, and give occaſion to thoſe that go down to the ſea in ſhips to praiſe his name, Pſal. cvii. 23, 24.

℣. 8. Fire, and hail, &c.] Theſe, and what follow in this verſe, are in the air, but are what are exhaled or drawn up from the earth or water; fire is lightning, which is very ſwift in its motion, and powerful in its effects; this is the fire which conſumed Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain; which in Elijah's time came down and deſtroyed the captains and their fifties; and which attended the Lord's appearance on mount Sinai; when the voice of his thunder was in the heaven, the lightnings lightened the world, and the earth trembled and ſhook, Pſal. lxxvii. 18. and by which the power, majeſty, and glory of God are greatly diſplayed; ſee Pſal. xxix. 3—9. hail, which is water frozen in the air and congealed; this was one of the plagues of Egypt; and with hailſtones many of the Canaanites were ſlain in the times of Joſhua; and by theſe God has ſhewn his power, and has got himſelf praiſe from his people by deſtroying their enemies, though they have blaſphemed his name on account of them, as they will when the great hail-ſtorm of all ſhall fall, Rev. xvi. 21. Snow, and vapour; the former is a gift of God, and very beneficial to the earth, and the cauſe of praiſe and thankfulneſs to God; ſee the note on Pſal. cxlvii. 16. the word[f] for vapour ſignifies ſmoke, and is what riſes out of the earth like ſmoke, as Kimchi and Ben Melech obſerve; and is hot and dry, and forms lightnings and winds, and has its place among things that occaſion praiſe. Stormy wind fulfilling fulfilling his word; which is raiſed up by a word of his command; he creates it, brings it out of his treaſures, holds it in his fiſts, and lets it go out at his pleaſure to fulfil his will; either, as at ſome times, in a way of mercy, as to dry up the waters of the flood, to make a way for Iſrael through the Red-ſea, to bring quails to them in the wilderneſs, and rain to the land of Iſrael in Ahab's time; and ſometimes in a way of judgment, to drown Pharaoh and his hoſt in the Red-ſea, to break the ſhips of Tarſhiſh, to fetch Jonah the diſobedient prophet back, and to diſtreſs him afterwards; ſee Pſal. cvii. 25. to do all this is an argument of divine power, and a proof of deity, as it is of our Lord's, Matt. viii. 27. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions read it in the plural number, which do his word; referring it not to the ſtormy wind only, but to fire and hail, ſnow and vapour; but the Hebrew text reſtrains it to the ſtormy wind.

℣. 9. Mountains, and all hills, &c.] Which are originally formed by the Lord, and ſet faſt by his power and ſtrength; theſe are the higheſt parts of the earth, and are very ornamental and uſeful; they include all in them and upon them, the trees and herbage that grow upon them, gold, ſilver, braſs and iron in them; all very beneficial to mankind, and afford matter of praiſe to God for them; ſee Iſa. lv. 12. Fruitful trees, and all cedars; trees bearing fruit are the fig-trees, pomegranates, vines, and olives, with which the land of Canaan abounded; and ſuch as bear lemons, oranges, plumbs, pears, apples, cherries, &c. which produce fruit for the uſe, pleaſure, and delight of man, and ſo a means of praiſing God: and cedars, the trees of the Lord which he hath planted; though they bear no fruit, yet very uſeful in building, and were of great ſervice in the temple at Jeruſalem; and which are put for all others of like uſefulneſs, and miniſter juſt occaſion of praiſe; ſee Pſal. xcvi. 12.

℣. 10. Beaſts, and all cattle, &c.] Wild and tame; the beaſts of the field, and the cattle on a thouſand hills, which are all the Lord's, made, ſupported, and ſupplied by him; he gives them their food and drink, which they wait for and receive from him, and in their manner praiſe him for the ſame; and theſe are uſeful to men for labour or for food, and therefore ſhould praiſe the Lord for them; ſee Iſa. xliii. 20. Creeping things, and flying fowl; of creeping things ſome belong to the ſea and others to the land; ſee Pſal. civ. 25. and there is not the leaſt creature on the ſea or land, the meaneſt reptile or worthleſs worm, but is of ſuch exquiſite workmanſhip as gives praiſe and glory to the Creator; and ſo do every fly and every inſect, as well as flying fowl of the greateſt bigneſs, as the eagle, vulture, &c. theſe, though they fly in the air, had their original from the waters, Gen. i. 20.

℣. 11. Kings of the earth, and all people, &c.] The order of the creation is pretty much obſerved throughout the whole of this account; and as man was made laſt of all, ſo here he is called upon laſt to praiſe the Lord; and the chief among men are begun with, the kings of the earth, of the ſeveral nations of the earth divided into kingdoms, over which ſome are ſet as ſupreme: and theſe have reaſon to praiſe the Lord who has raiſed them to ſuch dignity, for promotion comes not by chance, but by the Lord, who ſets up kings and puts them down at his pleaſure; and alſo for thoſe gifts beſtowed upon them, qualifying them for government, for it is by him kings reign and princes decree juſtice; and likewiſe for the preſervation of them, for it is he that gives ſalvation to kings, and continues them for uſefulneſs, notwithſtanding all plots and conſpiracies againſt them, Pſal. cxliv. 9, 10. ſee Pſal. lxxv. 6, 7. Prov. viii. 15, 16. and all people; their ſubjects, as they ſhould ſubmit unto them and pray for them, ſo ſhould praiſe the Lord on their account, when they rule well, protect and defend them in their perſons, property, and liberties, Prov. xxix. 2. Princes, and all judges of the earth; the ſons of kings, princes of the blood, heirs of the crown; or nobles, miniſters of ſtate, counſellors, and all ſubordinate magiſtrates, who are in high places of honour, profit and truſt, and ſo ſhould praiſe the Lord by whom they are brought to ſuch honour; and when they fill up their places, and diſcharge their truſt aright, the people have reaſon to be thankful for them; and eſpecially for the judges of the earth, when they are men fearing God and hating covetouſneſs, and impartially miniſter juſtice and judgment; ſee Pſal. ii. 10, 11.

℣. 12. Both young men, and maidens, &c.] Theſe ſhould praiſe the Lord, the one for their ſtrength, the other for their beauty; and both ſhould remember their Creator in the days of their youth, and fear, ſerve, and worſhip him; ſo they will praiſe and glorify him, as did Obadiah, Joſiah, Timothy, and the four daughters of Philip the evangeliſt. Old men, and children; the former have had a large experience of the providential goodneſs of God, and if good men, of the grace of God, and are under great obligation to praiſe the Lord for all that he has done for them; for they have known him that is from the beginning, and have ſeen many of his wonderful works, which they ſhould not forget to declare to their children to the honour and glory of God; and even out of the mouth of children, of babes and ſucklings, who have leſs knowledge, and leſs experience, God ſometimes does ordain ſtrength and perfect praiſe to himſelf; ſee Pſalm viii. 2. compared with Matt. xxi. 15, 16.

℣. 13. Let them praiſe the name of the Lord, &c.] His nature and perfections, and celebrate the glory of them; and his wonderful works, and the bleſſings of his goodneſs, both of providence and grace; even all the above creatures and things, celeſtial and terreſtial, for the following reaſons. For his name alone is excellent; the name of the Lord is himſelf, who is excellent in power, wiſdom, goodneſs, truth, and faithfulneſs, and in all other perfections of his nature; his works by which he is known are excellent, both of nature and of grace, and proclaim his glory; his Son, in whom his name is, and by whom he has manifeſted himſelf, is excellent as the cedars; and ſo are all his precious names by which he is called; and ſuch is the goſpel, by which he is notified to the world: nay, the Lord's name is alone excellent; all creature-excellencies are nothing in compariſon of him, in heaven or in earth, thoſe of angels and men; and therefore ſhould be praiſed by all, and above all. His glory is above the earth and heaven; there is the glory of celeſtial and terreſtial bodies which differ; the glory of the ſun, moon, and ſtars, and of one ſtar from another; but the glory of the divine Being, the Creator of them, infinitely exceeds the glory of them all: his glorious majeſty reſides above heaven and earth; the heaven is the throne he ſits upon, and the earth the footſtool he ſtands on; and Chriſt, who is ſometimes called his glory, and is the brightneſs of it, Pſal. lxiii. 2. Heb. i. 3. is exalted above every name on earth, and is made higher than the heavens, and ſo is exalted above all bleſſing and praiſe; ſee Pſalm viii. 1. Nehemiah ix. 5.

℣. 14. He alſo exalteth the horn of his people, &c.] Which is done when he increaſes their ſtrength, their ſpiritual ſtrength eſpecially; makes them ſtrong in the Lord, in his grace, and in the power of his might; when their dominion and authority is enlarged, and victory given over all their enemies; particularly when the kingdom under the whole heaven ſhall be given to them, and when they ſhall reign with Chriſt on earth; for this phraſe denotes the honourable as well as the ſafe ſtate of the people of God; the horn being an emblem of power, authority and dominion; the Targum renders it, "the glory of his people;" ſee Pſalm lxxv. 10. Some interpret this of Chriſt the horn of David, the horn of ſalvation, and the author of it, Pſalm cxxxii. 17. Luke i. 69. who is king over his people, as an horn ſignifies; and is the ſtrength, ſafety and ſecurity of them; has gotten them the victory over all their enemies, and is now exalted in heaven at the right hand of God, and that for his people[g], as it may be rendered; he is both raiſed up and exalted for them. The praiſe of all his ſaints; that is, the Lord is the object of the praiſe of all his ſaints, to whom he has ſhewed favour and kindneſs, and on whom he has beſtowed the bleſſings of his grace; it is matter of praiſe that they are ſaints, ſet apart by God the Father, ſanctified by the blood of Chriſt, and by the Spirit of God; and that their horn is exalted, or they raiſed to dignity and honour; and that Chriſt is raiſed and lifted up as an horn for them, 1 Cor. i. 30, 31. Rev. i. 5, 6. Luke i. 68, 69. Even of the children of Iſrael; not literal but ſpiritual Iſrael, ſuch who are Iſraelites indeed, whether Jews or Gentiles. A people near unto him; in reſpect of union, being one with him, in the bond of everlaſting love; in reſpect of relation, being near akin, he their Father, they his children, not by creation only, but by adopting grace; and Chriſt their near kinſman, nay their father, brother, head and huſband; in reſpect of acceſs unto him, which they have through Chriſt, with boldneſs and confidence, being made nigh and brought near by the blood of Chriſt; in reſpect of communion and the enjoyment of his gracious preſence; and in reſpect of inhabitation, God, Father, Son, and Spirit, dwelling in them, and making their abode with them: or as it may be rendered, the people of his near one[h]; that is, of Chriſt, who is near to God his Father, is one with him, was with him from everlaſting, was as one brought up with him, yea lay in his boſom, drew nigh to him as the ſurety of his people, and offered himſelf a ſacrifice to him as their prieſt, and now is ſet down at his right hand as their king; and where he alſo appears for them, is their advocate, and ever lives to intercede for them. Praiſe ye the Lord; even all creatures, eſpecially his ſaints, his people, the children of Iſrael, the laſt ſpoken of.

PSALM CXLIX.

THIS pſalm is thought by Calvin and others to have been written for the ſake of the Jews that returned from the Babyloniſh captivity; and is a prediction of great and famous things done in the times of the Maccabees to heathens and their princes, ſo Theodoret; the Syriac verſion entitles it, "concerning the new temple;" that is, the ſecond temple, built by Zerubbabel, and the things done under that; but it rather ſeems to have been written by David in the beginning of his reign, when he obtained victories over the Philiſtines, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites and Syrians; and refers to the times of the Meſſiah, as Kimchi, R. Obadiah Gaon, and others think; not of the Jews vainly expected Meſſiah, but of the true Meſſiah, who is come, and will come again, ſpiritually and perſonally; and there are many things in it applicable both to the firſt and latter part of his days.

℣. 1. Praiſe ye the Lord, &c.] Or hallelujah; the title of the pſalm, according to many. Sing unto the Lord a new ſong; for a new mercy received, a new victory obtained, or a new ſalvation wrought; more particularly the new ſong of redeeming grace through Jeſus Chriſt, the ſong of the Lamb, in diſtinction from the old ſong of Moſes and the children of Iſrael at the Red-ſea, on account of their deliverance, which was typical of ſalvation by Chriſt, the oldeſt, being the firſt ſong we read of; but this is a new one, which none but the redeemed of the Lamb can ſing; a ſong ſuited to goſpel-times, in which all things are new, a new church-ſtate, new ordinances, a new covenant, and a new and living way to the holieſt of all; a ſong proper for renewed perſons to ſing, who have new favours continually to bleſs and praiſe the Lord for. And his praiſe in the congregation of ſaints; ſuch who are partakers of the bleſſings of divine goodneſs; are ſeparated and diſtinguiſhed from others by the grace of God; are ſanctified and brought into a goſpel-church-ſtate; and who gather and aſſemble together to worſhip God, and attend upon him in his word and ordinances: and in ſuch aſſemblies the praiſes of God are to be ſung; which being done ſocially, the ſaints are aſſiſting to one another in this ſervice; and it is done with greater ſolemnity, and is more to the public honour and glory of God; thus goſpel-churches are called upon to ſing the praiſes of God among themſelves, Eph. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. and have Chriſt for an example going before them, Pſal. xxii. 22, 25.

℣. 2. Let Iſrael rejoice in him that made him, &c.] Or, in his makers[i], Father, Son, and Spirit; as in Job xxxv. 10. Iſa. liv. 5. ſee alſo Eccl. xii. 1. for all three perſons had a concern in the creation of man at firſt, let us make man, &c. Gen. i. 26. and have in the formation of every individual man; of the Iſraelites as men, and of them as a body politic and eccleſiaſtic, being raiſed up, conſtituted, and formed by the Lord in their civil and church-ſtate, and therefore had reaſon to rejoice in him, Deut. xxxii. 6. and ſo have all the ſpiritual Iſrael of God, whom he has choſen, redeemed, and called; every Iſraelite indeed, all who are the workmanſhip of God, the people he has formed for himſelf, and to ſhew forth his praiſe: theſe ſhould rejoice in God the Father, who has choſen them in Chriſt, bleſſed them with all ſpiritual bleſſings in him, ſent him to redeem them, has juſtified them by his righteouſneſs, pardoned their ſins through his blood, adopted them and made them heirs of glory; and in the Son of God their Redeemer, they ſhould rejoice in his perſon, in his righteouſneſs, ſacrifice, and fulneſs; and in the holy Spirit, who has regenerated and ſanctified them, is their comforter, and the earneſt of their future glory. Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King; not in David, unleſs as a type, but in his Son, the King Meſſiah, who is king of Zion; and therefore the children of Zion, the church, who are born of her, the mother of us all, and born in her through the miniſtry of the word, and brought up there by means of the goſpel, and the ordinances of it; ſuch as are regenerate perſons, ſons of God, and members of goſpel-churches, ſhould rejoice in Chriſt, the King of ſaints; that they have ſuch a King over them, who is the greateſt of kings, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; ſo righteous in the adminiſtration of his government, ſo wiſe in making laws for them, ſo powerful to protect and defend them; and who muſt reign till all enemies are put under his feet, even for ever and ever. Every appearance of Chriſt's kingdom is matter of joy to ſaints; his firſt coming was as a king, though in a mean and lowly manner; yet joyful to Zion and her children, Zech. ix. 9. his aſcenſion to heaven, when he was declared Lord and Chriſt; the pouring forth of his Spirit, and the ſucceſs of his goſpel in the Gentile world, to the overthrow of paganiſm in it, Rev. xii. 10. and eſpecially it will be an occaſion of great joy to his ſubjects, when he takes to himſelf his great power, and reigns, Rev. xi. 15—17. and xix. 6.

℣. 3. Let them praiſe his name in the dance, &c.] In a chorus of ſaints, joining together in their expreſſions of joy, by words and geſtures; an ancient practice that went along with ſinging praiſes, Exod. xv. 20. or rather, with the pipe[k], as ſome render it; a muſical inſtrument uſed in former times in the worſhip of God, in this part of it, praiſing his name, with thoſe that follow. Let them ſing praiſes unto him with the timbrel and harp; the former of theſe was a veſſel of braſs, a drum or tabret, on which they beat, perhaps like one of our kettle-drums; the other was a ſtringed inſtrument of muſic much uſed, and in playing on which David was very ſkilful: the muſic of theſe was typical of the ſpiritual melody made in the heart to the Lord in ſinging his praiſes, to which there are alluſions in goſpel-times; though the inſtruments themſelves are now laid aſide, being only ſuited to the church in her infant-ſtate, when under tutors and governors; ſee Pſal. lxviii. 25. Rev. v. 9. and xiv. 2. and xv. 2.

℣. 4. For the Lord taketh pleaſure in his people, &c.] Not all mankind; though they are all his people by creation, and are under the care of his providence; yet they are not all acceptable to him; ſome are abhorred by him for their ſins and tranſgreſſions: but theſe are a ſpecial and peculiar people, whom he has foreknown and choſen, taken into the covenant of his grace, and provided in it bleſſings for them; whom he has given to Chriſt, and he has redeemed; and who are called by the Spirit and grace of God, whereby they appear to be his people. Theſe the Lord loves with a love of complacency and delight; he takes pleaſure in their perſons, as conſidered in Chriſt, in whom they are accepted with him; as they are cloathed with his righteouſneſs, and made comely through his comelineſs; as waſhed in his precious blood, and adorned with the graces of his Spirit: yea, he takes pleaſure in their ſervices done in faith, and from love, and to his glory; in their ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe, as offered up through Chriſt; in the company of them and communion with them; and in their proſperity and happineſs, here and hereafter. He will beautify the meek with ſalvation; humble and lowly ſouls, who have been truly humbled under a ſenſe of ſin; brought to ſubmit to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and to depend upon the grace of God for ſalvation; are ſubject to the yoke of Chriſt, and patiently ſubmit to the will of God under every diſpenſation of providence; are not eaſily provoked to wrath; are free from envy and malice; have mean thoughts of themſelves, and high ones of other ſaints: theſe the Lord beautifies now with more grace, with which ſalvation is connected; with the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and the garments of his ſalvation, which are beautiful ones; and he will beautify them with eternal ſalvation, with the white robes of immortality and bliſs, when they will ſhine as the ſun in the kingdom of heaven.

℣. 5. Let the ſaints be joyful in glory, &c.] In the glory put upon them now, being beautified with ſalvation; in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt on them, and the grace of Chriſt in them, which makes them all-glorious within; and in the glory they expect to have hereafter, both upon their bodies and ſouls, and in the hope of that, Rom. v. 2. Some copies of the Ethiopic verſion render it, in his glory; in the glory of Chriſt, as a divine perſon and as Mediator, ſeen now in the glaſs of the goſpel, and will be the object of the beatific viſion hereafter; and now is, and then will be, matter of joy unſpeakable, 2 Cor. iii. 18. John xvii. 24. Or glorioſly[l], in a glorious manner; as ſaints do rejoice, when they aſcribe all the glory of ſalvation to the free grace of God and death of Chriſt, and rejoice on that account; ſaints have reaſon to rejoice, and indeed none but they; who being regenerated and ſanctified, are meet for, and ſhall partake of eternal glory. Let them ſing aloud upon their beds; whilſt others are taking their reſt and eaſe, let them meditate on the word of God; commune with their own hearts about their ſtate and condition; remember the Lord, and his goodneſs to them; all which give an occaſion to give thanks unto him, and ſing aloud his praiſe, Pſal. lxiii. 5, 6, and cxix. 62. and when they awake on their beds in a morning, after ſound ſleep and a good repoſe, it becomes them to praiſe the Lord, who gives his beloved ſleep; and who only makes them ſleep, and dwell in ſafety, Pſal. iv. 8. And the phraſe denotes the ſafe and ſecure ſtate of the ſaints upon their beds, lying down and ſleeping comfortably, having nothing to fear, the Lord ſuſtaining them; and ſo may and ſhould ſing upon their beds, Pſal. iii. 5, 6. Yea, ſaints may ſing upon their ſick-beds; ſince the Lord is with them there, and ſtrengthens them on a bed of languiſhing, and makes all their bed in their ſickneſs, Pſal. xli. 3. and even upon their death-beds may ſing aloud the triumphant ſong, O death, where is thy ſting? &c. 1 Cor. xv. 55—57. Saints in a future ſtate are on beds; the grave is a bed, where their fleſh reſts in hope; and the boſom and arms of Jeſus are the bed in which their ſouls reſt; and where they are, not in a ſtate of inſenſibility and inactivity, but are walking and talking, and ſinging aloud the praiſes of electing, redeeming and calling grace, Iſa. lvii. 1, 2. So Arama interprets the ſaints on their beds, thoſe that lie in the grave, when they ſhall riſe from thence.

℣. 6. Let the high praiſes of God be in their mouth, &c.] Or throat[m]; loudly declared by them. The word praiſes is not in the text, and ſo may be read, the high things of God[n]; or, the heights of God, as the Septuagint: and theſe are the perfections of God; as his omniſcience, which is knowledge too high for a creature to attain unto, and even to conceive of; his omnipotence, for high is his right hand; his omnipreſence, this is higher than heaven, deeper than hell, its meaſure is longer than the earth, and broader than the ſea; his love, grace and mercy, which are in the heavens; and his truth and faithfulneſs, which reach to the clouds; his eternity, immutability, and other attributes; all which ſhould be often talked of and celebrated: alſo the high acts and works of God, thoſe more inward and ſecret; as the thoughts of his heart, which are higher than ours, as the heavens than the earth; the everlaſting love of God, which has an height not to be reached; the eternal choice of perſons to grace and glory, before all time; the covenant of grace, which exceeds the mountains for height, as well as duration; and the glorious ſcheme of our peace, reconciliation and redemption, contrived in the divine mind, and formed in Chriſt from everlaſting: and others more outward, open and manifeſt; as the works of creation and providence; of redemption by Chriſt; the operations of the Spirit, and the powerful ſucceſs of the goſpel among Jews and Gentiles. The Vulgate Latin verſion and others render it, the exaltations of God[o]; Father, Son, and Spirit: Jehovah the Father ſhould be exalted in the mouths of his ſaints, for his love to them, choice of them, covenant with them, the miſſion of his Son on their account, and the regeneration of them according to his abundant mercy; and Jehovah the Son ſhould be exalted by them with their mouths and lips, as well as in their hearts, in his perſon, by honouring him as they do the Father, in his offices, kingly, prieſtly and prophetic; and the holy Spirit ſhould be exalted, by aſcribing the work of grace to him, the beginning, carrying on and finiſhing of it. And a two-edged ſword in their hand; which is no other than the word of God, Eph. vi. 17. Heb. iv. 12. one of its edges is the law, which ſharply reproves and menaces for ſin, threatening with curſes, condemnation, and death; and which, in the Spirit's hand, cuts deep into the hearts of men, lays open the corruption of their nature, and the ſwarms of ſin which are in them; it cauſes pain and grief, working wrath in the conſcience; it wounds and kills, and is therefore called the letter that kills, 2 Cor. iii. 6. The other edge is the goſpel, which cuts in pieces the beſt of men; all their works of righteouſneſs, which it removes from their juſtification and ſalvation; and all their wiſdom, holineſs, free-will-power, and creature-abilities; and it cuts down the worſt in man, his ſinful as well as his righteous ſelf; it teaches him to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts; it is uſeful to refute errors, and defend truth: and it is an inſtrument, and only a paſſive inſtrument, uſed by the Lord, as his power unto ſalvation; it is a ſword, but only effectual as it is the ſword of the Spirit; it is a part of the weapons of our warfare, and it is mighty, but only through God; it can do nothing of itſelf, but as it is in the hand of another; and it ſhould be in the hands of all the ſaints in common, as well as in the hands of goſpel-miniſters, to withſtand error, maintain truth, and repel the temptations of Satan. The Targum is, "the "praiſes of God in their throats, and as two-edged "ſwords in their hands;" making the praiſes of God and the two-edged ſwords to be the ſame: and ſo Jarchi and R. Jeſhuah in Aben Ezra interpret them.

℣. 7. To execute vengeance upon the heathen, &c.] Either upon the Gentile world, in the firſt times of the goſpel; when the apoſtles going there with the two-edged ſword of the word, vehemently inveighed againſt the idolatry of the heathens, and exhorted them to turn from their idols to ſerve the living God; and divine power going along with their miniſtry, multitudes were turned from them; through the ſucceſs of the goſpel, the oracles of the heathen were ſtruck dumb, their prieſts were deſpiſed, their idol-temples were forſaken, and idols rejected; now were the judgment of the heathen world, and the prince of it caſt out, and vengeance in this way taken upon it, or their diſobedience to God revenged, John xii. 31. 2 Cor. x. 6. Or elſe upon the Papiſts, as will be in the latter times of the goſpel; who are ſometimes called Heathens and Gentiles, Pſal. x. 16. Rev. xi. 2. on whom vengeance will be taken for all their idolatry, ſuperſtition and blood-ſhed of the ſaints; and they will be ſmitten and ſlain by the two edged ſword, proceeding out of the mouth of Chriſt, and as in the hands of his ſervants, Rev. xix. 15, 21. And puniſhments upon the people; or reproofs[p]; ſharp and piercing ones; ſuch as the convictions the word of God will ſtrike in the minds of men, and will be very diſtreſſing and afflicting to them; as the fire out of the mouths of the witneſſes, which is their doctrine, will be to their enemies the Papiſts; and will torment and kill them, and be the ſavour of death unto death unto them, Rev. xi. 5.

℣. 8. To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron.] Which is thought to allude to what was done to the Canaanitiſh kings, in the times of Joſhua; and to the princes of Midian by Gideon; and to Agag by Saul; and to the Ammonites, Syrians and others, by David: but it refers either to the firſt times of the goſpel, and the influence of the ſword of the Spirit over the hearts of men; and on ſome very great perſonages, as kings and nobles, brought to Chriſt and his churches, in chains of powerful and efficacious grace, declaring a ready and chearful ſubjection to his goſpel and ordinances; ſuch as Conſtantine, Theodoſius and others; and who were inſtruments in ſubduing, conquering and deſtroying tyrannical and perſecuting emperors and princes, as Maximilian, Licinius and others; ſee Iſa. xlv. 14. and more inſtances of the power of the goſpel, and the influence of divine grace on ſuch perſons, there will be in the latter day; ſee Iſa. xlix. 23. and lx. 3, 11. Pſal. lxxii. 10, 11. It may alſo reſpect the uſe of the goſpel-miniſtry, compared to a two-edged ſword on the hearts of men in common; whereby Satan, the ſtrong man armed, who keeps the palace as a king or prince, is diſpoſſeſſed; and ſin, which reigns like a king unto death, is dethroned, and grace is ſet up as a governing principle. But it may chiefly regard the deſtruction of antichriſtian kings and nobles, and their ſtates, through the prevalence of the goſpel and the power of Chriſt, and the two-edged ſword coming out of his mouth, Rev. xvii. 14. and xix. 19—21.

℣. 9. To execute upon them the judgment written, &c.] In the law, according to the Targum; either upon the ſeven nations of the land of Canaan, Deut. vii. 12. or upon all the enemies of God and his people, Deut. xxxii. 41. or rather in the goſpel; which declares, that whoever believes in Chriſt ſhall be ſaved, but whoever believes not ſhall be damned, Mark xvi 16. And according to this two-edged ſword or word of God, and the ſentence pronounced by it, and judgment written in it, things will everlaſtingly take place. Or it may principally have regard to the judgment upon Antichriſt in the latter day, written in the word of God; and which will be executed by the ſaints, with the two-edged ſword in their hands, Rev. xvi. 6. and xvii. 8, 16. and xviii. 6, 7. This honour have all his ſaints; which is ſpoken of throughout the pſalm; as to be acceptable unto God, and well-pleaſing in his ſight; to be adorned with grace, and beautified with ſalvation; to have the high praiſes of God in their mouths, and a two-edged ſword in their hands, and to do the execution with it above mentioned. Praiſe ye the Lord; even all his ſaints; who of all men have moſt reaſon to do it, for the grace that is given them, and the honour put upon them.

PSALM CL.

THIS pſalm is of the ſame kind, and upon the ſame ſubject with the two preceding ones; and very probably was written by the ſame hand, and about the ſame time; and is a very proper pſalm to conclude this book with, being all praiſe. Some ſay [q], this pſalm was ſung by the Iſraelites, when they came with their firſt-fruits into the ſanctuary, with the baſket on their ſhoulders. Thirteen times in this ſhort pſalm is the word praiſe uſed; not on account of thirteen properties or perfections in God, as Kimchi thinks: but it is ſo frequently and in every clauſe uſed, to ſhew the vehement deſire of the pſalmiſt that the Lord might be praiſed; and to expreſs his ſenſe of things, how worthy he is of praiſe; and that all ways and means to praiſe him ſhould be made uſe of, all being little enough to ſet forth his honour and glory. And not the Levites only, whoſe buſineſs it was in the temple ſervice to praiſe the Lord with muſical inſtruments, are here exhorted to it, as R. Judah the Levite thinks, but all people; not the people of Iſrael only, as Kimchi; but the Gentiles alſo, even all that have breath, ℣. 6. For, as R. Obadiah Gaon obſerves, this pſalm belongs to the times of the Meſſiah; to the goſpel-diſpenſation, to the latter part of it, eſpecially when Jews and Gentiles ſhall be converted; and when all will praiſe the Lord, as they will have reaſon for it.

℣. 1. Praiſe ye the Lord, &c.] Or hallelujah; which, in the Targum, Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions, is the title of the pſalm; and expreſſes the ſubject of it, the praiſe of the Lord. Praiſe God in his ſanctuary; in the temple, the houſe of his ſanctuary, as the Targum and R. Judah; or in heaven, as R. Moſes, his holy place, where he is praiſed by holy angels and glorified ſaints; or in the church below, of which the ſanctuary or temple was a type. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and the Eaſtern verſions render it, in his holy ones; among his ſaints, in the aſſembly of them, where he is to be feared and praiſed: it may be tranſlated, in his holy one [r]; and be underſtood of Chriſt, as it is by Cocceius; who is holy in both his natures, and is often called God's holy One, and the holy One of Iſrael; and whoſe human nature is a tabernacle or temple, wherein the fulneſs of the Godhead dwells; and in, and through, and for whom, the Lord is to be praiſed. Some render it, for or becauſe of his holineſs [s]; the perfection of holineſs in him; in which he is glorious and fearful in the praiſes of, and which appears in all his works of providence and grace. Praiſe him in the firmament of his power; the heaven above us, ſo called, Gen. i. 6, 7. which, in the Hebrew language, has its name from its being ſpread and expanded over the earth; and in the Greek and Latin tongues, from the firmneſs and ſtability of it; and which is a work of mighty power, and therefore ſo called; it particularly reſpects the ſtarry heavens; for the ſun, and moon and ſtars, were placed in the firmament, Gen. i. 14—17. or the air and atmoſphere about us, that preſſes upon us, and keeps all firm and ſtable. And now as this ſhews forth the glory of God, and his handy-work, Pſal. xix. 1, not only all in it ſhould and do in their way praiſe the Lord; but eſpecially men on earth, who enjoy the benefit of it. R. Judah underſtands this of the ark in the temple, called the ark of the Lord's ſtrength.

℣. 2. Praiſe him for his mighty acts, &c.] The creation of all things out of nothing; the ſuſtentation of all beings; the government of the world; the redemption of man by Chriſt, and the wonderful works done by him on earth; the work of grace upon the hearts of his people, and the preſervation of them in grace to glory. Praiſe him according to his excellent greatneſs; or, according to the multitude of his greatneſs [t]; which appears in his nature, perfections and work, and theſe both of providence and grace; and in proportion hereunto, and according to the abilities of creatures, angels and men, is he to be praiſed; which is giving him the honour due unto his name; ſee Pſal. xcvi. 8. and cvi. 2.

℣. 3. Praiſe him with the ſound of the trumpet, &c.] Which was uſed in calling the aſſembly together, for worſhip and on other occaſions; and at the feaſt of blowing of trumpets, and in the year of jubilee, Numb. x. 1, 2. Lev. xxiii. 23. and xxv. 9, 10. and by the prieſts in temple-ſervice, 1 Chron. xvi. 6, 42. and was typical of the goſpel, which gives a certain and joyful ſound, and is the cauſe and means of praiſing God, Iſa. xxvii. 13. Praiſe him with the pſaltery; to which pſalms were ſung. And harp; which were inſtruments of muſic, both uſed in divine worſhip under the former diſpenſation; and in which David was well ſkilled and delighted, and appointed proper perſons to praiſe with them, 1 Chron. xv. 20, 21. They were typical of the ſpiritual melody made in the hearts of God's people, while they are praiſing him in pſalms, hymns and ſpiritual ſongs, under the goſpel, Eph. v. 19. Rev. v. 2, 8, and xiv. 2, 3.

℣. 5. Praiſe him upon the loud cymbals, &c.] Or cymbals of hearing[x]; that were heard with pleaſure and delight, and afar off: the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions render it, well-ſounding cymbals, which give a grateful ſound to the ear; theſe were made of braſs, 1 Chron. xv. 19. to which the apoſtle alludes, 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Praiſe him upon the high-ſounding cymbals; or cymbals of ſhouting[y], ovation or triumph; which were uſed on joyful occaſions, as victories, deliverances, and the like; and were uſed alſo in the temple-ſervice; ſee 1 Chron. xvi. 5, 42. according to the Targum and Septuagint verſion, theſe were three-ſtringed inſtruments; for ſo they render the word for them in 1 Sam. xviii. 6. Now theſe ſeveral inſtruments of muſic are named, not as to be uſed in goſpel-times; but being expreſſive of the higheſt praiſe and joy ſhewn in former times, are mentioned to ſet forth the higheſt ſtrains and notes of praiſe in New-Teſtament-ſaints; as well as to denote their heartineſs, agreement, and unanimity in this ſervice, Rom. xv. 6.

℣. 6. Let every thing that hath breath, praiſe the Lord, &c.] Even the brute creatures, as in a preceding pſalm; but more eſpecially man, in whom God has breathed the breath of life, and is become not only a living but a rational ſoul; and more eſpecially ſpiritual men, converted perſons, whether Jews or Gentiles; on whom the Spirit of the Lord has breathed, and whom he has quickened; and who breathe in prayer after divine things; and who alſo have abundant reaſon to bleſs and praiſe his name for what he has beſtowed upon them, and has in reſerve for them; and for which they ſhould praiſe him as long as they have breath; ſee Rev. v. 13. Praiſe ye the Lord; all before mentioned, and in the manner as directed, and that in time and to all eternity. Thus ends the book of Pſalms. There is another pſalm added in the Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions, and in the metaphraſe of Apollinarius; but is owned to be a ſupernumerary one, and not to be found in all copies; and is ſaid to be written by David, when he fought with Goliath, and conquered him, and is as follows.

℣. 1. I was little among my brethren, and a youth in my father's houſe; I fed my father's ſheep. ℣. 2. My hands made (or uſed) the organ; and my fingers fitted (or played on) the pſaltery or harp: ℣. 3. And who hath declared to my Lord? he is Lord, he hath heard. ℣. 4. He ſent his angel, and took me from my father's ſheep; and anointed me with the oil of his anointing. ℣. 5. My brethren were goodly and great; and the Lord delighted not in them. ℣. 6. I went forth to meet the ſtranger, (the Philiſtine) and he curſed me by his idols: ℣. 7. And I threw at him three ſtones into his forehead, by the power of the Lord, and laid him proſtrate[z]. ℣. 8. I drew out the ſword from him; I cut off his head, and took away reproach from the children of Iſrael.

The PROVERBS.

THIS book is called in ſome printed Hebrew copies, Sepher Miſhle, the Book of Proverbs; the title of it in the Vulgate Latin verſion is, “the book of Proverbs, which the Hebrews call “Miſle:” in the Septuagint verſion it has the name of the writer, the Proverbs of Solomon; and ſo in the Syriac verſion, with the addition of his titles, “the ſon of David, king of Iſrael.” This and Eccleſiaſtes, are both of them by the Jews [a], called Books of Wiſdom: and it is common with the ancient Chriſtian writers [b], to call the book of Proverbs by the names of Wiſdom and Panaretos; names they give alſo to the Apocryphal books of Eccleſiaſticus and the Wiſdom of Solomon; and therefore this is to be carefully diſtinguiſhed from them. The author of this book was king Solomon, as the firſt verſe, which contains the inſcription of it, ſhews; for he was not a collector of theſe proverbs, as Grotius is of opinion, but the author of them, at leaſt of the far greater part; and not only the author, but the writer of them: the Jews [c] ſay, that Hezekiah and his men wrote them; it is true indeed the men of Hezekiah copied ſome, chap. xxv. 1. but even thoſe were written by Solomon. R. Gedaliah [d] would have it, that Iſaiah the prophet wrote this book; but without any foundation. At what time it was written is not certain; the Jewiſh writers generally ſay [e], it was written by Solomon, as were the books of Eccleſiaſtes and the Song of Songs, in his old age, when near the time of his death; though ſome think it was written before his fall: and it may be, it was not written all at once, but at certain times, when theſe proverbs occurred unto him and were ſpoken by him, and as occaſion ſerved: however, it is not to be doubted, but that they were written under the inſpiration of God. The Jews once thought to have made this book of Proverbs an Apocryphal one, becauſe of ſome ſeeming contradictions in it; but finding that theſe were capable of a reconciliation, changed their minds, as became them [f]. Among Chriſtians, Theodore of Mopſueſt, in the ſixth century, denied the divine authority of this book, and attributed it merely to human wiſdom; which opinion of his was condemned in the ſecond council at Conſtantinople: and in later times it has been treated with contempt by the Socinians, and particularly by Father Simon and Le Clerc; but the authority of it is confirmed by the writers of the New Teſtament, who have cited paſſages out of it; ſee Rom. xii. 20. Heb. xii. 5, 6. 2 Pet. ii. 22. from Prov. xxv. 21, 22. and iii. 11, 12. and xxvi. 11. The book conſiſts of five parts; firſt, a preface or introduction, which takes up the firſt nine chapters; the ſecond, the proverbs of Solomon, put together by himſelf, beginning at chap. x. to the xxvth; the third, the proverbs of Solomon, copied by the men of Hezekiah, beginning at chap. xxv. to the xxxth; the fourth, the words of Agur, chap. xxx. the fifth, the inſtruction of Solomon's mother, Bathſheba, chap. xxxi.

CHAP. I.

AFTER the inſcription, which gives the title of the book, and deſcribes the author by his name, deſcent and dignity, ℣. 1. follows the ſcope and deſign of it, which is to teach men wiſdom and knowledge; even ſuch as are ſimple and fooliſh, and particularly young men; nay, hereby wiſe men may grow wiſer, and attain to an higher degree of learning, ℣. 2—6. and the firſt doctrine taught in it is the fear of the Lord, or devotion to God; which is the beginning of knowledge, though deſpiſed by fools, ℣. 7. The next is obedience to parents; whoſe inſtructions attended to, are more ornamental than chains of gold, ℣. 8, 9. And then follows a diſſuaſive from bad company; in which the arguments made uſe of by wicked men to draw in others with them, and the danger of compliance, are moſt ſtrongly and beautifully repreſented, ℣. 10—19. When wiſdom, who is the inſtructor and teacher throughout the whole, is introduced as calling upon the ſimple and the ſcorners, to leave their ſins and turn to her, with a promiſe of the Spirit to them, ℣. 20—23. but they ſlighting and rejecting her call, are threatened with juſt and irrevocable ruin and deſtruction, ℣. 24—32. And the chapter is cloſed with a promiſe of ſafety and reſt to thoſe that hearken to her, ℣. 33.

℣. 1. The proverbs of Solomon, &c.] Who is ſaid to make three thouſand proverbs, 1 Kings iv. 32. but whether any of them are contained in this book cannot be ſaid: however, it is certain that they are not all in it, ſince if you except the firſt nine chapters, which are the introduction to the Proverbs, there are but ſix hundred and fifty nine verſes in it; and if they are taken in, they make but nine hundred and fifteen, which are not a third part of the proverbs ſaid to be made by him; however, here are as many and ſuch as God thought fit ſhould be preſerved for inſtruction in all future ages. It was uſual with the ancients in all countries, when any truth was found, and eſtabliſhed by experience, to wrap it up in a few apt words, with or without a figure; that it might be the better underſtood and more eaſily retained, and which were always venerable and greatly attended to: and of this kind are theſe proverbs; only with this difference, that theſe are of divine inſpiration, and the others not. The word uſed for them comes from one which ſignifies ſimilitude and dominion [g]; becauſe many of them are ſimilies or compariſons, and are delivered out in figurative expreſſions, in metaphors and allegories, and the like; and have all of them a commanding power, authority and influence upon the mind, obliging to an attention to them. The name of Solomon is put to them, the more to recommend them; who had a wiſe and underſtanding heart, as large as the ſand of the ſea, and was wiſer than all men, 1 Kings iv. 29—31. and was an eminent type of Chriſt, who ſpake in proverbs alſo, John xvi. 25. He is further deſcribed by his pedigree and office, The ſon of David, king of Iſrael; a wiſe ſon of a wiſe father, and king over a wiſe and underſtanding people. Theſe titles are added for the further commendation of the book; and it may be obſerved, that they are ſuch as belong to the Meſſiah, Solomon's antitype, one that is greater than he, Matt. i. 1. John i. 49.

℣. 2. To know wiſdom and inſtruction, &c.] That is, theſe proverbs were made, and written, and publiſhed to make known, or to teach men wiſdom and knowledge; not only in things moral, and therefore theſe proverbs are by ſome called Solomon's Ethics; and indeed they do contain the beſt ſyſtem of morality in the whole world; nothing like it is to be extracted out of all the writings of the heathen poets and philoſophers: nor only in things civil; for which reaſon they may be called his Politics, ſeeing they are inſtructive to kings and civil magiſtrates, and to ſubjects; and alſo his Oeconomics, ſeeing they furniſh out rules for huſbands and wives, parents and children, maſters and ſervants, worthy of their attention and obſervance: but alſo they are a means of, and are deſigned to teach ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom and knowledge; things relating to Jeſus Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and the way of life and ſalvation by him, the knowledge of which is life eternal. Theſe words, with others that follow, ſeem to be ſynonymous, and ſignify much one and the ſame thing; and are uſed to ſhew, that the moſt conſummate wiſdom and comprehenſive knowledge may be attained by means of this book; which, like the reſt of ſcripture, with a divine bleſſing, is able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation; and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for inſtruction in righteouſneſs, 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. where the apoſtle ſeems to allude to this text; ſince wiſdom here may ſtand for doctrine in general; and inſtruction may ſignify the means of attaining to it; and it may be obſerved, that the word is uſed for diſcipline and correction, as well as inſtruction. If theſe words are to be diſtinguiſhed, the firſt, wiſdom, may deſign a wiſe ſcheme and plan of truths, and the theory of them; and the latter, inſtruction, the learning it and putting it into practice; and for both theory and practice this book is uſeful. To perceive the words of underſtanding; which flow from a good underſtanding, and give a right underſtanding of things; ſo that a man may be able to diſtinguiſh between light and darkneſs, truth and error, right and wrong; particularly the doctrines of the goſpel may be meant, which are eminently ſo, and exceed the underſtanding of a natural man, and which are only underſtood by a ſpiritual man; the means of knowing which are the ſcriptures, under the guidance and direction of the Spirit of God.

℣. 3. To receive the inſtruction of wiſdom, &c.] Or prudence [h]; of wiſe and prudent men; and eſpecially of Chriſt himſelf, who bears thoſe names, whoſe inſtructions this book is full of; and the deſign of which is to engage the attention of men to them, and prevail upon them to receive them, and act conformably to them. Which inſtructions reſpect the following things; and which are added by way of illuſtration and amplification, viz. Juſtice, and judgment, and equity; that which is juſt in itſelf, and according to the nature of God and his will; and is judged ſo by right reaſon; and is equitable between man and man, and agrees with the law of God. Theſe three, R. Levi Ben Gerſom ſays, ſignify one and the ſame thing; true righteouſneſs, doing that which is juſt to God and man; which the doctrines of grace, or the inſtructions of wiſdom, teach men to do; concerning which, many rules may be collected from this book.

℣. 4. To give ſubtilty to the ſimple, &c.] Men of mean abilities, weak capacities, ſhallow underſtandings, incautious, credulous, and eaſily impoſed upon: theſe, by attending to what is herein contained, may arrive to a ſerpentine ſubtilty; though they are ſimple and harmleſs as doves, may become as wiſe as ſerpents; may attain to an exquiſite knowledge of divine things; and know even more than the wiſe and ſage philoſophers among the Gentiles, or any of the Rabbins and maſters of Iſrael; or any of the princes of this world, whoſe wiſdom comes to nought; and become very cautious and circumſpect how they are drawn aſide by the old ſerpent the devil, or by ſuch who lie in wait to deceive; and perform their duty both to God and man. To the young man knowledge and diſcretion; or thought [i]; who wants both: this book will teach him the knowledge of things, moral, civil and religious; to think and act aright; how to behave and conduct himſelf wiſely and diſcreetly before men; and be a means of forming his mind betimes for piety and religion; and of furniſhing him with rules for his deportment in future life, in all the periods of it; and in whatſoever ſtate and condition he may come into. A young man may cleanſe his way, reform his manners, behave with purity and uprightneſs, by taking heed to the things herein contained.

ỷ. 5. A wiſe man will hear, &c.] With great attention, and hearken to the proverbs and wiſe ſayings herein delivered; for here are many things entertaining to men of years and wiſdom, as well as inſtructive to young men and ſimple ones. And will increaſe learning; or add[k] to his ſtock of learning; or, as the Targum, "will add knowledge;" ſee 2 Pet. i. 5. or, will be wiſer, as the Vulgate Latin verſion. This is ſaid to ſhew the excellency of this book, and the extenſive uſefulneſs of it; indeed wiſe men will get knowledge where fools cannot, and increaſe learning where others can get none: there are few books but a wiſe man will get ſomething out of; and eſpecially ſuch a book as this, and as the ſcriptures are. And a man of underſtanding ſhall attain unto wiſe counſels; a man of a ſpiritual underſtanding arrives to the knowledge of the wiſe counſels of God; the doctrines of the goſpel, which are the whole counſel of God; are recondite wiſdom, the hidden wiſdom of God, which no wiſdom of man is comparable to. It is the wiſeſt ſcheme that was ever formed, and which the wit of man could never have deviſed, even ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt; and which was laid in God's counſels of old, which are faithfulneſs and truth; the knowledge of which is attained unto by one that is ſpiritually wiſe. Moreover, a man that thoroughly underſtands the things contained in this book, is fit to be a counſellor of others in things human and divine; in things moral, civil and ſpiritual: he is fit to be in the cabinet-council of princes, to be a counſellor of kings; yea, to have the reins of government in his hands. He ſhall poſſeſs government; ſo the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions: or, he ſhall poſſeſs the helm[l]; ſit as a pilot there, as the word may ſignify, and ſteer the ſhip aright in which he is; whether it be his family, or the church of God, or a city or corporation, or a kingdom: this book, rightly underſtood by him, will furniſh him with rules to do all things well and wiſely.

ỷ. 6. To underſtand a proverb, and the interpretation, &c.] This may be connected either with the firſt verſe, the proverbs of Solomon, &c. are written, as for the above ends and purpoſes, ſo for theſe; or with the preceding verſe, a wiſe and underſtanding man, by hearkening and attending to what is here delivered, will not only attain to wiſe counſels, but to the underſtanding of proverbial ſayings, and to ſee into the elegancy[m], the eloquence and beauty of them, as the word ſignifies; and be able to interpret them to others in a clear, plain way and manner. The words of the wiſe, and their dark ſayings; the words and doctrines, not of the wiſe philoſophers and ſages of the heathen world, but of men truly wiſe and good; and eſpecially of the wiſe inſpired writers of the ſcriptures, whoſe words come from one ſhepherd, Eccl. xii. 11. and the enigmas or riddles contained in their writings, which are ſo to a natural man, obſcure phraſes and expreſſions, things hard and difficult to be underſtood, yet to a ſpiritual man that judgeth all things, plain and eaſy, 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15. 2 Pet. iii. 16.

ỷ. 7. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge, &c.] Here properly the book begins, and this is the firſt of the proverbs, and an excellent one it is; ſuch an one as is not to be found in all the writings of the heathens. By the fear of the Lord is not meant a ſervile fear, a fear of puniſhment, of hell, wrath, and damnation, which is the effect of the firſt work of the Law upon the conſcience; but a filial fear, and ſuppoſes knowledge of God as a Father, of his love and grace in Chriſt, particularly of his forgiving love, from whence it ariſes, Pſal. cxxx. 4. Hoſ. iii. 5. it is a holy, humble, fiducial fear of God; a reverential affection for him, and devotion to him; it includes the whole of religious worſhip, both internal and external; all that is contained in the firſt table of the Law, and the manner of performing it, and principle of acting: this is the firſt of all ſciences to be learned, and it is the principal one; it is the baſis and foundation of all the reſt, on which they depend; and it is the head, the fountain, the root and ſource from whence they ſpring; and unleſs a man knows God, knows God in Chriſt, and worſhips him in his fear, in ſpirit and in truth, according to his revealed will, he knows nothing as he ought to know; and all his knowledge will be of no avail and profit to him; this is the firſt and chief thing in ſpiritual and evangelical knowledge, and without which all natural knowledge will ſignify nothing; ſee Job xxviii. 28. Pſal. cxi. 10. But fools deſpiſe wiſdom and inſtruction; the ſame with knowledge before; they do not deſire the knowledge of God, and of his ways and worſhip, but deſpiſe it, make no account of it, but treat it with contempt; eſpecially the knowledge of God in Chriſt, in which lies the higheſt wiſdom, for this is life eternal, John xvii. 3. they deſpiſe Chriſt the wiſdom of God, and the goſpel, and the truths of it, which are the hidden wiſdom of God; and all inſtruction into it, and the means of it; they deſpiſe the ſcriptures, which are able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation; and the miniſtry of the word, and the miniſters of it: ſuch ſort of diſcipline[n] as this, as the word ſignifies, they diſlike and abhor; and eſpecially correction or chaſtiſement[o], which is alſo the ſenſe of it; ſuffering reproach and affliction for the ſake of wiſdom, a profeſſion of Chriſt and his goſpel; and they are fools with a witneſs that deſpiſe all this; ſuch fools are atheiſts, deiſts, and all profane and wicked men. The Septuagint render it the ungodly; and ſuch ſort of men are all along meant by fools in this book.

ỷ. 8. My ſon, hear the inſtruction of thy father, &c.] This is not to be underſtood of God the father of mankind, and of that law which he has given them, as Jarchi and Gerſom interpret it, but of Solomon and his ſon in a literal ſenſe; and of any one that came to him for inſtruction, any pupil, hearer or reader of his; and it is a direction to all children to hearken to the inſtruction of their parents, and obey their commands; ſo next to the fear and worſhip of God, he exhorts to obedience to parents, and proceeds juſt in the ſame order and method in which the decalogue or ten commands were written; the firſt table reſpects God and his worſhip, and the ſecond follows, which begins with honour thy father and thy mother, &c. which the apoſtle ſays, is the firſt commandment with promiſe, Eph. vi. 1, 2. And forſake not the law of thy mother; meaning not the congregation of Iſrael, the old ſynagogue, or Jewiſh church, as Jarchi; and ſo in the Talmud[p] it is interpreted of the congregation of Iſrael, as is thy father in the former clauſe of the divine Being; nor the operative faculty of the human underſtanding, as Gerſom; but the mother of Solomon's ſon; and any and every mother of a child, who having an equal or greater tenderneſs for her offspring, and a true and hearty regard for their welfare, will inſtruct them in the beſt manner ſhe can, give the beſt rules, and preſcribe the beſt laws ſhe can for their good; and which ought to be as carefully attended to and obeyed as thoſe of a father: and ſhe is particularly mentioned, becauſe the law of God equally enjoins reverence and obedience to both parents, which human laws among the Gentiles did not; and becauſe children are too apt to ſlight the directions and inſtructions of a mother; whereas they carry equal authority, and have in them the nature of a law, as thoſe of a father.

℣. 9. For they ſhall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, &c.] The inſtructions and laws of parents being attended unto and obeyed by children, render them more lovely and amiable than any beautiful ornament whatever that can be put upon their heads. And chains about thy neck; be that unto them as chains of gold are to the neck, beautify and adorn them; ſo good works done in obedience to God and parents, are ornaments of great price, and preferable to any outward adorning whatever; ſee 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. The alluſions are unto, and the metaphors taken from thoſe things which are moſt pleaſing and acceptable to children, as fine top-knots and golden chains.

℣. 10. My ſon, if ſinners entice thee, &c.] Endeavour to ſeduce thee from thy parents, and draw thee aſide from them, from liſtening to their inſtructions, advice, and commands; and make uſe of all plauſible arguments to perſuade thee to join with them in the ſins they are addicted unto, and are continually employed in: for this is not to be underſtood of ſuch who are ſinners by nature, and through infirmity of the fleſh, as all men are; but of notorious ſinners, who are guilty of the groſſeſt enormities, who live in ſin, and give up themſelves to work all manner of wickedneſs; ſin is their trade and buſineſs, and the conſtant courſe of their lives; they are hardened, impudent, and daring, and not content to ſin themſelves, but do all they can to draw in others; and to preſerve youth from falling into ſuch bad company, is this exhortation given in this tender, affectionate, and moving manner; next to the fear of God, and regard to parents, is this caution given to ſhun the company of wicked men, which young men are liable to be drawn into, and is of fatal conſequence. Conſent thou not; yield not to their perſuaſions, liſten not to their ſolicitations, ſhew no liking and approbation of them, aſſent neither by words nor deeds; do not ſay thou wilt; ſay I will not, and abide by it; be deaf to all their intreaties, and proof againſt all their perſuaſions.

℣. 11. If they ſay, Come with us, &c.] Leave your father's houſe, and the buſineſs of life in which you are; make one of us, and become a member of our ſociety, and go along with us upon the highway. Let us lay wait for blood; lie in ambuſh under ſome hedge or another, waiting till a rich traveller comes up and paſſes that way, and then riſe and ſhed his blood in order to get his money; and the ſame word ſignifies both blood and money, and wait is laid for one for the ſake of the other. Let us lurk privily for the innocent without cauſe; or let us hide[q], the Vulgate Latin verſion adds ſnares; ſo Vatablus and others, as the fowler does for birds; or let us hide ourſelves[r]; in ſome private place, waiting for the innocent, the harmleſs traveller, who has done no injury to any man's perſon or property; thinks himſelf ſafe, and is not aware of any deſign upon him; going about his lawful buſineſs, and having done nothing to provoke ſuch miſcreants to attempt his life or take away his property: and which they do without cauſe as to him; freely[s] as to themſelves; and with impunity[t], as they promiſe themſelves and one another; all which ſenſes the word uſed will bear.

℣. 12. Let us ſwallow them up alive as the grave, &c.] The innocent perſon, and thoſe that are with him, his ſervants; our gang is ſo numerous that we can very eaſily diſpatch him and all his attendants, and bury them out of ſight at once, as if they were ſwallowed up alive in a grave, and ſo no more to be ſeen or heard of; and conſequently we ſhall be in the utmoſt ſafety and ſecurity, there being no traces of what is done, nor any left to make a relation of it, or to give any information of us, or to purſue us. And whole, as thoſe that go down into the pit; who though whole and in perfect health, ſhall in a moment be deſtroyed and caſt into the pit, being firſt plundered of all the riches they have about them; for this ſwallowing them up alive and whole, which is an alluſion to a beaſt of prey ſwallowing up another creature all at once, not only intends their cruelty in taking away life, but their rapaciouſneſs in ſeizing upon their ſubſtance.

℣. 13. We ſhall find all precious ſubſtance, &c.] Among one or another we meet with; gold and ſilver and precious ſtones, every thing that is valuable; not conſidering that hereby they were in danger of loſing the more precious ſubſtance, their immortal ſouls; and the moſt precious ſubſtance of all, the enjoyment of God, and happineſs with him to all eternity, which is the more enduring ſubſtance: the things of this world, properly ſpeaking, are not ſubſtance, though wicked men ſo judge them, they are things that are not; nor are they precious, in compariſon of ſpiritual and heavenly things; but they are what carnal men ſet a high price and value upon, and riſk the loſs of their name, lives and ſouls for. We ſhall fill our houſes with ſpoil; Aben Ezra interprets this of garments; but it may not only deſign the garments taken from the perſons robbed and killed; but alſo their money, commodities, and goods they were travelling with, which in time would be ſo large as to fill every one of their houſes; covetouſneſs lies at the bottom of all this wickedneſs; the love of money is the root of all evil.

℣. 14. Caſt in thy lot among us, &c.] Or thou ſhalt cauſe thy lot to fall among us[u]; though juſt entered, as ſoon as any booty is taken thou ſhalt caſt lots with us, and have thy full ſhare with thoſe that have been longer engaged. Let us all have one one purſe; or we will all have one purſe[w]; will throw all our booty taken by us into one common ſtock, and live upon it comfortably and merrily. Jarchi repreſents it as putting it to the young man's option to do which he would, either to caſt lots and take his ſhare ſeparately, or let it be put altogether and ſo partake jointly with the reſt. According to Gerſom the ſenſe is, that there ſhould be ſuch an exact diviſion made, that there ſhould not be more in one purſe than in another; their ſhares ſhould be equally divided by lot, and their purſes ſhould be alike; one ſhould not have more than another: theſe are the arguments uſed by wicked men to allure and enſnare young men to join with them in their ſinful ways and practices; from which they are dehorted, as follows.

℣. 15. My ſon, walk not thou in the way with them, &c.] In the ſame way as they do, which is the broad way that leads unto deſtruction; ſet not one foot in it; make no trial of it, whether it will be pleaſant and profitable walking in it; the experiment will be dangerous. Refrain thy foot from their path; their manner and courſe of life; do not follow it, nor join them in it; when there is an inclination or a temptation to it, withſtand it; ſtop in time, do not proceed, but draw back, and go on in the way thou haſt been trained up in, and remember the inſtructions of thy parents.

℣. 16. For their feet run to evil, &c.] To the evil of ſin, to commit robberies and murder, and all manner of iniquity; they are eager upon it and in haſte and ſwift to do it, chap. vi. 18.[x] being carried away with their inordinate affections, which are as feet to the ſoul; and drawn aſide with their luſts, and puſhed on by Satan, and encouraged by one another, and ſo ruſh on headlong to the evil of puniſhment alſo; and which is a reaſon why their ways and paths ſhould be abſtained from, becauſe they bring upon them ſwift deſtruction; it is to their own hurt they run, as Jarchi interprets it; though the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt to agree with what follows. And make haſte to ſhed blood; the blood of innocent perſons, in order to get their ſubſtance, to cover their iniquity and ſhame, and that no information may be given of them; this is mentioned as having ſomething very horrible in it, in order to deter from joining with them.

℣. 17. Surely in vain the net is ſpread in the ſight of any bird.] Or without cauſe[y], as the word is rendered in ℣. 11. and ſo the words are an illuſtration of the preceding; ſhewing that the blood of innocent perſons is ſhed without cauſe, no injury being done by them to thoſe that do it, but is ſhed without any provocation at all; juſt as the net is ſpread for the innocent bird, which has done no harm to the fowler that ſeeks to take it; ſo Gerſom: or elſe the ſenſe is, that though the net is ſpread by the fowler even in the ſight of the bird, yet it is in vain to the bird, though not to the fowler; it is ſo intent upon the corn that is ſpread about, that it takes no notice of the net, and ſo is catched in it; and thus it is with thoſe men that are bent upon their ſinful practices, upon theft and murder, though their ruin and deſtruction are before their eyes; and they daily ſee their companions in iniquity come to an untimely end; they know that they are liable to ſuffer death by the hand of the civil magiſtrate, and to be followed by the juſtice and vengeance of God, and ſuffer eternal puniſhment; yet take no warning hereby, but ruſh on to their own ruin, as follows.

℣. 18. And they lay wait for their own blood, &c.] Whilſt they lie in wait for the blood of others, they lie in wait for their own; and when they ſhed the blood of innocent perſons, it in the iſſue comes upon their own heads, and is the cauſe of their own blood being ſhed; vengeance purſues them, and juſtice will not ſuffer them to live. They lurk privily for their own lives; whilſt they are lurking in ſecret places to take away the lives of others, they are laying ſnares for their own ſouls; and the conſequence of it will be, that they will be brought to a ſhameful and untimely end here, or however to everlaſting ruin and deſtruction hereafter.

℣. 19. So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain, &c.] That is ſet upon getting riches in an unlawful way, by robberies and murder; his ways will end in the loſs of his own blood and life, and in the loſs of his immortal ſoul; this will be what his wicked ways and courſe of life will bring him to, and what will his gain profit him then? it would be of no uſe and ſervice to him could he have gained the whole world. Which taketh away the life of the owners thereof; or who, even every one of thoſe that are greedy of gain, and will be rich at any rate; ſuch ſtick not to take away the life of the proper owners of that gain, or money they are greedy of, in order to get it into their own poſſeſſion; and ſuch wicked practices cannot fail of meeting with a juſt recompence of reward: or which covetous gain, or gain gotten in ſuch a wicked manner, will be the cauſe of the life of the injurious maſters and wrong poſſeſſors of it being taken away from them, either by the hand of the civil magiſtrate, or by God himſelf. Theſe ſins of robbery and murder are particularly inſtanced in, not only becauſe other ſins lead unto them, as ſabbath-breaking, drunkenneſs and lewdneſs, and iſſue in temporal and eternal ruin; but becauſe they were very common among the Jews at the time that Wiſdom, or Chriſt, was here on earth; to which time the whole paſſage refers, as appears from the following verſes; and that thoſe ſins were frequent then is manifeſt both from ſcripture; ſee Matt. xxvii. 38. Luke x. 30. and xxiii. 19. and from the confeſſions of the Jews, who ſay[z] that forty years before the deſtruction of the temple, the ſanhedrim were obliged to remove from place to place, becauſe that murderers increaſed, and they could not judge and condemn them for fear of being murdered themſelves; and it was becauſe of this great increaſe they were obliged to leave off the beheading of the red heifer[a].

℣. 20. Wiſdom crieth without, &c.] Here the perſon inſtructing throughout this whole book is repreſented under the name of wiſdom; by which we are to underſtand not the attribute of divine wiſdom diſplayed in the works of creation; nor the light of nature in man; nor the law of Moſes given to the Iſraelites; nor the revelation of the divine will in general, as it is delivered out in the ſacred ſcriptures; nor the goſpel, and the miniſtry of it, in particular; but our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; for the things ſpoken of wiſdom, and aſcribed to it in this book, eſpecially in the eighth and ninth chapters, ſhew that a divine perſon is intended, and moſt properly belong to Chriſt; who may be called wiſdoms[b], in the plural number, as in the Hebrew text, becauſe of

of the conſummate and perfect wiſdom that is in him; as he is a divine perſon, he is the Logos, the Word and Wiſdom of God; as Mediator, all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge are hid in him; and as man, the ſpirit of wiſdom reſts upon him without meaſure. This, with what follows, to the end of the chapter, is a prophecy of the miniſtry of Chriſt in the days of his fleſh, and of the ſucceſs of it; and of the calamities that ſhould come upon the Jews for the rejection of him: and wiſdom is here ſaid to cry, as Chriſt did, John vii. 28, 37. the word ſignifies to cry both in a ſorrowful way, as Jeſus did when he cried to Jeruſalem, weeping over it, Matt. xxiii. 37. Luke xix. 41. and in a joyful one, which well ſuits with the goſpel, as preached by him; a joyful ſound expreſſed by piping, in oppoſition to John's miniſtry, which was a mournful one, Matt. xi. 17. for crying here means no other than the preaching of the word; which is ſuch a cry as that of heralds, when they publicly proclaim peace or war; ſo wiſdom, or Chriſt, is ſaid to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the acceptable year of the Lord, Iſa. lxi. 1, 2. This cry was made without the city of Jeruſalem, and without that part of the country which was properly called Jury; Chriſt firſt preached in the land of Galilee; or this may mean the Gentile world where Chriſt preached, though not in perſon, yet by his apoſtles, whom he ſent into all the world to preach the goſpel to every creature. She uttereth her voice in the ſtreets; of the city of Jeruſalem, and other places; nor is this contrary to Matt. xii. 19. which is to be underſtood of crying in a bawling and litigious way, of lifting up the voice in ſelf-commendation, neither of which Chriſt did; and yet might cry and utter his voice in the ſtreets, that is, publicly preach his goſpel there, as he did; and he alſo ſent his ſervants into the ſtreets and lanes of the city to call in ſinners by the miniſtry of the word, Luke xiv. 21. which perhaps may be meant of places in the Gentile world; nor is this ſenſe to be excluded here; it may be figuratively underſtood of the public miniſtration of the word and ordinances in the church, called the ſtreets and broad ways of it, Cant. iii. 2.

℣. 21. She crieth in the chief place of concourſe, &c.] Where a multitude of people meet together; the Targum is, "on the top of palaces;" but rather it is to be underſtood of the ſynagogues of the Jews where Chriſt frequently preached; and which, from hence, they build in the higheſt part of the city[c]; and beſt of all of the temple, whither the tribes of Iſrael went up to worſhip in great bodies, and to which the Jews daily reſorted; here Chriſt taught publicly, as he himſelf ſays, John xviii. 20. In the opening of the gates; either of the city, at which people went in and out in great numbers; or of the temple, where they paſſed and repaſſed continually on account of worſhip; ſee John x. 23. Acts iii. 10, 11. in alluſion hereunto the public worſhip of God's houſe is ſignified by the gates of Zion, and alſo of wiſdom, Pſal. lxxxvii. 2. Prov. viii. 34. In the city ſhe uttereth her words; the doctrines of the goſpel; even in the city of Jeruſalem literally, and in other cities of Judea and Galilee, the ſingular being put for the plural; and figuratively in the church of God, often compared to a city; and ſo all theſe expreſſions of without, in the ſtreets, in the chief place of concourſe, the openings of the gates, and the city, may denote in general the openneſs and publicneſs of the goſpel-miniſtry, both by Chriſt in his apoſtles, in Judea, and in the Gentile world; more eſpecially the former. Saying, as follows.

℣. 22. How long, ye ſimple ones, will ye love ſimplicity? &c.] Simple fooliſh things, agreeable to their character, being weak, ſimple men, men of weak capacities and ſhallow underſtandings; and ſuch were the firſt perſons that were called by Chriſt through the miniſtry of the word, even effectually; they were babes and ſucklings in compariſon of others, by whom they were deſpiſed as illiterate and ignorant of the law; ſee Matt. xi. 25. John vii. 49. 1 Cor. i. 26, 27. though it may reſpect the Jews in general, who were externally called by Chriſt, and were a ſimple and fooliſh people, addicted to ſilly cuſtoms and uſages, to the traditions of the elders, and loved the folly and darkneſs of them, and to continue in them, rather than the light of the goſpel, John iii. 19, 20. And the ſcorners delight in their ſcorning; at Chriſt, becauſe of the meanneſs of his parentage and education; at his diſciples and followers, at his doctrines and miracles, ſufferings and death. And fools hate knowledge? the knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt; the knowledge of the goſpel, and the truths of it; they hated the light of it, and did not care to come to it, but rather loved the darkneſs of the law, and even of error and infidelity; they hated Chriſt, the teacher of true and uſeful knowledge; they hated his perſon, though without a cauſe; they hated him in his offices, as a prophet to inſtruct them, as a prieſt to be the propitiation for them, and as a king to rule over them; ſuch fools were they, and who are therefore expoſtulated with by wiſdom, or Chriſt; which expoſtulations ſhew their continuance in theſe things, and the danger they were in by them, the pity and compaſſion of Chriſt as man and a miniſter of the word, and the fervour and importunity of his miniſtrations.

℣. 23. Turn ye at my reproof, &c.] Or rather to my reproof; for the words are not an exhortation to the converſion of the heart, or to true repentance; but to an attendance to the external miniſtry of the word preached, which reproves of ſin, righteouſneſs and judgment; and does not deſign the turning of the heart to it, which is God's work, but the turning of the face and ears to hear it; and ſo the Targum, "turn your face to my reproof," and not your backs, as they did, ſhewing a diſlike of it; or as Aben Ezra, "turn ye to hear my reproof;" turn your ears and liſten to it, and do not pull away the ſhoulder, or ſtop your ears that you may not hear it. Behold, I will pour out my ſpirit unto you; not upon you, but unto you; for the holy Spirit of God is not here deſigned, and the effuſion of his gifts, ordinary and extraordinary, or of his ſpecial grace; but the mind of wiſdom, or Chriſt, as the word is uſed in chap. xxix. 11. Some interpret it, here, my will[d]; the external revelation of his will made in the miniſtry of the word, by whom grace and truth, the doctrines of grace and truth, came in their full extent; for as the doctrines of grace were poured into his lips, ſo they were poured out by them again, out of his heart, as out of a fountain or well, as the word[e] here uſed ſignifies; which denotes the large and abundant revelation of the goſpel by Chriſt, and is mentioned as an encouragement to men to attend unto it; which ſenſe is confirmed by what follows.

lows. I will make known my words unto you; the doctrines of the goſpel, words of grace and wiſdom, and ſuch as never man ſpake as Chriſt did, his enemies being witneſſes; the words of peace and reconciliation, of life and righteouſneſs, and of eternal ſalvation, which were made known in a miniſterial way by Chriſt and his apoſtles; but the Jews were ſuch fools as to hate and deſpiſe the knowledge of theſe things; wherefore it follows:

℣. 24. Becauſe I have called, and ye refuſed, &c.] This is to be underſtood not of the internal call of wiſdom, or Chriſt, which is by the ſpecial grace of his Spirit; is according to an eternal purpoſe, the fruit of everlaſting love, peculiar to God's elect, and by a divine power; and is alſo a call to ſpecial bleſſings of grace, and to eternal glory; and which is always effectual, unchangeable and irreverſible, and can never be refuſed, rejected, and reſiſted, ſo as to become void and of no effect: but of the external call by the word, to the natural duties of religion, and to an attendance on the means of grace; which may be where no election goes before, no ſanctification attends, nor ſalvation follows, Matt. xx. 16. and xxii. 14. and this may be refuſed and rejected as it often is; as when men notwithſtanding that call, do not attend on the miniſtry of the word, or if they do, it is in a negligent, careleſs way; or they ſhew an averſion to it, deſpiſe, contradict, and blaſpheme it, as the Jews did, who were the perſons firſt called to hear it; ſee Matt. xxii. 2—5. I have ſtretched out my hand, and no man regarded; this is a geſture of perſons calling to others, as orators and preachers, requiring ſilence and attention; and when eager and fervent and importunate in their diſcourſes; it is attributed to Chriſt, Iſa. lxv. 2. Rom. x. 21. but notwithſtanding all wiſdom's eagerneſs, zeal, warmth and importunity, expreſſed by words and geſtures, it was all diſregarded; no attention was given to it, which is here complained of.

℣. 25. But ye have ſet at nought all my counſel, &c.] The ſame with the counſel of God, Acts xx. 27. The whole goſpel, and all the truths of it; the intire ſcheme of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt, which is the produce of divine wiſdom, and is according to the counſel of the divine will, and his eternal purpoſe in Chriſt Jeſus; this the Jews ſet at nought, made no account of, but deſpiſed and rejected, as they did Chriſt, the author of it, Acts iv. 11, 12. as alſo his ordinances, which go by the ſame name, becauſe of the wiſdom and will of God in them; particularly baptiſm, rejected by the ſcribes and phariſees, Luke vii. 30. And would none of my reproof; would not hearken to it, nor take it, nor receive any inſtruction from it, nor caution by it; did not like it, but contemned it, and trampled upon it; ſee Matt. xxiii. 37.

℣. 26. I alſo will laugh at your calamity, &c.] By way of retaliation, meaſuring meaſure for meaſure; even as they ſcorned him, and delighted in their ſcorning, now he in his turn will laugh at them and their diſtreſs; which act is aſcribed to the Lord by an anthropopathy; ſee Pſal. ii. 4. and xxxii. 13. ſignifying, that he ſhould not at all pity them, ſhew no compaſſion to them, and have no mercy upon them; but rather expreſs a pleaſure and delight in diſplaying the glory of his juſtice in their deſtruction: the plain ſenſe is, that no favour would be ſhewn them, Iſa. xxvii. 11. The word tranſlated calamity, ſignifies a vapour [t], or cloud; denoting it would be a very dark diſpenſation with the Jews, as it was when wrath came upon them to the uttermoſt; even on their nation, city and temple; as in their laſt deſtruction by the Romans, which is here intended. I will mock when your fear cometh; which is the ſame thing in different words; for by fear, is meant the dreadful calamity on them, which brought dread, terror and conſternation with it, and of which they had fearful apprehenſions beforehand: wherefore this is mentioned among the ſigns of Jeruſalem's deſtruction, mens hearts failing them for fear, Luke xxi. 26.

℣. 27. When your fear cometh as deſolation, &c.] When ſuch will be the calamity that will occaſion this fear, that it ſhall be like ſome deſolating judgment, as famine, ſword and peſtilence, which lays all waſte: and ſuch was the deſtruction of the Jews by the Romans; it not only laid Jeruſalem and the temple waſte, but the whole country of Judea. Theſe are the deſolations ſaid to be determined, or the conſummation and that determined, which ſhould be poured upon the deſolate, Dan. ix. 26, 27. And your deſtruction cometh as a whirlwind; ſuddenly and unthought of, fierce and boiſterous, throwing down and carrying all before it: ſo the ſaid deſtruction did; it threw down the walls and houſes of the city of Jeruſalem, and the temple, and its fine buildings, ſo that not one ſtone was left upon another not thrown down, Matt. xxiv. 2. When diſtreſs and anguiſh cometh upon you; as they did at that time with a witneſs, when Jeruſalem was beſieged by the Romans: what with the ſword of the enemy without, and the famine within; together with the vaſt number of cut-throats and ſeditious perſons among themſelves; it was ſuch a time of diſtreſs and tribulation as never was from the beginning of the world, nor ever will be, Matt. xxiv. 22. Joſephus's hiſtory of thoſe times is a proper comment on theſe words.

℣. 28. Then ſhall they call upon me, but I will not anſwer, &c.] As he called them, and they refuſed to anſwer to his call, ℣. 24. ſo it was juſt in him to return no anſwer to them, when they called on him to deliver them from the Romans, and ſave them from ruin: for this was what they called out for, and what they expected, that the Meſſiah would come and deliver them; this was what they buoyed themſelves up with, and made them ſo deſperate to the laſt. They ſhall ſeek me early, but they ſhall not find me; this is the very thing that Chriſt told the Jews, and much in the ſame words with theſe, John vii. 34. and viii. 21. for when he was gone, and they were in diſtreſs, then they ſought after the Meſſiah, in the deſert, and in the ſecret chambers, and in this and the other place, where they were told he was; but alas! they could not find him: the true Meſſiah, whom they had rejected, was come and gone, and would return no more, until his ſecond coming to judgment; or however, till he came in his kingdom and power, to their ruin and deſtruction; of which coming of his the ſcriptures often ſpeak.

℣. 29. For that they hated knowledge, &c.] Spiritual and evangelical; the knowledge of the ſcriptures, of the promiſes and prophecies of them reſpecting the Meſſiah, though they were called upon and exhorted to ſearch them; the knowledge of the Meſſiah, his perſon, offices and grace; the knowledge of his goſpel, and the doctrines of it; ſee ℣. 22. And did not chooſe the fear of the Lord; which is the beginning of knowledge, ℣. 7. inſtead of chooſing, they caſt off the fear of the Lord; and by their rejection of the Meſſiah, and their uſage of him, it plainly appeared, that the fear of God was not before their eyes, nor upon their hearts; nor did they chooſe or care for the pure, ſpiritual and evangelical worſhip of God, introduced in the goſpel-diſpenſation; the ordinances of Chriſt they did not chooſe to ſubmit to; and would neither go into the kingdom of God or goſpel-church-ſtate themſelves, nor ſuffer thoſe that were entering to go in, Matt. xxiii. 13. but rather choſe their ſuperſtition and will-worſhip, according to the tradition of the elders, by which they made the word and worſhip of God of none effect.

℣. 30. They would none of my counſel, &c.] Neither his doctrines nor his ordinances; nor would they attend to the wholſome counſel and advice he gave them in his ſermons upon the mount, and in other diſcourſes of his at other times and places. They deſpiſed all my reproof; for their hypocriſy, uncleanneſs, covetouſneſs, and other ſins they were addicted to; ſee Matt. xxiii. but they derided him for it, Luke xvi. 14. where the ſame word is uſed as is by the Septuagint here. Theſe things are repeated from ℣. 25. to obſerve their ingratitude, and how juſt was their ruin, and what the true cauſe of it.

℣. 31. Therefore ſhall they eat of the fruit of their own way, &c.] Their evil ways; be puniſhed according to their deſerts, and receive the juſt reward of their iniquities; ſee Iſa. iii. 10, 11. And be filled with their own devices; or counſels[g]; their device and counſel was to put Chriſt to death; to deliver him to the Roman governor, that he might be crucified, as he was: and they afterwards had their belly-full of crucifixion, as the word[h] uſed ſignifies; ſuch vaſt numbers of them were crucified by the Romans before the walls of the city, five hundred a day, and ſometimes more; inſomuch that room was wanted for croſſes, and croſſes for bodies[i].

℣. 32. For the turning away of the ſimple ſhall ſlay them, &c.] Or be the cauſe of their being ſlain; even their turning away from Chriſt, their averſion to him; their turning their backs on him, and a deaf ear to him; their turning away from his goſpel, and putting it from them, thereby judging themſelves unworthy of everlaſting life: in all which they ſhewed themſelves to be the ſimple and fooliſh perſons they were; and for which wrath and ruin came upon them, and they were ſlain with the ſword and famine, and by one another. Some render it, as Aben Ezra, the reſt or quietneſs of the ſimple[k], &c. taking up their reſt in themſelves, and in their obſervance of ceremonies and traditions; and crying Peace, peace, when ſudden deſtruction was at hand: or a ſtubborn hardened reſt in ſin, a ſeared conſcience; having no ſenſe of guilt, nor fear of puniſhment; living in carnal ſecurity till death ſhould ſeize upon them. And the proſperity of fools ſhall deſtroy them; that is, the abuſe of it; leading them to commit ſins, which bring deſtruction upon them; or ſeeing ſinners live with impunity, and proſper in the world, take encouragement from thence to indulge themſelves in ſin, which is their ruin; or, being in proſperity, think it will always be well with them, and therefore put away the evil day far from them, which comes upon them at an unawares; which was the caſe of the Jews.

℣. 33. But whoſo hearkeneth unto me, &c.] To wiſdom or Chriſt, to the cry and call above; to the voice of his goſpel, not only externally but internally; ſo as ſpiritually and experimentally to underſtand it, to diſtinguiſh it from the voice of a ſtranger; ſo as to approve of it, and receive it in the love of it, and to delight and take pleaſure in it; ſo as to feel the power of it, and believe it; not only give an aſſent unto it, but by faith receive it, and appropriate the things of it to a man's ſelf: and alſo to the voice of his precepts, his ordinances; ſo as to yield a chearful obedience to them, from a principle of love, with a view to his glory, and without truſting to and depending upon it. Such ſhall dwell ſafely; as they muſt indeed, ſince they dwell in God; in his heart, the ſecret place of the moſt High; and in his everlaſting and unchangeable love, wherefore they are not conſumed; and in the covenant of his grace, which is firm, and ſure, and immoveable; and in his power, by and in which they are kept, as in a garriſon, fortreſs or ſtrong-hold: and they dwell in Chriſt, the rock of ages, againſt which the gates of hell cannot prevail, and on which their ſouls are built; and ſo remain ſafe amidſt the floods, ſtorms and tempeſts, that beat upon them; the refuge to which they flee, the ſtrong-hold to which they turn, and whither they run and are ſafe; the ark in which they ride ſafely, amidſt all the waves and billows of affliction and tribulation; their place of defence, where they are ſafe from Satan; and are in his hands out of which none can pluck them, the Lord their righteouſneſs, by whom Judah is ſaved, and under whom Iſrael dwells ſafely; being by his righteouſneſs ſecure from divine juſtice, from the curſe of the law, and from wrath to come: beſides, ſuch have the Spirit dwelling in them, who is greater than he that is in the world; who when he, the enemy, comes in upon them as a flood, the Spirit of the Lord lifts up a ſtandard againſt him; angels are their guardians, encamp about them; and they are the inhabitants of a ſtrong city, which has ſalvation for walls and bulwarks; and eſpecially they will dwell ſafely in the other world, in thoſe manſions and everlaſting habitations in Chriſt's Father's houſe, he is preparing for them; which are ſure dwellings, as well as quiet reſting-places, as follows. And ſhall be quiet from fear of evil; as they may be in the preſent life, under a comfortable ſenſe of the blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice of Chriſt; which, when applied and laid hold on by faith, ſpeak peace to the conſcience, and yield quietneſs of mind: ſo that ſuch have no reaſon to be afraid of the evil one, Satan, who cannot devour and deſtroy them; nor of the evil of ſin, for though they may and ſhould be afraid to commit it, yet not of being conquered by it, and coming under the dominion of it, nor of being brought by it into a ſtate of condemnation; nor of the evil of judgments upon a wicked world; nor of death, and a future judgment; nor of hell, and everlaſting damnation; and hereafter ſuch will enter into peace, and be free from all evils, natural, moral, or ſpiritual; and from the fear of them, being out of the reach of them all. The ſafety and protection of thoſe that hearken to Chriſt, and believe in him, here promiſed, had a remarkable accompliſhment in the believing Jews; who, a little before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, were warned to go out from thence to a place called Pella, beyond Jordan[l], as they did, and where they were ſafe.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

THIS chapter directs to the means of attaining to the knowledge of divine things, and ſhews the profit and advantage ariſing from thence. The means are, embracing the doctrines of the goſpel, and retaining in memory and affection the ordinances of it, ℣. 1. and an inclination of the ear, and an application of the heart to the knowledge of theſe things, ℣. 2. An earneſt and importunate deſire, expreſſed by prayer, after the ſame, ℣. 3. and a diligent and unwearied ſearch for them, as for ſilver and hid treaſure, ℣. 4. The advantages are, that ſuch ſhall attain to the fear and knowledge of God; which may be concluded from theſe being the gift of God to his people, and from their being laid up for them, whom he carefully keeps and preſerves, ℣. 5—8. and not only ſo, but ſuch learn to do that which is juſt and right among men, ℣. 9. And beſides, ſuch is the nature of divine wiſdom, that when it has once got a place in the heart and in the affections, it will be a means of preſerving both from the ways of evil men, ℣. 10—12. who are deſcribed, ℣. 13—15. And from the evil woman, whoſe character is given, ℣. 16, 17. whoſe vicious courſe of life, and the ways ſhe leads perſons into, are repreſented as very dangerous, ℣. 18, 19. And on the contrary, ſuch is the uſefulneſs of true wiſdom, that it leads into the way of good men, who will be happy and ſafe, when the wicked ſhall be deſtroyed, ℣. 20—22.

℣. 1. My ſon, &c.] Theſe are either the continuation of the words of Solomon to his ſon Rehoboam; or to any one that came to him for inſtruction, or was within the reach of being taught by him; whom he addreſſes in this tender and affectionate manner, in order to gain his attention to what he was about to ſay: or elſe they are the words of wiſdom or Chriſt continued, thus beſpeaking his children and people; and giving them ſome very wholſome counſel and advice, backed with the moſt powerful and prevailing arguments. If thou wilt receive my words; or doctrines: the doctrines of the goſpel, relating to the perſon, office and grace of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; ſuch as the words of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and life; which are to be received, not as the word of man, but as the word of God; and with all readineſs of mind and willingneſs, as they were by the Bereans; and moſt gladly, as by the three thouſand pricked to the heart under Peter's ſermon; and as they are and will be by every ſenſible ſinner. And hide my commandments with thee; in the heart; ſo as to have a high eſteem of them, and a hearty affection and value for them; retain them in memory, and frequently think of them and meditate upon them, and conſtantly obſerve them; ſee Pſal. cxix. 11, 127, 128.

℣. 2. So that thou incline thine ear unto wiſdom, &c.] Hearken to wiſdom, that is, Chriſt; or rather, to the inſtruction of wiſdom, which is the goſpel; ſo called, becauſe it is the produce of divine wiſdom, what the wiſdom of man could never have deviſed, and which it oppoſes; and in which there is a moſt glorious diſplay of the wiſdom of God, in the juſtification and ſalvation of his people by Chriſt, 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7. and is worth liſtening unto with the greateſt attention, which is what is deſigned by this expreſſion. And apply thine heart to underſtanding; to a ſpiritual and experimental underſtanding of the goſpel, and the truths of it: for an inclination of the ear, without an application of the heart, which ſignifies the intenſeneſs of the mind, an earneſt and hearty deſire after knowledge, will ſignify nothing; a hypocrite may ſeemingly hear with great attention, and ſhew much affection, and yet his heart be after the world and the things of it, Ezek. xxxiii. 31. ſee Pſal. cxix. 112.

℣. 3. Yea, if thou crieſt after knowledge, &c.] Of God, Chriſt, and the goſpel; not only bow the ear, and bend the mind to theſe things, but importunately and fervently pray for them; not only attend the miniſtry of the word by men, but cry to God to give the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things; which ſuppoſes ſome ſenſe of a want of it, an hearty deſire for it, having ſome apprehenſion of the worth and value of it; and that it is to be had, as there is indeed great reaſon to hope for and expect it, James i. 5. And lifteſt up thy voice for underſtanding; for Chriſt, who is underſtanding as well as wiſdom, chap. viii. 14. or rather, for an underſtanding of the goſpel and the myſteries of it, which men do not naturally underſtand; and for which there muſt be an underſtanding given, or the eyes of the underſtanding muſt be enlightened; or Chriſt, by his Spirit and grace, muſt open the underſtanding, that it may underſtand theſe things; which is granted to thoſe who lift up their voice in prayer for it.

℣. 4. If thou ſeekeſt her as ſilver, &c.] That is, wiſdom, knowledge and underſtanding; which all ſignify and relate unto one and the ſame thing, expreſſed here by her: namely, the doctrine of wiſdom, or Chriſt; that is, the goſpel, and a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge and underſtanding of it, and the truths thereof; which are as deſirable and valuable as ſilver, and more ſo; and which may be fitly compared to it, and be preferred before it, for their purity, ſolidity and duration; ſee Pſal. cxix. 72. 1 Cor. iii. 12. and are to be ſought after with as much and more eagerneſs, affection and diligence, as ſilver is by thoſe who are moſt covetous of it, Prov. viii. 10. And ſearcheſt for her, as for hid treaſures; the goſpel is a treaſure, 2 Cor. iv. 7. an accumulation of riches. It contains rich truths, things valuable for their antiquity; for being far fetched and dear bought, coming from heaven, and ſealed by the blood of Chriſt, and the holy martyrs of Jeſus; and for the abundance of them; there are treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge in the goſpel, and in Chriſt the ſum and ſubſtance of it, who is full of truth as well as grace, Coloſ. ii. 3. John i. 14. It contains rich bleſſings of grace, ſuch as are ſpiritual, ſolid and ſubſtantial, ſure and irreverſible; and a multitude of them, Rom. xv. 29. and alſo rich promiſes, exceeding great and precious ones; which are abſolute and unconditional, ſuited to the various caſes of God's people, and ſure to all the ſeed: and it reveals the riches of God's goodneſs, his ſpecial goodneſs in Chriſt; the unſearchable riches of Christ, and the riches both of grace and glory. And under this notion of a treaſure is it to be ſearched for, and as an hid treaſure; in alluſion to what is laid up in the cabinets of princes, or lies in the bowels of the earth, as precious ſtones: Pliny[m] ſays, that topazin, in the language of the Troglo-

Troglodytes, has the ſignification of ſeeking, becauſe topazes are diligently ſought for and ſearched after; ſee the note on Job xxviii. 19. The goſpel, and the truths of it, were greatly hid under the former diſpenſation from the Gentile world, and very much from the Jews themſelves; being wrapped up in dark prophecies, obſcure hints, and ſhadowy types and ſacrifices; and are now, and always were, intirely hid from the wicked and reprobate part of the world, from them that are loſt, and from God's own elect before converſion. This is the fellowſhip of the myſtery that was hid in God, in his heart, from all eternity: the truths of it are, the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge hid in Chriſt; and likewiſe the treaſure hid in the field of the ſcriptures; which therefore are to be ſearched into for them, with like labour and reſolution with which men dig into the earth, to find the rich ore that is in the bowels of it: and this ſhould be done by diligent reading them; by frequent and deep meditation on them; by conſtant hearing the truths of the goſpel preached; by earneſt prayer for the illumination of the divine Spirit to underſtand them; and by all the help of the writings of good men, and converſation with them, that can be had. Theſe are things to be ſought for and ſearched after, in the firſt place, in the early time of life; and with the utmoſt diligence and labour, as being of the greateſt moment and importance; ſee Matt. xiii. 44. Eph. iii. 9, 10. Col. ii. 3.

℣. 5. Then ſhalt thou underſtand the fear of the Lord, &c.] The grace of fear, and the exerciſe of it; which is the beginning of wiſdom and knowledge, and is a treaſure itſelf, chap. i. 7. and ix. 10. Iſa. xxxiii. 6. By means of the goſpel, the Lord works it in the hearts of his people by his Spirit; and by the ſame leads them into the riches of his ſpecial grace and goodneſs, which they are influenced by to fear, and the Lord for the ſake of it: and particularly they are led hereby to the pardoning grace and mercy of God, which is with him, that he may be feared; and it is the goſpel which induces and encourages a true filial fear of God, by which men depart from evil; for that teaches them to deny all manner of ſin, and to live a godly life and converſation: ſo that through a diligent ſearch after the knowledge of the goſpel, and an attaining it, men come to have a ſpiritual, experimental and practical underſtanding of the fear of God as a grace; and alſo, as it includes the whole worſhip of God, by means of goſpel-light, they come to underſtand what ſort of worſhip that is, God is to be worſhipped with; that it is pure, ſpiritual and evangelical, ſuited to his nature and will: what the ordinances of divine ſervice are; and that theſe are to be kept as they were delivered, and in the exerciſe of faith, from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God, without truſting to them or depending on them for ſalvation. And this is the advantage ariſing from a diligent ſearch after the doctrine of wiſdom, or the goſpel, and a knowledge and underſtanding of it; and is uſed as an argument encouraging to it; and another follows. And find the knowledge of God; ſuch a knowledge of God as is not to be found by the light of nature, in the whole volume of the creatures, and in all the writings of the philoſophers; no, nor in the law of Moſes; for though much of God and his perfections may be ſeen and known by the things that are made, and much of the will of God by the law he gave; yet by neither of theſe is the knowledge of God in Chriſt, which is life eternal. This only is to be found in the goſpel, and by means of it; here only it is brought to light, and through this men not only find it, but increaſe more and more in it: herein is a glorious diſplay of his perſons and perfections, of his counſels and purpoſes, of his covenant and promiſes, of his mind and will, with reſpect to doctrine and worſhip; and of the way of peace, life and ſalvation, by Jeſus Chriſt; which muſt ſerve greatly to engage and excite perſons to a diligent ſearch and purſuit after it. And all that is here ſaid, is deſigned to encourage a diligent ſearch after divine things; for, as the poet[n] ſays, there is nothing ſo difficult, but by ſearching may be found out.

℣. 6. For the Lord giveth wiſdom, &c.] Natural wiſdom in all its branches, with all its improvements, and in its utmoſt latitude and perfection; and ſpiritual wiſdom, which lies in the knowledge of a man's ſelf, his own folly, impurity, impotence and miſery; in being wiſe unto ſalvation; in the knowledge of Chriſt, as the only way of ſalvation, and of God in Chriſt; in partaking of the true grace, which is wiſdom in the hidden part; in being acquainted experimentally with the doctrines of the goſpel; and in walking wiſely and circumſpectly, and as becomes it, which is practical wiſdom: and all this is the gift of God; as is alſo Chriſt, who is wiſdom, and is given to be wiſdom to his people. He is the gift of God to them, in all characters he bears, and relations he ſtands in; he is a very large comprehenſive gift, an unſpeakable one; which is given freely and liberally, and is never taken away again. Now this is ſaid, partly to caution ſuch who ſearch after wiſdom and find it, not to attribute it to their diligence and induſtry, but to the grace of God; and partly as a direction where to go for it; and as an encouragement to hope to have it, ſince the Lord freely gives it, James i. 5. Out of his mouth cometh knowledge and underſtanding; by the prophets of the Old Teſtament, who came with a Thus ſaith the Lord, and were the mouth of the Lord to the people; from whence flowed the knowledge of divine things; of the will of God; of the Meſſiah, his perſon and offices; of his coming, ſufferings, death, and ſalvation by him: and by his Son, by whom he has ſpoke in theſe laſt days, and has declared all his mind; and by whom the doctrines of grace and truth, and the knowledge of them, are come fully and clearly, Heb. i. 1. John i. 17, 18. and by the ſcriptures of truth, both of the Old and of the New Teſtament, which are the word of God; what are breathed by him, and come out of his mouth, and are able to make men wiſe unto ſalvation: and by the miniſters of the goſpel, who ſpeak in the name of the Lord, and the Lord by them; and by means of whom he imparts much ſpiritual and evangelical knowledge to the ſons of men; the mouth of a goſpel-miniſter, who is the mouth of God to men, ſpeaketh wiſdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment, Pſal. xxxvii. 30. This clauſe is added, to encourage to a ſearch after wiſdom in the uſe of means; namely, by attending on the word and the miniſtry of it.

℣. 7. He layeth up ſound wiſdom for the righteous, &c.] In order to give it to them that ſeek for it; which is another encouragement to ſearch after it. By ſound wiſdom may be meant, not the law, as Kimchi and Ben Melech; ſo called, becauſe it endures for ever, when all beings are defective and come to nothing; but the goſpel, which is ſound doctrine, pure and incorrupt; true and real wiſdom, in oppoſition poſition to that which has only the ſhew of wiſdom, and is ſcience falſely ſo called; and this was hid in God, in Chriſt, and laid up as a treaſure in the ſacred ſcriptures: or elſe the true grace of God, in diſtinction from that which is counterfeit; and is that goodneſs of his, which he has laid up in his heart, and in the covenant of his grace; and the fulneſs of grace which he has laid up in Chriſt for them, Pſal. xxxi. 19. or eternal glory and happineſs. The word here uſed ſignifies eſſence, ſubſtance [o]; that which really is, and is ſolid and ſubſtantial; and ſuch are the glories of the other world, the crown of righteouſneſs, the hope laid up in heaven, and the inheritance reſerved there, Col. i. 5. 2 Tim. iv. 8. 1 Pet. i. 4. Theſe are real things, though inviſible, and are rich and valuable; and have ſubſtance and ſolidity in them, in oppoſition to earthly riches, which are a vain ſhew, and are things that are not, and at beſt temporal and periſhing; but theſe are an enduring ſubſtance, chap. viii. 21. and xxiii. 5. Heb. x. 34. The Septuagint render it by ſalvation, and the Targum by a word which ſignifies glory and honour; all which may well be underſtood of eternal life, which is laid up and reſerved for the righteous: not for ſuch who are only ſo in ſhew and imagination, but for thoſe who are really and truly ſo; not for thoſe who are legally, but evangelically righteous; or not for ſuch that ſeek righteouſneſs by the law, but by faith in Chriſt; for ſuch who are made righteous, by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and by faith receive it, and lay hold on it as their righteouſneſs; and in conſequence of this, live ſoberly and righteouſly: for theſe only eternal life is prepared; they only have a right unto it, and a meetneſs for it, and ſhall enjoy it. He is a buckler to them that walk uprightly; who are ſincere in their deportment before God and men; who walk according to the rule of the divine word; who walk by faith on Chriſt, and walk on in him as they have received him; and go on living by faith on his righteouſneſs, which is walking in his uprightneſs, till they come to be with him for ever in heaven. To theſe the Lord is a buckler or ſhield; he covers them with the ſhield of faith, his own Son, his blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice; which faith lays hold on and uſes as a ſhield againſt Satan's fiery darts; and gives them the ſhield of ſalvation, which ſecures them from ſin and wrath, and every enemy; and encompaſſes them about with his favour, as a ſhield, which is immutable and invariable; and keeps them by his power, through faith unto ſalvation, Eph. vi. 16. Pſal. xviii. 35. and v. 12. 1 Pet. i. 5. with this compare Gen. xv. 1. Pſal. iii. 3. and xviii. 2. and lxxxiv. 11. Some [p] read theſe words by way of appoſition, and underſtand them of ſound wiſdom; that that is a buckler or ſhield to the perſons here deſcribed; ſee Eccl. vii. 12.

℣. 8. He keepeth the paths of judgment, &c.] That is, the Lord keeps them; he does that which is juſt and right himſelf, in the courſe of his providence, and in the methods of his grace; and as he guides the feet of his people in the ways of righteouſneſs and holineſs, he keeps them there from turning out of them. The words may be rendered, to keep the paths of judgment [q]; and ſo expreſſes the end, fruit and effect of the Lord's being a buckler to them, as he is ſaid to be in the preceding verſe: he is their ſhield and protection, ſo as either to keep them in the right ways in which they ſhould go; or that they might ſtudiouſly obſerve them, and keep walking therein, without ſtumbling in them, or declining from them. And preſerveth the way of his ſaints; to whom he has been kind and bountiful; or who have been merciful, liberal and generous to others; who having partook of the grace of God themſelves, are uſeful to men: the Targum calls them righteous ones. Theſe the Lord preſerves by his power and grace, in the way in which he has led them, and which is his own way, ſafe to his kingdom and glory: for none of his ſaints, his holy and righteous ones, ſhall ever periſh; the way in which he directs them, and in which he keeps them, leads to everlaſting life; ſee 1 Sam. ii. 9.

℣. 9. Then ſhalt thou underſtand righteouſneſs and judgment, &c.] This is another fruit and effect of the goſpel, and of a ſpiritual underſtanding of it; that beſides the knowledge of God, and how to behave with reverence towards him, ℣. 5. it leads men into a notion of doing that which is right and juſt among men; it gives them not only a theoretic but a practical underſtanding of juſtice, and a true judgment of what is right and wrong; or gives ſuch an underſtanding thereof as that they practice it; for it teaches men to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, Tit. ii. 11, 12. It is not only a revelation and miniſtration of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt as the only matter of a ſinner's juſtification before God; and informs a man's judgment ſo that he can diſtinguiſh between truth and error, right and wrong, good and bad notions and practices; but it influences his actions, life and converſation, and engages him to do works of righteouſneſs from the beſt principles, upon the beſt motives, and with the beſt views. And equity; yea, every good path; that is, ſo to underſtand equity, as to do that which is equitable between man and man; and to underſtand every good path which the word of God directs to, even all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, ſo as to walk in them; theſe things the goſpel acquaints men with, and urges them to obſerve: or the words may be rendered, either the rectitude or equity of all good paths, as the Syriac verſion; how juſt, and right, and plain, and equitable every one is, and therefore ought to be walked in; or plainneſſes, or moſt plain, is or ſhall be every good path [r], to them that have a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of the goſpel; and by it an underſtanding of their duty. One word ſignifies plain and ſtraight, and another round [s], and both are true of the path of righteouſneſs; for though it is a circle of duty ſaints walk in, yet ſtraight and plain.

℣. 10. When wiſdom entereth into thine heart, &c.] Either Chriſt, the wiſdom of God; who enters there at converſion, and ſets up a throne in the heart, and dwells there by faith: or elſe the goſpel, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; which enters not into the head only, as in hypocrites and formal profeſſors; nor into the natural affections, as in the ſtony-ground-hearers; but into the heart, opened by the Spirit of God to receive it, ſo as to have a ſpiritual underſtanding of it; which is done when the goſpel comes not in word only, but in the demonſtration and power of the Spirit; when a man truly underſtands it, approves of it, loves it, believes it; and it has a place in his heart, and richly dwells there. And knowledge is pleaſant unto thy ſoul; which the goſpel thus entering gives; even the knowledge of God in Chriſt, as the God of all grace, as gracious and merciful, forgiving iniquity, tranſgreſſion and ſin; the knowledge of Chriſt, as the only Redeemer and Saviour; and the knowledge of goſpel-truths, which lead and relate unto him: all which is pleaſant to a gracious ſoul, and affords unſpeakable delight to the mind; and is ſweeter, as every truth of the goſpel is, than the honey or the honey-comb; ſee chap. xvi. 24.

℣. 11. Diſcretion ſhall preſerve thee, &c.] Which wiſdom or the goſpel gives, or the Lord by the means of it; for the goſpel makes a man wiſe and diſcreet in the buſineſs of ſalvation, and in his conduct and deportment; and the diſcretion it gives him will put him upon his guard, and direct him to watch againſt every error, and every falſe way. And ſo the words may be rendered, diſcretion will watch over thee; to keep thee from every thing pernicious in doctrine and practice. The Septuagint verſion renders it, good counſel; which wiſdom gives, and the goſpel is full of; and which, if attended to, is a means of the preſervation of the ſaints. Underſtanding ſhall keep thee; which is only the ſame thing expreſſed in other words. The Septuagint verſion renders it, an holy thought; and the Arabic verſion, a juſt thought ſhall preſerve thee in thy laſt times. What theſe are a means of keeping and preſerving from, is explained in the following verſes.

℣. 12. To deliver thee from the way of the evil man, &c.] Who is ſo by nature and practice, who is hardened in ſin and abandoned to it, whoſe courſe of life is evil, and who endeavours to draw others into the ſame evil practices; now the goſpel, and a ſpiritual knowledge of it, are a means of preſerving men from following the examples of ſuch perſons, and from walking with them in the ways of ſin: or from the evil way[t], from every evil way, from a vicious courſe of life; not from idolatry only, as ſome interpret it, though this may be included, and chiefly deſigned; but from all manner of ſin, from every thing that is contrary to the law of God and ſound doctrine. From the man that ſpeaketh froward things; perverſe things, things contrary to the light of nature, to divine revelation, to the word of God, both law and goſpel; if a ſingle man is meant, he might be thought to be the man of ſin, Antichriſt, who has a mouth ſpeaking blaſphemies againſt God, his name, his tabernacle, and them that dwell therein, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. and the goſpel delivers men from following him, and falling in with his perverſe doctrines and practices; but the word ſeems to be a collective one, and to be underſtood of all wicked men, to whom the deſcription agrees, as it is explained in the following verſes in the plural number; who out of their evil hearts, and the abundance of wickedneſs there, ſpeak evil things, tending to debauch the minds and manners of others; to be delivered from whom is a ſingular mercy. Jarchi reſtrains this to heretics, and ſuch as cauſed Iſrael to apoſtatize to idolatry, and turned the law into evil. The goſpel is undoubtedly a means of preſerving from error and hereſy.

℣. 13. Who leave the paths of uprightneſs, &c.] Or righteouſneſs, or the right and plain ways[u]; which the light of nature and the law of God, and eſpecially the goſpel of Chriſt, direct to; and in which they have been trained up, having had a religious education; for it ſuppoſes them to have been externally in theſe ways, ſince they are ſaid to leave them; for though perſons do not eaſily and ordinarily leave the ways they have been brought up in, yet ſometimes they do; and there are inſtances of it, and ſuch generally are the worſt of men. To walk in the ways of darkneſs; ſin, ignorance and infidelity; in which they that walk know not where they are, nor whither they are a going, and which muſt be very uncomfortable as well as dangerous; in which only works of darkneſs are done, and which lead to blackneſs of darkneſs, the darkneſs of hell; a miſerable choice, a ſad change this! So Schultens renders it, ways of horrid darkneſs.

℣. 14. Who rejoice to do evil, &c.] At the doing of it, or when they have done it; they are glad of an opportunity of doing miſchief, and glory when they have done it; it is a ſport and paſtime to them, Prov. x. 23. they take pleaſure in the act of ſin, and have no remorſe of conſcience afterwards; they ſpeak of it in an exulting manner, and boaſt of it, and glory in their ſhame. And delight in the frowardneſs of the wicked; of the wicked man, as Aben Ezra and Gerſom ſupply it; in the perverſities and contradictions of every wicked man; they not only take pleaſure in their own ſins but in the ſins of others, and in them that commit them; which is an aggravation of their wickedneſs, Rom. i. 32. they delight to hear a man ſpeak froward and perverſe things; things againſt God, and Chriſt, and religion, againſt all good men, and every thing that is good; againſt the goſpel, the doctrines and ordinances of it; and they delight to ſee him do things perverſe and contrary to the will of God. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, they exult in the worſt things.

℣. 15. Whoſe ways are crooked, &c.] Which ſwerve from, and are not agreeable to the rule of the divine word, either the law of God or the goſpel of Chriſt; ſin is an aberration, a ſtraying from the rule of God's word, a tranſgreſſion of his law; and a walk in it is unbecoming the goſpel of Chriſt; it has many ſerpentine windings and turnings in it; full of diſtortions and excurſions, and many retrograde actions; ſee Pſal. cxxv. 5. Iſa. lix. 8. And they froward in their paths; declining here and there, ſometimes going one way and ſometimes another, but always following that which is evil, and reſolute to continue therein.

℣. 16. To deliver thee from the ſtrange woman, &c.] As the goſpel of Chriſt and its doctrines, or the inſtructions of wiſdom, are a means of delivering perſons from the evil man, his company, ways, and works; ſo from a naughty woman, an adultereſs, called a ſtrange woman; not becauſe of another nation, or unknown, but becauſe ſhe belongs to another perſon, and not to him whom ſhe entices into her embraces. Gerſom interprets this of the ſenſitive appetite, and Jarchi of idolatry; as others do alſo of ſuperſtition and all falſe doctrine, and every thing that is contrary to true wiſdom; and the whole that is here and afterwards ſaid may well enough be applied to the whore of Rome, from whoſe fornication, or ſpiritual adultery, that is, idolatry, will-worſhip, and antichriſtian doctrines, the goſpel delivers men; ſee chap. vii. 5, &c. Even from the ſtranger which flattereth with her words; that uſeth ſmooth and ſoft words to work upon the paſſions, move the affections, and win the hearts of of men; and enſnare them and draw them to commit wickedneſs with her; ſee chap. v. 3. and vii. 21. and ſo Antichriſt, and all falſe teachers and heretics, with good words and fair ſpeeches deceive the hearts of the ſimple, Rom. xvi. 18.

℣. 17. Which forſaketh the guide of her youth, &c.] Not God, the God of her life, and who had provided for her from her youth up; nor her parent that had taken care of her in her infancy, and had been the guardian of her virgin-ſtate; but her huſband to whom ſhe was married in her youth, and to whom ſhe gave up herſelf to be guided and directed, ruled and governed by; and as it is an aggravation of evil in a man to deal treacherouſly againſt the wife of his youth, and the wife of his covenant, Mal. ii. 14. ſo it is in a woman to forſake the friend or companion of her youth [w], as the phraſe may be rendered; who loved her and eſpouſed her in his youthful age, and with whom he had lived long in love and friendſhip, and in great happineſs, but now forſakes him; her affections being alienated from him, quits his company and bed, and aſſociates with others. Gerſom interprets this of the human underſtanding, appointed to govern the other powers and faculties of the ſoul. And forgetteth the covenant of her God; not the covenant made with Noah, in which adultery, as well as other things, were forbidden; nor the law of Moſes, or covenant at Sinai, in which it was condemned; but the marriage-covenant, which ſhe entered into with her huſband when eſpouſed to him, and when they mutually obliged themſelves to be faithful to one another: and this is called the covenant of God; not only becauſe God is the author and inſtitutor of marriage, and has directed and enjoined perſons to enter into ſuch a contract with one another; but becauſe he is preſent at it, and is a witneſs of ſuch an engagement, and is appealed unto in it; which, as it adds to the ſolemnity of it, makes the violation of it the more criminal. So the church of Rome has forſook Chriſt, who was her guide in her firſt ſettlement, and her huſband ſhe profeſſed to be eſpouſed to, as a chaſte virgin; and has followed other lovers, and become the mother of harlots; ſo falſe teachers leave their guide, the ſcriptures, and bring in damnable hereſies, and deny the Lord that bought them, 2 Pet. ii. 1.

℣. 18. For her houſe inclineth unto death, &c.] Bends, verges, and points that way; it lies in the way to death, and brings unto it, and ſinks into it as into a ditch; or all that are in her houſe, that are familiar with her, live and dwell with her, and commit wickedneſs with her; theſe incline, or are liable to loſe, and do loſe their name, character and reputation, which is a death upon them; and bring diſeaſes upon their bodies, which iſſue in corporal death; or are in danger of dying by the hand of the injured huſband, or the civil magiſtrate; and alſo are expoſed unto eternal death: or ſhe inclines to death, which is her houſe [x], ſo Aben Ezra and Kimchi; and to which the Targum agrees, "for in "the pit of death is her houſe;" that is, the houſe ſhe at laſt comes to and muſt dwell in, and all that are enſnared by her; ſee chap. v. 5. and Rev. xxi. 8. and the ſecond death will be the portion of the whore of Rome and all her followers, Rev. xiv. 10, 11. and xvii. 8. and xix. 20. And her paths unto the dead; that is, her evil ways in which ſhe walks, and into which ſhe draws others to join with her; theſe lead both her and them to the damned [y] in hell to keep company with them, and be puniſhed as they are: the word rephaim, here uſed, ſometimes ſignifies giants, and ſo the Targum renders it here; and may refer to the giants of the old world, who were cut off for their debauchery and uncleanneſs, Gen. vi. 4, 11, 12. and with whom ſuch perſons ſhall be for ever.

℣. 19. None that go unto her return again, &c.] That is, thoſe that commit whoredom with her return not again by repentance, and to a ſober and chaſte way of living, at leaſt but very few; hence ſome of the ancients thought adultery was the unpardonable ſin; but it is certain that ſome have been recovered by the power of divine grace, and have been brought to repentance for their impure manner of life, and have truly believed in Chriſt, and lived ſober and godly lives afterwards; but, as the Targum adds, they do not return in peace, but with great diſtreſs of mind, remorſe of conſcience, and bitterneſs of ſoul; and theſe inſtances are rare, generally ſpeaking, ſuch as are enſnared by an adulterous woman, whoſe heart is ſnares and nets, and whoſe hands are as bands, are held ſo faſt by her that they ſeldom get out again, though ſome few may eſcape, Eccl. vii. 26. The words may be rendered, all that go into her [z] ſhall not return again; no, very few of them. And it is a very rare thing when men are fallen into idolatry, ſuperſtition, will-worſhip, and hereſy, that they are recovered out of this ſnare of the devil; there is a peradventure they may, but it is not often that they be looſed from it, 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. Neither take they hold of the paths of life; Chriſt, and the ways of Chriſt, which lead to eternal life; few there be that find theſe paths and walk in them, Matt. vii. 14. and eſpecially ſuch as are drawn aſide by an impure woman, they are held ſo faſt by her alluring charms, and ſo bewildered by her art of deceiving, that they are like perſons that are led out of their way, and cannot find it again.

℣. 20. That thou mayeſt walk in the way of good men, &c.] Who are not ſo by nature, but made ſo by the grace of God; ſuch as the ſaints, prophets, and patriarchs of old; and who walked in the way of righteouſneſs, holineſs, and truth; being directed therein by the Spirit and word of God: now the uſe and profit of wiſdom's inſtructions, or of the goſpel of Chriſt, and the doctrines of it, and a ſpiritual underſtanding of them, are not only to deliver men from the wicked man and the naughty woman, but alſo to influence and engage them to follow the examples of good men, and to walk in the ſame good old paths as they have done, Heb. vi. 12. And keep the paths of the righteous; not only obſerve them and walk in them, but continue therein, even in the paths of faith and holineſs; for righteous men, ſuch as are made righteous by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and are anew created unto righteouſneſs and true holineſs, and in conſequence thereof live righteouſly; theſe walk by faith on Chriſt, and as becomes his goſpel; and in all the ordinances of it, and in all the duties of religion; and the goſpel teaches all thoſe that receive and profeſs it to do the ſame.

℣. 21. For the upright ſhall dwell in the land, &c.] Such as are upright in heart, who have a right ſpirit renewed in them; whoſe hearts are right with God, have the truth of grace in them; whoſe faith is unfeigned, their love without diſſimulation, and their hope without hypocriſy; and who are upright in their lives and converſations; theſe being Iſraelites according to the fleſh, as well as Iſraelites indeed in a ſpiritual ſenſe, ſhall dwell in the land of Canaan, which the Lord promiſed to ſuch, and which good men enjoyed by virtue of it: or the ſenſe is, that ſuch ſhall dwell peaceably and quietly in the world, and poſſeſs the good things of it, though in a ſmall quantity, in ſuch a comfortable manner with the love of God, and a ſenſe of it, as wicked men do not; or elſe they ſhall inhabit the world to come, as Jarchi interprets it; not only a future ſtate of happineſs in heaven, but the Meſſiah's kingdom on earth, the new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs, 2 Pet. iii. 13. And the perfect ſhall remain in it; or be left in it[a]; or ſhall be ſtrengthened[b], confirmed and eſtabliſhed in it; or they ſhall dwell in it as a tent or tabernacle, bound with ſtrong cords; ſee Iſa. xxxiii. 20. or continue there, when others ſhould have no place in it, as follows. By the perfect are meant ſuch as have all grace ſeminally implanted in them, though it is not come up to maturity; who have a perfection of parts but not of degrees; are properly men in Chriſt, though they are not arrived to the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt; are perfectly holy in Chriſt, though not in themſelves; and are perfectly juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and perfectly comely through his comelineſs, though as yet imperfect in themſelves; and thoſe that ſhall dwell in the new heavens and new earth, and remain there a thouſand years, ſhall be entirely perfect in ſoul and body, wholly without ſin; and compleat in knowledge, holineſs, and peace: the Targum renders it, who are without ſpot, undefiled perſons; ſuch who are not defiled with women, with the ſtrange woman before mentioned; whoſe garments are not defiled, and who are free from the pollution of falſe doctrine, will-worſhip, ſuperſtition, and idolatry, Rev. iii. 4. and xiv. 4.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter wiſdom, or Chriſt, delivers out ſome freſh leſſons and inſtructions to his children; as not to forget his doctrine, but heartily attend to his precepts and ordinances, ſeeing theſe are the means of lengthening out their days, and of enjoying peace, ℣. 1, 2. as well as had the promiſe of the mercy and truth of God, and the continuance of them annexed to them; and therefore are exhorted to keep cloſe to them, and ſhew the greateſt value and affection for them, which was the way to find favour with, and to be taken notice of by God and man, ℣. 3, 4. and then he proceeds to exhort them to a hearty truſt in the Lord, without dependence on themſelves; and to ſeek direction from him in every ſtep they took, which they might expect to have, ℣. 5, 6. to humility and the fear of God, and fleeing from evil, which they would find would much contribute to their health, ℣. 7, 8. to liberality in ſupporting the worſhip of God and the intereſt of religion, which would turn to account and profit to them, ℣. 9, 10. to patience in bearing the chaſtiſement of the Lord, as coming from a loving father, ℣. 11, 12. then follows a commendation of wiſdom, and the happineſs of the man poſſeſſed of it is declared, ℣. 13. from the profit, preciouſneſs, pleaſure, and uſefulneſs of it, ℣. 14—18. and from its concern in the works of creation and providence, ℣. 19, 20. and from that comfort, honour, ſafety, and ſecurity, which come by the doctrines and inſtructions of wiſdom, and a ſteady regard to them, ℣. 21—26. and the chapter is concluded with exhortations to beneficence, charity, concord, and peace with neighbours, ℣. 27—30. and to ſhun the ways of wicked men, urged from the different ſtate and condition of wicked men and fools, and of the juſt, the lowly and wiſe, ℣. 31—35.

℣. 1. My ſon, forget not my law, &c.] Or doctrine[e]; the doctrine of Chriſt, the goſpel, and the ſeveral truths of it; which being of the utmoſt moment and importance ſhould be kept in memory, and not let ſlip, or be in the leaſt ſlighted and neglected; ſee Heb. ii. 1—3. But let thine heart keep my commandments; as the ark or cheſt kept the two tables of the law put into it; it denotes a cordial affection for the commandments and ordinances of Chriſt, a hearty attention and obedience to them, and a conſtant and chearful obſervance of them, flowing from love and gratitude to him, John xiv. 15, 21.

℣. 2. For length of days, and long life, &c.] Or years of life or lives[f]; a long life of uſefulneſs and comfort here, and eternal life hereafter: the law of Moſes promiſed a long life to the obſervers of it; but the goſpel of Chriſt brings an immortal life to light; and promiſes to all believers in him that they ſhall not periſh, but ſhall have everlaſting life. Length of days for ever and ever was aſked by Chriſt of his Father, and given him, and is in his right hand, ỳ. 16. it is in his power to give, and he does give it to all his children, people, and followers, Pſal. xxi. 4. John xvii. 2. And peace ſhall they add to thee; the goſpel is the goſpel of peace, which not only proclaims peace by the blood of Chriſt; but the doctrines of it, ſuch as juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, pardon by his blood, and atonement by his ſacrifice, are the means of giving and increaſing ſpiritual peace in the hearts of believers; and ſo are the ordinances of Chriſt, which in ỳ. 17. are called for that reaſon paths of peace; ſee Rom. v. 1, 11. Pſal. cxix. 165.

ỳ. 3. Let not mercy and truth forſake thee, &c.] Or forſake not them, and the exerciſe of them; ſhew mercy to fellow-creatures, to ſinful men, to the bodies of men, by relieving their wants; and to their ſouls, by pitying and praying for them, and by giving them wholſome counſel and advice: to fellow-chriſtians, ſympathize with them in their troubles, put on bowels of compaſſion, be tender-hearted, and forgive offences; and, in a ſpirit of meekneſs, reſtore backſliders, for God will have mercy and not ſacrifice. Attend to truth; exerciſe faith on the Lord; caſt not away your confidence; ſpeak truth to your neighbour and brother; and hold faſt the truth of the goſpel, and never depart from it. Though many interpreters underſtand this by way of promiſe, and as an encouragement to regard the doctrines and ordinances of Chriſt, rendering the words, mercy and truth ſhall not forſake thee[g]; meaning the mercy and truth of God; the mercy of God in forgiving ſin, in ſympathizing under affliction, in helping in time of need, in ſupplying with all needful grace, and in bringing to eternal life; for the mercy of the Lord is from everlaſting to everlaſting upon them that fear him, Pſal. ciii. 17. the truth of God, his faithfulneſs in performing promiſes, never fails; the unbelief of man cannot make it of no effect; though we believe not, he abides faithful and true to every word of his; not one ſhall fail or paſs away, all ſhall be fulfilled; ſee Pſal. lxxxix. 33. Rom. iii. 3, 4. 2 Tim. ii. 13. all his paths are mercy and truth, and he never goes out of them, Pſal. xxv. 10. Bind them about thy neck; as chains for ornament: not mercy and truth, juſt before mentioned, as may ſeem at firſt ſight; but the law and commandments of wiſdom, ỳ. 1. or the doctrines and ordinances of Chriſt; ſee chap. i. 8, 9. reckon it as your greateſt honour, glory and beauty, that you ſtedfaſtly adhere to theſe things; nothing makes a believer look more lovely in converſation, than a cloſe regard to the truths of Chriſt, and a conſtant walking in his ordinances. Write them upon the table of thine heart; do not forget them, keep them in memory, and always retain an hearty affection for them; it is the Spirit's work to write them in the heart; and when they are there written, it is the work of ſaints, under a divine influence, to copy them over in life, and to ſhew by their conduct and behaviour that they are written there; ſee Jer. xxxi. 33. 2 Cor. iii. 3. The alluſion in both phraſes is to the directions given about the law of Moſes, Deut. vi. 8, 9. and to the writing of his law on tables of ſtone: and it was uſual with the ancients, in after-times, to write on tables of wood; Solon's laws were written on tables of wood[h]; and ſuch were the tabellæ & pugillares of the Romans, made of box, beach, and other ſorts of wood, covered with wax, on which they wrote; ſee the note on Hab. ii. 2. but Solomon would have his law written on the fleſhly tables of the heart, 2 Cor. iii. 3.

ỳ. 4. So ſhalt thou find favour, &c.] Or grace[i]; the grace of God, and larger meaſures of it; as Noah did, Gen. vi. 8. which are communicated to men when in the way of their duty: or good-will, eſteem and reſpect among men; as Joſeph had with Potiphar, and the keeper of the priſon, Gen. xxxix. 4, 21. And good underſtanding in the ſight of God and man; as Chriſt, as man, had in the ſight of both, Luke ii. 52. that is, to be taken notice of, regarded and approved by both. Some render it, good ſucceſs[k]; proſperity in things temporal and ſpiritual; ſee Pſal. cxi. 10. There is ſomething lovely, and of good report, in a cloſe attention to the doctrines and duties of religion; which make a man amiable in the ſight of others, and which is followed with a bleſſing from the Lord.

ỳ. 5. Truſt in the Lord with all thine heart, &c.] Not in a creature, the beſt, the holieſt, and the higheſt; not in any creature-enjoyment, as riches, ſtrength and wiſdom; nor in any outward privilege, ariſing from natural deſcent and education; not in a man's ſelf, in his own heart, which is deceitful; nor in any works of righteouſneſs done by him; not in a profeſſion of religion, or the duties of it, ever ſo well performed; not in frames, nor in graces, and the exerciſe of them; no, not in faith or truſt itſelf: but in the Lord, the object of all grace, and in him only; in Jehovah the Father, as the God of nature and providence, for all temporal bleſſings; and as the God of all grace, for all ſpiritual bleſſings, and all the needful ſupplies of grace; and for eternal happineſs, which he has provided, promiſed, and freely gives. Truſt in him at all times; in times of affliction, temptation and darkneſs: there is a great deal of reaſon for it; all power and ſtrength are in him to help; his love, grace and mercy, move him to it, and are always the ſame: the conſideration of what he has done for others that have truſted in him, and for ourſelves in times paſt, ſhould induce and encourage to it; as alſo the happineſs of thoſe that truſt in him, who enjoy peace and ſafety; and his diſpleaſure at thoſe that ſhew any diffidence of him, or diſtruſt him. Truſt in Jehovah the Son; in his perſon for acceptance; in his righteouſneſs for juſtification; in his blood for pardon; in his fulneſs for ſupply; in his power for protection and preſervation; and in him alone for ſalvation and eternal life. Truſt in Jehovah the Spirit, to carry on and finiſh the work of grace upon the heart; of which a ſaint may be confident, that where it is begun it will be completed. And this truſt in Father, Son and Spirit, ſhould be with all the heart, cordial and ſincere. The phraſe denotes not ſo much the ſtrength of faith, as the ſincerity of it; it ſignifies a faith unfeigned; it is not ſaying or profeſſing that a man believes and truſts in the Lord; but it is with the heart, and with his whole heart, that he believes unto righteouſneſs, if he believes aright; ſee Rom. x. 10. Acts viii. 37. And lean not unto thine own underſtanding; or truſt not to that; for it ſtands oppoſed to truſting in the Lord. Men ſhould not depend upon their own wiſdom and underſtanding in the conduct of civil life, but ſhould ſeek the direction and bleſſing of providence, or otherwiſe will meet with diſappointment; and when they ſucceed, ſhould aſcribe it, not to their own prudence and wiſdom, but to the goodneſs of God; for bread is not always to the wiſe, nor nor riches to men of underſtanding, Eccl. ix. 11. and much leſs ſhould men lean to their own underſtanding in matters of religion; a natural man has no underſtanding of ſpiritual things, of the things of the goſpel, nor indeed any practical underſtanding of things moral, Rom. iii. 11. 1 Cor. ii. 14. Jer. iv. 22. The underſtanding of man is darkened by ſin; yea, is darkneſs itſelf; it is like the firſt earth, covered with darkneſs, till light is let into it, and therefore not to be leaned unto and depended on, Eph. iv. 18. and v. 8. There is a neceſſity of a new heart and ſpirit, of an underſtanding to be given, in order to underſtand ſpiritual and divine things, Ezek. xxxvi. 26. 1 John v. 20. for though theſe are not contrary to the reaſon and underſtanding of men; yet they are above them, and cannot be diſcovered, reached, comprehended, and accounted for by them, Matt. xvi. 17. John iii. 4, 9. Nay, there are ſome things in the goſpel, which, though plain to an enlightened underſtanding by the word of God; yet the manner how they are cannot be apprehended: as the doctrines of a Trinity of perſons; of the generation of the Son of God; the proceſſion of the Spirit; the union of the two natures in Chriſt; the reſurrection of the dead, &c. In ſhort, not our reaſon and underſtanding at beſt, and much leſs as carnal and unſanctified, but the word of God only is our rule of judgment, and the ſtandard of our faith and practice; and to that we ſhould have recourſe, and be directed by it, and not lean to our own underſtandings.

℣. 6. In all thy ways acknowledge him, &c.] Or know him[l]; the Lord: ſet him before thee; have him always in view; conſider him as ever preſent with thee, obſerving every ſtep thou takeſt; and take not one ſtep without his leave, and without his advice; aſk wiſdom of him who gives liberally; conſult his word, and make the ſcriptures thy counſellors, or the men of thy counſel, as in Pſal. cxix. 24. take him as your guide; obſerve the footſteps of his providence; follow the Lamb whereſoever he goes; walk not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit; when things go croſs and adverſe, and not to your mind, ſubmit to his ſovereignty; and be ſtill and know that he is God, that does all things right, for his own glory and his people's good, Pſal. xlvi. 10. and when things ſucceed, give him the glory of all; own his hand in it, and the bounty of it; acknowledge that all you have, in providence and grace, come from him. And he ſhall direct thy paths; man cannot direct his own; no, not a good man: this is a bleſſing from the Lord; who orders the ſteps of his people, keeps the feet of his ſaints, and directs them aright in things temporal and ſpiritual, Jer. x. 23. Pſal. xxxvii. 23. 1 Sam. ii. 9.

℣. 7. Be not wiſe in thine own eyes, &c.] So as to act independently of God; not to truſt in him, nor acknowledge him, nor ſeek to him for help and direction; nor aſk nor take the advice of others; but being conceited and ſelf-ſufficient, lean to thine own underſtanding as being wiſe enough to conduct all affairs in life by thy own diſcretion; and in matters of religion wiſer than thy teachers, and even than the ſcriptures, being wiſe above that which is written; pleaſing thyſelf with thine own wiſdom, as exceeding others; glorying in it as thine own acquiſition, and not aſcribing it to God, ſo far as it any ways deſerves the name of wiſdom; though for the moſt part that which men glory in, and are conceited of, is not wiſdom but folly; and at leaſt it is their folly to boaſt of it and be elated with it; ſee Iſa. v. 21. Rom. xii. 16. Fear the Lord; which is true wiſdom; and where this is not, there is none, let men be ever ſo conceited; and where this is, there is humility; theſe two go together, and make a man wiſe, rich and honourable, chap. xxii. 4. The fear of the Lord is oppoſed to pride, high-mindedneſs and vain conceit, Rom. xi. 20. this includes reverence of God, faith in him, dependence on him, acknowledgment of him, ſeeking to him for direction, and carefulneſs not to offend him. And depart from evil; from the evil of ſelf-confidence and ſelf-conceit, and from all other evil; the fear of God influences men to avoid ſin, and abſtain from all appearance of it; by means and through the exerciſe of it, men forſake it, and keep at a diſtance from it, chap. xvi. 6. Nehemiah could not do as others did, becauſe of the fear of the Lord; and Job was a man that feared God, and therefore he avoided that which was evil, Neh. v. 15. Job i. 1.

℣. 8. It ſhall be health to thy navel, &c.] That part of the body which is the knot of the inteſtines; and may be put for the bowels and inward parts, which being ſound, the body is in health; and theſe may be put for the whole body: and ſo the Septuagint verſion renders it, to thy body; and this may be put for the whole perſon. And the ſenſe is, either wiſdom, as Jarchi; the doctrine of wiſdom, the goſpel; which teaches men to truſt in the Lord, and not in themſelves, to apply to him for wiſdom, and not lean to their own underſtanding; this contributes much to a man's ſpiritual health and welfare: or elſe the fear of the Lord is of this uſe to men, both in ſoul and body; ſince by it they depart from thoſe ſins which bring diſeaſes upon the body; and are influenced by it to the exerciſe of ſuch graces, and the diſcharge of ſuch duties, as are the means of keeping the ſoul in good plight. And marrow to thy bones; or, watering[m] to them: that which irrigates and moiſtens them, and makes and keeps them ſtrong and ſolid; ſee Job xxi. 24. What marrow is to the bones, that is wiſdom, or the fear of God, to the ſouls of men; the means of eſtabliſhing and ſtrengthening them againſt ſin, and ſnares and temptations, and to do the will and work of God.

℣. 9. Honour the Lord with thy ſubſtance, &c.] Or, out of thy ſubſtance[n]; for as it ſhould be a man's own that he gives, and not another's, and therefore called thy ſubſtance; or, as the Septuagint verſion, out of thy juſt labours, what is righteouſly and lawfully gotten, and not by fraud and oppreſſion; ſo it is only a part of it, and not all, that is required; what in proportion to his ſubſtance can be prudently ſpared, and is ſufficient and ſuitable to the call in providence. A man's ſubſtance are his wealth and riches; his mammon, as the Targum; which, in compariſon of heavenly things, indeed have no ſubſtance in them: yet theſe are worldly ſubſtance, and of account; and as with theſe God has honoured men, they ſhould honour him with them again, by giving to the poor, eſpecially his poor ſaints; for as an oppreſſing of them is a reproaching of him, ſo having mercy on them is honouring him, chap. xiv. 31. and eſpecially by contributing to the ſupport of his worſhip, the keeping up the intereſt and credit of religion, and for the ſpread of the goſpel; and chiefly by communicating to the miniſters of it, giving them the double honour which is due to them; and which, when given them, the Lord takes as done to himſelf, as an honouring him, 1 Tim. v. 17. And with the firſt fruits of all thine increaſe; or, out of the chief of all thine increaſe[o]; God muſt have the beſt, and in the firſt place. The alluſion is either to the maintenance of the prieſts and Levites under the law, and the manner of doing it; which, among other things, was out of the annual produce of the earth, and the firſt-fruits of it; and may reſpect the comfortable ſupport of goſpel-miniſters under the preſent diſpenſation; ſee 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14. or to the firſt-fruits of every kind offered to the Lord, and to the feaſt kept ſacred to him at the ingathering the fruits of the earth, Lev. xxiii. 10, 17, 39. and even among the heathens formerly were ſomething of the ſame kind. Ariſtotle ſays[p], the ancient ſacrifices and aſſemblies were inſtituted as firſt-fruits, after the gathering of the fruits, at which time eſpecially they ceaſed from working.

℣. 10. So ſhall thy barns be filled with plenty, &c.] With plenty of corn; ſo that there will be a ſufficient proviſion of bread for the eater for the enſuing year, and of ſeed for the ſower when the time of ſowing returns; ſo far ſhould they be, it ſuggeſts, from being loſers, by honouring the Lord with their ſubſtance, that they ſhould be gainers by it; inſtead of having leſs, ſhould have abundantly more. And thy preſſes ſhall burſt out with new wine; not that they ſhould really burſt[q], for then the wine would be ſpilled, which would be a loſs; but that they ſhould be ſo full, that they ſhould be ready to burſt or run over: and ſo the Targum, and the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, and thy preſſes ſhall overflow with new wine. As the former clauſe denotes plenty of eatables, ſo this of drinkables; and both, fulneſs of all ſorts of proviſions, promiſed to the liberal man; and may be an emblem of the large proviſions of grace and glory, which the Lord has made for and beſtows upon ſuch that honour him.

℣. 11. My ſon, deſpiſe not the chaſtening of the Lord, &c.] This ſeems to be introduced to prevent an objection that may be made to the above promiſe of plenty; ſeeing the children of God are often afflicted in this world, even the wiſe and pious, and thoſe that fear the Lord, and honour him; which is accounted for, and the reaſon of it given, in the following verſe. Theſe words are cited in Heb. xii. 5, 6. and are repreſented as an exhortation, ſpoken unto children, the children of God; by which it appears, that not any ſingle perſon is meant by my ſon; and as not here, ſo neither elſewhere in this book, where the ſame phraſe is uſed. It is not to be limited to any ſon of Solomon's according to the fleſh; nor to any perſon or perſons, that applied to him for inſtruction, and were taught by him; nor to all the people of God in his time: but it has reſpect to the Jews in the times of the apoſtles; and even to all the children of God in all ages, who more or leſs endure afflictions, here called the chaſtening of the Lord, becauſe they are from him; whatever concern, men, or devils, or ſecond cauſes, may have in them, they are originally from the Lord, either ſent or ſuffered by him; they are indeed by his appointment, and are ordered, limited and reſtrained by him, and are overruled for his glory and his people's good: they are not chaſtiſements in a way of vindictive wrath and juſtice, which would be contrary to the ſatisfaction of Chriſt, the juſtice of God, his everlaſting and unchangeable love, and to his word and oath; but they are in love; they are the chaſtiſements of a father, in which he deals with them as with children; and uſes them for the good diſcipline and inſtruction of them, as the word[r] here ſignifies; and therefore not to be deſpiſed, or loathed and abhorred, as diſagreeable food or phyſic be; or as if they were unneceſſary and unprofitable, or unworthy of notice and regard; or as little, ſlight and trifling things, without conſidering from whence they come and for what they are ſent; but, on the contrary, ſhould be regarded as uſeful and ſerviceable; ſee Job v. 17. Neither be weary of his correction; rebuke or reproof[s]; ſo in Heb. xii. 5. when thou art rebuked of him, not in wrath and fury, but in love, as before. The ſame thing is meant by correction as chaſtening; and ſuppoſes a fault to be committed by him that is corrected, for God corrects none but for ſin; and authority in the corrector, which he, as the Father of ſpirits, and as our covenant-God and Father in Chriſt, has a right to do: he corrects by his Spirit, by his word, by his miniſters, and by his providences, afflictive ones, which laſt is here meant; and it is always for good, at a proper time, and when neceſſary, in meaſure and with judgment: and of this the children ſhould not be weary, as grievous and intolerable; and eſpecially ſhould not be weary of their lives on account of it, in which ſenſe the word is uſed in Gen. xxvii. 46. which has been the caſe of Job and others; but ſhould bear it quietly and peaceably, and with patience, without fretting and murmuring; or ſhould not faint, as it is rendered in Heb. xii. 5. or ſink under the weight, but chearfully ſupport under it. The two extremes, which men are apt to run into, are here guarded againſt; on the one hand, to make little or nothing of an affliction; to outbrave it, not to be affected with it, nor humble under the mighty hand of God; nor conſider the rod, and him that has appointed it: and, on the other hand, to aggravate an affliction, as if no ſorrow was like their's, and to be quite dejected and overwhelmed with it.

℣. 12. For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, &c.] This is a reaſon why the children of God ſhould not deſpiſe corrections, nor be weary of them; ſince they ſpring from love, are given in love, nor is there any abatement of it in them: when the Lord chaſtens and corrects, he does not take away his loving-kindneſs from them; yea, it is becauſe he loves them, that therefore he thus deals with them; wherefore they ought to be patiently bore, and kindly taken by them. Even as a father the ſon, in whom he delighteth; as a father chaſtens and corrects his ſon, whom he dearly loves, and has the greateſt pleaſure in, ſo the Lord chaſtens and corrects his people; ſee Deut. viii. 5. There is ſuch a relation ſubſiſting between them, as that of father and ſon, which flows from the inexpreſſible love of God to them; and which is a love of complacency and delight in them, and is invariable and unchangeable, changeable, and continues the ſame under all their afflictions; as appears by what he does for them in them, and by the iſſue of them; he knows their ſouls in adverſity, and chooſes them in the furnace of affliction; he pays love-viſits to them, and comforts them under all their tribulation; he ſympathizes with them, and ſupports them; he makes their bed in their affiiction, and delivers out of it, or takes them to himſelf: the iſſue is always his own glory, and their good.

℣. 13. Happy is the man that findeth wiſdom, &c.] Some connect theſe words with the preceding; as if the ſenſe was, a good man, though he is chaſtened by the Lord, yet is a happy man; not only becauſe his chaſtenings are in love and for good, but becauſe he improves in ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding by them; ſee Pſal. xciv. 12. Aben Ezra connects them with the former, but in a different manner, thus; happy is the man that findeth wiſdom, for by it he keeps from ſinning, that chaſtiſements may not come upon him. But rather, the argument in praiſe of wiſdom, and the advantages of it, inſiſted on in the preceding chapter, is reſumed here and enlarged upon; and by wiſdom is meant Chriſt, and a ſaving knowledge of him by means of his goſpel; and finding him, ſuppoſes ſeeking him; which does not ariſe from nature, but the grace of God, and follows upon a ſight of the need and worth of Chriſt; and is done in the uſe of means, as reading, praying, and attendance on the word and ordinances: and finding him, is no other than an enjoyment of him by faith; which is a ſeeing him, a taking hold on him, and poſſeſſing him; who is to be found in the covenant of grace, being the Mediator, ſurety and meſſenger of it; in the goſpel, which is full of him; in the promiſes of it, which hold him forth, and the bleſſings of his grace; in the ordinances, which direct unto him, and where he ſhews himſelf: for he is not to be found by the light of nature, nor by carnal reaſon, nor by the law of Moſes; but by means of the goſpel, attended with the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of him; and a happy finding this, which fills the poſſeſſor with inexpreſſible joy! ſee John i. 41. And the man that getteth underſtanding; Chriſt, and a ſpiritual underſtanding of him: this is not a proper acquiſition of a man's own; an intereſt in Chriſt is not gotten by any thing of man's; not by his good works, which are the fruits of grace; nor by faith and repentance, which are gifts of grace themſelves; but it is given unto a man: and getting here ſignifies, as before, poſſeſſion and enjoyment of Chriſt, as God's pure gift; as a man that is ſaid to obtain the favour of God, when he enjoys it, and the effects of it, in conſequence of finding Chriſt, chap. viii. 35. where the ſame word is uſed as here. The word ſignifies to draw out [t]; as metals are drawn out of the earth by ſearching and digging for, or as water out of a well; thus Chriſt, and the knowledge of him, are drawn out of the mines and fountains of the ſcriptures, by ſuch that ſeek after him aright. Aben Ezra interprets it, that draws or brings it out from another, and learns it; the true believer in Chriſt hears and learns of the Father, and ſo comes to Chriſt, and enjoys him, John vi. 45. The Targum is, "who "cauſes underſtanding to ſpring up;" as water out of a well or fountain; out of his heart, as Gerſom; or, as Jarchi, who has learned wiſdom, that it is ready to break out at his mouth; out of the abundance of it in his heart, his mouth ſpeaketh; as ſuch that know Chriſt, cannot but ſpeak to others of the things they have heard and ſeen, Matt. xii. 34, 35. Acts iv. 20.

℣. 14. For the merchandiſe of it is better than the merchandiſe of ſilver, &c.] The believer is a ſpiritual merchant; faith is a trading with and for Chriſt, and for ſpiritual and heavenly things by him; and becauſe there is a parting with ſomething for Chriſt, as a man's ſinful luſts and pleaſures, his own righteouſneſs, his friends and relations, when ſet in oppoſition to or competition with him, and even life itſelf, when called for; and becauſe he runs a riſk of ſuffering reproach, afflictions, and death itſelf; therefore this concern with him, and enjoyment of him, is called a merchandiſe; which is better than that of ſilver, or than ſilver which is got by merchandiſe: for Chriſt, and the things of Chriſt, are more valuable than ſilver, and to be preferred unto it; more uſeful and profitable than ſilver is, which a man may have a large abundance of, and loſe his ſoul, whereas by Chriſt is the ſalvation of it; more ſatisfying than ſilver is, with which a man is never ſatisfied, whereas he that has Chriſt has enough, having all things; more pleaſant in obtaining, and more ſafe in enjoying; a great deal of anxiety and vexation attend the one, and inexpreſſible pleaſure the other; and more durable and laſting than that, the enjoyment of Chriſt is for ever. And the gain thereof than fine gold; the doctrines and ordinances of Chriſt are more to be deſired than gold, yea than fine gold; the bleſſings of grace by Chriſt, ſuch as redemption, pardon of ſin, &c. are not obtained by corruptible things, as ſilver and gold, but are more precious than they; and even the graces of Chriſt in the hearts of his people, as faith, hope, and love, are more precious than gold that periſheth; and much more preferable muſt he himſelf be, and the gain that accrues to a believer by him, which is cent. per cent. an hundred fold, even in this world, and in the world to come everlaſting life: it is all clear gain, a believer gets by Chriſt and trading with him; he has him, and all with him, without money and without price; he has that which is more worth than the gain of the whole world, even the ſalvation of his immortal ſoul; the riches he has by Chriſt are immenſe and unſearchable, the riches of grace and glory; it cannot be ſaid how great this gain is.

℣. 15. She is more precious than rubies, &c.] Or pearls [u], as ſome; which were formerly eſteemed above all precious ſtones; the eaſtern were the more valuable [w]; which Solomon had moſt knowledge of; Chriſt is the pearl of great price, of more value than any pearl, or all put together, Matt. xiii. 46. ſee the note on Job xxviii. 18. or carbuncles [x], as others. The Targum and Septuagint render it in general terms precious ſtones; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, than all riches; there is a beautiful gradation in this and the preceding verſe, wiſdom is firſt preferred to ſilver, then to fine gold [y], and here to precious ſtones. Chriſt is precious, exceeding precious in his names and titles, Meſſiah, Jeſus, Immanuel, &c. in his divine nature, and the perfections of it, which ſhew his condeſcenſion and grace to become a Saviour, aſſure of his ability to ſave, and render his mediatorial performances valuable; in his perſon as God and man; in the beauty, fulneſs, and fitneſs of it; in his power, wiſdom, grace, &c. in his offices, his prieſtly office; in his ſatisfaction, his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, are precious; in his interceſſion, which is ever acceptable and prevalent; in his prophetic office, his goſpel is precious, every truth and promiſe of it; in his kingly office, all his ordinances and appointments, his commandments are more to be loved than gold, yea than fine gold; in all his relations and characters, and in every thing that belongs to him; he is ſo to them that believe, and to none elſe, 1 Pet. ii. 7. theſe ſee the need and worth of him, receive much from him, and live upon him; and eſpecially he is precious to them at firſt converſion; and ſo he is after deſertions, and long abſence; and under temptations and afflictions, loſſes and diſappointments; and in the hour of death: and he is ſuperlatively precious, more precious than rubies, or any precious ſtones; of a ſuperior luſtre and glory to them, being the brightneſs of his Father's glory; and of more intrinſic worth and value, of greater price than any pearls, and more inriching to his poſſeſſors, for ſuch poſſeſs all things. And all the things thou canſt deſire are not to be compared unto her; this takes in a very great compaſs: there are many things that are very deſirable, and the deſires of man's heart are very extenſive, and not eaſily ſatisfied; there are the precious things of heaven, brought forth by the ſun and moon; and the precious things of the earth, which are either upon it or in it, in the bowels of it, and upon the plains, and hills; but none of equal worth with Chriſt: there are many precious and excellent, and deſirable perſons in the world, neighbours, friends, relations and acquaintance; ſaints on earth, and angels in heaven; yet none to be valued with Chriſt, and compared to him; ſee Pſal. lxxiii. 25.

℣. 16. Length of days is in her right hand, &c.] Wiſdom is here repreſented as a queen, as indeed ſhe is above all kings and queens; ſee chap. viii. 15, 16, 18. holding in one hand, inſtead of a ſcepter, length of days; and in the other, inſtead of a globe, riches and honour: the alluſion is thought by ſome on this clauſe, to be to an ancient cuſtom of numbering things, and the ages of men by the hand and fingers, beginning with the left hand, and when they came to a hundred went to the right[z]; ſo that in that might be truly ſaid to be length of days, few arriving to that number: or rather the reference is to what Solomon received of the Lord, who aſking wiſdom had not that only, but a long life and riches and honour; ſee 1 Kings iii. 11—14. Some think that only temporal bleſſings are here meant, and becauſe health and long life are preferable to wealth and honour, the former are ſaid to be in the right hand, and the latter in the left; but ſeeing in the preceding verſes the advantages of wiſdom are ſuperior to ſilver, gold, and precious ſtones; it can hardly be thought that ſhe ſhould be repreſented as only having temporal bleſſings in her hands to beſtow on her followers. Others are of opinion that ſpiritual and eternal bleſſings are the right hand-ones, being the principal; and temporal bleſſings are the left hand ones, as being the leſs valuable, Matt. vi. 33. but to me they ſeem all of one ſort, all ſpiritual and eternal ones, even thoſe of the left hand, by comparing this paſſage with chap. viii. 18. By length of days is meant length of days for ever and ever, Pſal. xxi. 4. or eternal life, a life of viſion or enjoyment of God; a life of perfect knowledge, holineſs, and pleaſure; being free from all the imperfections, difficulties, and diſtreſſes of the preſent one, and which will laſt for ever; this is in the hand of Chriſt, not the promiſe and grant of it only, but the thing itſelf, in conſequence of his aſking it of his Father; and which he has in a covenant-way, and ſo has a right and power to beſtow it: and it being in his hands ſhews both the valuableneſs, and the ſecurity and ſafety of it; and alſo that it is to be had from him, and is in his gift, and in no other; and is a pure gift of his grace; wherefore happy is the man that finds wiſdom, or Chriſt, ſince he finds and has eternal life in him. And in her left hand riches and honour; by riches are meant not temporal riches, for theſe are not always to the wiſe, nor to the children of wiſdom, nor of Chriſt; and all that have theſe are not happy, nor are they durable: but ſpiritual riches are intended, the riches of grace; of pardoning, juſtifying, and ſanctifying grace, and of all ſupplies of grace; and alſo the riches of glory, which are ſolid and ſatisfying, immenſe and unſearchable, laſting and durable: and by honour is deſigned not the honour which comes from men, or the honour of this world; for ſuch who find Chriſt, and are poſſeſſed of him, and profeſs him, have but a ſmall ſhare of this, being generally ſpeaking accounted the filth and offſcouring of the world; but yet they are the children of God, and ſo have that name which is better than to be the ſons and daughters of the greateſt monarch; they are the ſpouſe of Chriſt, and ſo his queen that ſtands at his right hand in gold of Ophir; they are made kings and prieſts unto God, and ſhall reign with Chriſt for evermore; this honour have all the ſaints, and is what is in the hands of Chriſt to give, and does give, to all that believe in him: or glory[a], as the word ſignifies; the glory of God, eternal glory; this as well as grace is Chriſt's gift, Pſal. lxxxiv. 11.

℣. 17. Her ways are ways of pleaſantneſs, &c.] The ways and methods which Chriſt took to bring about the ſalvation of his people; ſome in eternity, as engaging as a ſurety for them, entering into a covenant with his Father on their account, taking the care and charge of their perſons, grace, and glory; others in time, as the aſſumption of their nature, obedience to the law, ſuffering and dying in their room and ſtead, riſing again, aſcending to heaven, and interceding for them; calling them by his grace, clothing them with his righteouſneſs, and keeping them by his power unto ſalvation, and at laſt introducing them into his kingdom and glory. Theſe are pleaſant, to view the love of Chriſt in them, the ſucceſs that attended them, the glory of God brought about hereby, and the ſalvation of his people; which is exceedingly pleaſant, being agreeable to all the perfections of God; ſuitable to the caſe of ſinners, full and compleat in itſelf, free to them, and of an everlaſting duration; it is this which makes Chriſt ſo pleaſant to ſouls, and the goſpel alſo: or elſe the ways which Chriſt has preſcribed and directed his followers to walk in are here meant; as himſelf, who is the principal way, and the only way to the Father, and to heaven and happineſs; alſo the ways of faith, holineſs, and truth, the ways of Chriſt's commandments, and all the ordinances of the goſpel and inſtitutions of religion; which are pleaſant, when the preſence of God and Chriſt is enjoyed in them; when the heart is enlarged with the love of God and Chriſt; when aſſiſted therein by the Spirit of God, having good food and refreſhment in them, and good company with them; and which though attended with much tribulation end in eternal pleaſure. And all her paths are peace; the paths which Chriſt has trod in to procure the peace of his people; he appeared in the council of peace and aſſiſted in it; he entered into a covenant of peace with his Father; he aſſumed the nature of his people, in order to be their peace-maker; he took the chaſtiſement of their peace upon him; he obtained it by the blood of his croſs; he ſends his miniſters to publiſh it, and his Spirit into the hearts of men to reconcile them to this way of peace and ſalvation by him; and the reſult of all this is, that an honourable peace is made for ſinners, and peace of conſcience is enjoyed which paſſeth all underſtanding, flowing from the blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of Chriſt; and the whole iſſues in eternal peace in the world to come. Likewiſe all thoſe paths which Chriſt inſtructs his people to walk in; as the paths of faith and obedience, theſe lead to the enjoyment of peace here and hereafter; there is much peace had in a way of believing, and great peace have they which love the law of God, and the commandments of Chriſt, and obey them; they may meet with much diſquietude at times in their own ſpirits, by reaſon of ſin, temptation, and deſertion; they may bring the malice of the world upon them, and have much trouble from it, and too too often diſagree among themſelves; and yet after all, they have that peace which others have not, while they live; and when they die, they depart in peace, and enter into eternal peace. Now all this is true, not of unregenerate perſons, who deſire not the knowledge of Chriſt, and to whom there is no peace, but of true believers in him.

[a] כבוד gloria, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Gejerus, Cocceius, Schultens.

℣. 18. She is a tree of life, &c.] Or lives [b]; ſo Chriſt is called, Rev. ii. 7. and xxii. 2, 14. in alluſion to the tree of life in the garden of Eden, Gen. ii. 9. he being the author of life, natural, ſpiritual, and eternal; which ſouls may come at, and pluck and eat of the fruit which is upon him in great plenty and variety, even all the bleſſings of grace and glory. To them that lay hold upon her; which is expreſſive of an act of faith on Chriſt, Heb. vi. 18. faith lays hold on the perſon of Chriſt as a Saviour, and will have him and no other; it comes to the blood of Chriſt, and deals with it for pardon and purification; it lays hold on his ſkirt, who is a Jew, on the robe of his righteouſneſs, and puts it on; it lays hold on his ſtrength, and goes forth in it, in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; it lays hold on his covenant, the bleſſings and promiſes of it, and takes them to itſelf: and this act ſuppoſes danger without him, ſafety in him, a view of ſuitable proviſions for food and clothing with him; ſome ſtrength of grace, and ſome degree of reſolution; alſo condeſcenſion on Chriſt's part to ſuffer himſelf to be handled by them; and likewiſe that he firſt took hold on them and brought them out of a ſtate of nature to himſelf: great encouragement there is for ſenſible ſinners to lay hold on Chriſt; he is ſet before them in the goſpel to be laid hold on; he never diſcourages any from ſo doing, nor caſts out any that come to him; he is able to bear the ſtreſs of their ſalvation they lay upon him; multitudes of loſt ſinners have been ſaved by him: and he is a tree of life, as the text ſays, to ſuch perſons; they have ſpiritual life, and the ſupport and comfort of it, from him now, and may expect everlaſting life from him hereafter. And happy is every one that retaineth her; or holds her faſt [c]; ſee Cant. iii. 4. Gen. xxxii. 26. as ſuch may be ſaid to do who conſtantly apply to him for freſh communications of grace; who walk on in him as they have received him, and hold faſt the profeſſion of their faith in him. The phraſe is expreſſive of great affection to him, and ſtrong faith in him; faith keeps its hold of Chriſt through great darkneſs and many difficulties; oftentimes the ſoul walks in darkneſs, and yet ſtays itſelf on Chriſt, and Abraham-like believes in hope againſt hope. Faith is ſometimes very low, and yet lets not go its hold; it fails not, through the prevalent interceſſion of Chriſt; it cannot ſo let go its hold as that there is a parting; a partial departing there may be, but not a total one: however, it is ſometimes very difficult for faith to keep faſt hold of the Redeemer; it is for the honour and comfort of believers ſo to do; and it is their mercy that intereſt in Chriſt, and ſalvation by him, do not depend on acts of faith; for though we believe not, yet he abides faithful; nevertheleſs happy are they that retain him, or are ſtedfaſt in their faith on him; they have much communion with him now, and ſhall live with him for evermore hereafter.

℣. 19. The Lord by wiſdom hath founded the earth, &c.] He has created all things, and made the world by his Son, the wiſdom of God, Eph. iii. 9. Heb. i. 2. not uſing him as an inſtrument; but he being an efficient cauſe with him, to him, as to the firſt cauſe, the creation of all things is aſcribed, John i. 1—3. Col. i. 16. and particularly the laying the foundation of the earth, Heb. i. 10. and though this is true of the divine perfection of wiſdom, Jer. x. 12. yet from the context it appears beſt to underſtand it of the eſſential wiſdom of God, Chriſt Jeſus; the Jeruſalem-Targum of Gen. i. 1. is, By wiſdom God created, &c. and this ſerves greatly to ſet forth the dignity and excellency of wiſdom, or Chriſt, and ſo the happineſs of that man that finds him; with this the account of him is cloſed and crowned. By underſtanding hath he eſtabliſhed the heavens; or prepared, adorned, and beautified them, by placing the luminaries in them, and directing their ſtation, motion, and influence; the making of the heavens, with all the hoſt of them, is aſcribed to the eſſential Word or Wiſdom of God, Pſal. xxxiii. 6.

℣. 20. By his knowledge the depths are broken up, &c.] From whence fountains and rivers flow, and whereby that great cavity was made which holds that large confluence of waters called the ſea, Gen. i. 9, 10. Some refer this to the breaking up the fountains of the great deep at the flood, Gen. vii. 11. and others to the dividing of the waters of the Red-ſea when Iſrael came out of Egypt, Pſal. lxxviii. 13. all wonderful works of divine wiſdom, and ſhew the greatneſs of him, in whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, by whom they were done. And the clouds drop down the dew; which makes the earth fruitful, and is put for all the bleſſings of nature, Gen. xxvii. 28. the drops of dew are begotten by the Lord, they have no other father but him; the vanities of the Gentiles cannot produce them; he who fills the clouds with them, from whence they deſcend, is no other than the mighty God; and ſuch is Chriſt the wiſdom of God. Some underſtand this in a myſtical ſenſe of goſpel-miniſters, and of the dew of goſpel-doctrine, trine, dropped and diſtilled by them under the influence and direction of Chriſt; ſee Deut. xxxii. 2. but the literal ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 21. My ſon, let not them depart from thine eyes, &c.] Meaning not the things done by wiſdom; though it is good to contemplate his works of creation and providence, which ſerve to ſet forth the glory of Chriſt, and lead into adoring and admiring views of him, and to thankfulneſs to him; but wiſdom, underſtanding, and knowledge, whereby theſe things are done, which are but ſo many names of Chriſt: we ſhould always ſet him before us, keep him always in view, be ever looking to him by faith, and never ſuffer him to depart from our eyes; we ſhould always have in ſight his divine perſon for our acceptance with God, the greatneſs and glory of it to encourage our faith and hope in him; we ſhould keep in view his righteouſneſs for our juſtification, and which we ſhould ever make mention of at the throne of grace, and hold it forth in the hand of faith againſt all charges and accuſations of law and juſtice, Satan, or our own hearts; we ſhould be continually looking to his blood for peace and pardon, healing and cleanſing; and our eyes ſhould be at all times on his fulneſs, for freſh ſupplies of grace, for ſpiritual food, or the daily bread of our ſouls, and for ſpiritual ſtrength and comfort; we ſhould always conſider him as the Saviour, and be exerciſing faith on him as ſuch, for there is no other; and ſhould always look upon him as the mediator between God and man, and make uſe of him; and he ſhould be ever before us as our example, both in the exerciſe of grace and performance of duty, to copy after; and we ſhould always keep ſight of him whilſt running our chriſtian race, as the forerunner for us entered, and as the mark for the prize of the high calling of God. And not only wiſdom, or Chriſt, but all the things that are ſaid of him in the context we ſhould never loſe ſight of; the exceeding great gain got by him, the ſuperlative preciouſneſs of him, the fulneſs of bleſſings in both his hands, the pleaſantneſs and peaceableneſs of his ways, the uſefulneſs of him as a tree of life to thoſe that lay hold upon him, and retain him; and the works of nature and providence done by him, ℣. 14—20. Moreover this may include all the truths and doctrines of wiſdom, or Chriſt; for if the law and its precepts were to be upon the hands, and as frontlets between the eyes of the Iſraelites, and ſo be ever in ſight, then much more the doctrines of the goſpel, Deut. vi. 8, 9. It is obſervable that the Septuagint here makes uſe of the ſame word the apoſtle does in Heb. ii. 1. ſpeaking of goſpel-truths; ſee the note there; theſe are meant in the next clauſe; and ſome by a tranſpoſition place them thus, let not ſound wiſdom and diſcretion depart from thine eyes, keep them; for by ſound wiſdom is meant ſound doctrine, the wholſome words of Chriſt, the ſolid and ſubſtantial truths of the goſpel. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, keep the law; but the Syriac verſion much better, keep my doctrine, the doctrine of the goſpel; which alſo is meant by diſcretion or counſel[d], as ſome render the word, and as the goſpel is called, Acts xx. 27. this ſhould be kept; the doctrines of it ſhould be held faſt and not let go, or be departed from; and the ordinances of it ſhould be obſerved and kept, as they were delivered, from a principle of love, and a view to the glory of Chriſt; the advantages ariſing from them follow.

℣. 22. So ſhall they be life unto thy ſoul, &c.] Give it a better life than it naturally has, though immortal; Chriſt is both the ſpiritual and eternal life of the ſouls of thoſe that look unto him by faith; and his goſpel, and the doctrines of it, are the means of reviving drooping ſaints, and of quickening them to the diſcharge of their duty; wherefore both he and they ſhould be kept in continual view, and held faſt. And grace to thy neck; an ornament to that and to the whole man; how ornamental is Chriſt and his righteouſneſs to a believer? how lovely is the perſon that is ſteady in his principles, and regular in his practices? who ſtands faſt in the truths of the goſpel, and whoſe converſation is as becomes it? ſee chap. i. 9. and iii. 3.

℣. 23. Then ſhalt thou walk in thy way ſafely, &c.] In the way of thy duty and buſineſs, without fear of any enemy; having in ſight the captain of ſalvation gone before, and walking in ſuch ways of pleaſantneſs and peace as wiſdom's are; and having ſuch a lamp to the feet, and ſuch a light unto the paths as the goſpel and its doctrines be. And thy foot ſhall not ſtumble; at the word and the truths of it, as ſome men do, being thereunto appointed; and at Chriſt, the ſtumbling ſtone laid in Zion, particularly at his juſtifying righteouſneſs; ſee 1 Pet. ii. 8. Rom. ix. 33.

℣. 24. When thou lieſt down thou ſhalt not be afraid, &c.] That is, when thou lieſt down on thy bed at night in order to take ſleep, having committed thyſelf into the hands of a faithful Creator and covenant-God and Father, and of Chriſt the Redeemer and Wiſdom of God; thou ſhalt not be afraid of thieves breaking in to hurt thy perſon or rob thee of thy property, or of fire to conſume thy dwelling and ſubſtance, and of nocturnal apparitions and diabolical ſpectres deceiving thy ſight and diſturbing thy mind: or when thou art aſleep[e], for ſo the word alſo ſignifies; thou ſhalt not be ſurprized out of it with any of the above things, or terrified in it with uneaſy imaginations, anxious cares, and diſtreſſing dreams. Yea, thou ſhalt lie down, and thy ſleep ſhall be ſweet; free of all uneaſy thoughts and cares, ſound and refreſhing, pleaſant and comfortable, like that of the labouring man, Eccl. v. 12. ſee Pſal. iv. 8. This epithet of ſweet is often given to ſleep in poetic writings[f].

℣. 25. Be not afraid of ſudden fear, &c.] Of any thing terrible that comes unawares, unthought of, by any of the above things mentioned in the preceding note; or by any rumours and reports of danger being near at hand; always think thyſelf ſafe in the arms of Wiſdom, and under the care of Iſrael's keeper, who neither ſlumbers nor ſleeps. Neither of the deſolation of the wicked when it cometh; either of the deſolation which wicked men threaten to bring, and are ſuffered to bring, upon the godly for the ſake of religion; either on their perſons or goods, ſince ſuffering at their hands in ſuch a cauſe is to the honour of ſaints, and for the glory of God; or of the deſolation which comes upon the godly, for God is able to deliver him from it, as Noah and his family from the univerſal deluge, and Lot and his family from Sodom and Gomorrah; or if they promiſcuouſly fall in it, nevertheleſs it will be well with them to all eternity.

℣. 26. For the Lord ſhall be thy confidence, &c.] The object of it, in whom thou ſhalt put thy confidence, and be ſafe and ſecure from all fear and danger; danger: or the Lord ſhall be in thy confidence[g]; ſhall ſupport thee in it, and maintain that, ſo that thou ſhalt not caſt it away; the word uſed has ſometimes the notion of folly in it, and Jarchi, from the Jeruſalem Talmud, produces a ſenſe agreeable to it; "the Lord ſhall be in things in which thou art "fooliſh;" which how abſurd it may ſeem to be, will admit of a good interpretation; that the Lord will be with wiſdom's followers in things which may ſeem fooliſhneſs to the world; as Chriſt, the things of Chriſt, and the doctrines of the Spirit of Chriſt, the goſpel, and the doctrines of it are. The Targum is, "the Lord ſhall be thine help," in all times of diſtreſs, difficulty and danger. And ſhall keep thy foot from being taken; in the ſnares of ſin, temptation, and miſchief; in thoſe which Satan and the world lay for God's people; from theſe the Lord preſerves them; wherefore happy are thoſe that have an intereſt in Chriſt, who find and enjoy him.

℣. 27. Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, &c.] Honour, reverence, and tribute to civil magiſtrates, Rom. xiii. 7, 8. juſt payment of debts to creditors, and alms to the poor, which by what follows ſeems to be chiefly intended; and the Septuagint render it, "do not abſtain to do well to the "needy;" and Aben Ezra interprets it of the poor; to them alms are due becauſe of their wants, and by the appointment of God; hence called righteouſneſs, in ſome copies of Matt. vi. 1. ſo money, kept from the poor, mammon of unrighteouſneſs, Luke xvi. 9. They are, as the word in the Hebrew text ſignifies, the owners thereof[h]: rich men are not ſo much proprietors of good things, as they are God's almoners or ſtewards to diſtribute to the poor; and as often as men have opportunity, they ſhould do good in this way to all, eſpecially to the houſhold of faith, Gal. vi. 10. this will hold true, as of temporal good things, ſo of ſpiritual; as good advice, exhortation and doctrine. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, do not forbid him to do well that can; which ſenſe is favoured by Jarchi: and as we ſhould not abſtain from doing good ourſelves, ſo neither ſhould we forbid, hinder or diſcourage others; but the former ſenſe is beſt. When it is in the power of thine hand to do it; not to hinder others, as Jarchi, but to do good; when a man has a ſufficiency in his hands to do good with; has not only enough for himſelf and his family, but ſomething to ſpare; when he has both opportunity and ability; and when he can do it at once and without delay, as follows.

℣. 28. Say not unto thy neighbour, &c.] Either to whom thou art indebted, and who comes for the payment of a juſt debt; or to any poor and indigent perſon that applies for alms; Go, and come again, and to morrow I will give; go home, and come to morrow, and I will pay thee what I owe thee; or do not trouble me now, come another time, and perhaps I may relieve thy wants: this ſhould not be ſaid, becauſe a man cannot be ſure of to morrow that he ſhall ever ſee it; nor may it be in the power of his hands, ſhould he live unto the morrow, to do as he promiſes; his ſubſtance may be taken from him, and beſides, in the mean time the poor object may periſh for want of relief. When thou haſt it by thee; money to pay thy debts with, or to give alms to the poor; and therefore ſhould give readily and at once, and not make any excuſes and delays; bis dat, qui cito dat. Some make this to be part of the covetous man's words, ſaying, and there is with thee; or thou haſt enough, thou haſt no need to aſk of me; thou haſt what thou aſkeſt; thou art not in want; thou art richer than I; but the other ſenſe is beſt. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions add, "for thou knoweſt "not what the day following may bring forth;" or may happen on it.

℣. 29. Deviſe not evil againſt thy neighbour, &c.] Or, plow not evil[i]; turn not up thy heart to find evil againſt thy neighbour, as the earth is turned up by the plough; ſee Hoſea x. 13. Do not contrive and form ſchemes in thy mind and thoughts to do him any injury, in his name and character, in his perſon, property or family: a good man ſhould deviſe all the good he can to his fellow-creatures, but not evil to any; eſpecially to his neighbour, and as deſcribed in the next clauſe. Seeing he dwelleth ſecurely by thee; having a good opinion of thee, and not ſuſpecting any ill deſign againſt him, thinks himſelf, goods, and family in ſafety; and is under no concern to provide for his ſecurity, placing his confidence in thee, and perhaps to ſuch a degree as to intruſt with his ſecrets. Now to project evil againſt ſuch a man is exceeding baſe; it is doubly ſinful; this is an aggravation of the iniquity.

℣. 30. Strive not with a man without cauſe, &c.] Either by words, in a wrangling, quarrelſome and contentious way, for mere trifles; when there is no foundation for it, no juſt reaſon given to form a complaint, or pick a quarrel upon; or by deeds, by law-ſuits, when there is nothing to proceed upon; or it is ſo trifling, that it is not worth while to litigate it or contend about: ſuch, who ſtrive either way, are far from following the example of wiſdom or Chriſt, and from taking his advice, Matt. xii. 19. and v. 40. If he have done thee no harm; no real hurt to thy perſon, nor injury to thy ſubſtance; if he has not abuſed, nor defrauded thee, nor taken any thing from thee by force or fraud, nor withheld from thee what is thy right and due. But otherwiſe, the laws of God and man ought to take place; right may be ſought for, and juſtice ſhould be done.

℣. 31. Envy thou not the oppreſſor, &c.] The man that gets wealth and riches by acts of injuſtice, by oppreſſing the poor, by rapine and violence; do not envy his proſperity, and the ſubſtance he is poſſeſſed of; do not wiſh to be in his place and circumſtances, to enjoy his affluence and eaſe; do not look upon his happineſs with an envious eye, and a fretting heart; he is far from being a happy man; his end will be bad; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 1, 7. And chooſe none of his ways; which he has uſed to get his riches in; do not follow him in them; for ſhould you do as he has done, and get ever ſo much, ſince this would be with the loſs of your ſouls, of what advantage would it be? He makes the beſt choice, that chooſes the good part that ſhall not be taken away; Chriſt, and the ways of Chriſt.

℣. 32. For the froward is abomination to the Lord, &c.] The perverſe man, that pleaſes not God, and is contrary to all men, as the Jews were; one froward in his words and actions: who tranſgreſſes the law, as the Arabic verſion renders it; one that acts contrary to the nature, will and word of God; and ſuch an one is not only abominable in his ſight, but an abomination itſelf; it is ſin, which is that abominable thing that God hates, that makes him ſo; and the Targum is, "for iniquity is abominable

"before the Lord." But his ſecret is with the righteous; not ſuch who are outwardly ſo to others, or truſt in themſelves that they are righteous, or ſeek for righteouſneſs by their own works; but ſuch who are juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which faith receives from him, and in conſequence of which a man lives ſoberly and righteouſly: with theſe the ſecret of the Lord is; of his love, grace and favour, which was from everlaſting, and is manifeſted in regeneration; of his purpoſes of grace, with reſpect to election, redemption, vocation and adoption, which is made known in effectual calling; of his covenant, as that he is their covenant-God, Chriſt is their covenant-head and Mediator, and that they have an intereſt in all the grace, bleſſings and promiſes of it; of the goſpel, and the ſeveral myſteries of it, which are ſo to carnal men; of his providences, what he is doing, or what he is about to do, and will do hereafter, Amos iii. 7. and of communion and fellowſhip with him. The phraſe denotes friendſhip and familiarity; God deals with the righteous, as a man does with his intimate friend, converſes freely with him, and diſcloſes his ſecrets to him: and the word is rendered confabulation by the Targum, Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions; ſee Job xxix. 4, 5. Pſal. xxv. 14.

℣. 33. The curſe of the Lord is in the houſe of the wicked, &c.] The wicked man being a tranſgreſſor of the law, is under the curſe of it; and all that he has, his houſe, his ſubſtance, his very bleſſings are curſes; ſee Mal. ii. 2. Zech. v. 2—4. he is accurſed amidſt his greateſt affluence, and ſometimes from a plentiful eſtate is reduced to penury and want: and Aben Ezra interprets it, the curſe of want; and the Vulgate Latin verſion is, want from the Lord is, &c. But he bleſſeth the habitation of the juſt; the righteous man, as before deſcribed; he is bleſſed himſelf, having the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, and his ſins forgiven him for his ſake; and what he has of worldly ſubſtance, though it be ever ſo little, he has it with a bleſſing; and therefore it is better than the riches of many wicked men; his houſe, though it is but a cottage, as the word[k] here ſignifies, is bleſſed with the preſence of God in it; his family, his children and ſervants, are bleſſed, having his inſtructions and example, and eſpecially when made effectual by the grace of God; as the houſe of Obed-Edom was bleſſed for the ſake of the ark, ſo is a juſt man's houſe, being a bethel, an houſe of God, bleſſed on account of his worſhip in it; ſee 2 Sam. vi. 11.

℣. 34. Surely he ſcorneth the ſcorners, &c.] That make a mock at ſin, a jeſt of religion, that ſcoff at the doctrines of the goſpel and the profeſſors of it; theſe the Lord looks upon, laughs at, and has them in deriſion. The Greek verſion and two apoſtles render it, he reſiſteth the proud, 1 Pet. v. 5. James iv. 6. Such who are haughty and arrogant, that exalt themſelves and deſpiſe others; as thoſe of a phariſaical ſpirit are and do, are abhorred and deſpiſed by the Lord; he ſets himſelf againſt them, is their enemy, and ſcatters them in the imagination of their hearts, Luke i. 51. L'Empereur obſerves[l], that this verſion is quite agreeable to the Hebrew text and the ſenſe of Jewiſh writers: R. Alſhech ſays, that לצים rendered ſcorners, are ſuch who will not look upon the divine Being, but go on boldly in ſin, as if there was no God; and Kimchi explains the word by מתגאים who exalt themſelves, or are proud; and becauſe proud men yield to none, but reſiſt others, hence the verb is uſed by the Septuagint, to reſiſt; agreeable to which the Targum is, "he ſhall drive away; and Alſhech, "he "ſhall deſtroy;" and Gerſom, "God ſhall make "others mock them;" which is, to reſiſt them. But he giveth grace unto the lowly; or humble ſouls; ſuch who are made truly ſenſible of ſin, and lie low in their own ſight on account of it; who, ſenſible of the imperfection and inſufficiency of their own righteouſneſs, ſubmit to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; aſcribe their ſalvation, and all the bleſſings of it, to the free grace of God; own the deficiency of their duties, and diſclaim all merit in them; think the worſt of themſelves, and the beſt of others; and humble themſelves under the mighty hand of God, and are patient under every adverſe diſpenſation of providence; knowing what their deſerts are, how undeſerving of any favour, and how deſerving of the divine diſpleaſure. Now God firſt gives grace to theſe perſons to make them thus humble and lowly, which they are not naturally, and then he gives them more grace according to his promiſe; and it is in proof of God's giving more grace to ſuch perſons, that the apoſtle James produces this paſſage, chap. iv. 6. Grace is God's gift, firſt and laſt, what is had in firſt converſion, in after-ſupplies, and for perſeverance to the end: ſanctifying, juſtifying, pardoning and adopting grace, are the pure gifts of God, of his own favour and good-will, without any merit, motive or condition in the creature; and which he gives liberally and bountifully; for not favour with men is here meant, as ſome think, but the grace of God.

℣. 35. The wiſe ſhall inherit glory, &c.] The wiſe are the ſame with the juſt and lowly before mentioned, to whom God gives grace, and to theſe he gives glory. The wiſe are ſuch who are ſo, not in a natural, civil or notional ſenſe, or that are wiſe in the things of nature, in civil affairs and in ſpeculative matters of religion; but in a ſpiritual ſenſe, who are wiſe unto ſalvation; who know themſelves, the ſinfulneſs of their nature, their inability to do that which is good, and their want of righteouſneſs to juſtify them before God; who are ſenſible of the ſickneſs and diſeaſes of their ſouls, their ſpiritual poverty, and their great folly and ignorance with reſpect to things of a ſpiritual nature; who know Chriſt, and him crucified, the way of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by him; that know him, not only notionally, but ſo as to apply unto him, and reſt on him for ſalvation; who build it on him the foundation, on him only, and give him all the glory of it; and who have alſo a competent knowledge of the goſpel, and a comfortable experience of the truths of it; and who take up a profeſſion of religion upon ſuch an experience, and hold it faſt without depending on it, and have a converſation becoming it, walking circumſpectly, not as fools but as wiſe. Now theſe ſhall inherit glory; not the glory of this world, or honour among men in it; but the glory of another, of which, the glory of this world, and of the moſt excellent things in it, is but a faint reſemblance: it is unſeen, inconceivable and incomparable; it is an eternal glory which Chriſt is entered into, and the ſame the Father has given him; and will lie in the viſion of God, and communion with him; in beholding the glory of Chriſt, and in having a glory put upon them both in ſoul and body: and this they ſhall enjoy as an inheritance; not by purchaſe or acquiſition, but by free gift; as a bequeſt of their Father; which comes to them as children, through the death of Chriſt the teſtator, and will be poſſeſſed for ever, as inheritances run. But ſhame ſhall be the promotion of fools; not fools in a natural, but in a religious ſenſe; ſuch who know not themſelves, nor the way of ſalvation; who mock at ſin, and ſcoff at religion: theſe and every one of theſe ſhall take or lift up ſhame[m], as their part and portion, alluding to the heave-offering under the law, in oppoſition to the glory the wiſe ſhall inherit and poſſeſs. Or, ſhame ſhall lift up fools[n]; hold them forth, and make them manifeſt and conſpicuous: all the promotion they ſhall be raiſed unto, will be only ſhame and confuſion, if not in this world, yet in that to come; for when they ſhall riſe from the dead, it will be to ſhame and everlaſting contempt, Dan. xii. 2. The Targum is, "fools "ſhall receive tribulation;" that ſhall be their inheritance in the other world.

CHAP. IV.

IN this chapter Solomon adviſes to ſeek after wiſdom, to avoid bad company, and to continue in the right paths of goodneſs and truth: he excites attention to what he had to ſay, from the relation he ſtood in to the perſons addreſſed; from the nature of his inſtructions, which were good and profitable; and from his own example, in attending to thoſe his parents gave him, ℣. 1—4. He exhorts above all things to get wiſdom, from the ſuperior excellency of it, and from the preſervation, promotion and honour, to be had by it, ℣. 5—9. and he further enforces his exhortations, from their being the means of a comfortable life, and of the prolongation of it, and of leading in a right way without ſtraitneſs or ſtumbling, ℣. 10—13. And then proceeds to caution againſt bad company, and going into a bad way of life; which is enforced from the miſchief done by thoſe that walk in it, and from the darkneſs of it, to which the path of the juſt is oppoſed, ℣. 14—19. And the exhortation to attend to and obſerve his inſtructions, and keep them, is repeated, from the conſideration of their being life and health to them, ℣. 20—22. and that they might be preſerved, and not departed from, directions are given about ordering the heart, mouth, lips, eyes and feet, ℣. 23—27.

℣. 1. Hear, ye children, the inſtruction of a father, &c.] Either of God their Father, as Gerſom interprets it; or rather, of Solomon their father: and ſo he recommends his inſtruction from the relation he ſtood in to them; for ſince he was their father, he would give them no bad inſtruction; and ſince they were his children, they ought to receive it: by whom are meant, not his children in a natural ſenſe, or the children of his body; but his diſciples, ſuch who applied to him for knowledge, and whom he undertook to learn. And attend to know underſtanding; what would ſerve to enlighten, enlarge, improve and inform their underſtandings; what would lead them into the knowledge and underſtanding of things divine and ſpiritual, and which would be worth knowing; and of having their underſtandings ſtored and enriched with.

℣. 2. For I give you good doctrine, &c.] Whoſe author, matter, uſe and tendency, are good, and therefore ſhould be received; ſo the goſpel is called, 1 Tim. iv. 6. and no other is here meant: it is the doctrine concerning Wiſdom or Chriſt, as the following verſes ſhew; which ſerves to exalt him, and makes for the good and welfare of immortal ſouls; and ſuch is the doctrine of the ſcriptures, of Chriſt and his apoſtles, even all the doctrines and truths of the goſpel. Forſake you not my law; or doctrine[o]; not the law given on mount Sinai, as Gerſom interprets it; but the doctrine of Chriſt, which goes out from mount Zion: this the children of wiſdom ſhould not neglect, relinquiſh, drop or depart from; but ſhould keep it, and abide by it.

℣. 3. For I was my father's ſon, &c.] Or, a ſon to my father[p]; ſo Solomon was to God, his heavenly Father, 2 Sam. vii. 14. which Jarchi obſerves, and gives as the ſenſe of this place: but his father David is meant, whoſe ſon he was; though he was not his only one, he had others beſides him. But the ſenſe is, that he was his darling, his beloved ſon, whom he loved above the reſt; as he was beloved of the Lord, and therefore his name was called Jedidiah, ſo he was beloved of his father; and becauſe he had a peculiar love for him, he took a particular care of his education. Tender and only beloved in the ſight of my mother; his mother Bathſheba, who had a moſt affectionate regard to him; and therefore in his tender age, as ſoon as he was ſuſceptible of inſtructions, gave them to him, which being received, made deep and laſting impreſſions on him; ſee chap. xxxi. 1, 2. The marginal reading is, to the ſons of my mother; for Bathſheba had more ſons, 1 Chron. iii. 5. both readings may be retained, beloved in the ſight of my mother's ſons. Gerſom interprets this of the people of Iſrael, who were ſons to God their Father; and were the only nation that received the law, and which they received at the time of their coming out of Egypt, in the days of their youth.

℣. 4. He taught me alſo, and ſaid unto me, &c.] The Targum is, "they taught me," his father and his mother; and ſo the Septuagint verſion, "who "ſaid and taught me;" and the Arabic verſion, "they both taught me, and ſaid unto me;" but in the Hebrew it is ſingular, and is reſtrained to the father. He taught him when he was very young, and alſo gave him inſtructions when he was older, and a little before his own death; ſee 1 Chron. xxviii. 8, 9. and xxix. 1. he taught him by the ſeveral pſalms he wrote; ſome of which are called maſchil, inſtructive or cauſing to underſtand; two of them particularly were wrote for him, Pſal. lxxii. and cxxvii. and he taught him in the following words. How far the words of David his father reach, is not agreed on on all hands; ſome think they end with the fifth verſe; others with the ſixth; others with the ninth, and the words of Solomon begin at the tenth: ſome will have it, that they take in the whole chapter, which is not probable; nay, others ſay that the whole of the book following ing is his, which can by no means be agreed to: it ſeems moſt likely to me, that they end at the ſixth verſe, and at moſt are not to be carried beyond the ninth. Let thine heart retain my words; ſays David to his ſon: the inſtructions he gave him by word of mouth, concerning his moral behaviour, relating to political things, the government of the people; and eſpecially ſuch as concerned the everlaſting welfare of his ſoul, or were about wiſdom or Chriſt, and the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things; theſe he would have him lay up in his heart, and keep them there, as a rich treaſure, to have recourſe unto upon all occaſions. Keep my commandments, and live; which commandments may reſpect him both in his private and public capacity, and in a religious and political one; how he ſhould behave as a man, a king, and one that feared God: as well as they may reſpect his orders for the building of the temple, and ſettling and eſtabliſhing the worſhip of God in it; by obſerving which he would live comfortably and honourably, and to a good old age.

℣. 5. Get wiſdom, get underſtanding, &c.] Not only moral and political wiſdom and underſtanding, but that which is ſpiritual and evangelical; Chriſt, and the knowledge of him; he being the only happy man that has an intereſt in him, and is poſſeſſed of him by faith, which is the meaning of getting him; ſee the note on chap. iii. 13. by which it appears, that what Solomon had before delivered, and afterwards repeats and urges, was the ſame his father David, that wiſe, great and good man, taught him; and which he mentions, the more to recommend the getting of wiſdom and underſtanding to others. Forget it not; when gotten, keep it in remembrance; be continually meditating on Wiſdom, or Chriſt, his glories and excellencies; the fulneſs of grace and truth in him; the bleſſings of goodneſs which come by him; the great uſe and profit of having and enjoying him. Neither decline from the words of my mouth; the above inſtructions, and all others he gave unto him.

℣. 6. Forſake her not, and ſhe ſhall preſerve thee, &c.] That is, Wiſdom or Chriſt. Men may be ſaid to forſake Chriſt, when they forſake the aſſembly of his church and people, which are his other ſelf; when they forſake his miniſters, his ambaſſadors and repreſentatives; when they forſake his word and ordinances; when they drop the doctrines of the goſpel, or depart from them; when they quit the profeſſion they have formerly made. Nominal believers and formal profeſſors may forſake him finally and totally; true believers only partially and for a time, through the weakneſs of the fleſh, the temptations of Satan, the ſnares of the world, and the prevalence of corruption; and therefore ſuch an exhortation is neceſſary, and ought to be regarded. To forſake Chriſt is a very great evil; it is againſt a man's own intereſt, and is of dangerous conſequence, and therefore to be guarded againſt; to abide by him, his truths and ordinances, is very commendable; ſuch ſhall be preſerved by him ſafe to his kingdom and glory. Love her, and ſhe ſhall keep thee; Chriſt is to be loved for the excellencies and perfections of his nature; for the lovelineſs of his perſon; for the love he has ſhewed to his people; for what he in love has done and ſuffered for them, and is now doing; for the fulneſs of his grace and ſalvation, and the ſuitableneſs of them to them; for the communion he indulges them in with himſelf; for the relations of an head, huſband, father, brother and friend, he ſtands in to them: and alſo under the character of wiſdom, he being the only wiſe God and their Saviour, the wiſdom of God and wiſdom to them; and whoſe goſpel is the wiſdom of God in a myſtery. He is to be loved, all of him and that belong unto him, and above all creatures and things, ardently, ſincerely and conſtantly; and ſuch lovers of him ſhall be kept by him from the evil of the world; from the power and dominion of ſin, and condemnation by it; from being deſtroyed by Satan, and his temptations; and from a final and total falling away, ſo as not to periſh everlaſtingly; they are kept in his own hands, in his Father's love and his own, in the everlaſting covenant; and in a ſtate of grace, of ſanctification, juſtification, and adoption. Not that loving Chriſt, and cleaving to him, are the cauſes of this preſervation; but his love, grace and power; yet theſe are deſcriptive of the perſons kept and preſerved: and the preſervation and keeping of them is uſed as an argument to love him, and cleave unto him.

℣. 7. Wiſdom is the principal thing, &c.] Or 4
principal one; the principal of perſons and things; the principal of perſons, angels or men: Chriſt is ſuperior to angels, having a more excellent name and nature than they; he is the God, the Creator and head of them, and is above them in the human nature; he is ſuperior to men, to the greateſt of men, he is King of kings and Lord of lords, and to the beſt of men the ſaints. Are they kings? he is their King: are they prieſts? he is the great High-prieſt: are any of them prophets, teachers, ſhepherds? he is the great Prophet in Iſrael; a Teacher, that never any taught or ſpoke like him; the chief ſhepherd and biſhop of ſouls: is the church a family? he is the Maſter of it: is it a body? he is the Head: is it a building? he is the foundation and corner-ſtone; yea, the chief Maſter-builder. He is the beginning and chief of all God's ways, and the chief in them; in election, in the council of peace, and covenant of grace; in redemption and ſalvation, in grace and glory; he is all in all. Or the words may be rendered, wiſdom is the beginning [q]; ſo Chriſt is called, Col. i. 18. a phraſe expreſſive of his eternity, and of his being the firſt cauſe and author of all things, both in the old and new creation. Or thus, that which is the beginning of wiſdom get [r], &c. which is the fear of the Lord; ſee chap. i. 7. and ix. 10. Therefore get wiſdom; not an intereſt in Chriſt, but a knowledge of it; and make uſe of all means to obtain a greater knowledge of him, and of intereſt in him, which is what the apoſtle calls winning Chriſt; by which he means, not getting an intereſt in him, that he had already, but gaining a greater degree of knowledge of him, as the context ſhews, Phil. iii. 8—10. or, buy wiſdom [s]; that is, without money and without price; ſo Chriſt adviſes to buy gold and white raiment of him, his grace and righteouſneſs, Rev. iii. 18. Iſa. lv. 1. And with all thy getting, get underſtanding; another name for Chriſt; ſee chap. viii. 14. Or, along with all thy getting [t], or above all; let not Chriſt be wanting; he is the one thing needful, the good and better part and portion, which, if miſſing, all other ſubſtance ſignifies little: or part with all for this pearl of great price, wiſdom, wiſdom, and prefer it to all worldly ſubſtance; look upon all but droſs, in compariſon of Chriſt and the knowledge of him: all other gettings or ſubſtance are only for the body, this for the ſoul, and the eternal welfare of it; they are only for a time, this for eternity; they are not ſatisfying, but having this, a ſoul has enough, has all things; Chriſt being his, all things are his; he poſſeſſes all things, and all other things are not bleſſings without him.

℣. 8. Exalt her, and ſhe ſhall promote thee, &c.] Chriſt is to be exalted in his perſon, by aſſerting his proper deity; by aſcribing all divine perfections to him; by allowing him to be the author of all divine works; by giving him divine worſhip and homage; by owning his divine and eternal Sonſhip, and diſtinct perſonality: he is to be exalted in all his offices of Prophet, Prieſt and King, and as the only Redeemer and Saviour; by truſting in him, embracing his goſpel, and ſubmitting to his ordinances: and ſuch that exalt him, he will promote them here and hereafter; of which more in the next clauſe. According to the Talmudiſts [u], the word for exalt ſignifies a diligent ſearch, by turning things about to find out what is ſought; and ſo the Septuagint interpret the word in the ſenſe of ſearching, Jer. l. 26. She ſhall bring thee to honour, when thou doſt embrace her; by faith: for this is an act of faith, and a very conſiderable one, and is expreſſive of great nearneſs to Chriſt, of much intimacy and familiarity with him, of ſtrong love and affection to him, of a good degree of boldneſs uſed with him, and of joy and exultation in him; for ſuch an action is uſed by perſons near akin, and are very familiar with, and have a very great affection for one another, and uſe much freedom with each other, and rejoice at meeting together. Now ſuch who embrace Chriſt, in the arms of their faith, as their alone Saviour, ſuch he promotes and brings to honour; not to honour among men, for to embrace Chriſt and exalt him is the way to diſgrace, though the diſgrace is an honour, and will be ere long rolled off; but to honour hereafter. Such will be ſet at his right hand, and be owned by him before his Father and his angels; and they will be placed on the ſame throne with him, and will reign with him for ever and ever; ſee 1 Sam. ii. 30.

℣. 9. She ſhall give to thine head an ornament of grace, &c.] This, and the following clauſe, explain what that honour is Chriſt promotes and brings his followers to here and hereafter: he gives them grace and more grace; an increaſe of grace, ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; and ſome think James refers to this paſſage, chap. iv. 6. The grace that Chriſt gives is very ornamental to his people: juſtifying grace greatly beautifies and adorns them; it not only covers the nakedneſs of their ſouls, and all their ſpots and imperfections, and through it all their ſins are cauſed to paſs from them; but they are made exceeding beautiful, perfectly comely through this comelineſs, a perfection of beauty by it; and which is often ſignified by that which is very ornamental, rich and coſtly, as fine linen, cloathing of wrought gold, raiment of needle-work, a wedding-garment, ſtuck with jewels and precious ſtones: ſanctifying grace, which alſo is Chriſt's gift, is very ornamental; it is called the beauty of holineſs; it is that by which a man is made like to God, and conformed to the image of Chriſt; it is the curious workmanſhip of the Spirit of God; or what makes a man beautiful, and makes him meet for heaven and happineſs: every grace is ornamental; faith, hope, love, humility, &c. theſe are like rows of jewels, and chains of gold, about the neck. And when this ornament is ſaid to be given to the head, it is not to be underſtood of the natural head of a man, but of his whole perſon, it gives a comelineſs to; and may denote the viſibility of it, as it appears in the life and converſation. A crown of glory ſhall ſhe deliver to thee; by which is meant eternal glory and happineſs, called a crown, an enſign of royal dignity, which belongs to ſuch as are made kings and prieſts unto God; and is given to conquerors, even who are more than conquerors through Chriſt, and as a reward of diligence and faithfulneſs, Rev. ii. 10. It is ſometimes called a crown of life, a crown of righteouſneſs, an incorruptible and never-fading one, and, as here, a crown of glory: the ſaints in heaven will have a glory put upon them, both in ſoul and body; they will appear with Chriſt in glory, and be crowned with glory and honour, as he is; they will be cloathed and ſurrounded with it: and ſo ſome render it, "ſhe will compaſs thee "about with a crown of glory as with a ſhield [w];" ſee Pſal. v. 12. This Chriſt is ſaid to deliver; it is in his hands, laid up in him, and is ſafe with him; he has power to diſpoſe of it, and it may be expected from him; ſee 2 Tim. iv. 8.

℣. 10. Hear, O my ſon, and receive my ſayings, &c.] Some think David is ſtill ſpeaking to his ſon Solomon, or Solomon continues relating what his father ſaid to him; though I rather think theſe are Solomon's words to his ſon, to every one of his children that came to him for inſtruction, or he took upon him to teach; whom he adviſes to liſten to what he had further to ſay, and to embrace, and not reject his doctrines. And the years of thy life ſhall be many; ſee chap. iii. 1, 2. long life here, and length of days for ever and ever, or eternal life hereafter; which muſt be a very forcible argument to engage attention to his ſayings.

℣. 11. I have taught thee in the way of wiſdom, &c.] In the way that leads to it, or is concerning it; in the goſpel, which is the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, the manifold wiſdom of God, and which directs to Chriſt and the knowledge of him, who is true wiſdom; this is another reaſon or argument why the wiſe man's inſtructions ſhould be attended to. I have led thee in right paths; in paths of righteouſneſs, holineſs, and truth; in ſuch as are agreeable to the will and word of God, and which lead right on to the city of habitation; and therefore ſuch teachings and leadings ſhould be followed, and ſuch ways walked in.

℣. 12. When thou goeſt, thy ſteps ſhall not be ſtraitened, &c.] By enemies, or attended with difficulties and obſtructions, or ſubject to dangers, but be at freedom and liberty in walking; for though ſaints do not walk in the broad road with ſinners, yet they are brought into a large place, and their ſteps are enlarged under them, and their hearts are enlarged to run the way of God's commandments; and a wide field of truth and duty ſuch have to walk in, who are taught and led in the ways of wiſdom and righteouſneſs, Pſal. xviii. 19, 36. and cxix. 32, 45. And when thou runneſt, thou ſhalt not ſtumble; ſuch that make haſte to keep the commandments of God, that run with alacrity and chearfulneſs in their chriſtian race, and in the way of their duty, ſhall not ſtumble, through the deceitfulneſs of ſin, the ſnares of the world, and the temptations of Satan, ſo as to fall and periſh.

[w] תמגנך υπερασπιση σου, Sept. proteget te, V. L. muniet te, Montanus, Tigurine verſion; cinget te, Gejerus.

℣. 13. Take faſt hold of inſtruction, &c.] Not the law, as Jarchi and Gerſom interpret it; but the inſtruction of wiſdom, the doctrine of Chriſt or the goſpel; ſee chap. viii. 1—10. which is an inſtruction into the mind and will of God, concerning the ſalvation of men; into the grace of God, ſhewing that ſalvation, in all its branches, is of pure grace; into the perſon and offices of Chriſt, and into the buſineſs of ſalvation through him; into the doctrines of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life by him. This ſhould be taken faſt hold of; in order to which, men ſhould take heed unto it, attentively hear it; they ſhould come with a cordial affection to it, and an eager deſire after it, or they will never lay faſt hold on it; for taking faſt hold, as it ſuppoſes a careful attention to the goſpel, ſo a reception of it in the love of it, and an eagerneſs to be poſſeſſed of it: ſuch may be ſaid to take faſt hold on it, who receive it into their hearts, and not into their heads only; head-knowledge of the goſpel-inſtruction is not hold faſt enough, it muſt be heart-knowledge of it; it is taken faſt hold on, when it is mixed with faith when heard; when it is digeſted and incorporated as it were into men, and becomes the engrafted word; when men are led experimentally and practically into it, and are not hearers only, but doers of it; and being thus, taken faſt hold of, Let her not go; the inſtruction of wiſdom, or the goſpel of Chriſt; do not drop it, nor depart from it, nor waver about it; nor be languid in a profeſſion of it, nor indifferent to it: be not remiſs[x], as the word ſignifies; or let not thine hand be remiſs, or let not thine hand go; having, as it were with both hands, took faſt hold of the goſpel, hold it faſt, neither drop it through negligence and careleſſneſs, nor ſuffer it to be taken from thee by fraud or force. Keep her, for ſhe is thy life; which may be underſtood either of the goſpel, wiſdom's inſtruction, which ſhould be kept as a rich treaſure, and not parted with at any rate; ſince it is the means of quickening dead ſinners; of ſhewing ſenſible ones the way of life by Chriſt; of producing faith in them, by which they live upon him; and of maintaining and ſupporting the ſpiritual life in them, and of reviving and comforting them under the moſt drooping and afflictive circumſtances; a man would as ſoon part with his life ſurely as part with this! Or elſe, ſeeing the feminine gender is here uſed, which does not agree with the word tranſlated inſtruction, but with wiſdom, mentioned ℣. 11. ſo Aben Ezra; therefore Chriſt may be here meant, who is to be kept as the pearl of great price, being more precious than rubies and all deſirable things, and eſpecially ſince he is the life of his people: he is the author and maintainer of their ſpiritual life; he is their life itſelf, it is hid with him; and becauſe he lives, they live alſo: all the comforts and ſupplies of life are from him, and he is their eternal life; it is given through him and by him, and lies greatly in the enjoyment of him.

℣. 14. Enter not into the path of the wicked, &c.] Which leads to eternal death; join not with them in their wicked ways and practices; have no fellowſhip, keep no company with them; do not ſet one foot in the path they tread, leſt thou ſhouldſt be tempted to proceed to more ungodlineſs; you do not know where and when there will be a ſtop, when once you begin, therefore enter not. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, do not delight in the paths of the ungodly; but this ſuppoſes not only entrance, but progreſs and continuance in them, whereas the firſt is dehorted from in theſe words: And go not in the way of evil men; if tempted and prevailed upon to take a ſtep and make a trial, do not proceed; withdraw at once, do not go on. Some render it, ſeeing the word uſed has ſometimes the ſignification of bleſſedneſs in it, do not eſteem the way of evil men bleſſed[y]; nor reckon thyſelf or them happy that walk in ſuch ways; they are far from it: hence the Targum, Septuagint and Syriac verſions are, do not envy the ways of wicked men; their ſeeming pleaſure will end in bitterneſs: the Arabic verſion is, do not imitate them; do not follow their example, and do as they do.

℣. 15. Avoid it, &c.] As dangerous and pernicious, as abominable and deteſtable; or, flee from it, as the Vulgate Latin verſion: Jarchi and Gerſom interpret it, make it void; cauſe it to ceaſe, deſtroy it, do all you can to hinder the wicked from accompliſhing their deſigns. Paſs not by it; do not come near it; keep at a diſtance from it, that you may not be drawn into it; abſtain from all appearance of evil, and every thing that may lead to it. Turn from it, and paſs away; the Targum adds, from them, from wicked men. This heap of words is uſed to ſhew the danger of bad company; to diſſuade from the leaſt approach to it; and to expreſs the vehement deſire of the wiſe man to preſerve his ſon, and all well-inclined perſons, from it.

℣. 16. For they ſleep not, except they have done miſchief, &c.] Or they cannot ſleep, as Jarchi and Gerſom interpret it. Oftentimes they cannot ſleep on their beds for deviſing miſchief, their thoughts are ſo intenſely ſet on contriving wicked ſchemes; and when they have ſo done, they cannot ſleep until they have executed them; they are continually reſtleſs and uneaſy day and night, like the troubled ſea, conſtantly caſting up mire and dirt. Who would keep ſuch company as theſe! And their ſleep is taken away, unleſs they cauſe ſome to fall; into the ſnares and traps they lay for them, or into ſin and calamity by it; the former of which they endeavour by all means to draw men into, and the latter is the unavoidable conſequence of it. They imitate their father the devil, both delight in ſin, and in the ruin of their fellow-creatures; it is a ſport to them to do miſchief, and they have no pleaſure without it; ſee chap. xi. 23. What company are ſuch!

℣. 17. For they eat the bread of wickedneſs, &c.] Either that is gotten by wicked and unlawful means, or wickedneſs itſelf is bread unto them; it is that to their minds as bread is to their bodies; they feed upon it with as much eagerneſs, appetite, guſt and pleaſure; it is a ſweet morſel to them; it is meat, drink, ſleep, and every thing to them; they take the higheſt ſatisfaction, and the utmoſt delight in it. And drink the wine of violence; either that which is obtained by rapine and violence; or they as greedily commit ſuch acts of oppreſſion and injury, as a man drinks a glaſs of wine; they do not drink up iniquity like water only, but even like wine, the moſt generous and delicious. Wherefore all ſociety with ſuch men ſhould be avoided.

℣. 18. But the path of the juſt is as the ſhining light, &c.] The juſt man is one that is made righteous through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him; and who is created anew in Chriſt, in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; and under the influence of divine grace, lives ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly: the path he is directed to walk in and does, is Chriſt himſelf, the way, the truth, and the life; through whoſe blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, he goes to God for grace and mercy, for peace, pardon and acceptance, for freſh ſupplies of grace, and in order to enjoy communion with him; and who alſo is the way of ſalvation, and to eternal life and happineſs: and beſides this grand and principal path, there are the paths of truth, righteouſneſs and holineſs; the path of duty and obedience; the way of the commandments of God, and ordinances of Chriſt: and this path he walks in, whether of grace or duty, is as the ſhining light; or of the morning, when the day firſt dawns, or at leaſt when the ſun riſes. Such is the light beamed in at firſt converſion, which directs men to walk in the above mentioned paths; it is a light after a night of darkneſs, as ſuch is the ſtate of unregeneracy; which, though at firſt is but glimmering, yet afterwards is clear and ſhining; eſpecially when Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs appears, or is revealed, as the hope of glory. The firſt grace in converſion is a true light that ſhines, by which a ſoul ſees its own vileneſs and filthineſs, the inſufficiency of its own righteouſneſs; and the fulneſs, ſuitableneſs, and ability of Chriſt as a Saviour, and has ſome diſcerning of goſpel-truths. That ſhineth more and more unto the perfect day; or, going and ſhining[z], or enlightening; it ſhines clearer and clearer, ſo does true grace; it grows and increaſes more and more, every grace does, faith, hope, love, patience, humility, &c. the light of the knowledge of Chriſt the way, though it is imperfect, yet capable of being increaſed, and is increaſed by means of the miniſtry of the word and ordinances; which increaſe God has promiſed, ſaints purſue after, and attain unto. Light into the goſpel, and the doctrines of it, increaſes yet more and more; whereby a ſoul walks pleaſantly, comfortably and ſafely, in the right path, until the perfect day of glory comes, a day without clouds; when there will be nothing to interpoſe between God and them; when there will be no more clouds of darkneſs, unbelief, doubts, and fears; when the ſun will always be ſeen, no more withdrawn, eclipſed or ſet; even Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, whoſe glory will always be beheld by the righteous to all eternity: when there will be no more night of affliction, deſertion and death; when the light of knowledge will be clear and perfect, and ſaints ſhall ſee face to face, and know as they are known; and when not only the light of the righteous ſhall be ſo clear, diſtinct and perfect, but they themſelves ſhall ſhine as the ſun in the kingdom of God. The words may be rendered, the prepared day[a]; appointed in the decrees of God, and firmly eſtabliſhed by them: the inviſible glories of the heavenly ſtate, which make this everlaſting day, are things which God has prepared for his people; the kingdom and glory itſelf, the inheritance of the ſaints in light, is prepared for them from the foundation of the world. And ſince ſuch is the path of the juſt, who would walk in the ways of the wicked? which are the reverſe of this, as the following words ſhew.

[x] אל תרף ne remittas, Tigurine verſion, Mercerus, Gejerus, Michaelis.

[y] תאשר בדרך רעים in via malorum ne te beatum exiſtimes, Tigurine verſion; ne beatam prædices viam malorum, Michaelis.

℣. 19. The way of the wicked is as darkneſs, &c.] They are in the darkneſs of ſin, ignorance, error, and unbelief; their works are works of darkneſs; the way in which they are leads to eternal darkneſs, ruin and miſery, and ſo muſt be moſt uncomfortable and dangerous. They know not at what they ſtumble; they ſtumble at the word, which they are ignorant of, and at Chriſt, whom they have no knowledge of; and through the temptations of Satan and ſnares of the world, which they are not aware of, nor upon their guard againſt.

℣. 20. My ſon, attend to my words, &c.] Which go before and which follow after, his doctrines, inſtructions, cautions and exhortations. Incline thine ear unto my ſayings; ſtoop and bow the ear; liſten attentively to what is ſaid, as being of the greateſt moment and importance.

℣. 21. Let them not depart from thine eyes, &c.] Commit them to writing, frequently read them over; let them be always in ſight, as a rule and directory to ſteer the courſe of life by. Some underſtand this of the wicked, as if the ſenſe was, Let not them, the wicked, cauſe them to depart from thine eyes; nor thee to neglect them, by their bad advice, ſolicitations to ſin, and ill examples; ſee the note on chap. iii. 21. Keep them in the midſt of thine heart; lay them up there and ponder them; often meditate upon them, and do not forget them; ſhew the moſt affectionate regard unto them, and look upon them as a moſt ineſtimable treaſure, for which no place is ſo fit a repoſitory as the heart.

℣. 22. For they are life unto thoſe that find them, &c.] The words or doctrines of Chriſt, whoſe type Solomon was, are to be found in the field of the ſcriptures, by diligent ſearching for them; and being found, they are the means of ſpiritual life, and of maintaining it, and of ſhewing the way, and bringing unto eternal life; ſee John vi. 63. And health to all their fleſh; the whole man, ſoul and body; as they are the means of preſerving the body from many diſeaſes, which intemperance, luſt and luxury lead unto, and are curbed by theſe; ſo of healing the various diſeaſes of the ſoul; and however, of directing to a panacea for them, to the blood of Chriſt, which is the true balm of Gilead, and he the phyſician of ſouls. Moreover, the doctrines of the goſpel are the wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus; they are ſound, ſalutary and healthful, and ſerve to keep the ſoul in good plight, and the body too. The Septuagint render it, to all fleſh; that is, to all men; but this is not true in fact; for to ſome the goſpel of Chriſt, through contempt and rejection of it, is the ſavour of death unto death.

℣. 23. Keep thy heart with all diligence, &c.] The mind from vanity, the underſtanding from error, the will from perverſeneſs, the conſcience clear of guilt, the affections from being inordinate and ſet on evil objects, the thoughts from being employed on bad ſubjects; and the whole from falling into the hands of the enemy, or being the poſſeſſion of Satan: great diligence had need be uſed in keeping it, ſince it is naturally ſo deceitful and treacherous; a ſtrict eye is to be kept upon it; all the avenues to it to be watched, that nothing hurtful enters, or evil comes out; it is to be kept by all manner of means that can be thought of, by prayer, hearing, reading, meditation; and, above all, by applying to Chriſt for his grace and Spirit, to ſanctify, preſerve and keep it. Or, above all keeping, keep thine heart[b]; though other things are to be kept, and care taken of them, as kingdoms and cities, and towns and families, and treaſures and riches; yet the heart above all: for out of it are the iſſues of life; of natural life: it is the ſeat of it, from whence all actions of life are derived; it is, as philoſophers ſay, the firſt that lives, and the laſt that dies; and it is the ſeat of ſpiritual life, the principle of it is formed in it; from whence all ſpiritual and vital actions flow, and which lead unto and iſſue in eternal life: as is a man's heart, ſuch is his ſtate now and will be hereafter; if the heart is quickened and ſanctified by the grace of God, the man will live a life of faith and holineſs here, and enjoy everlaſting life hereafter: and if the heart is right, ſo will the actions of men be; they are regulated and denominated by it; they will then ſpring from right principles, and be directed to right ends, and performed with right views; great care therefore ſhould be taken of the heart, ſince ſo much depends upon it, and it is ſo well known to God the ſearcher of it.

℣. 24. Put away from thee a froward mouth, &c.] A mouth ſpeaking froward and perverſe things; things contrary to right reaſon, to the law of God, and goſpel of Chriſt; blaſphemies againſt God or men; every thing that is untrue, unchaſte, unjuſt, fooliſh and filthy; all ſwearing, lying, and every thing that is repugnant to truth and juſtice. Some underſtand it of men that are liars, blaſphemers, and froward perſons, who are to be ſhunned and avoided, and to be debarred the houſes and ſociety of good men. And perverſe lips put far from thee; do not make uſe of them thyſelf, nor keep company with men of ſuch a character. Much the ſame thing is meant as before.

℣. 25. Let thine eyes look right on, &c.] To the path of truth and holineſs, without turning or looking to the right hand or left, as it is afterwards expreſſed; to the word of truth, as the rule to walk by; to Chriſt, the author and finiſher of faith, from whom all grace, and the ſupplies of it, are to be had; and to the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God. And thine eye-lids look ſtraight before thee; to the precepts of the word, to obſerve them; to the promiſes of it for encouragement; to the examples of the ſaints gone before, as motives to excite diligence, and to exerciſe patience, faith and hope; to the mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt for eternal life, and to the bleſſed hope laid up in heaven.

℣. 26. Ponder the path of thy feet, &c.] Conſider well what path it is, whether right or wrong; or weigh it in the balances of thought, as Aben Ezra; or rather, in the balances of the word, and ſee whether it agrees with that or no. The Septuagint verſion is, make ſtraight paths for thy feet; to which the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews ſeems to have reſpect, Heb. xii. 13. And let all thy ways be eſtabliſhed; ſo as to walk on ſteadily, conſtantly, uniformly, and not be eaſily moved out of the ways of religion and truth. Or, let all thy ways be prepared, or directed, or diſpoſed[c]; according to the rule of the divine word. Some render it as a promiſe, and all thy ways ſhall be eſtabliſhed[d]; when care is taken to look well into them; ſee 2 Chron. xx. 20.

℣. 27. Turn not to the right hand, nor to the left, &c.] Either into the road of immorality and profaneneſs, or into that of error, ſuperſtition, and falſe worſhip; but attend to the way of holineſs and truth, directed to in the word of God; ſee Iſa. xxx. 21. nor be moved out of it by threatenings and menaces, nor by flatteries and promiſes; neither be caſt down with adverſity, nor be lifted up with proſperity; but keep on in an even way, attending to that which is juſt and right; leaving all events with God, as knowing you are in the way of your duty, and in which he would have you walk. Remove thy foot from evil; from walking in evil ways and along with evil men, and from doing evil things; abſtain from all appearance of evil, keep at a diſtance from it; the evil of ſin brings on the evil of puniſhment. There are two verſes added in the Septuagint, Arabic and Vulgate Latin verſions, which are not in the Hebrew text; "For the ways which are on the right hand God "knoweth; but thoſe that are on the left are per-"verſe. He will make thy paths right, and pro-"mote thy goings in peace."

CHAP. V.

THE general inſtruction of this chapter is to avoid whoredom, and make uſe of lawful marriage, and keep to that. It is introduced with an exhortation to attend to wiſdom and underſtanding, ℣. 1, 2. one part of which lies in ſhunning an adulterous woman; who is deſcribed by her flattery with which ſhe deceives; by the end ſhe brings men to, which is deſtruction and death; and by the uncertainty of her ways, which cannot be known, ℣. 3—6. Wherefore men are adviſed to keep at the utmoſt diſtance from her, ℣. 7, 8. leſt their honour, ſtrength, wealth and labours, be given to others, ℣. 9, 10. and repentance and mourning follow, when too late, ℣. 11—14. And as a remedy againſt whoredom, entering into a marriage-ſtate is adviſed to, and a ſtrict regard to that; allegorically expreſſed by a man's drinking water out of his fountain, and by his wife being as a loving hind, and pleaſant roe to him, the ſingle object of his affections, ℣. 15—19. As alſo the conſideration of the divine omniſcience is propoſed to deter him from the ſin of adultery, ℣. 20, 21. as well as the inevitable ruin wicked men are brought into by it, ℣. 22, 23.

℣. 1. My ſon, attend unto my wiſdom, &c.] Not the wiſdom of the world or of the fleſh, worldly wiſdom and carnal policy; but ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom; ſuch as one that is greater than Solomon has in him, even Chriſt; for in him are all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge; and which he teaches and communicates to others, even all proper inſtructions for conduct in life: the goſpel, and the ſeveral doctrines of it, which are the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; theſe every child of God, and diſciple of Chriſt, ought carefully and diligently to attend unto. And bow thine ear to my underſtanding; liſten attentively to thoſe things, which I have, and give an underſtanding of, even things divine and ſpiritual; the underſtanding of which is of the utmoſt moment and importance.

℣. 2. That thou mayeſt regard diſcretion, &c.] Obſerve it; retain it in thine heart, as Aben Ezra adds, and uſe it; think, ſpeak, and act diſcreetly, and ſo avoid the bad woman afterwards deſcribed: the Vulgate Latin verſion is, that thou mayeſt keep the thoughts; and ſo Gerſom interprets the word; good thoughts, according to the Septuagint verſion; the thoughts of the heart are to be obſerved. A man of ſpiritual wiſdom will take notice of them; evil thoughts, which lead to uncleanneſs, are to be repreſſed and kept in; good ones to be cheriſhed and improved; wiſe and ſagacious ones, ſuch the word here uſed ſignifies, are to be attended to, as being of great advantage in the various affairs and buſineſs of life; and ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom helps to ſuch thoughts, and directs to the obſervance and exerciſe of them. And that thy lips may keep knowledge; may be able to ſpeak of things worthy to be known, and communicate the knowledge of them to others; by which means uſeful knowledge will be kept and preſerved, and be continued in ſucceſſive ages; ſee Mal. ii. 7. even the knowledge of God and of Chriſt, and of the goſpel and its doctrines; and which will be a means of preſerving men, as from falſe doctrine, error, and hereſy, ſo from profaneneſs and immorality; and particularly from the adulterous woman next deſcribed.

℣. 3. For the lips of a ſtrange woman drop as an honey-comb, &c.] Mulſa dicta, honey-words, as is Plautus's[e] expreſſion. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions premiſe ſomething here which is not in the Hebrew text, "do not give heed to a wicked woman;" and the Vulgate Latin verſion, "to the fallacy of a woman:" but there is no need to connect the words by ſuch a ſupplement; ſince, as they lie, they give a reaſon why it was neceſſary to attend to wiſdom and underſtanding, in order to act diſcreetly and ſpeak knowingly; ſince there is ſo much danger of being drawn aſide by a wicked woman, a lewd and adulterous one; the kiſſes of whoſe lips, her confabulations and ſongs, are as pleaſing to the carnal ſenſes of men, as honey is ſweet to the taſte; ſhe promiſes them a great deal of pleaſure in her embraces, and in the enjoyment of her: ſo the poet[f] deſcribes an agreeable voice to be ſweeter than the honey-comb. And her mouth is ſmoother than oil; her fair ſpeeches, enticing words, and flattering fawning language, and amorous expreſſions, eaſily find their way and ſlide into the hearts of men, to prevail upon them to liſten to her, and yield to her temptations. Gerſom interprets this ſtrange woman, of the imaginative faculty; and Jarchi, of hereſy: it is applicable enough to the whore of Rome; who, by the blandiſhments of pomp and grandeur, and the allurements of wealth and riches, draw many into her idolatrous practices; which are ſpiritual adultery, ſignified by her golden cup, Rev. xvii. 4.

℣. 4. But her end is bitter as wormwood, &c.] Which is oppoſed to the honey-comb her lips are ſaid to drop; ſo that, as Juvenal ſays[g], plus aloes quam mellis habet: the end which ſhe brings perſons to, or the iſſue of complying with her, is bitterneſs; ſuch as loſs of credit, ſubſtance and health, remorſe of conſcience, and fear of death, corporal and eternal; ſee Eccl. vii. 26. Sharp as a two-edged ſword; which cuts every way; as committing ſin with an harlot hurts both ſoul and body; and the reflection upon it is very cutting and diſtreſſing, and deſtroys all comfort and happineſs. This is the reverſe of her ſoothing and ſoftening ſpeech, which is as oil. Such alſo will be the ſad caſe of the worſhippers of the beaſt, or whore of Rome; who will gnaw their tongues for pain, and be killed with the two-edged ſword that proceedeth out of the mouth of Chriſt, Rev. xvi. 10. and xix. 15, 21.

℣. 5. Her feet go down to death, &c.] The ways in which ſhe walks, and in which ſhe leads others, iſſue oftentimes in corporal death; and always in eternal death, if grace prevent not; and unleſs men are brought to a ſenſe of ſin, to repent of it and leave it. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, the feet of imprudence or folly, in oppoſition to wiſdom; that is, the feet of the fooliſh woman, ſuch an one the harlot is; and ſuch is the whore of Rome, notwithſtanding all her boaſted knowledge and wiſdom. And into perdition, or the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone, which is the ſecond death, ſhe goes herſelf, and hither ſhe brings all that follow her idolatrous practices, Rev. xvii. 8. and xix. 20. and xxi. 8. Her ſteps take hold on hell; make ſure of it; hell is the certain portion of the harlot, and of all thoſe that follow her lewd courſes, unleſs reclaimed by the grace of God; and this will be the caſe of the worſhippers of Antichriſt, or who give into the idolatries of the church of Rome, or commit fornication with her, Rev. xiv. 9—11. Or, her ſteps ſupport hell[h]; keep it up, and fill it with inhabitants; millions are carried into it by her means: or, reach unto hell; ſhe ſtops not till ſhe comes there, and her followers with her. The word may be rendered the grave, and may reſpect ſuch whores who haunted burying-places, and proſtituted themſelves among the graves; and were called from hence buſtuariæ moechæ[i].

℣. 6. Leſt thou ſhouldeſt ponder the path of life, &c.] Conſider and meditate which is the way to get out of her hands and ways, and eſcape death, and obtain eternal life; leſt thoſe ſhe has drawn into her wicked courſe of life ſhould be religiouſly inclined, and think of quitting ſuch a courſe, and inquire after the way of life and ſalvation; and be weighing in their minds which is moſt eligible, to continue with her whoſe feet lead to death; or to take the path of life: to prevent all this if poſſible, Her ways are moveable; ſhe appears in different ſhapes; changes her dreſs and habitation; makes uſe of a thouſand arts to enſnare men, to entangle their affections, and retain them in her nets; ſhe firſt puts them upon one thing, and then on another; ſhe leads them into various mazes and labyrinths of ſin, till they have loſt all ſenſe of religion, and ſight of the path of life. That thou canſt not know them; her ways, arts and devices. Or, thou canſt not know[k]; that is, the way of life, or how to get out of her ways into that. Or, thou knoweſt not; where ſhe goes, whither ſhe leads thee, and what will be the end and iſſue of ſuch a courſe of life. The Targum underſtands it, and ſo ſome other interpreters, of the harlot herſelf, paraphraſing the whole thus; "in the way of life ſhe walks not; her ways are unſtable, and ſhe knows not" the way of life, nor where her ways will end; or, cares not[l] what becomes of her. And ſo, in like manner, the former part of the verſe is underſtood and interpreted, leſt ſhe ponder the path of life[m]; or, as others, ſhe does not ponder the path of life[n]. The ways of the antichriſtian harlot are with all deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs; and her chief care is to keep perſons in ignorance, and from pondering the path of life or true religion, and to retain them in her idolatry, 2 Theſſ. ii. 9, 10.

℣. 7. Hear me now therefore, O ye children, &c.] Since ſuch is the character, this the wretched end, and theſe the ways of the adulterous woman; thoſe that are young in years, and liable to be enſnared by her, ſhould hear what Solomon, or Chriſt, here ſays, for their caution and inſtruction; and eſpecially ſuch who are, or profeſs themſelves to be, the children of God and of Chriſt; and therefore, as dear children, ſhould be followers of them, and not of an harlot. And depart not from the words of my mouth; the warnings, directions and exhortations given, to avoid the whoriſh woman; the doctrines of Chriſt, the truths of the goſpel: theſe ſhould not be forſaken, but abode by; and alſo his precepts and ordinances, which ſhould be cloſely attended unto.

℣. 8. Remove thy way far from her, &c.] The way of the mind, walk and converſation; keep at the greateſt diſtance from her; neither come where ſhe is, not look at her, nor converſe with her; ſhun her, as one would the peſt or a loathſome carcaſs; go a good way about rather than come near her, or be within ſight of her, or ſo as to be in any danger of being enſnared by her. And come not nigh the door of her houſe; not only not enter her chamber, but go not to her houſe; no, not over the threſhold of the door, nor near the door; but avoid her houſe, as one would a houſe that has the plague in it. Men ſhould not go in the way of temptation, truſting to their own ſtrength; they may be entangled and overcome before they are aware; it is good to keep out of the way of it. And as it becomes the children of wiſdom to wait at her gates, and at the poſts of her door, to gain knowledge and underſtanding of divine things; ſo they ſhould not go within the doors of falſe teachers, nor near them, nor admit them within their's. It is a complaint againſt the church at Thyatira, that ſhe ſuffered the woman Jezebel, the Romiſh harlot, to teach and ſeduce the ſervants of Chriſt, or connived at their attendance on her, Rev. ii. 20.

℣. 9. Leſt thou give thine honour unto others, &c.] To ſtrumpets, their children, attendants, ſervants and friends; that is, either wealth or riches, which make men honourable; or their fame, credit and reputation, which are loſt by keeping company with ſuch perſons; or the outward comelineſs of the body, and inward vigour of the mind, which are impaired by adulterous practices. The Targum renders it, thy ſtrength; and ſo the Syriac verſion, thy ſtrength of body, which is enervated by ſuch impurities; ſee chap. xxxi. 3. compare with this the kings of the earth that commit fornication with the whore of Rome, giving their power and ſtrength to the beaſt, Rev. xvii. 2, 13. Jarchi's note is, "leſt "thine heart has reſpect to other gods, to give "them the glory of thine honour and praiſe;" and ſo underſtands it not of corporal, but of ſpiritual adultery or idolatry: the Septuagint and Arabic verſions are, thy life; which agrees with what follows: And thy years unto the cruel; youthful years, the flower of age, conſumed by the cruel luſt of uncleanneſs, which preys upon and waſtes both body and ſubſtance, and cuts them off in the prime of days; and deprives of years which otherwiſe, according to the courſe of nature, and in all probability, might be arrived unto: ſo harlots, in Plautus[o], are ſaid to ſup the blood of men, and to deprive of goods, light, honour and friends[p]. And the harlot herſelf may be here meant; who, when ſhe has got what ſhe can, has no pity on the man ſhe has ruined, and even will not ſtick to take away his life upon occaſion; as well as is the cauſe and means of the damnation of his ſoul: or the jealous huſband of the adulterous woman, who will not ſpare the adulterer when taken by him; or her brethren, her relations and friends; or her other gallants and co-rivals, who, when they have opportunity, will avenge themſelves; or the civil magiſtrate, who executes judgment without mercy on ſuch delinquents, this being a ſin puniſhed with death. Jarchi interprets the cruel, of the prince of hell, the devil; and ſo the Midraſh, of the angel of death. The character well agrees with the antichriſtian beaſt, the whore of Rome; who, by her ſorceries and fornications, has deſtroyed millions of ſouls.

℣. 10. Leſt ſtrangers be filled with thy wealth, &c.] The adultereſs, her huſband, children, friends, bawds, and ſuch like perſons ſhe is concerned with; theſe ſhare the wealth of the adulterer, abound with it, and live profuſely on it, until he is ſtripped quite bare and deſtitute: or, with thy ſtrength; ſee the note on the preceding verſe. Jarchi interprets it of the prophets of Baal, that exact money by their falſhoods: it may well enough be applied to the fornicating merchants of Rome, who wax rich through the abundance of her delicacies and adulteries, Rev. xviii. 3. perſons, ſtrangers indeed to God and Chriſt, and all true religion. And thy labours be in the houſe of a ſtranger; that is, wealth gotten by hard labour, with toil and ſweat, grief and trouble, as the word uſed[q] ſignifies; and yet, after all, not enjoyed by himſelf, and his lawful wife and children, but by the ſtrange woman and her accomplices, and ſpent in maintaining whores, bawds and baſtards; hence the fable of the harpies, eating and ſpoiling the victuals of Phineus, who were no other than harlots that conſumed his ſubſtance[r]: and ſometimes they are carried into a ſtrange country, and poſſeſſed by foreigners. Theſe are the wretched effects and miſerable conſequences of adultery, and therefore by all means to be ſhunned and avoided. Jarchi underſtands it of the houſe of idolatry, or an idol's temple; and every one knows what vaſt riches are brought into the temples or churches of the Papiſts by idolatry.

℣. 11. And thou mourn at the laſt, &c.] Or roar as a lion, as the word[s] ſignifies; ſee chap. xix. 12. and xx. 2. and xxviii. 15. expreſſing great diſtreſs of mind, horror of conſcience, and vehement lamentations; and yet, not having and exerciſing true repentance, but declaring a worldly ſorrow, which worketh death. This mourning is too late, and not ſo much on account of the evil of ſin, as the evil that comes by it; it is when the man could have no pleaſure from it and in it; when he has not only loſt his ſubſtance by it, but his health alſo, the loſs of both which muſt be very diſtreſſing: it is at the end of life, in his laſt days; in his old age, as the Syriac verſion, when he can no longer purſue his unclean practices. When thy fleſh and thy body are conſumed; either in the time of old age, and through it, as Gerſom; or rather, by diſeaſes which the ſin of uncleanneſs brings upon perſons, ſons, which affect the ſeveral parts of it; the brain, the blood, the liver, the back, and loins, and reins; and even all the parts of it, expreſſed by fleſh and body. This may expreſs the great tribulation ſuch ſhall be caſt into, that commit adultery with the Romiſh Jezebel, Rev. ii. 22.

℣. 12. And ſay, How have I hated inſtruction? &c.] To live virtuouſly, and avoid the adulterous woman; this he ſays, as wondering at his ſtupidity, folly and madneſs, that he ſhould hate and abhor that which was ſo much his intereſt to have obſerved. Gerſom interprets it of the inſtruction of the law; but it is much better to underſtand it of the inſtruction of the goſpel; which the carnal mind of man is enmity unto, and which they are ſo ſtupid as to abhor; when it is of ſo much uſefulneſs to preſerve from error and hereſy, ſuperſtition, will-worſhip and idolatry. And my heart deſpiſed reproof; for following the whoriſh woman; and which was ſecretly deſpiſed in the heart, and heartily too, if not expreſſed with the mouth: it is one part of the goſpel-miniſtry to reprove for falſe doctrine and falſe worſhip, though it generally falls under the contempt of the erroneous and idolatrous.

4 ℣. 13. And have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, &c.] Parents, tutors, maſters, and miniſters of the word; neither regarded the advice of parents, nor the inſtructions of tutors, nor the commands of maſters, nor the ſermons of miniſters: theſe are all loſt on ſome perſons; they are proof againſt them all; theſe make no impreſſions upon them, and are of no uſe to them. Nor inclined mine ear to them that inſtructed me? or to my maſters, as the Targum and Vulgate Latin verſion; turned away the ear from them, ſtopped it to them, and would not hear what they had to ſay; at leaſt would not receive it, and act according to it.

℣. 14. I was almoſt in all evil, &c.] Scarce a ſin but he was guilty of; contempt of private and public inſtructions, the inſtructions of parents and miniſters of the goſpel, and following lewd women, commonly lead to the commiſſion of all other ſins, even the moſt atrocious. Some underſtand this, not of the evil of ſin, but of the evil of puniſhment; and that the ſenſe is, that there is ſcarce any calamity, diſtreſs or miſery, that a man can be in, but his profaneneſs and lewdneſs had brought him into; and he was juſt upon the brink of hell itſelf: and ſo Jarchi paraphraſes it, "there was but a ſtep between me and hell." Aben Ezra obſerves, that the paſt is put for the future, I ſhall be; and then the meaning is, in a little or in a ſhort time I ſhall be in complete miſery; and ſo they are the words of one, under conſciouſneſs of ſin, deſpairing of mercy. In the midſt of the congregation and the aſſembly; that is, either he deſpiſed and neglected the inſtructions which were given in a public manner; or he committed all the evil he did openly; not only in company with wicked men, which he frequented, but even in the preſence and before the people of God; yea, before the civil magiſtrates, the great ſanhedrim, which is ſometimes deſigned by the laſt word here uſed: or when he was in the houſe of God attending public worſhip, his eyes were full of adultery, and his heart of impure luſts; and neither place, ſervice, nor people of God, where he was, commanded any awe and reverence in him, nor in the leaſt reſtrained his unclean thoughts and wanton deſires; and which is mentioned as an aggravation of guilt. Or elſe the ſenſe is, that his calamities and miſeries were as public as his crimes; he was made a public example of, and all the people were witneſſes of it; which ſerved to ſpread his infamy, and make his puniſhment the more intolerable: both the ſins and puniſhment of thoſe that commit fornication with the whore of Rome, will be public and manifeſt, Rev. xviii. 5. and xiv. 10.

℣. 15. Drink waters out of thine own ciſtern, &c.] Arguments being uſed to diſſuade from converſation with an adulterous woman, taken from the diſgrace, diſeaſes, poverty, and diſtreſs of mind on reflection, it brings a man to; the wiſe man proceeds to direct to marriage, as a proper antidote againſt it: take a wife and cleave to her, and enjoy all the pleaſures and comforts of a marriage-ſtate. As every man formerly had his own ciſtern for the reception of water for his own uſe, 2 Kings xviii. 31. ſo every man ſhould have his own wife, and but one: and as drinking water quenches thirſt, and allays heat; ſo the lawful enjoyments of the marriage-bed quench the thirſt of appetite, and allay the heat of luſt; for which reaſon the apoſtle adviſes men to marry and not burn, 1 Cor. vii. 9. and a man that is married ſhould be content with his own wife, and not ſteal waters out of another's ciſtern. The alluſion may be to a law, which Clemens of Alexandria[1] ſays, Plato had from the Hebrews; which enjoined huſbandmen not to take water from others to water their lands, till they themſelves had dug into the earth, called virgin-earth, and found it dry and without water. And running waters out of thine own well; the pure, chaſte and innocent pleaſures of the marriage-ſtate are as different from the embraces of an harlot, who is compared to a deep ditch and a narrow pit, chap. xxiii. 27. as clear running waters of a well or fountain, from the dirty waters of a filthy puddle; ſee chap. ix. 17. Some interpret theſe words, and what follow, of perſons enjoying with contentment the good things of life, they have for the ſupport of themſelves and families; and of a liberal communication of them to the relief of proper objects; but not to ſpend their ſubſtance on harlots. Jarchi underſtands by the ciſtern, the law of Moſes: but it may be better applied to the ſcriptures in general, from whence all ſound doctrine flows, to the comfort and refreſhment of the ſouls of men; and from whence all doctrine ought to be fetched, and not elſewhere.

℣. 16. Let thy fountains be diſperſed abroad, &c.] Or ſhall abound, as the Targum; that is, ſtreams of water from fountains; which Aben Ezra interprets of a multitude of children, namely, that are lawfully begotten: the fountains are the man and his wife in lawful marriage; the ſtreams are their offspring lawfully procreated by them; which may be ſaid to be diſperſed abroad, when being grown up they are diſpoſed of in marriage in other families, and ſo become fountains to others, and public bleſſings. And rivers of waters in the ſtreets; meaning a numerous poſterity as before; and ſuch as a man is not aſhamed publicly to own, whereas he is aſhamed of ſuch as are unlawfully begotten; but theſe are to his honour in the ſtreets, and for public good; and particularly to thoſe to whom they are given in marriage; ſee Iſaiah xlviii. 1. Jarchi interprets this of multiplying diſciples, and of teaching them the law publicly, and of getting a name thereby; but it might be interpreted much better of ſpreading the doctrines of the goſpel, and of the public miniſtry and profeſſion of that, for the good of others.

[1] Stromat. l. 1. p. 274.

℣. 17. Let them be only thine own, and not ſtrangers with thee.] Or they ſhall be thine own[u], as the Targum; meaning not the ciſtern, the well, or the wife, but the fountains and rivers, or the children; by a man's cleaving to his own wife, who is a chaſte and virtuous woman, he is ſatiſfied that the children he has by her are his own, and not another's; whereas if he has to do with a common harlot, it is uncertain whoſe children they are, ſhe proſtituting herſelf to many: it may be applied to the peculiar poſſeſſion and ſtedfaſt retention of the truths of the goſpel, in oppoſition to all divers and ſtrange doctrines propagated by others; ſee Rev. ii. 25. and iii. 11.

℣. 18. Let thy fountain be bleſſed, &c.] Thy wife; make her happy by keeping to her and from others; by behaving in a loving, affable, and reſpectful manner to her; by living comfortably with her, and providing well for her and her children: or reckon her a happineſs, a bleſſing that God has beſtowed; or "thy fountain ſhall be bleſſed," as the Targum; that is, with a numerous offſpring, which was alway reckoned a bleſſedneſs, and was generally the happineſs of virtuous women, when harlots were barren. And rejoice with the wife of thy youth; taken to be a wife in youth, and lived with ever ſince; do not deſpiſe her, nor divorce her, even in old age, but delight in her company now as ever; carry it not moroſely and churliſhly to her, but expreſs a joy and pleaſure in her; ſee Eccl. ix. 9. Mal. ii. 14, 15. Jarchi interprets this of the law learned in youth; but it might be much better interpreted of the pure apoſtolic church of Chriſt, the beulah, to whom her ſons are married, Iſa. lxii. 4, 5. to whom they ſhould cleave with delight and pleaſure, and not follow the antichriſtian harlot.

℣. 19. Let her be as the loving hind, and pleaſant roe, &c.] That is, the wife of youth; let her always appear to thee as amiable and lovely as theſe creatures are; or let her be loved by thee as theſe are by princes and great men[w], who uſed to keep them tame, keep them clean, waſh, comb them, and adorn them, and play with them; or rather, as theſe creatures are loving to their mates, let thy love be ſingle, chaſte, pure, and fervent, as theirs; ſee Cant. ii. 9, 17. and viii. 14. The pure church of Chriſt is very different from the apoſtate church of Rome; the one is compared to a loving and lovely creature, innocent and chaſte; the other to a cruel and ſavage beaſt, Rev. xiii. 1, 2, 11. Let her breaſts ſatisfy thee at all times; even as it were to be inebriated therewith, and ſo as not to ſeek out elſewhere to ſtrange women for ſatisfaction; ſee Cant. i. 13. The church's breaſts are the ordinances of the goſpel, which are ſaid to be like young roes, and afford great pleaſure, ſatisfaction, and refreſhment to true believers, Cant. iv. 5. and vii. 3. And be thou raviſhed always with her love; greatly delighted with it, both in loving her and being loved by her; and let this always continue in old age as well as in youth; or now as well as formerly, and not for a ſhort time, but for continuance: or, err thou always in her love[x]; if any error is committed by thee, let it be on the ſide of love, in loving her too much; better err in loving her than in loving a ſtrange woman.

℣. 20. And why wilt thou, my ſon, be raviſhed with a ſtrange woman, &c.] Or err with her[y]; after all thoſe inconveniencies and miſeries that follow upon a converſation with an harlot, and all thoſe advantages of a marriage-ſtate ſet before thee; why wilt thou be ſo fooliſh and mad as to have a fondneſs for an harlot and dote upon her, and neglect entering into a marriage-ſtate, or forſake the wife of youth? and yet though things are ſo clearly ſtated and aptly repreſented, and the expoſtulation made in the moſt tender and affectionate manner; it is ſuggeſted as if after all it would not be attended unto, but a harlot be preferred to a wife of youth, a filthy beaſt to a loving hind, and dirty puddles of water in a ditch to running ſtreams from a well or fountain. And embrace the boſom of a ſtranger? that is not thy wife; a deſcription of unlawful love and impure embraces, which are diſſuaded from.

℣. 21. For the ways of a man are before the eyes of the Lord, &c.] Both good and bad; the ways of a chaſte and virtuous man, who cleaves to his own wife and ſhuns the harlot, which are approved of by the Lord; and the ways of a lewd man, all the impure thoughts, deſires, and contrivances of his mind, and all the ſteps he takes to commit lewdneſs, and all the filthy actions he is guilty of, theſe are all open and naked to the omniſcient God: the adulterer ſeeks the twilight, and flatters himſelf with ſecrecy, not conſidering that the eye of God is upon him; there are many that were their filthy actions known to men they would be aſhamed of them; and this conſideration greatly deters from them, and puts them upon ſecret ways of commiting them; much more ſhould the conſideration of the divine omniſcience weigh with them to avoid them; which is the argument here made uſe of. And he pondereth all his goings; he not only ſees them, but takes notice of them, and obſerves them, and ponders them in his mind, and lays them up there, in order to bring to an account for them hereafter; yea he weighs them in the balance of juſtice, and will proportion the puniſhment unto them, according to the rules of it; when it muſt go ill with thoſe that follow ſuch lewd practices, Heb. xiii. 4. Rev. xxii. 12, 15.

℣. 22. His own iniquities ſhall take the wicked himſelf, &c.] As in a ſnare or net, as Gerſom obſerves; in which the adulterer is ſo entangled that he cannot extricate himſelf; he may fancy that when he grows old, his luſts will be weakened, and he ſhall be able to get clear of them, and have repentance for them, but he will find himſelf miſtaken; he will become but more and more hardened by them and confirmed in them, and will have neither will nor power to repent of them, and ſhake off thoſe ſhackles with which he is bound: it may be underſtood of the guilt and puniſhment of his ſins; that the horrors of a guilty conſcience ſhall ſeize him, there will be no need of any others to arreſt him, theſe will do that office; or diſeaſes ſhall come upon him for his ſins, and bring him to the duſt of death, and ſo to everlaſting deſtruction. And he ſhall be holden with the cords of his ſins; which he has been all his life committing and twiſting together, and made as it were cords of, which by conſtant practice become ſtrong as ſuch; with the guilt of which he is bound as a malefactor, and will be brought to juſtice, being reſerved in theſe cords, as the angels that ſinned, in their chains, unto the judgment of the great day; the phraſe denotes the ſtrength of ſin, the impotency of man to get rid of it, and the ſure and inevitable ruin that comes by it.

ỳ. 23. He ſhall die without inſtruction, &c.] Into the evil of ſin, and the danger he is in, and ſo without repentance for it; for inſtruction is the means of repentance and productive of it when bleſſed, Jer. xxxi. 19. but it is but juſt that thoſe who have hated and rejected it in health and life, that when they come to die ſhould have none given them about the evil of ſin, the danger of their ſtate, and the way of ſalvation: or rather becauſe of inſtruction[z]; becauſe they would not hear and receive, but neglected, rejected, and deſpiſed it, ſo Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom; or without correction[a], or diſcipline and amendment by it. And in the greatneſs of his folly he ſhall go aſtray; being left to the exceeding great folly of his mind, he ſhall continue to go aſtray as he has done from God and his good ways, from the precepts of his law, and the rules of his word; going after his own heart's luſts, which will drown him in perdition. This folly may be underſtood either of his fornication and adultery; which is egregious folly; or of his imagining that he ſhould be able to repent of ſin when he pleaſed, and free himſelf from the bondage of it, and eſcape the puniſhment due unto it.

CHAP. VI.

IN this chapter the wiſe man diſſuades from raſh ſuretiſhip; expoſes the ſin of idleneſs; deſcribes a wicked man; makes mention of ſeven things hateful to God; exhorts to attend to parental inſtructions and precepts, and cautions againſt adultery. Suretiſhip is deſcribed, ỳ. 1. and repreſented as a ſnare and a net, in which men are taken, ỳ. 2. and advice is given what to do in ſuch a caſe, for ſafety in it, and deliverance from it, ỳ. 3—5. The ſin of ſlothfulneſs is expoſed, by obſerving the induſtry of the ant, ỳ. 6—8. by expoſtulating with the ſluggard for his continuance in ſloth, and by mimicking him, ỳ. 9, 10. and by the poverty it brings upon him, ỳ. 11. Then a naughty, wicked man is deſcribed, by his mouth, eyes, feet, fingers and heart, whoſe ruin is ſudden and inevitable, ỳ. 11—15. The ſeven things hateful to God are particularly named, ỳ. 16—19. And next, the exhortation in ſome preceding chapters is reaſſumed, to attend to the inſtructions of parents; which will be found ornamental, pleaſant and uſeful, ỳ. 20—23. Eſpecially to preſerve from the lewd woman cautioned againſt, ỳ. 24, 25. whoſe company is diſſuaded from; on account of the extreme poverty and diſtreſs ſhe brings perſons to, and even danger of life, ỳ. 26. from the unavoidable ruin ſuch come into, ỳ. 27—29. from the ſin of uncleanneſs being greater than that of theft, ỳ. 30, 31. from the folly the adulterer betrays; from the deſtruction of his ſoul, and the diſgrace he brings on himſelf, ỳ. 32, 33. and from the rage and irreconcileable offence of the huſband of the adultereſs, ỳ. 34, 35.

ỳ. 1. My ſon, if thou be ſurety for thy friend, &c.] To another; haſt engaged thyſelf by promiſe or bond, or both, to pay a debt for him, if he is not able, or if required; or haſt laid thyſelf under obligation to any, to ſee the debt of another paid. If thou haſt ſtricken thy hand with a ſtranger; or to him[b]; whom thou knoweſt not, and to whom thou oweſt nothing; and haſt given him thine hand upon it, as well as thy word and bond, that what ſuch an one owes him ſhall be paid; a geſture uſed in ſuretiſhip for the confirmation of it, chap. xvii. 18. and xxii. 26. or, for a ſtranger[c]. And the ſenſe is, either if thou art become bound for a friend of thine, and eſpecially if for a ſtranger thou knoweſt little or nothing of, this is a piece of raſhneſs and weakneſs; or, as Gerſom, if thou art a ſurety to thy friend for a ſtranger, this alſo is a great inadvertency and overſight. It is a raſh and inconſiderate entering into ſuretiſhip that is here cautioned againſt; doing it without inquiring into, and having ſufficient knowledge of the perſon engaged for; and without conſidering whether able to anſwer the obligation, if required, without hurting a man's ſelf and family; otherwiſe ſuretiſhip may lawfully be entered into, and good be done by it, and no hurt to the ſurety himſelf and family. Jarchi interprets it of the Iſraelites engaging themſelves to the Lord at Sinai, to keep his commandments.

ỳ. 2. Thou art ſnared with the words of thy mouth, &c.] Got into a ſnare out of which an eſcape is not eaſy; art no longer free, and thine own man, but under obligation to pay the debt if required; by the verbal agreement made and confirmed by ſtriking hands, and this before witneſſes. Thou art taken with the words of thy mouth; as in a net, and held faſt therein and thereby, and cannot get looſe without paying the debt, if the debtor does not, or without the leave of the creditor.

ỳ. 3. Do this now, my ſon, and deliver thyſelf, &c.] Take the following advice, as the beſt that can be given in ſuch circumſtances, in order to be freed from ſuch an obligation, or to be ſafe and eaſy under it. When thou art come into the hand of thy friend; or, "becauſe or ſeeing thou art fallen "into the hand of thy friend," as the Targum; or "though thou art," &c. as Aben Ezra; which may be underſtood either of the creditor to whom a man is bound, or of the debtor for whom he is bound, or of both; for a ſurety is in the hands or power of both: he is in the hands of the creditor, who may demand payment of the debt of him; and he is in the hands of the debtor, who, if a careleſs, or crafty and deceitful man, may leave him to the payment of it. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions are, "for thou art come into the hands of evil men "for thy friend;" and the Syriac verſion, "ſeeing "for thy friend thou art fallen into the hands of "thine enemy;" and therefore muſt make the beſt of it thou canſt, and in the following way: Go, humble thyſelf; that is, to the creditor, proſtrate thyſelf before him; lie down upon the ground to be trodden on, as the word[d] ſignifies; fall down on thine knees, and intreat him to diſcharge thee from the bond, or give longer time for payment, if up; for thou art in his hands, and there is no carrying it with a high hand, or a haughty ſpirit to him; humility, and not haughtineſs, is moſt likely to be ſerviceable in ſuch a caſe. And make ſure thy friend; for whom thou art become a ſurety, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions add; ſolicit him, as the former of theſe verſions render it; ſtimulate him, as the Septuagint; ſtir him up, urge him to pay off the debt quickly, and diſcharge the bond, or give thee ſecurity and indemnity from it. Or, magnify thy friend[e]; that is, to the creditor; ſpeak of him as a very able and reſponſible man, and as an honeſt and faithful one, that will pay in due time. Some render it magnify, and ſpeak well of the debtor to thy friend, which may pleaſe and appeaſe him: or, multiply thy friends[f]; get as many as thou canſt to intercede for thee, and get thee diſcharged from the obligation by ſome means or another; to this purpoſe Jarchi.

[d] התרפס præbe conculcandum te, Montanus, Vatablus, Michaelis.

℣. 4. Give not ſleep to thine eyes, nor ſlumber to thine eye-lids.] Until the above things are done; which denotes of what conſequence and importance they are; and that perſons in ſuch circumſtances ſhould not be careleſs, dilatory and unconcerned; but ſhould uſe great diligence, and leave no ſtone unturned, or method untried, to extricate themſelves; ſee Pſal. cxxxii. 4.

℣. 5. Deliver thyſelf as a roe from the hand of the hunter, &c.] As ſuch a creature, which is very ſwift, when it is got into the hand of the hunter, will ſtrive and ſtruggle to get out; ſo ſhould a man try all ways and means to get out of his ſuretiſhip engagements, eſpecially when he finds himſelf liable to danger by it; this he ſhould do immediately and out of hand[g], as the phraſe here uſed ſometimes ſignifies with the Jewiſh writers. And as a bird from the hand of the fowler; another metaphor, ſignifying the ſame thing.

℣. 6. Go to the ant, thou ſluggard, &c.] That art become ſurety for another, and got into a ſnare and net, and yet takeſt no pains to get out. Or this may be directed, not to the ſurety, but the debtor; who, through his ſlothfulneſs, has contracted debts, and uſes no induſtry to be in a capacity to pay them. Or it may be, this has no connection with the former; but the wiſe man proceeds to a new ſubject, and to diſſuade from idleneſs, which brings ruin on families, and leads to all ſin; and for the inſtruction of idle and ſlothful men, propoſes the example of the ant, and ſends them to it to learn induſtry of it[h]. Conſider her ways; what diligence and induſtry it uſes in providing its food; which, though a ſmall, weak, feeble creature, yet will travel over flints and ſtones, climb trees, enter into towers, barns, cellars, places high and low, in ſearch of food; never hinder, but help one another in carrying their burdens; prepare little cells to put their proviſions in, and are ſo built as to ſecure them from rain; and if at any time their corn is wet, they bring out and dry it, and bite off the ends of it, that it may not grow. Theſe, with others, are taken notice of by Franzius[i]; and ſome of them by Gerſom on the place. And be wiſe; learn wiſdom of it, and be wiſer than that, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions: this is a mortification of proud men, that would be reckoned wiſe, to be ſent to ſo deſpicable a creature to get wiſdom from.

℣. 7. Which having no guide, overſeer, or ruler,] None to guide and direct her what to do; nor any to overlook her, to ſee that ſhe does aright, or to oblige her to work and keep her to it; nor any to call her to an account, and correct her for doing amiſs; and nevertheleſs diligent and induſtrious, doing every thing of herſelf, by the inſtinct of nature, readily and willingly: and yet how ſlothful are men; who, beſides the dictates of nature, reaſon and conſcience, have parents, maſters, miniſters and magiſtrates, to guide, direct, exhort, inſtruct and enforce! ſo Ariſtotle[k] ſays of the ant, that it is αναρχος, without any ruler or governor.

℣. 8. Provideth her meat in the ſummer, &c.] Againſt the winter, of which it is mindful, when it never comes out of its place, having in the ſummertime got a ſufficiency laid up in cells for its uſe: ſhe toils in the heat of ſummer to get in her proviſion for the winter, being ſenſible that nothing is to be gotten then; ſhe works at it night and day whilſt the ſeaſon laſts; ſo diligent is it in laying up its ſtores at the proper opportunity[l]. And gathereth her food in the harveſt; the time when corn is ripe, and is ſhed on the earth; this it gathereth, and lays up in its repoſitories againſt a time of need. The ſeeds it gathers and lays up; it bites off the chit or bud-end of them, that they may not grow, as Pliny[m] and others obſerve, but be a winter-ſtore; hence its name in Hebrew is nemalah, from namal, to cut off; it being done by biting. Yea, according to Ælianus[n], it ſeems to have ſome ſenſe of futurity with reſpect to famine, which being near, it will work exceeding hard to lay up food, fruits and ſeed; and, according to Virgil[o] and others, it ſeems to preſage old age, and therefore provides againſt it. An inſtruction this to work, whilſt perſons are in health and have youth on their ſide; that they may have not only a ſufficiency for preſent uſe, but to lay up againſt a time of ſickneſs and old age. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions add, "or go to "the bee, and learn what a worker ſhe is, and what "an admirable work ſhe performs; whoſe labours "kings and private perſons uſe for health: ſhe is "deſirable to all and famous; and though weak in "ſtrength, honouring wiſdom is advanced." But this is not in the Hebrew text; but perhaps being wrote in the margin of ſome copy of the Septuagint as a parallel inſtance, was by ſome unſkilful copier put into the text of the Greek verſion, from whence the Arabic verſion has taken it; it crept in very early, for Clemens of Alexandria makes mention of it[p].

℣. 9. How long wilt thou ſleep, O ſluggard? &c.] Or lie[q] in bed, indulging in ſloth and eaſe; whilſt the induſtrious ant is buſy in getting in its proviſions, even by moon-light, as naturaliſts[r] obſerve. When wilt thou ariſe out of thy ſleep? and be about thy lawful calling? doing the duties of religion, and the buſineſs of life; providing things honeſt in the ſight of all men; things neceſſary for thyſelf and family, and wherewith to do good to others; exerciſing a conſcience void of offence both to God and men. Time ſhould not be ſlept away, to the neglect of the affairs of life, nor of the concerns of the immortal ſoul and a future ſtate; men ſhould not be ſlothful in things temporal or ſpiritual: whatever may be the proper time to awake and ariſe out of ſleep in a morning, which ſeems to be according to a man's circumſtances, health and buſineſs; it is always high time for the ſinner to awake out of the ſleep of ſin, and ariſe from the dead; and for the drowſy ſaint to ariſe out of his lethargy and carnal ſecurity.

℣. 10. Yet a little ſleep, a little ſlumber, &c.] Or, little ſleeps, little ſlumbers [s]. Theſe are the words of the ſluggard, in anſwer to the call of him to awake and ariſe, deſiring he might not be diſturbed, but be ſuffered to ſleep on longer: there is a very beautiful climax or gradation in the words, aptly expreſſing the diſpoſition and actions of a ſluggard; he firſt deſires a few ſleeps more, ſome ſound ſleeps one after another; which is quite agreeable to his character: and if he cannot be allowed them, then he requeſts a few ſlumbers at leaſt, ſome dozings, till he can get himſelf thoroughly awake; and if theſe cannot be granted, yet he prays however that this might be admitted, A little folding of the hands to ſleep; or, to lie down [t]; a few toſſings and tumblings upon the bed more, with his hands folded about his breaſt; a ſleeping geſture, and the poſture of ſluggards. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, a little thou wilt embrace the breaſt with the hands; and the Syriac verſion, and a little thou wilt put thine hand upon thy breaſt. The Jewiſh commentators underſtand this as a direction and command to ſleep and ſlumber but little, ſince a little ſleep is ſufficient for nature; or otherwiſe poverty will come, &c. but the former ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 11. So ſhall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, &c.] Either ſwiftly and ſuddenly, as a traveller makes haſte to get to his journey's end, and comes upon his family or friends at an unawares; or though he moves gradually, by ſlow paces and ſilent ſteps, yet ſurely: and ſo it ſignifies, that poverty ſhould come upon the ſluggard very quickly, and before he was aware; and though it might come by degrees, yet it would certainly come. And thy want as an armed man; or, thy wants as a man of ſhield [u]: denoting many wants that ſhould come ruſhing in one upon another, like a man armed with ſhield and buckler; appearing with great terror and force, not to be reſiſted. It denotes the unavoidableneſs of being brought into penury and want by ſloth, and the terribleneſs of ſuch a condition. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Arabic verſions add, "but if thou art not ſlothful, thy harveſt ſhall come as a fountain; (as the inundation of a fountain, Arabic) but want ſhall flee as an evil racer (as an evil man, Arabic; far from thee, Vulgate Latin):" but this is not in the Hebrew text.

℣. 12. A naughty perſon, a wicked man, &c.] Or, a man of Belial, a man of iniquity [w]. The former ſignifies an unprofitable man, a man good for nothing, that is of no uſe to God or man; or one that is lawleſs, that has thrown off the yoke of the law, and will not be ſubject to it; Belial is a name of the devil; and here it may deſign ſuch as are his children, and will do his luſts: the latter phraſe ſignifies one that is wholly given up to work wickedneſs. The characters well agree with the ανομος, the lawleſs one, the man of ſin and ſon of perdition, Antichriſt, 2 Theſſ. ii. 3, 8. Who walketh with a froward mouth; ſpeaking perverſe things, things contrary to the light of nature and reaſon, to law and goſpel; uttering lies, and deceit, and blaſphemies againſt God and man; to which he has uſed himſelf, and in which he continues, as the word walketh ſignifies: ſo Antichriſt has a mouth opened in blaſphemies againſt God and his ſaints, Rev. xiii. 5, 6.

℣. 13. He winketh with his eyes, &c.] Not thro' natural infirmity, but purpoſely and with deſign; with one of his eyes, as Aben Ezra, as is uſual with ſuch perſons: it is the air and geſture of a ſneering and deceitful man, who gives the wink to ſome of his friends, ſneering at the weakneſs of another in company; or as ſignifying to them ſome ſecret deſign of his againſt another, which he chooſes not to declare in any other way. He ſpeaketh with his feet; the motions of the feet have a language; the ſtamping of the feet expreſſes rage; here it ſeems to intend the giving of a hint to another, by privately preſſing his foot with his, when he ſhould be ſilent or ſhould ſpeak, or do this or the other thing he would have him do. He teacheth with his fingers; by ſtretching them out or compreſſing them; and ſo ſhewing either ſcorn and contempt [x], or rage and fury. The whole of it ſeems to deſign the ſecret, cunning, artful ways, which wicked men have to convey their meanings to one another, without being underſtood by other perſons; they have a language to themſelves, which they expreſs by the motions of their eyes, feet and fingers: and this character of art and cunning, diſſimulation and deceit, fitly agrees with the man of ſin, 2 Theſſ. ii. 10. Rev. xiii. 11. So mimicks are ſaid to ſpeak with their hands; ſome have been famous in this way [y].

℣. 14. Frowardneſs is in his heart, &c.] Or perverſe things; evil habits and principles of ſin; all manner of wickedneſs, errors and hereſies; things contrary to right reaſon, repugnant to the will and law of God, and the reverſe of ſound doctrine; all evil thoughts and evil things; ſee Matt. xv. 19. He deviſeth miſchief continually; againſt his neighbours, and eſpecially againſt good men; he is continually planning ſchemes, contriving methods, ways and means, how to diſturb, diſtreſs and ruin men; being a true child of Belial, or of the devil, his heart is the forge where he is continually framing wickedneſs in one ſhape or another; and the ground which he is always plowing up and labouring at to bring forth ſin and wickedneſs, and with which it is fruitful. He ſoweth diſcord; or ſtrifes [z]: the Syriac verſion adds, between two; which Jarchi interprets between a man and his Maker; rather, between a man and his neighbour; between one friend and another; between huſband and wife, parents and children, brethren and brethren, magiſtrates and ſubjects; between kings and princes of the earth, in which ſort of work the man of ſin, Antichriſt, has been very buſy. The Targum is, he caſteth out ſtrifes, as firebrands among men. The words in the Hebrew text are, he ſendeth out diſcord, or ſtrifes[a]; theſe are the meſſengers ſent out by him to make miſchief.

℣. 15. Therefore ſhall his calamity come ſuddenly, &c.] Unthought of and unexpected: he that deviſeth miſchief to others ſecretly, ſhall have no warning of his own ruin, nor time and means of preventing it; the deſtruction of Antichriſt will be ſudden, and of all wicked men at the coming of Chriſt, 1 Theſſ. v. 3. Rev. xviii. 7, 8. Suddenly ſhall he be broken without remedy; or, and there ſhall be no healing[b]: his bones will be broken to pieces, and there will be no cure for him; or he ſhall be like an earthen veſſel, which, when broke, cannot be put together again. The ruin of wicked men is ſudden, inevitable and irreparable; ſo Antichriſt will come to his end, and none ſhall help him, Dan. xi. 45.

℣. 16. Theſe ſix things doth the Lord hate, &c.] That is, the ſix following, which are all to be found in a man of Belial, a wicked man before deſcribed. There are other things beſides theſe that God hates, and indeed more ſo; as ſins againſt the firſt table, which more immediately ſtrike at his being, honour and glory; theſe being ſuch as are againſt the ſecond table, but are mentioned, as more eſpecially appearing in the character of the above perſon; and muſt be hateful to God, as contrary to his nature, will, and law. Yea, ſeven are an abomination unto him; or, the abomination of his ſoul[c]; what his ſoul abhors, or he abhors from his very heart: meaning not ſeven others, but one more along with the ſix, which make ſeven; a like way of ſpeaking, ſee in chap. xxx. 15, 18, 29. Job v. 19. Nor is the word abomination to be reſtrained to the ſeventh, or hatred to the ſixth; but they are all to be ſuppoſed to be hateful and abominable to the Lord; though ſome think the cardinal number is put for the ordinal, ſeven for the ſeventh; as if the ſeventh, which is ſowing diſcord among brethren, was of all the moſt abominable, ℣. 19. it being what was laſt mentioned in the character of the wicked man, ℣. 14. and which ſeems to have given occaſion to, and for the ſake of which this enumeration is made.

℣. 17. A proud look, &c.] Or, eyes elated[d]; ſcorning to look down upon others; or looking upon them with diſdain; or reckoning them as unworthy to be looked upon, having an high opinion of their own worth and merit. Pride is the firſt of the hateful things mentioned; it being the firſt ſin committed, as is probable, the ſin of the angels, and of the firſt man; and is a predominant evil in human nature, and is directly oppoſite to God and to his nature, and againſt which he ſets himſelf; for, he reſiſteth the proud, James iv. 6. the pride of the heart ſhews itſelf in the eyes, or by the looks of a man; Gerſom ſays, the phraſe denotes impudence and haughtineſs. A lying tongue; that is the ſecond of the hateful things; a tongue ſpeaking falſhood, knowingly and willingly, with an intention to deceive others; to hurt the character of a neighbour, or to flatter a friend, is a moſt deteſtable evil; it ought to be ſo to men, it muſt be ſo to God, who is a God of truth: nor is there any thing in which a man more reſembles the devil, who is the father of lies. And hands that ſhed innocent blood; human blood; and that of perſons, who have not been guilty of any capital ſin, for which they ought to die by the laws of God or men, and yet ſhed or poured out as common water; ſuch hands muſt be defiled, and ſuch men muſt be hateful to God, they deſtroying his image, and being like to the devil, who was a murderer from the beginning. Theſe three ſins are plainly to be ſeen in the ſon of Belial, Antichriſt, who exalts himſelf above all that is called God, the kings and princes of the earth; he and his followers ſpeak lies in hypocriſy; and is the whore that is drunk with the blood of the ſaints, 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. 1 Tim. iv. 2. Rev. xvii. 6.

℣. 18. An heart that deviſeth wicked imaginations, &c.] Or, thoughts of wickedneſs[e]; which are framed and formed in the heart: and this being the ſource and fountain of all wickedneſs, is placed in the midſt of theſe hateful and abominable things; ſee the note on ℣. 14. evil thoughts and deſigns, both againſt God and men are intended, which are forged and fabricated in the wicked heart of man; and may reſpect the depths of Satan in the antichriſtian beaſt of Rome, Rev. ii. 24. Feet that be ſwift in running to miſchief; to commit all manner of ſin with greedineſs, eſpecially murder; ſee chap. i. 16.

℣. 19. A falſe witneſs that ſpeaketh lies, &c.] Or, that ſpeaketh lies, even a falſe witneſs[f]; and ſo this is diſtinguiſhed from a lying tongue, the ſecond of theſe evils: this is the ſin of bearing falſe witneſs againſt one's neighbour, a breach of the eighth command. It may be rendered, he that bloweth lies[g]; that raiſes lies, and ſpreads them abroad, and ſwears to them, to the damage of others. This makes the ſixth; and the ſeventh follows, And him that ſoweth diſcord among brethren; whether in a natural relation, or in a civil ſociety, or in a religious community.

℣. 20. My ſon, keep thy father's commandment, &c.] Theſe are not the words of David to Solomon continued from chap. iv. 4. but the words of Solomon to his ſon; and not to his ſon only, in a ſtrict natural relation, but to every one that came to him for and put himſelf under his inſtruction; and to every one that ſtood in ſuch a relation to a religious father; for not the divine Being, the Father of all is here meant, according to ſome Jewiſh writers; though the commandment no doubt is the commandment of God taught by godly parents; or ſuch a ſyſtem of precepts that is founded upon and agrees unto the revealed will of God, and which being ſo ſhould be laid up and kept in the heart, and not forgotten; and ſhould be obſerved and attended to and obeyed throughout the whole courſe of life, as if it was the commandment of God himſelf; and indeed it is no other than that which pious parents train up their children in the knowledge of, inſtil into them, and urge upon them the obſervance of. And forſake not the law of thy mother; the ſame as before, and which is mentioned to ſhew that the ſame reſpect is to be had to a mother as to a father, the commandment and law of them being the ſame, and they ſtanding in the ſame relation; which yet children are apt to make a difference in, and while they ſtand in awe of their father and his precepts, ſlight their mother and her directions, which ought not to be. Some underſtand this of the congregation of Iſrael, as ſome Jewiſh writers; and others of the church of God, the mother of us all.

℣. 21. Bind them continually upon thine heart, &c.] Not upon the head or arm, as the words of the law were to be bound, Deut. vi. 8. to which there ſeems to be an alluſion; and which may confirm the ſenſe of the words given, that this reſpects the law of God itſelf, and the precepts of it, inſtructed in by parents; but they ſhould be bound upon the heart, and have an abiding place in the underſtanding, affections, memory and will. And tie them about thy neck; as an ornament, inſtead of a necklace of pearl, or chains of gold; they ſhould be ſo far from being thought burdenſome and troubleſome, that they ſhould be reckoned comely and graceful; ſee chap. i. 9. and iii. 3, 22.

℣. 22. When thou goeſt, it ſhall lead thee, &c.] The law of God taught by parents; this directs man in the path of duty, and buſineſs of life; teaches him what way to ſhun, and which to walk in; it leads out of the paths of ſin, and into the way in which he ſhould go, which is moſt conducive to his good, and to the glory of God; it will lead him ſafely, ſo that he ſhall not ſtumble, chap. iii. 3. When thou ſleepeſt, it ſhall keep thee; from terrifying dreams, evil ſpirits, dangers by fire or thieves; one that obſerves it conſcientiouſly may lie down and ſleep, ſecure of the guardianſhip of divine providence, and not fear any evil; or ſhall watch over thee[h] in the night-ſeaſon. And when thou awakeſt, it ſhall talk with thee; familiarly; and inſtruct what to do and how to behave the day following; or it ſhall go out with thee[i], into the fields for a morning's walk, and aſſiſt in meditation. Jarchi interprets this of ſleeping by death, and of awaking at the reſurrection of the dead.

℣. 23. For the commandment is a lamp, &c.] The law of God is a lamp or candle to ſee to work by and to walk by; it enlightens the eyes and directs the feet, and makes working more pleaſant and walking more comfortable; and indeed without it a man knows not rightly what to do or where he ſhould walk, or where he is walking; ſee Pſal. cxix. 105. And the law is light; it makes things clear and manifeſt, what is right and what is wrong; it enlightens the eyes of the underſtanding, whereby perſons come to ſee both their ſin and their duty; and it directs them to avoid the one and do the other; ſee Pſal. xix. 8. And reproofs of inſtruction are the way of life; kind reproofs given by parents agreeable to the word of God, which inſtruct what ſhould be ſhunned and what ſhould be performed, when attended to, put men in the way of an honourable and uſeful life; and are the means of preſerving them from a ſcandalous and uſeleſs one.

℣. 24. To keep thee from the evil woman, &c.] This is one uſe of the profit ariſing from attending to the inſtructions of parents, and to the law of God as taught by them; to preſerve from fornication and adultery, one of its precepts expreſly forbidding adultery and all corporal uncleanneſs; and the whole of it directing to an obſervance of all duties reſpecting God and our neighbour, which requires diligence and induſtry, and prevents idleneſs, that inlet to all ſin, and eſpecially to uncleanneſs[k]. From the flattery of the tongue of a ſtrange woman; the ſame with the evil woman, the lewd and adulterous one; ſee chap. ii. 16. and v. 3. Jarchi interprets this of idolatry; the character well agrees with the idolatrous church of Rome, or Antichriſt, repreſented by a whore, Rev. xvii. 1, 2, 5. as this woman is called the woman of evil[l], for ſo it may be rendered, one very evil, given up and abandoned to ſin; ſo Antichriſt is called the man of ſin, 2 Theſſ. ii. 3. and as this woman is ſaid to have the ſmoothneſs of a ſtrange tongue[m], as the words may be tranſlated, and are by the Targum; ſo the religion of this falſe church is delivered in a ſtrange language the people underſtand not, by which they are kept in ignorance and deception; now the word of God read and explained in the mother-tongue, and eſpecially the goſpel-part of it, the doctrine of wiſdom, is a means of preſerving perſons from the errors and hereſies, ſuperſtition and idolatry of the church of Rome, and from being carried away with their falſe gloſſes and gaudy worſhip, and all its deceivable ways of unrighteouſneſs.

℣. 25. Luſt not after her beauty in thine heart, &c.] Do not look upon it with the eye, nor dwell upon it in the thought; the one will lead on to and kindle luſt in the heart, and the other will cheriſh it and blow it up into a flame; and luſt thus conceived and nouriſhed in the heart is no other than committing adultery, Matt. v. 28. Neither let her take thee with her eye-lids; let her not take thee from inſtruction with them, ſo Aben Ezra, from attending to that; or let her not take thy wiſdom from thee, ſo Jarchi; or rather let her not take thee as in a net, with the ſparkling of her eyes, with the wanton and amorous glances of them; ſo the Syriac verſion, let her not captivate thee, &c. which, applied to the antichriſtian church, may ſignify the outward pomp and grandeur of it, its pretenſions to antiquity, to the apoſtolic ſee, to infallibility, miracles, great devotion, &c. which are taking to men, and are the Circean cup with which ſhe bewitches and allures, Rev. xvii. 4. The Targum is, "let her not ſeduce thee, &c."

℣. 26. For by means of a whoriſh woman a man is brought to a piece of bread, &c.] To be glad of one, and to beg for one, for the leaſt morſel; it is expreſſive of the extreme poverty and want which harlots bring men to, who ſtrip them of all their ſubſtance, and then ſend them going to get their bread as they can; thus the prodigal having ſpent his ſubſtance with harlots was ſo reduced as to deſire the huſks which ſwine eat, Luke xv. 13—16. ſo ſpiritual fornication or idolatry leaves men without bread for their ſouls, brings them into ſpiritual poverty, and even to deſperation and death. And the adultereſs will hunt for the precious life; or ſoul[n]; not content with his precious ſubſtance, his jewels, his gold and ſilver; having ſtript him of his goods and livelihood, though ſome think that is here intended; ſhe lays ſnares for him, and draws him into thoſe evils which bring him into the hands of her huſband, who avenges himſelf by ſlaying the adulterer; or into the hands of the civil magiſtrate, by whom this ſin of adultery was puniſhed with death; nay is the occaſion of the ruin of his precious and immortal ſoul to all eternity: the precious ſouls of men are part of the wares of Antichriſt, Rev. xviii. 13.

℣. 27. Can a man take fire in his boſom, &c.] A whore is compared to fire, and is ſo called by the poets[o]; and it is a ſaying of Pythagoras, "it is a like thing to fall into fire and into a woman[p];" the Hebrew words אש eſh, fire, and אישה iſhah, a woman, have ſome affinity; and the phraſe of taking it into the boſom fitly expreſſes the impure embraces of an harlot. And his clothes not be burned? he cannot, it is impoſſible; and equally vain is it to think, that a man can commit whoredom and it not be known, or he not hurt by it in his name and ſubſtance, or in his body, ſoul, and life.

℣. 28. Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?] He cannot; if he ſets his feet upon them, and continues them ever ſo little on them, they will be burnt, and much more if he walks upon them; and ſo if a man gives way to the burning luſts of his heart after a whoriſh woman, and commits adultery with her, though not with frequency, he will not eſcape puniſhment in one ſhape or another; and much more if he continues ſuch a lewd courſe of life; ſuch practices are extremely dangerous[q], and there is no poſſibility of being unhurt by them; ſee Job xxxi. 12. the lake of fire and brimſtone, everlaſting burnings will be the portion of thoſe that commit fornication with the whore of Rome, Rev. xiv. 10, 11.

℣. 29. So he that goeth in to his neighbour's wife, &c.] To converſe with her, or lie with her, as the Targum; for it means not barely going into her houſe, or chamber, or into her company, though without any ill deſign at firſt, which yet may be dangerous; but committing adultery with her, as this phraſe is often uſed, Gen. xix. 31. and xxix. 21, 23, 30. Whoſoever toucheth her; by impure dalliances, and eſpecially by carnal copulation with her, in which ſenſe it is uſed 1 Cor. vii. 1. ſee the note there. Shall not be innocent; or free[r] from diſgrace and infamy, from loſs of ſubſtance or health; from puniſhment in this life, either by the jealous huſband or civil magiſtrate; and in the world to come by the Lord himſelf; for whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, Heb. xiii. 4.

℣. 30. Men do not deſpiſe a thief, if he ſteal, &c.] They do not diſcommend or reproach him for it, or fix a mark of infamy upon him, or expoſe him to public ſhame by whipping him; but rather excuſe him and pity him when it appears what his caſe is, what put him upon it, and that he had no other intention in it than to do as follows. To ſatisfy his ſoul; his craving appetite for food, having none to eat, nor no other way of getting any: the words ſhould be ſupplied thus, for he does this to ſatisfy his ſoul; or as the Syriac verſion, for he ſteals to ſatisfy his ſoul; and ſo they are a reaſon why men do not deſpiſe him, nor uſe him ill, becauſe it is done with no other view; not with a wicked deſign to hurt his neighbour, nor with a covetous intent to increaſe his own ſubſtance in an unlawful way, but only to ſatisfy nature in diſtreſs; and another reaſon follows, or the former confirmed. When he is hungry; or for he is hungry[s]; preſſed with famine; the temptation is great, nature urges him to it; and though it is criminal, men in ſuch caſes will not bear hard upon him for it. The Targum is, "it is not to be wondered at in a thief that he ſhould ſteal to ſatisfy his ſoul when it is hungry." The Vulgate Latin verſion is, "it is not a great fault when any one ſteals, for he ſteals to fill a hungry ſoul;" it is a fault, but it is not a very heinous one, at leaſt it is not ſo heinous as adultery, for the ſake of which it is mentioned, and with which it is compared: the deſign of the inſtance is to ſhew that adultery is far greater than that; and yet in our age we ſee that the one is ſeverely puniſhed even with death for trifling things, when the other goes unpuniſhed.

℣. 31. But if he be found, he ſhall reſtore ſevenfold, &c.] According to the law in Exod. xxii. 1, 4. in caſe of theft double was to be reſtored, if the theft was found alive in his hand; and in ſome caſes four-fold and five-fold. Aben Ezra obſerving that double and five-fold being near together in the law, joins them, and ſo makes ſeven-fold. Some think Solomon has reference to a law in other nations which obliged to a ſevenfold reſtoration; or that the penalty was increaſed in his time, but neither appears; rather the meaning is, that a thief ſhould make reſtoration according to law as often as he is found guilty, be it ſeven times, or ſeventy times ſeven, Matt. xviii. 21, 22. or the ſenſe is, that he ſhould make perfect reſtoration, full reſtitution as the law requires: but then this finding him is not to be underſtood of finding him in the fact, ſtealing to ſatisfy hunger, for then to inſiſt upon a legal reſtitution, as it is incompatible with ſuch a man's circumſtances, ſo would contradict what is before ſaid, that ſuch a one is not uſually reproached and found fault with; but the ſenſe is, if it ſhould be found otherwiſe, or it ſhould be found that he has food to ſatisfy his ſoul, as Gerſom obſerves, and has no need to ſteal; or if he is found in a man's houſe, then he ſhall make reſtitution as the law directs, even a full one, Exod. xxii. 2, 3. He ſhall give all the ſubſtance of his houſe; to pay the ſeven-fold, or to make full reſtitution; nay if neceſſary, he himſelf may be ſold, as the above law requires.

℣. 32. But whoſo committeth adultery with a woman, &c.] Which is a greater degree of theft than the former, it being the ſtealing of another man's wife. Lacketh underſtanding; or an heart[t]; the thief lacks bread and therefore ſteals, but this man lacks wiſdom and therefore acts ſo fooliſh a part; the one does it to ſatisfy hunger, the other a brutiſh luſt. He that doeth it deſtroyeth his own ſoul; is liable to have his life taken away by the huſband of the adultereſs; ſo according to Solon's law[u] the adulterer taken in the act might be killed by the huſband: or by the civil magiſtrate; for according to the law of Moſes he was to die, either to be ſtrangled or ſtoned, John viii. 5. ſee the note there; and beſides, he not only ruins the natural faculties of his ſoul, beſotting, corrupting, and depraving that, giving his heart to a whore, but brings eternal deſtruction on it; yet ſo fooliſh is he, though it iſſues in the ruin of his precious ſoul; he does this[w], for ſo the firſt part of this clauſe which ſtands laſt in the original text may be rendered.

℣. 33. A wound and diſhonour ſhall he get, &c.] A wound, ſtroke, or blow, either from the huſband of the ſtrumpet, as was often the caſe[x] in after times; or from the civil magiſtrate, being ordered by him to be beaten[y] or ſtoned; or from God himſelf inflicting diſeaſes on him; ſee Gen. xii. 17. where the ſame word is uſed as here: and diſhonour from men; for though they do not deſpiſe a thief in circumſtances before related, yet they will deſpiſe an adulterer and ſpeak reproachfully of him, whenever they have occaſion to make mention of him. And his reproach ſhall not be wiped away; as long as he lives, though his life may be ſpared; yea, it ſhall even continue after death; and though he may repent of his ſin and reform, as in the caſe of David.

℣. 34. For jealouſy is the rage of a man, &c.] Fills a man with rage againſt him of whom he is jealous; which keeps boiling within him, till he has an opportunity of venting it: and very ſevere it is; it is ſtrong as death, and cruel as the grave. Therefore he will not ſpare in the day of vengeance; when he has an opportunity of avenging himſelf; whenever he finds the adulterer in his houſe, or catches him and his wife in bed together, he ſpares not to take away his life, and ſometimes the life of both of them; inſtances of this nature hiſtory furniſhes us with: or he will ſpare no coſt and pains to proſecute him before a civil magiſtrate, and bring him to public juſtice; prayers and intreaties, bribes and gifts, will be of no avail, as follows.

℣. 35. He will not regard any ranſom, &c.] So that his caſe is much worſe than a thief's; if he is taken, he makes reſtitution according to law, and he is freed, and no more is ſaid and done to him; and at moſt it is but parting with all the goods in his houſe; but in this caſe it will not do. In the Hebrew text it is, he will not accept the face of any ranſom[z]; that is, as the Targum paraphraſes it, "he will not accept the face of any one that gives a gift:" he will have no reſpect unto him for the ſake of the gift; whatever gift is offered, be it what it will, for the ranſom of his life from death, it will be diſregarded. Neither will he reſt content, though thou giveſt many gifts; increaſe them, and keep continually giving; nothing but the life of the adulterer will ſatiſfy him, which he will either take away himſelf, or obtain it in a way of legal proſecution. How fooliſh therefore is the man that will expoſe his name and credit, his health and ſubſtance, his life in this world, and his ſoul in another, to utter ruin, for the ſake of gratifying a ſordid luſt! This may be interpreted of God, who is a jealous God in matters of worſhip, and will not ſuffer idolatry to go unpuniſhed, which is ſpiritual adultery.

CHAP. VII.

THE ſum of this chapter is to exhort men to attend to the doctrines and precepts of wiſdom, in order to avoid the adulterous woman; the exhortation to keep them with care, affection and delight, in order to anſwer the end, is in ℣. 1—5. A ſtory is told of Solomon's own knowledge, of a young man enſnared and ruined by a lewd woman, it begins ℣. 6. The young man is deſcribed as fooliſh, and as throwing himſelf in the way of temptation, ℣. 7—9. the harlot that met him is deſcribed by her attire, her ſubtilty, her voice, her inconſtancy, her impudence, and pretenſions to piety, ℣. 10—14. The arguments ſhe made uſe of to prevail upon him to go with her, are taken partly from the elegance of her bed, the ſoftneſs of it, and its ſweet perfume, and ſatiety of love to be enjoyed in it, ℣. 15—18. and partly from the abſence of her huſband, who was gone a long journey, and had made proviſion for it for a certain time, ℣. 19, 20. By which arguments ſhe prevailed upon him to his utter ruin; which is illuſtrated by the ſimilies of an ox going to the ſlaughter, a fool to the ſtocks, and a bird to the ſnare, ℣. 21—23. And the chapter is concluded with an exhortation to hearken to the words of wiſdom, and to avoid the ways and paths of the harlot, by which many and mighty perſons have been ruined; they being the direct road to hell and death, ℣. 24—27.

℣. 1. My ſon, keep my words, &c.] Doctrines and inſtructions; which, as a father to a ſon, or a maſter to his ſcholars, he had delivered; theſe he would have him obſerve and attend to. And lay up my commandments with thee; as a treaſure in his heart, to be brought out upon occaſion; to be kept as valuable; and made uſe of as an antidote againſt, and a preſervative from ſinning; ſee Pſal. cxix. 11. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions add, what is not in the Hebrew text, "Son, honour the Lord, and thou ſhalt be ſtrong;" (the Arabic adds, "and he ſhall ſtrengthen thee;) and fear none beſides him."

℣. 2. Keep my commandments, and live, &c.] Not the commandments of the law only, but the commandments of Chriſt; and even the doctrines of Chriſt are ſo called, as faith in him, and love to the ſaints, 1 John iii. 23. John xiv. 21, 23. which is the way to live comfortably, peaceably, pleaſantly, and honourably. And my law as the apple of thine eye; the doctrine of Chriſt, the law of the Lord, that goes out of Zion; which ſhould be as dear to men as the apple of their eye, and as carefully preſerved, that the leaſt injury is not done to it; it ſhould be kept inviolate.

℣. 3. Bind them upon thy fingers, &c.] Let the above words and doctrines be as ready and familiar, as if they were at the fingers ends: or let them be always freſh in memory, as a piece of thread is tied about the fingers, to put in mind of any thing to be done; or let them be as rings upon the fingers, both memorial and ornamental: or put into practice the things taught and commanded; the fingers being the inſtruments of action, and eſpecially of doing things nicely and accurately. Write them upon the table of thine heart; that they may be ſtrong in the memory, deep in the affection, and abiding in the underſtanding and will; ſee chap. iii. 3.

℣. 4. Say unto wiſdom, Thou art my ſiſter, &c.] Intimately acquainted, greatly beloved, and highly delighted in: this may be underſtood both of the goſpel, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, which men ſhould be converſant with, be ſtrongly affected to, and take delight and pleaſure in; and of Chriſt, the eſſential wiſdom of God, and who ſtands in the relation of a brother to his people, and ſhould be reſpected as ſuch. And call underſtanding thy kinſwoman; or kinſman[a]; ſuch Chriſt is in our nature, our goel, our near kinſman, partaker of the ſame fleſh and blood, and therefore is not aſhamed to call us brethren, nor ſhould we be aſhamed to call him kinſman: moreover his word and goſpel, and the underſtanding of it, ſhould be familiar to us; it ſhould be well known[b] by us, as the word uſed ſignifies, and dwell richly in us.

℣. 5. That they may keep thee from the ſtrange woman, &c.] Nothing has a greater tendency than Chriſt and his goſpel, and an intimate acquaintance with them, and a retention of them, to keep from all ſin, from all fleſhly luſts, from the ſin of uncleanneſs; and alſo from all the errors, hereſies, idolatry, ſuperſtition, and will-worſhip of the whore of Rome; a ſtranger to God and true godlineſs, to Chriſt and his truths, the Spirit and his operations. From the ſtranger which flattereth with her words; ſee the notes on chap. ii. 16. and v. 3. and vi. 24.

℣. 6. For at the window of my houſe, &c.] This is either an hiſtorical account of a matter of fact known to Solomon, or a parable made by him, ſetting forth the cunning artifices of an harlot, the folly and weakneſs of a young man enſnared, and the ruin he is brought into by her. As Solomon was a public magiſtrate he is here repreſented as a private obſerver of the behaviour of his ſubjects, as ſitting in his palace at a window, at the ſmall windows of it, as the Targum, where he could ſee and not be ſeen himſelf; near to which was an harlot's houſe; for they generally get about the courts of princes, where they make their prey. I looked through my caſement; or latteſs[c]; the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions underſtand this of the harlot looking out of the window of her houſe and through the caſement, when ſhe ſpied a young man, as follows; but this agrees not with the Hebrew text, which carries it to Solomon; though a greater than he may be deſigned, the omniſcient God, who looks through the windows and latteſs of heaven, and beholds all the actions of the children of men; thoſe that are moſt private, and done in the dark; and Chriſt the ſon of God whoſe eyes are like unto a flame of fire, to look through all the darkneſs of popery, repreſented by the Thyatirian church-ſtate; into all the intrigues of the Romiſh harlot, and behold all the follies of thoſe that commit fornication with her, Rev. ii. 18.

℣. 7. And beheld among the ſimple ones, &c.] Such as are eaſily perſuaded and drawn into ſin; ſimple and fooliſh in things moral and ſpiritual, and not arrived to any ripeneſs of underſtanding in things natural and civil; have ſeen but little of the world, and know leſs of religion, and are eaſily impoſed upon and carried away with the company they keep; ſuch ſimple fooliſh creatures are the followers of Antichriſt; ſee 2 Tim. iii. 6, 9. I diſcerned among the youths; or children[d]; at leaſt in underſtanding, the children of Jezebel, Rev. ii. 23. A young man void of underſtanding; or wanting a heart[e]; to know and fear the Lord, and not in the way to learn and improve; but in company like himſelf, and ſo in a fair way to continue fooliſh and ſimple, and deſtitute of the true underſtanding of things, and expoſed to the ſnares and deluſions of ſuch that lie in wait to deceive.

℣. 8. Paſſing through the ſtreet near her corner, &c.] The houſe of the harlot that ſtood in a corner to take in perſons that came both ways; to come near which is dangerous; this was putting himſelf in the way of temptation: or the corner of the ſtreet where ſhe ſtood to pick up young men; it could be with no good deſign to walk the ſtreets in the night, and to go where harlots haunt, and where they dwell or ſtand; or however it was expoſing himſelf to danger, and had he took the wiſe man's advice, would not have done it, chap. v. 8. we ſhould abſtain from all appearance of evil, and from every thing that leads to ſin; and as to immorality and uncleanneſs, ſo to falſe doctrine and falſe worſhip; the ſynagogues of Satan, and popiſh chapels ſhould be avoided. And he went the way to her houſe; that led directly to her houſe, which ſhews a bad intention; and if his deſign was not to commit fornication, yet to gratify his luſts by looks, dalliances, and impure diſcourſe with her; and hither he went in a ſet, ſtately manner, as the word[f] ſignifies; with an air pleaſing to the harlot, as a beau and fop of the town; and by which air and gait he was known by her to be a proper perſon to attack.

℣. 9. In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night, &c.] Which is the uſual time adulterers take to commit their works of darkneſs in, by which they think to conceal them; they being ſuch as they themſelves do not care ſhould be ſeen and known, Job xxiv. 15. their works will not bear the ſun and day-light, therefore they take the twilight and when the ſun is ſet; and chooſe the night, and not moon-light-nights neither, but the blackeſt and darkeſt nights as fitteſt for their purpoſe; moſt likely to meet with harlots, and leſs liable to be ſeen by their neighbours; but always to be ſeen by the omniſcient God with whom the darkneſs and the light are both alike. Perhaps theſe ſeveral words may expreſs the time from the young man's firſt ſetting out to his drawing nigh to the harlot's houſe, and his being attacked and enſnared by her; when he firſt ſet out from his own or his father's houſe, it was twilight, the ſun was declining; by that time he had got good part of his way the ſun ſet and then it was evening; and when he came near the harlot's houſe it was black and dark night: and this may repreſent the gradual and progreſſive growth of popery; there was firſt a twilight, a decline of the purity of goſpel-light and knowledge, and then the ſun of the goſpel ſet, which brought on an evening, and iſſued in the groſs darkneſs of popery, repreſented by the Thyatirian church-ſtate, as before obſerved; ſince that, the morning-ſtar of the reformation has appeared, but this is become obſcure, we are in a twilight again; it is neither day nor night with us as yet, but a dark black night is haſtening on; and it is eaſy to obſerve how many, like this fooliſh young man, are marching on in a ſtately manner to the harlot's houſe, or are verging to popery, whether they deſign it or no.

℣. 10. And behold, there met him a woman, &c.] A married woman, and an adultereſs, as the following account of her ſhews; as ſoon as ever ſhe diſcerned the young man before deſcribed, who ſhe knew by his air, walk, and dreſs, was a fit perſon for her turn, ſhe at once ſet out from her houſe, or the corner where ſhe ſtood, and met him; ſhe did not wait till he came up and made his ſuit to her, but ſhe went out and firſt attacked him; wherefore the word behold is prefixed as a note of admiration at the impudence of the woman, and as a note of attention to obſerve the conſequence of this affair. This woman repreſents the woman on a ſcarlet coloured beaſt, the mother of harlots, who though ſhe pretends to be the ſpouſe of Chriſt is an arrant whore, Rev. xvii. 3, 5. With the attire of an harlot; not with her face veiled, as Tamar was, Gen. xxxviii. 14, 15. for though that might be the ſign of an harlot in the day-time, yet not in the night, as this was; rather with ſhowy, gaudy garments, ſuch as the Athenian whores wore, or ſhort ones as the Romans; the word ſignifies one fitted to her body, neat and well-ſhaped, to recommend her: ſo the woman, the whore of Rome, is ſaid to be arrayed in purple and ſcarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious ſtones and pearls; ſignifying the outward pomp and ſplendor of the Romiſh religion, deſigned to captivate weak and unwary minds, Rev. xvii. 4. ſee the note there. And ſubtil of heart; miſtreſs of all artful and intriguing methods to ſeduce and enſnare[g]; or reſerved of heart[h], cautious and wary what ſhe ſaid, told every thing that was encouraging, but kept back what was diſcouraging; or ſhe kept her own heart to herſelf, whilſt ſhe ſtole the hearts of others; ſo the Targum renders it, "which takes away the hearts of young men;" and to the ſame purpoſe are the verſions of the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic: the ſubtlety of the popes, prieſts, jeſuits, and other emiſſaries of Rome to deceive the hearts of the ſimple is well known; the coming of Antichriſt was after the working of Satan, with all deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs, 2 Theſſ. ii. 9, 10.

℣. 11. She is loud and ſtubborn, &c.] Loud; not that her voice may be heard, and ſo be found by thoſe that ſeek her in the dark, as Aben Ezra interprets it; but rather clamorous, noiſy, and talkative when ſhe has got her gallant with her; pouring out fooliſh and unchaſte words to allure and entice him; unleſs it is to be underſtood of her bawling and ſcolding when within doors at her huſband in order to get him out and be rid of him; to whom ſhe is ſtubborn or rebellious, as the Targum, breaking covenant with him, and diſobeying his commands; and departing from him, declining out of the way, as Jarchi; ſpeaking rebellion, as Aben Ezra: all which agree with the whore of Rome, who is rebellious againſt Chriſt, whoſe ſpouſe ſhe profeſſes to be; is perfidious to him, diſobedient to his commandments; is gone out of the way of his truths and ordinances, and publiſhes and encourages every thing that is contrary thereunto; as well as has a mouth ſpeaking blaſphemies, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. Her feet abide not in her houſe; to attend the buſineſs of it; but ſhe is gadding abroad to ſeek her lovers and bring them in; it is the character of good women that they are keepers at home, but it is the ſign of an harlot to gad abroad, which is enlarged upon in the following verſe.

℣. 12. Now is ſhe without, &c.] The word for whore is ſometimes rendered in the Targum[i] one that goes abroad, or without her houſe; ſitting or ſtanding at the door of it, in an idle poſture, and in order to invite her lovers in; and if ſhe can get none this way, or quickly, grows impatient: ſhe is now in the ſtreets; takes her walks abroad in the ſtreets of the city to ſee who ſhe can light of to pick up and bring home. And lieth in wait at every corner; of the ſtreet where more ways meet, ſometimes at one corner and ſometimes at another, that ſhe may take all that comes; ſometimes ſhe is without in the fields, and in the country, to ſee what ſhe can meet with there; and ſometimes in the ſtreets of the city, and in the populous places of it, in the markets and courts, and in every private corner, trying all ways to gain lovers and ſatisfy her luſt[k]: all which may repreſent the diligence and induſtry, art and cunning of the Romiſh emiſſaries to gain proſelytes to their idolatrous worſhip, who every where lie in wait to deceive.

℣. 13. So ſhe caught him and kiſſed him, &c.] The young man that went near her corner where ſhe was plying, or in the way to her houſe, where ſhe was ſitting or ſtanding, waiting and watching for ſuch an opportunity, for ſuch a perſon, as a prey to faſten on; and no ſooner ſhe ſaw him, and come up to him, but without any ceremony or addreſs, ſhe laid hold upon him, as the word[l] ſignifies, threw her arms about his neck, and embraced him in them; and, what is unuſual for women to do, kiſſed him, in order to ſtir up wanton affections and impure deſires in him. And with an impudent face; or, and ſhe ſtrengthened her face[m]; rubbed her forehead, put on a brazen face, a whore's front; ſee Jer. iii. 3. Rev. xvii. 5. And ſaid unto him; accoſted him in the following manner, without ſhame or bluſhing.

℣. 14. I have peace-offerings with me, &c.] Meaning at her houſe. Theſe peace-offerings were of the euchariſtic kind; they were offered by way of thankſgiving for favours received; the greateſt part of which, all excepting the fat on the kidneys, the rump of the ſheep, the breaſt and right ſhoulder, which were the prieſts, were returned to the offerers to feaſt upon with their friends, and were to be eaten the ſame day, Lev. vii. 11—15. This ſhe ſaid to ſhew that ſhe was no common ſtrumpet, or that proſtituted herſelf for gain; that ſhe was a ſufficient houſewife, had a conſiderable affluence of life, her ſubſtance greatly increaſed, for which ſhe had made her thank-offering that day; that ſhe wanted nothing of him but his company and the enjoyment of him; and that ſhe had good chear to regale him with. She was properly קדשה a holy, religious harlot, as the word ſometimes ſignifies; and ſuch is the church of Rome, which makes great pretenſions to devotion and religion, yet is the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth, Rev. xvii. 5. This day have I paid my vows; not on account of the young man, and for his health, and for meeting with him; for thoſe vows were not now made to be paid, but were made and paid already; but her vows of peace-offerings and thankſgivings, givings, which, as ſhe had promiſed, ſhe had performed. Under this head may be reckoned the vows of virginity and celibacy, through a ſhew of which the moſt ſhocking iniquities are committed by the members of the church of Rome.

℣. 15. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, &c.] Having ſo much good chear at home, and none to eat of it with her; and having ſo fond and affectionate a regard to this young man, as ſhe pretended; he being the only perſon in her thoughts, whom ſhe hoped to meet with, and whoſe company ſhe deſired, and his only; though had ſhe met any other, ſhe would have ſaid the ſame things to them. Aben Ezra, upon the preceding verſe, ſays, ſhe told him lies; probably that might be true; but this was no doubt a lie; and it is no unuſual thing for the whore of Rome to ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, 1 Tim. iv. 2. Diligently to ſeek thy face; which of all faces ſhe deſired to ſee, being moſt lovely to her; with the comelineſs of which ſhe was exceedingly taken and raviſhed, and got up betimes in the morning, as the word [n] ſignifies, even before day, to ſeek for him. And I have found thee; which ſhe ſpeaks with a rapture and extaſy of joy; bleſſing herſelf on this happy occaſion, that ſhe ſhould come out ſo opportunely, and find him ſo quickly; intimating, that it was a kind providence, and that the thing was of God: ſo converſions to the antichriſtian church, which are the artifice of hell, are aſcribed to the divine Being.

℣. 16. I have decked my bed with coverings of tapeſtry, &c.] Made uſe of by the ancients [o] for bedcloaths: beautiful ornaments, as Gerſom; and precious garments, as Jarchi. She had adorned her bed with curtains and cloaths, very delightful to the eye and inviting; and had well corded it, as ſome interpret it, with cords of fine linen, and all to allure her lovers; ſhe ſoon diſcovered her luſtful inclinations, what her heart was upon, and ſays this and more to fire the young man's luſt, and cauſe him to follow her: ſo the church of Rome adorns her places of worſhip in the moſt pompous manner; which are the beds in which ſhe commits adultery, Rev. ii. 22. and alſo her images to ſtrike the minds of people, and draw them into her idolatrous worſhip. With carved works; perhaps the bed's head, teſter and poſts, were all carved, and cut out of cedar-wood and others, as Gerſom obſerves; though ſome think this refers to the variety of work in tapeſtry, which look like inciſions and carvings, or the net-work and agnet-holes made therein: this may be very well applied to the carved work and carved images ſet up in the Romiſh churches. With fine linen of Egypt; the ſheets, pillows, and bolſters made thereof, and ſo ſoft to lie upon; which was reckoned the beſt and fineſt, though not the ſtrongeſt. Pliny ſays [p], of the linen of Egypt, that it had leſs ſtrength and firmneſs in it (it being ſo fine); but bore the beſt price, and was the moſt gainful and profitable. The word uſed is not what is elſewhere met with, even when the linen of Egypt is mentioned, and indeed is no where elſe uſed: the Targum renders it, an Egyptian covering; and ſo moſt of the Oriental verſions interpret it of bed-coverings of tapeſtry painted, brought out of Egypt. The word is uſed in the Chaldee language for cords; and may here ſignify threads of linen twiſted together, or linen cords, with which the harlot's bed was corded, and looked beautiful. Pliny [q] ſays, there were four ſorts of linen in Egypt; Tanitic, Peluſiac, Butic, and Tenterytic; ſo called from the names and provinces where they were cultivated; and perhaps the Etun of Egypt may be the Tanitic: the fine linen, called Byſſus, was brought out of India into Egypt; and is ſaid to grow upon a tree as high as the poplar, and its leaves like a willow [r]. Egypt is very properly made mention of in this account; it being one of the names of the city of Rome, of the great city, which is ſpiritually called Sodom and Egypt, and equal to both for luſt and luxury, Rev. xi. 8.

℣. 17. I have perfumed my bed, &c.] As ſhe had made it entertaining to the ſenſes of ſeeing and feeling, it being ſhowy and gaudy, ſoft and eaſy; ſo to the ſenſe of ſmelling; and all to provoke luſt, and draw into her embraces; by cenſing it with incenſe, as Doneſh in Jarchi; or by ſprinkling [s] a liquor, made of the following ſpices, on the head, poſts and ſides of the bed, to remove all ill ſcents, and make it more acceptable; ſo the Targum, Vulgate Latin, Septuagint, and all the Oriental verſions render it, I ſprinkled my bed: or, it may be, by ſuffumigation, which women are ſaid to uſe with their garments and bed-cloaths [t]. Even this the harlot did, With myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon; all odorous and of a ſweet ſmell: Horace [u] ſpeaks of the anointed beds of ſuch perſons; and of the above ſpices ointments were made, with which the harlot's bed might be perfumed. Cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincenſe, are reckoned among the wares of Babylon, or the church of Rome, Rev. xviii. 13.

℣. 18. Come, let us take our fill of love until the morning, &c.] Taking him by the hand, and pulling him along, ſhe ſays, Come; let us not ſtand here in the ſtreets, but let us go within, and after ſupper to bed; and there enjoy ourſelves, till inebriated with love, as the word [w] ſignifies: ſo the poet [x] ſpeaks of ebrios ocellos, eyes drunk, that is, with love; and ſo continue till the morning-light, the night being the fitteſt ſeaſon for thoſe works of darkneſs: this expreſſes the inſatiableneſs of her luſt. Let us ſolace ourſelves with loves; mutual love, not lawful but criminal, more properly luſts; denoting the abundance of it, and the pleaſure promiſed in it, which is very ſhort-lived, and bitterneſs in the end.

℣. 19. For the good man is not at home, &c.] Or, for the man is not in his houſe [y]. She does not ſay, my man, or my huſband; though the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions ſo render it; leſt this ſhould throw ſome difficulty in the young man's way, or remind herſelf of her conjugal obligation; but the man, by way of contempt, as diſowning him for her huſband, or however having no regard for him in compariſon of others: and this ſhe ſays to encourage the young man to go with her; ſince her huſband was gone, and ſhe was alone, and miſtreſs of the houſe. He is gone a long journey; or, a way afar off [z]; into a diſtant country, and therefore need not fear a return of him that night; ſhe was prepared to anſwer all objections. The good man of the houſe may be underſtood of Chriſt, who is gone into a far country, to heaven, to take a kingdom to himſelf, and return, Luke xix. 12. and in the mean while the church of Rome, who profeſſes herſelf the true church and ſpouſe of Chriſt, is committing fornication with the kings of the earth; and has ſet up another in his room and ſtead, whom ſhe calls Chriſt's vicar on earth; and flatters herſelf and her lovers with impunity, from his diſtance from her, and his vicar having a right to do as he pleaſes.

℣. 20. He hath taken a bag of money with him, &c.] Or, in his hand[a]; either for merchandiſe, as Gerſom; or for defraying the charges of his journey; and both ſuppoſe length of time: if for merchandiſe, it required time to purchaſe goods, and ſee them packed up and ſent away; or if for his journey, ſince it was not a few pieces of money he put in his pocket to defray expences, but a bag of it he carried in his hand, it ſhews that he ſhould be out a conſiderable time. And will come home at the day appointed; and not before: Aben Ezra interprets it, at the beginning of the month, at the new moon, when the moon is covered[b], which Horace[c] calls triceſſima ſabbata: but rather it is to be underſtood of the full moon, as Aquila and the Vulgate Latin verſion render it; when it is light all night, and ſo a proper time for travelling home again. Gerſom takes it to mean the beginning of the year, when the holy bleſſed God, parabolically ſpeaking, ſits upon a throne to judge the world in righteouſneſs: the Targum calls it the day of the congregation; ſome fixed feſtival day, when the congregation meets together; and at ſuch a feſtival, or appointed time, this good man had fixed for his return, and when, and not before, he would. This ſhe ſays to remove all fears from the young man, of being ſurpriſed and caught by her huſband. There is an appointed time for Chriſt's ſecond coming, when he will certainly come, and not before; and which is ſuppoſed to be at a great diſtance of time: and therefore wicked men and ſeducers, and ſuch as the apoſtate church of Rome, make uſe of to encourage themſelves in their wickedneſs, in hopes of impunity; put the evil day far away from them; but in the appointed time Chriſt will come, and call his ſervants to an account, good and bad.

℣. 21. With her much fair ſpeech ſhe cauſed him to yield, &c.] Or, to decline from the right way: or, inclined him[d]; his ear to liſten to her, and his heart to go after her and along with her. This ſhe did, by uſing a great many words, by her prolixity, and by ſome taking and ſtriking expreſſions; lewd women are generally very talkative[e]. It may be rendered, by her much doctrine[f], as the word is in chap. iv. 2. ſo Jezebel calls herſelf a propheteſs, and ſets up for a teacher of men; and, by her falſe doctrine, deceives ſome that are called the ſervants of Chriſt, to commit fornication, and eat things ſacrificed to idols, Rev. ii. 20. With the flattering of her lips ſhe forced him; to go along with her, not againſt his will, but with it: though at firſt there was ſome reluctance, conſcience roſe up and oppoſed; but her words, which were ſmoother than oil, found a way into his heart, and prevailed upon him to yield to her intreaties; he could no longer withſtand her attacks, but ſurrendered to her; her charming voice, and flattering lips, had more effect upon him than her kiſſes; notwithſtanding theſe he was reluctant, but could ſtand it out no longer, againſt her alluring words and ſoothing language. With this compare the deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs in them that periſh through Antichriſt, 2 Theſſ. ii. 10.

℣. 22. He goeth after her ſtraightway, &c.] Or ſuddenly[g]; and inconſiderately, giving himſelf no time to think of what would be the ſad conſequences of it. As an ox goeth to the ſlaughter; as ſenſeleſs and ſtupid as that; and as ignorant of the iſſue as that is, led by the butcher, as if it was going to a paſture, when it is going to the ſlaughter-houſe. So ſuch perſons as are enſnared by harlots; they follow them in a view of pleaſure, but it ends in ruin; if not in the loſs of bodily life, by the revengeful huſband or civil magiſtrate; yet in the deſtruction of their immortal ſouls. Or as a fool to the correction of the ſtocks; a drunken, beſotted fool, who, while he is leading to the ſtocks, is inſenſible whither he is going; but when he has been there a while, and is come out of his drunken fit, then he is ſenſible of his puniſhment and his ſhame. Or, as the ſtocks are for the correction of a fool[h]: or, as a man goes to the ſtocks, to the correction of a fool[i]; ſo the young man went after the harlot: or, as one fettered[k], goes thither, bound hand and foot; he cannot help himſelf, nor avoid the ſhame. It denotes both the power of ſin, there is no withſtanding its allurements and blandiſhments, when once given way to, and the ſhame that attends or follows it. The Targum is, "as a dog to a chain;" and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions.

℣. 23. Till a dart ſtrike through his liver, &c.] The fountain of blood, and ſo of life; which, being pierced thro' and poured out, is certain death, Lam. ii. 11. the meaning is, till he is ſlain either by the hand of God, or by the civil magiſtrate, or by the jealous huſband; and be thruſt through by him, as Zimri and Coſbi were by Phinehas. The liver may be particularly mentioned, not only for the reaſon before given, but becauſe it is the ſeat of luſt[l]; ſo he is ſtricken in the part where his luſt begins, where he has been ſmitten by Cupid's darts: or this dart through the liver may denote ſome diſeaſe, infecting the blood through ſinful luſt. The Targum is, "as an hart into whoſe liver an arrow "flies;" or is wounded by an arrow in the liver, as the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions: and ſo the meaning is, that this young man went as ſwiftly after the harlot, as a hart does when it is wounded. As a bird haſteth to the ſnare; it has its eye upon the bait, and flies ſwiftly to that, inſenſible of the ſnare that is laid for it. And knoweth not that it is for his life; the bird knows not that the ſnare is ſet for its life, as Jarchi; or the fool knows not that it is for his ſoul; that it ſhall die, which hates correction, as Aben Ezra. The man that goes after the harlot knows not, or does not conſider that it is to the deſtruction of his precious and immortal ſoul; ſo the Targum, "he knows "not that it tends to the death of his ſoul;" and to the ſame ſenſe the Syriac and Arabic verſions; the ſecond death, which adulterers and idolaters ſhall have their part in, Rev. xxi. 8. The ſouls of men, and the ruin of them, are what the whore of Rome deals in, Rev. xviii. 13. ſhe goes into perdition, into the bottomleſs pit herſelf, and carries all her worſhippers with her, Rev. xvii. 8. and xiv. 9—11.

℣. 24. Hearken unto me now therefore, O ye children, &c.] The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions read, in the ſingular number, my ſon, in the ſame manner as the chapter begins; but it is in the plural number in the Hebrew text; and ſo read the Targum and Syriac verſion, children, the children of Solomon; not only thoſe of his own body, but all ſuch that put themſelves under his inſtruction, or were willing to take his advice: it may be extended to all the children of men, for all are intereſted herein; eſpecially ſuch who profeſs to be the children of God and of Chriſt, the followers of wiſdom. This is the epilogue, or application of the above ſtory. Since this is the caſe, that young men are in danger of being enſnared and brought to ruin by this harlot; therefore take the advice of the wiſeſt of men, even of wiſdom herſelf, And attend to the words of my mouth; the doctrines of Chriſt; the beſt preſervative from the allurements of the whore of Rome.

℣. 25. Let not thine heart decline to her ways, &c.] Or turn not aſide from the right way, the path of truth and holineſs, to thoſe of the whoriſh woman, that lead to ruin and deſtruction; do not ſo much as think of going out of the one into the other; let there not be the leaſt wandering thought, affection, or diſpoſition of the mind thereunto; ſtop and check the firſt motion of the heart, which leads to a compliance with her, and ſeems to be directed to her ways, or to betray any love and liking of them. Go not aſtray in her paths; for whoever walks in her paths, goes aſtray from God and his law; from Chriſt and his goſpel; and from the true church of God; and from the right paths of faith, duty and worſhip.

℣. 26. For ſhe hath caſt down many wounded, &c.] Wounded in their name, character and reputation; in their bodies by diſeaſes; and in their ſouls by guilt, ſhame and horror, through a compliance with her ſinful luſts: theſe ſhe caſts down from the honours they were poſſeſſed of, from the health they enjoyed, and from the peace and tranquillity of mind they formerly felt within them. And not a ſingle perſon, as the young man inſtanced in, or a few only, but many; great multitudes, hundreds and thouſands, and thoſe not weak, and fooliſh, and inconſtant, as he might be thought to be; but ſuch as were great[m] and mighty, as the word alſo ſignifies; men of great riches, and wiſdom, and courage; as ſoldiers[n], mighty men of war, ſuch as wound and kill others; which ſeems the true ſenſe of the word here uſed: and therefore none ought to truſt in themſelves, nor truſt themſelves in her company, nor in the leaſt decline to her ways; and eſpecially ſuch as are weak and unſkilful, and ignorant of her devices, as the children here addreſſed. Yea, many ſtrong men have been ſlain by her; men famous for martial exploits, as Samſon and others, have been overcome by her: ſome of great fortitude of mind have not been able to withſtand her, ſhe has prevailed over them; and others of robuſt conſtitutions have been weakened by diſeaſes, contracted through incontinency with her; and ſome have ſuffered death by her means, either from her huſband, or her gallants, or the civil magiſtrate: and of theſe there have been innumerable inſtances; ſo the word[o] for ſtrong men ſometimes ſignifies; and ſo it is here rendered in the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, and innumerable are they whom ſhe has ſlain. All the world have wondered after the whore of Rome; kings of the earth and mighty men have committed fornication with her; high and low, rich and poor, have been ruined by her; thouſands have gone to hell by her means: and ſome of the ſycophants of Rome have even ſaid, that if the pope of Rome ſhould ſend thouſands to hell, of which they ſeem themſelves to be conſcious, no one ſhould ſay to him, What doſt thou?

℣. 27. Her houſe is the way to hell, &c.] Or ways[p]; the broad, highway to it; either to the grave, as ſheol often ſignifies; or to hell itſelf, the place of the damned: to go into her houſe, and commit wickedneſs with her, is to take a ſtep to deſtruction, a large ſtride towards hell; and if grace prevent not, will bring a man thither. Who would go into ſuch a houſe, and much leſs dwell there, which is the very ſuburbs of hell? Going down to the chambers of death; to enter her chamber, to ſtep into her bed, howſoever decked and adorned, entertaining and inviting it is, not only leads to the chambers of the grave, as the Targum; but to the loweſt and innermoſt parts of hell; the apartments of the ſecond death, the lot of all unclean and idolatrous perſons without repentance and faith. The Phœnicians called Pluto, the god of hell, by the name of Moth[q], a word ſimilar to this uſed here; and ſo thoſe chambers are no other than the chambers of hell. Plautus[r] alſo calls the gate of a whore's houſe the gate of hell; which agrees with the firſt clauſe of the verſe.

CHAP. VIII.

THIS chapter contains the inſtructions of wiſdom or Chriſt; ſhewing the excellency of them, and the author of them, in oppoſition to the harlot and her allurements, in the preceding chapter. Chriſt, under the name of wiſdom, is repreſented as an herald, publiſhing the goſpel in the miniſtry of the word, either in perſon or by his ſervants, ℣. 1. The places where this proclamation is made are deſcribed, ℣. 2, 3. the perſons to whom, ℣. 4, 5. The excellency of the things delivered, being right things; truth, agreeable to the word of God, plain and eaſy to be underſtood, and of more worth than gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, ℣. 6—11. And then wiſdom, or Chriſt, is commended and recommended, by his conſummate prudence and knowledge, by his hatred of evil, and by his influence on the political affairs of kings and princes, ℣. 12—16. and the advantages of thoſe that are early ſeekers of him are pointed out; their enjoyment of his favour, of his riches, honour and righteouſneſs; and their being led by him in right paths now, and inheriting eternal glory hereafter, ℣. 17—21. And next follows an account of his exiſtence from eternity as a divine perſon, illuſtrated by a variety of phraſes, ℣. 22—29. and of his being with the Father; of his great affection for him, and complacency in him; and of Chriſt's wonderful delight and pleaſure in the ſons of men, ℣. 30, 31. And the chapter is concluded with an exhortation to them to hearken to his inſtructions; ſetting forth the happineſs of thoſe that wait on him in public ordinances, and find him; and the miſery of thoſe that hate and reject him.

℣. 1. Doth not wiſdom cry? &c.] Chriſt, who is the wiſdom of God; ſee the note on chap. i. 20. and which clearly appears from his ſubſiſtence with the Father, his eternal exiſtence, and from many perſonal properties, characters, and actions aſcribed to him throughout the whole of this chapter, and in the following. Crying is here attributed to him, which ſignifies proclaiming, publiſhing, preaching the everlaſting goſpel, which directs men in the right way of enjoying peace, comfort, honour, and eternal happineſs; the alluſion is to an herald that lifts up his voice aloud at noon-day in the public ſtreets when he proclaims; and is oppoſed to the whiſpers of an harlot, at night, in a corner; truth ſeeks no corner, its voice is heard at noon-day, it will bear the light. Now, does not or ſhall not wiſdom cry, or Chriſt preach? verily he does or will, in his word, by his prophets under the former diſpenſation; in his own perſon, and by his apoſtles and miniſters under the preſent; who then would hearken to the alluring voice of an harlot, or hear Jezebel the wicked propheteſs teach, when Chriſt himſelf preaches, or however by his faithful miniſters? And underſtanding put forth her voice? the ſame with wiſdom, or Chriſt, ſee ℣. 14. by whoſe voice the goſpel is meant, which is the voice of Chriſt, which is heard and followed by the ſheep of Chriſt, and not the voice of a ſtranger; and putting it forth, giving or uttering it, ſignifies the publication of it.

℣. 2. She ſtandeth in the top of high places, &c.] To be both ſeen and heard, for which reaſon Chriſt went up into a mountain and preached, Matt. v. 1. by the way; the road-ſide, to inſtruct and direct paſſengers as they go along, to ſhew them the right way, and caution them againſt taking wrong ways; ſo did Chriſt, Matt. xvi. 6. and xxiii. 16. In the places of the paths; or, between the paths[s]; where more ways than one met together, and ſo difficult to know which was the right path to take; here Chriſt ſtands in the miniſtry of the word to direct, and ſays, this is the way, walk ye in it, Iſa. xxx. 21. and as there are many ways which are propoſed to men to walk in, ſome of open profaneneſs and impiety, and others that have a ſhew of religion and devotion, but both lead men wrong; the miniſters of Chriſt ſhew, and he by them, the way of ſalvation, and how to avoid ſuch as lead to deſtruction, Acts xvi. 17.

℣. 3. She crieth at the gates, &c.] Of the temple, or of the city, where the courts of judicature were, and perſons met on civil accounts; and where people were continually paſſing and repaſſing. At the entry of the city; meeting thoſe that came out of the country to the city upon trade and buſineſs. At the coming-in at the doors; of the temple, or city, or private houſes; all theſe expreſſions denote the publickneſs of the goſpel miniſtry, both by Chriſt himſelf, who ſpake openly to the world, always taught in the ſynagogues and temple, and in ſecret ſaid nothing; and who ordered his diſciples to preach what they heard and received from him upon the houſe-tops, John xviii. 20. Matt. x. 27. ſo did the apoſtle Paul, Acts xx. 20, 27.

℣. 4. Unto you, O men, I call, &c.] Not angels, the fallen angels; for as they had nothing to do with Chriſt, he had nothing to do with them, or ſay unto them, Matt. viii. 29. nor the brutes, irrational creatures; for though the goſpel is to be preached to every creature, yet only to rational ones, Mark xvi. 15. men, whom God has loved and Chriſt has redeemed; theſe are by the goſpel called, and called effectually. There are ſome men indeed who are only externally called; but there are others who are alſo called with an holy calling, of which ſee the note on chap. i. 24. Some think men of eminence are here meant, as rich men, ſo Aben Ezra; or men of wiſdom and knowledge, ſuch as the ſcribes and phariſees, and learned doctors among the Jews; but it rather ſeems to deſign men indefinitely, of whatſoever rank or order, ſtate or condition. And my voice is to the ſons of men; which ſome interpret of the poor, as Aben Ezra; or thoſe who are more illiterate, or the common people; ſo that high and low, rich and poor, have the goſpel preached unto them; but the phraſe ſeems to intend the ſame as before, the ſame thing is ſaid in different words.

℣. 5. O ye ſimple, underſtand wiſdom, &c.] The goſpel, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, particularly the doctrine of ſalvation by Chriſt; it is the higheſt wiſdom to know Chriſt and him crucified: and they are the ſimple who are weak and eaſy to be impoſed upon, who are here called unto; and generally ſpeaking ſuch are they to whom the myſteries of grace are made known, whilſt they are hid from the wiſe and prudent. And ye fools, be of an underſtanding heart; or cauſe the heart to underſtand; or get an underſtanding heart[t]; make uſe of all means to get ſpiritual wiſdom and underſtanding; all men, let them be what they will in other reſpects, are fools as to a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of divine things; and that man can only be ſaid to have truly an underſtanding heart that knows his own folly, the plague of his heart, his need of Chriſt, the worth of him; and has an underſtanding given him to know him and his intereſt in him.

℣. 6. Hear, for I will ſpeak of excellent things, &c.] Such are the things of the goſpel; they not only excel what the light of nature dictates and directs to, but even what the law of Moſes commands and requires; the doctrines of the goſpel are excellent in their author, nature and uſe; particularly thoſe which reſpect the love, grace and mercy of God, the perſon and offices of Chriſt, the efficacy of his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, and the great ſalvation which he has wrought out. Theſe are the doctrines of grace which proceed out of wiſdom's mouth, and are ſuch as never man ſpake the like; they are to be approved of, being what differ from others, and to be preferred unto them, Phil. i. 9. or princely things[u], as the word may be rendered; which became him who is the prince of the kings of the earth, and the prince of peace to ſpeak; and are worthy to be received by princes, though little known and valued by the princes of this world; and are embraced and eſteemed by thoſe who are the princes of the Lord's people: or they are principal ones, or leading truths[w]; of the greateſt importance, intereſting ones; praiſe-worthy, as Aben Ezra, or honourable, as Gerſom, and to be had in the higheſt eſteem and veneration. And the opening of my lips ſhall be right things; agreeable to right reaſon, though above it; conſonant to the righteous law of God, and even to the perfection of God's righteouſneſs, which is greatly glorified by the obedience, ſufferings, and death of Chriſt, and redemption through him; and theſe are the excellent and principal doctrines of the goſpel, even juſtification by Chriſt's righteouſneſs, atonement by his ſacrifice, and redemption through his blood; all which are conſiſtent with, and greatly diſplay the juſtice of God: nor are any of the doctrines of the goſpel licentious ones, but on the contrary teach men to live ſoberly and righteouſly; as well as they are plain and eaſy to ſuch who are converſant with them, as is often expreſſed, and may be the ſenſe of the word here uſed alſo.

℣. 7. For my mouth ſhall ſpeak truth, &c.] And nothing but the truth; and nothing more or leſs can be ſpoken by wiſdom, or Chriſt, who is truth itſelf; nothing elſe can come out of his mouth, or drop from his lips; all the doctrines of Chriſt are agreeable to the ſcriptures of truth, and are what the Spirit of truth leads into; and the whole is called the word of truth; there are many very particular and ſpecial truths, but the principal one is ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt. And wickedneſs is an abomination to my lips; the ſin of lying more eſpecially, as oppoſed to truth; this is deteſtable to wiſdom, what Chriſt never ſuffered his lips to utter; for no lie is of the truth, but of Satan the father of lies; and as it is abhorred by Chriſt, it ought to be by all good men.

℣. 8. All the words of my mouth are in righteouſneſs, &c.] Or with righteouſneſs[x]; are connected with it, are agreeable to it; are righteous ones, conſiſtent with righteouſneſs, with the righteous nature, will and law of God: or are concerning righteouſneſs[y], the neceſſity of righteouſneſs in order to eternal life; the inſufficiency of man's own righteouſneſs to intitle to it; the need, worth and excellency of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt for that purpoſe; and of the propriety and uſefulneſs of a life of righteouſneſs and holineſs which the grace of God inſtructs men in. There is nothing froward or perverſe in them; that is contrary to right reaſon, or to the law of God, or to the ſcriptures of truth, or to the analogy of faith; nor is there any contradiction in the doctrines of the goſpel one to another, but an entire harmony and uniformity in them; they are not yea and nay.

℣. 9. They are all plain to him that underſtandeth, &c.] Whoſe underſtanding is enlightened by the Spirit of God; who is a ſpiritual man, that has a diſcerning, and can judge of ſpiritual things: as for the carnal man, let him have what natural knowledge or wiſdom he will, he cannot know theſe things; for they are ſpiritually diſcerned, and can only be diſcerned by ſpiritual men. The Bible is a ſealed book to others, learned or unlearned; the myſteries or doctrines of the goſpel are hid in parables from ſuch; but thoſe to whom Chriſt has given an underſtanding to know him, theſe know them, and they are plain unto them: for though there are ſome things hard to be underſtood in the ſcriptures, as in Paul's epiſtles, and ſome ſublime truths in the goſpel; yet thoſe which are neceſſary to ſalvation are eaſily underſtood; that faithful ſaying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jeſus Chriſt came into the world to ſave the chief of ſinners, is a very plain one. And right to them that find knowledge; a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of Chriſt and his truths. The Targum is, "to them who deſire knowledge;" and ſo the Syriac verſion; that ſeek for it heartily and diligently, in a right way, in the uſe of proper means, under the direction and by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God.

℣. 10. Receive my inſtruction, and not ſilver, &c.] Not but that ſilver may be deſired, ſought after and received, conſiſtent with the inſtructions of wiſdom; though an anxious, immoderate, ſinful purſuit after it, hinders the reception of them; and when they are in competition, the one is to be preferred to the other: the doctrines of the goſpel are of more worth, and more to be deſired than thouſands of gold and ſilver; and therefore the meaning is, that the inſtruction of wiſdom ſhould be received rather than ſilver; it ſhould have the preference; ſo Gerſom interprets it, and with which agrees the following clauſe: And knowledge rather than choice gold; that is, the knowledge of Chriſt, and the knowledge of God in Chriſt; the knowledge of the goſpel, and the truths of it; a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of theſe things, is of more value than the fineſt gold, than the gold of Ophir; ſee Pſal. xix. 10. and cxix. 72.

℣. 11. For wiſdom is better than rubies, &c.] A ſort of precious ſtones: or, than precious ſtones[z] in general; ſo the Targum, and Septuagint, Arabic and Syriac verſions; even than all of them, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; or, than pearls[a], or carbuncles[b]: there are none equal to it, nor is it to be procured by them; ſee Job xxviii. 16—19. And all the things that may be deſired, are not to be compared to it; ſee the note on chap. iii. 15.

℣. 12. I wiſdom dwell with prudence, &c.] Here wiſdom begins to ſpeak in her own perſon, and continues to do ſo unto the end of the chapter; or Chriſt deſcribes himſelf, pencils out, and draws his own picture, and a moſt lovely one it is. In this clauſe Chriſt is deſcribed by the habitation in which he dwells, I wiſdom inhabit prudence[c]; ſo the words may be rendered; that is the houſe in which I dwell: or by his companion with whom he dwells, with prudence; that is my companion with whom I am familiarly converſant. The phraſe taken both ways, ſhews that Chriſt is very largely, yea fully poſſeſſed of prudence; as a man that dwells in a houſe, is the proprietor and poſſeſſor of it, ſo prudence is Chriſt's; it belongs to him, he enjoys it; he dwells in prudence, and prudence dwells in him; all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge are in him, and the Spirit of wiſdom reſts upon him: and alſo it ſhews that prudence is natural to him, and not adventitious; it does not come from abroad, nor does he go abroad for it; he and prudence are as it were born and brought up together in one and the ſame houſe: and likewiſe, that there is an intimacy and familiarity between them; prudence is moſt preſent with Chriſt, is always near him, and ready at hand to be exerciſed by him; as it was when he was incarnate on earth; he dealt prudently, as it was propheſied he ſhould, Iſa. lii. 13. which appeared in his diſputation with the doctors in the temple at twelve years of age; by his prudent anſwers to the enſnaring queſtions of his enemies; and throughout the whole of his miniſtry, both as to the manner and matter of it; and particularly at the time of his ſeizure, arraignment, trial, and crucifixion. Or by prudence, may be meant prudent men, ſuch as are poſſeſſed of this quality or virtue, and with ſuch wiſdom or Chriſt dwells; not with the wiſe and prudent of this world; nor with ſuch who are ſo in their own conceit; but with ſuch who are ſenſible of their folly; who are humbled under a ſenſe of ſin, and are made wiſe unto ſalvation; who believe in Chriſt, which is a point of the higheſt prudence; and who walk circumſpectly, not as fools, but as wiſe; ſuch as theſe have the preſence and company of Chriſt. And find out knowledge of witty inventions; the word מזמות is ſometimes uſed in an ill ſenſe, and is rendered wicked devices, chap. xii. 2. Pſal. xxxvii. 7. and may be taken in this ſenſe here. Chriſt, who is God omniſcient, knows all that is in the hearts of men; all their thoughts, ſchemes and devices; he found out, he ſcented the knowledge of them when here on earth; he was privy to the ſecret thoughts and wickedneſs of mens hearts; he knew all the hypocritical deſigns and views of the Phariſees, when they tempted him with enſnaring queſtions; he was appriſed of all the ways and methods they deviſed to take away his life before the time, and ſo eſcaped them; he found out the knowledge of Judas's wicked ſcheme to betray him, and ſpoke of it to him and others before it was executed; and he knew all the wicked devices and ſtratagems of Satan againſt himſelf, in tempting him in the wilderneſs, and in putting it into the heart of Judas to betray him; and he knows all his wiles and artful ſchemes to decoy his people, and makes them known unto them, ſo that they are not ignorant of his devices. Moreover, it may be underſtood and interpreted, in a good ſenſe, of the thoughts, devices, and purpoſes of God's heart, as in Jer. xxiii. 20. and li. 11. and particularly as relating to man's redemption and ſalvation: this is a device or invention of God; ſin is man's invention, by which he fell; but the recovery of man is the invention of God; he found out the perſons to be ſaved in his eternal decrees; and the perſon that ſhould be the Saviour of them, in his council and covenant, and appointed him for the work; and he found out the way and manner of ſaving men by him, even by the ranſom and ſacrifice of himſelf: and this is a witty invention, wherein God has abounded in all wiſdom and prudence; as appears by pitching upon ſo proper a perſon to be the Saviour as his own Son; by bringing it about in a way ſo agreeable to all his perfections, to the ſatisfaction of his juſtice, and the honour of his law; and in making ſuch partakers of it, and in ſuch a way, as moſt glorifies the riches of his grace. And this ſcheme Chriſt has full knowledge of, being in the boſom of his Father, as one brought up with him; and was the Angel of the great council, and preſent when the deſign was formed; and beſides, he has found it to his coſt, even at the expence of his precious blood; and ſo has obtained, or found redemption for us, as the phraſe is in Heb. ix. 12. and having found it, and the knowledge of it, he makes it known to others by his Spirit, word and miniſters. Likewiſe theſe witty inventions may be interpreted of the whole goſpel, and the doctrines of it; the goſpel is an invention, not of men, but of God; not a ſcheme and device of men, but of God; it is not taught by men, and learned of them, or of them only, but of God; and a witty one it is, it is the wiſdom of God, the manifold wiſdom of God, though eſteemed fooliſhneſs by men. This Chriſt has found out the knowledge of; he has full and perfect knowledge of it, it is hid in him; it came and was preached by him, as it never was before or ſince; and he communicated, and ſtill does communicate the knowledge of it; and bleſſed are they that know the joyful ſound!

℣. 13. The fear of the Lord is to hate evil, &c.] All evil in general; evil thoughts, evil words, evil actions, evil company, evil worſhip, and evil doctrines; and by the fear of the Lord, which ſhews itſelf in an hatred of evil, becauſe of the loathſome nature of it, and being contrary to God and his will, and as it appears in the glaſs of the law, and eſpecially in the glaſs of pardoning love, is meant; not the fear of his judgments and wrath, or a diſtruſt of his grace and goodneſs, much leſs an hypocritical fear, or a mere ſhew of devotion; but a reverential affection for him, which is peculiar to children; a filial, godly fear, which is conſiſtent with ſtrong faith, great joy, and true courage; and is oppoſite to pride and ſelf-confidence, and is accompanied with real holineſs; it takes its riſe from the grace of God, and is greatly increaſed and promoted by the diſcoveries of his love and goodneſs: this is brought into the account and deſcription of wiſdom, to diſtinguiſh it from carnal wiſdom; to commend wiſdom from its holineſs; for this is the beginning of wiſdom, yea wiſdom itſelf, Job xxviii. 28. Pſal. cxi. 10. chap. i. 7. and ix. 10. Pride and arrogancy, and the evil way, and the froward mouth do I hate; theſe are the particulars of evil, which wiſdom or Chriſt declares his hatred of. Pride, which appears in men in thinking too highly of themſelves, in ſpeaking too well of themſelves, in deſpiſing others, in ſetting up and truſting to their own righteouſneſs for ſalvation, and in crying up the purity and power of human nature; this is very contrary to the ſpirit of the meek and lowly Jeſus, and muſt be hateful to him: arrogancy differs little from pride, and the two words in the Hebrew are very much the ſame, very little differ; it is an aſcribing that to a man's ſelf which does not belong to him, whether in things natural, civil or ſpiritual; when men attribute their juſtification and ſalvation to their own works, it is arrogancy, and muſt be hateful to Chriſt; who has been at ſo much pains and expence to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs, and work out ſalvation for men: it is the height of arrogancy in a man to conceit he has a power to regenerate, renew and convert himſelf, and, with the haughty Arminian, Grevinchovius, to ſay, he has made himſelf to differ from others; this muſt be hateful to Chriſt, by whoſe Spirit and grace this only is done: and it is a piece of arrogancy when men aſcribe all the good works done by them to their own power, when without Chriſt they can do nothing; which therefore fore muſt be diſpleaſing to him. The evil way, as Aben Ezra obſerves, is an evil cuſtom and courſe of ſinning; a man's own way, which he chooſes and delights in, and which leads to deſtruction: and the froward mouth, is the mouth that ſpeaks perverſe things; things contrary to a man's own heart, contrary to truth, to the rule of the divine word, to the goſpel, to Chriſt and his people, and to all men; which muſt be hateful and abominable to him who is truth itſelf.

ỳ. 14. Counſel is mine, and ſound wiſdom, &c.] The words and ſentiments in this and the following clauſe, are the ſame with thoſe in Job xii. 13. and ſeem to be taken from thence, which are ſpoken of God; and being here applied to wiſdom, ſhew that a divine perſon is meant; and are very applicable to him who is the wiſdom of God, and the power of God; and on whom reſts the Spirit of wiſdom and underſtanding, of counſel, and of might, and of the fear of the Lord, 1 Cor. i. 24. Iſa. xi. 2. Counſel belongs to him, and is uſed and exerciſed by him, as concerned with the Father and Spirit, both in the works of nature and grace; to whom all the purpoſes and counſels of God are known; and who was conſulted in the creation of man, and in his redemption, reconciliation and ſalvation; the council of peace being between them both: and it belongs to him, and is uſed by him with reſpect to his people; he is council to them; he gives them counſel and advice, he being the wonderful Counſellor; he gave it in perſon when here on earth, both to ſinners and to ſaints, and which continues on record: the goſpel is the counſel of Chriſt, and it is very ſuitable and ſeaſonable, hearty, ſincere and faithful; is freely given, and being taken, infallibly ſucceeds; ſee Rev. iii. 18. And he is council for them; he appears for them in court; introduces their perſons, and preſents their petitions to his Father; pleads their cauſe, is their advocate, anſwers to all charges and accuſations; and calls for and requires, in point of law and juſtice, every bleſſing of goodneſs for them. Sound wiſdom belongs to Chriſt; wiſdom, from whence he has his name in this book; ſound wiſdom, ſuch as is ſolid and ſubſtantial, real and true, in oppoſition to the wiſdom of the world, to knowledge falſely ſo called, to carnal, ſenſual and earthly wiſdom. The goſpel may be meant, which is the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; ſound doctrine, a form of ſound words, the wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus: both grace and glory may be intended, which are both in the gift of Chriſt; grace is that wiſdom which he makes his people to know in the hidden part; and glory is that ſound wiſdom laid up for the righteous, the better and more enduring ſubſtance in heaven. The word here uſed ſignifies eſſence or ſubſtance; and ſome render it, whatſoever is[d]; whatever has a being that is Chriſt's; all creatures are his, the earth and the fulneſs of it, and they that dwell therein. I am underſtanding; eſſentially as a divine perſon; his underſtanding is infinite; there is no ſearching of it; it reaches to all perſons and things: as Mediator, the Spirit of wiſdom and underſtanding reſts on him without meaſure, by which he was furniſhed for his prophetic office; as man, his underſtanding was amazing to all that knew him, and heard him. Chriſt not only has an underſtanding, but he is underſtanding itſelf; he is the fountain, author and giver of underſtanding; of all the natural underſtanding there is in men; of the light of nature and reaſon, of thoſe intellectual faculties which men are poſſeſſed of; and of all the ſpiritual underſtanding in divine things, which his people are partakers of, 1 John v. 20. I have ſtrength; as the mighty God; which appears in his creation of all things out of nothing, in his upholding all things by his power, and in his government of the world. As Mediator, he has the Spirit of might upon him; all power in heaven and earth is given him; his ſtrength is manifeſt in the ſalvation of his people, when he came travelling in the greatneſs of it to ſave them; by fulfilling the law for them; by bearing their ſins, and the puniſhment due to them; and by deſtroying all their enemies; and in his plucking them out of the hands of Satan, out of the burning, out of the mire and clay at converſion; in bearing and ſupporting them under all their burdens, afflictions and temptations, and in preſerving them ſafe to his kingdom and glory; and in giving them ſtrength in the mean time to bear the croſs, to withſtand temptations and corruptions, to exerciſe the graces of the Spirit, and perform the duties of religion.

ỳ. 15. By me kings reign, &c.] Chriſt is the Prince of the kings of the earth, the King of kings and Lord of lords; they are made kings by him, and are under him; he ſets them up, and depoſes them at pleaſure; they have their kingdoms, crowns and ſceptres from him, and are accountable to him. The Syriac verſion renders it, for me; it is for the ſake of Chriſt they reign; and they ought to ſeek his glory, and the good of his kingdom and intereſt. Moreover, as it is by him they are ſet up as kings and governors, and are preſerved and continued in their governments by him; ſo it is by him that they rule well who do ſo, that they reign juſtly, wiſely, happily and ſucceſsfully; all the wiſdom which appears in their adminiſtrations, is all from him; all thoſe wiſe laws, which are enacted by them for the good of their ſubjects, is owing to the wiſdom and prudence he gives them. And princes decree juſtice; theſe may deſign ſuch who are under kings, are aſſiſting to them in government; who are of their privy-council, and give advice in making laws, and putting them into execution. Here it particularly regards their making juſt and righteous laws for the good of the ſtate, in which they are employed by kings; or their adviſing to them, and aſſiſting in drawing them up: and now all the wiſdom that is neceſſary hereunto, and which is conſpicuous herein, is all from Chriſt; who has the ſpirit of princes in his hands, and orders and directs them as he pleaſes. The Targum is, "I anoint princes with "juſtice."

ỳ. 16. By me princes rule, &c.] All governors of provinces and cities, who are under the king as ſupreme; the diſcharge of whoſe office in a right manner requires much wiſdom, prudence, juſtice, and integrity; all which they have from Chriſt, as well as their power of ruling, that rule well. And nobles, even all the judges of the earth; the word[e] for nobles, ſignifies perſons of a free ſpirit, generous, bountiful men; ſuch as are called benefactors, Luke xxii. 25. ſo one of the Ptolemy's, king of Egypt, was called Evergetes. Such who govern, not in a cruel and rigorous manner, but with clemency and gentleneſs; who, as they are free and noble themſelves, their ſubjects are a free people, and enjoy their privileges and liberties fully and quietly. And the judges of the earth; are ſuch as ſit on benches of juſtice, hear and try cauſes, and paſs ſentence on men; which requires great ſkill and knowledge, and much faithfulneſs and integrity, which all that perform their office aright have from Chriſt. How great therefore muſt he be! how wiſe and juſt! from whom all rulers, ſupreme and ſubordinate, have their power, prudence, generoſity and juſtice!

℣. 17. I love them that love me, &c.] Thoſe that love Chriſt are ſuch who are born again, and have a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of him; that believe in him, have ſeen his lovelineſs, have had his love ſhed abroad in their hearts, and a view of his fulneſs and ſuitableneſs; ſome comfortable apprehenſions of their relation to him, and intereſt in him, and are indulged with communion with him: the love with which ſuch ſouls love Chriſt, ſprings from their very hearts, is cordial and ſincere; it gives him the preference to all objects, to all creatures, angels or men, and to all creature-enjoyments; it is drawn out to all of Chriſt, and to all that belong to him, or are his; and though it may be ~~loſt,~~ become remiſs and abate in its fervency, it cannot be loſt; and is what is very acceptable to Chriſt, and highly eſteemed of by him: it ſhews itſelf by a high veneration for the truths and doctrines of his goſpel; by a ſtrict regard to his commands and ordinances; by an hearty affection for his people; by parting with and bearing all for his ſake; by a carefulneſs of offending him, and loſing his company; by an earneſt deſire after his preſence, and delight in it, and by a concern at his abſence; by a diligent inquiry after him in the uſe of means until he is found, and by the joy expreſſed at finding of him: now ſuch Chriſt loves; not that he begins to love his people when they begin to love him, for he loved them from everlaſting; as appears by his eſpouſing their perſons, undertaking their cauſe, and taking the care and charge of their perſons, grace and glory, ſo early; and by his aſſumption of their nature in time, and by his ſuffering and dying for them; all which were before they had any love to him: but this points out and deſcribes the perſons, who may be aſſured of the love of Chriſt to them, ſince their love to him ſprings from his to them; beſides, it deſigns ſome freſh manifeſtations of his love, and the continuance of it; as well as ſuggeſts that he has future bleſſings to beſtow on ſuch, as freſh marks of his affection, and inſtances of his love to them; ſuch as granting them his gracious preſence, giving them more grace; cauſing all things, even afflictions, to work together for their good; preſerving and keeping them from falling, and at laſt giving them eternal glory and happineſs; ſee John xiv. 21—23. And thoſe that ſeek me early ſhall find me; and they are ſuch who ſee their need of Chriſt, and know the worth of him; and thoſe ſeek to him in the uſe of means, the word and ordinances, and as aſſiſted by his Spirit and grace, for pardon, righteouſneſs, life and ſalvation, which are only to be had in him: and they may be ſaid to ſeek him early, or morning him[f], who ſeek him in the morning of youth, or in the firſt place, above all things elſe, and that with the greateſt eagerneſs and earneſtneſs, diligence and importunity; and ſuch always are ſucceſsful; they find Chriſt and life, righteouſneſs and ſalvation in him, and every bleſſing, and therefore are happy, as in chap. iii. 13. ſee the note there.

℣. 18. Riches and honour are with me, &c.] By riches are meant not the riches of Chriſt's perſon, the perfections of his nature, his works, and his vaſt empire over all creatures, and the revenues ariſing from thence, which though durable, yet not communicable; nor temporal riches, which though with him, and at his diſpoſe, yet theſe, at leaſt a large ſhare of them, and in common is not given to his people, nor are they durable; but the riches of grace, redeeming, juſtifying, pardoning and ſanctifying grace are intended, and the riches of glory in another world: and ſo honour deſigns not that which he has as a divine perſon, or as mediator, which is incommunicable; much leſs temporal honour, for though this is with him and from him, as appears ℣. 15, 16. yet is not uſually given to his followers, who are not the great and noble, but generally reckoned the offſcouring of all things; nor is ſuch honour durable; but the honour he gives his people lies in their being eſpouſed to him, in being the ſons of God through him, in being made by him kings and prieſts unto God, and in reigning with him here and for ever. Yea, durable riches and righteouſneſs; which laſt ſome underſtand as another adjunct and epithet of riches, and repreſent them in oppoſition to mammon of unrighteouſneſs, or to riches, either ill-gotten or ill-managed; and expreſſes another property of Chriſt's riches of grace and glory, as being what are come by in a way of righteouſneſs into his hands, and are diſtributed faithfully by him; though rather it reſpects a diſtinct thing which is with Chriſt, and in his hands to give, even his juſtifying righteouſneſs, conſiſting of his active and paſſive obedience, which he has wrought out, is in him, and given by him to his people; and is what is called the righteouſneſs of God and of faith; which ſecures from condemnation and entitles to eternal life; and is an everlaſting one, as durable as his riches are, which are his fulneſs that ever continues with him: pardon is ſimul and ſemel, and for ever; ſanctifying grace, as faith, hope, and love, always abide; and about the riches of glory there can be no doubt of the permanency of them; and the ſame may be ſaid of honour both here and hereafter.

℣. 19. My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold, &c.] This is ſaid in alluſion to the fruit that grows on trees, wiſdom, or Chriſt, being a tree of life, chap. iii. 18. ſee the note there; and ſo he is compared to other trees, Cant. ii. 3. Hoſea xiv. 8. His fruit are the bleſſings of grace, ſuch as redemption, reconciliation, pardon, juſtification, adoption, and eternal life; theſe are his by covenant, are procured by him, and are communicated from him; alſo the graces of his Spirit called fruits, as faith, hope, love, &c. of which he is the author and object; and even good works, the fruits of his grace; they are done in virtue of union to him, by his ſtrength, and are directed to his glory: and all theſe, eſpecially his grace and the bleſſings of it, are preferable to the fineſt gold; they are more valuable as to their intrinſic worth and excellency; they are more uſeful and profitable, being for the good and welfare of immortal ſouls; and they are more ſatisfying and more laſting, and which cannot be obtained with ſuch a corruptible thing as gold is. And my revenue than choice ſilver; as the former word refers to fruits that grow on trees, this to ſuch as ſpring from ſeed ſown in the earth; ſee Lev. xxiii. 39. where the ſame word is uſed as here, and is alſo rendered revenue in Jer. xii. 13. Chriſt himſelf is compared to ſeed, and ſo his word, John xii. 24. Luke viii. 11. and the fruit or revenue thereof is the ſame as before: or elſe the alluſion is to the profit ariſing from riches, from eſtates, and their annual rent; or from money put out to uſe, or improved by commerce, and ſo ſignifies the ſame with the gain and merchandize of wiſdom, chap. iii. 14. ſee the note there. Aben Ezra conſtrues the words thus, my revenue is choicer than ſilver; but our verſion is beſt.

℣. 20. I lead in the way of righteouſneſs, &c.] As a king his ſubjects, a ſhepherd his flock; as a guide to perſons that are ignorant and out of the way; as parents their children, teaching them to go; or as a maſter his ſcholars: and the way wiſdom, or Chriſt, leads his people in, is the way of righteouſneſs; the doctrine of righteouſneſs, or the way and manner of a ſinner's juſtification in the ſight of God; all men are out of the way of it, and are ignorant of the right way; Chriſt leads them into it: he leads them off of their own righteouſneſs by ſhewing that it does not deſerve the name of one; that it is unacceptable to God, unprofitable to him, and inſufficient to juſtify them before him; and he leads them to his own righteouſneſs, which he has wrought out; and ſhews them that this is anſwerable to the demands of law and juſtice, is acceptable to God, and imputed by him without works; and this he does in his word and by his Spirit: and in this way of righteouſneſs he leads them into his father's preſence with acceptance; to himſelf, in which he beholds them with pleaſure; and to eternal glory, which gives them a title to it: he alſo leads into the practice of righteouſneſs; he teaches them, and they learn of him works of righteouſneſs; he goes before them by way of example, and he gives them his Spirit and grace to enable them to perform them; and which may more eſpecially be intended in the next clauſe. In the midſt of the paths of judgement; of truth and holineſs; in his commandments and ordinances; in all which they are led, not againſt their wills but with them; and not only walk but run with the greateſt chearfulneſs in thoſe ways and paths of his.

℣. 21. That I may cauſe thoſe that love me to inherit ſubſtance, &c.] Subſtantial bleſſings, bleſſings indeed, as all ſpiritual ones are; and ſubſtantial grace, as every grace is; and ſubſtantial communion with God and Chriſt, which is a real thing and had in the way of righteouſneſs; alſo ſubſtantial happineſs hereafter, as eternal life is; which being expreſſed by ſubſtance, or that which is[g], as the word uſed ſignifies, denotes the reality of it; it being not only actually promiſed, prepared, and laid up for the ſaints, but is what is known by them now, and of which they have the earneſt and pledge; as alſo the ſolidity of it, being oppoſed to the vain and ſhadowy things of this life; as well as the riches, valuableneſs, and continuance of it; it is enduring ſubſtance, which cannot be waſted nor taken away; which is in its own nature incorruptible, and the ſaints will always continue to enjoy it. God himſelf may be meant, who is moſt eminently יש that which is, a ſelf-exiſtent Being, and the Being of beings, eſſence itſelf, and of whom the ſaints are heirs, and who will be their portion now and for ever, Rom. viii. 17. Pſal. lxxiii. 26. and ſuch that ſhall enjoy this inheritance are thoſe that love Chriſt; to them it is promiſed, for them it is prepared, and to them it will be given, James i. 12. 1 Cor. ii. 9. 2 Tim. iv. 8. not that their love to Chriſt is the meritorious cauſe of ſo valuable a bleſſing; but this deſcribes the perſons that ſhall have it, and points out a proper diſpoſition for it, without which none would be fit to enjoy it; and beſides there is a connection between grace and glory; to which may be added, that this ſhews that Chriſt does not love in word only, ſaying, I love them that love me, ℣. 17. but in deed alſo; and how much he eſteems the love of his people; and it is deſigned to encourage the faith and hope of weak believers, who though they do not ſo ſtrongly believe in Chriſt, yet truly love him. And be it further obſerved that this ſubſtance is enjoyed by way of inheritance; it is not purchaſed, nor acquired, but bequeathed and given to the children of God by their heavenly Father, and comes to them through the death of Chriſt the teſtator, and is for ever, as inheritances are; and ſo Aben Ezra obſerves, that it ſignifies an eternal poſſeſſion. And I will fill their treaſures; the treaſures of their hearts, Matt. xii. 35. Chriſt now fills their underſtandings with ſpiritual knowledge, their ſouls with grace, their minds with peace and joy, and their hearts with food and gladneſs; and hereafter he will fill them to full ſatisfaction with knowledge, holineſs and joy, and will be all in all to them.

℣. 22. The Lord poſſeſſed me in the beginning of his way, &c.] Not created me, as the Targum and the Septuagint verſion; which verſion Arius following gave birth to his pernicious doctrine; who from hence concluded Chriſt is a creature, and was the firſt creature that God made, not of the ſame but of a like nature with himſelf, in ſome moment or period of eternity; and by whom he made all others: the Word, or wiſdom of God is never ſaid to be created; and if as ſuch he was created, God muſt have been without his wiſdom before he was created; beſides Chriſt, as the word and wiſdom of God, is the Creator of all things, and not created, John i. 1—3. but this poſſeſſion is not in right of creation, as the word is ſometimes uſed, Gen. xiv. 19, 22. but in right of paternity; ſee Gen. iv. 1. Deut. xxxii. 6. it might be more truly rendered, the Lord begat me, as the word is tranſlated by the Septuagint in Zech. xiii. 5. it denotes the Lord's having, poſſeſſing, and enjoying his word and wiſdom as his own proper Son; which poſſeſſion of him is expreſſed by his being with him and in him, and in his boſom, and as one brought forth and brought up by him; as he was in the beginning of his way of creation, when he went forth in his wiſdom and power and created all things; then he did poſſeſs his Son, and made uſe of him, for by him he made the worlds: and in the beginning of his way of grace, which was before his way of creation; he began with him when he firſt went out in acts of grace towards his people; his firſt thoughts, purpoſes, and decrees concerning their happineſs were in him; the choice of their perſons was made in him; God was in him contriving the ſcheme of their peace, reconciliation, and ſalvation; the covenant of grace was made with him, and all fulneſs of grace was treaſured up in him: the words may be rendered, the Lord poſſeſſed me, the beginning of his way[h]; that is, who am the beginning, as he is; the beginning of the creation of God, the firſt cauſe, the efficient of it, both old and new; ſee Col. i. 18. Rev. iii. 14. So Aben Ezra, who compares with this Job xl. 19. This ſhews the real and actual exiſtence of Chriſt from eternity, his relation to Jehovah his Father, his nearneſs to him, equality with him, and diſtinction from him: it is added for farther illuſtration and confirmation-ſake, Before his works of old; the creation of the heavens and the earth; a detail of which there is in the following verſes.

℣. 23. I was ſet up from everlaſting, &c.] I, a perſon, and not a quality; a perſon, and not a nature; the perſon of Chriſt as the Son of God, and not the human nature of Chriſt, which then did not exiſt; this phraſe deſigns the ordination and conſtitution of Chriſt in his office as Mediator. So the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, I was ordained; Chriſt was fore-ordained to be the Redeemer and Saviour of men, to be the propitiation for their ſins, to be the head of the church, and the judge of the world. It intends likewiſe his inauguration into his office, and his inveſtiture with it; and becauſe anointing with oil was uſed in inſtalling perſons into the offices of prophet, prieſt, and king; hence Chriſt's inſtallment into his office as Mediator is here expreſſed by an anointing; for the words may be rendered, I was anointed[i]; it takes in all that goes to his conſtitution as Mediator, his call, appointment, and inveſtiture; and the whole of his office, every part and branch of it; and chiefly his kingly office, with reference to which the ſame word is uſed Pſal. ii. 6. and ſo Gerſom paraphraſes it, "and there were given to me power, "dominion, and greatneſs;" all which ſuppoſe the eternity of his perſon; for had he not exiſted from everlaſting, he could not have been ſet up, and anointed as Mediator, or inveſted with his office as ſuch. From the beginning, or ever the earth was; or from the firſt of the earth, or the original of it; that is, before all time, before the earth or any thing was created; this farther confirms the eternal exiſtence of Chriſt's perſon, the antiquity of his office, the early proviſion of grace in him as mediator for his people, and may lead to entertain high and honourable thoughts of him.

℣. 24. When there were no depths, I was brought forth, &c.] Not only in the decree of God, as the head of the elect; foreordained to be the Redeemer of them, and to be the propitiation for their ſins; and appointed the judge of the world, and heir of all things; but was begotten, as the Targum and Syriac verſion; the Septuagint is, he begot me; and ſo it is to be underſtood of the eternal generation and ſonſhip of Chriſt; for the word חוללתי is uſed of generation, Job xv. 7. Pſal. li. 5. Chriſt is the firſt-born of every creature, begotten, born and brought forth before any creature was in being; ſee Pſal. ii. 7. before the depths of the great ſea were formed, for they were made by him, Pſalm xcv. 1, 5. when there were no depths, but the infinite being and perfections of God, and the thoughts and purpoſes of his heart, which are his deep things, Job xi. 7, 8. Pſal. xcii. 5. 1 Cor. ii. 10. When there were no fountains abounding with water; or heavy, or honoured[k] with it; when the fountains of the great deep were not; and when there were no other fountains which form rivers, and water the earth; when there were none but God the fountain of living waters; then was Chriſt as the only begotten Son of God; and who was alſo ſet up as the fountain of all grace, life, and ſalvation for his people.

℣. 25. Before the mountains were ſettled, &c.] Plunged[l], or fixed in the earth; and which was done by the great ſtrength of the Lord, upon their proper baſes, Pſal. lxv. 6. and which were ab origine, or from the beginning of the world, and therefore called the ancient mountains, Deut. xxxiii. 15. to be before the mountains is a periphraſis of eternity, and is a phraſe expreſſive of God's eternity; and being here uſed of the Son's, ſhews his eternity is the ſame with his Father's, Pſal. xc. 2. Before the hills was I brought forth; which is repeated partly to ſhew the importance of it; this being a matter of infinite moment and concern, and deſerving of the ſtricteſt attention and obſervation; and partly to ſhew the certainty of it; the eternal generation of Chriſt being an article of faith moſt ſurely to be believed.

℣. 26. While as yet he had not made the earth, &c.] That is, the Lord, who poſſeſſed wiſdom, or Chriſt, and by whom he was ſet up; he as yet had not made the earth, when this was done; this ſhews that the earth had a beginning, contrary to thoſe philoſophers who aſſerted the eternity of it; that Chriſt was before that was, for it was made by him; and conſequently he muſt be eternal, and was before any man was, ſince the earth was made before man; and that he was not of the earth, earthy, as was the firſt man. Nor the fields; the plain parts of the earth, in oppoſition to the mountains and hills before mentioned; the vallies and meads that lay between them, full of graſs, flowers and fruits; pleaſant to behold, and profitable to be enjoyed; ſo the word is alſo rendered Job v. 10. and vallies, by the Targum here: or the out-parts[m]; the extremities of the earth, the two poles of it; the uninhabitable parts of the earth, as diſtinct from the habitable part of it afterwards mentioned: or all without it; the ambient and ſpacious æther. Nor the higheſt part of the duſt of the world; meaning, not the mountains and hills, which are before mentioned, and are the higheſt part of the earth; but rather, the chief of the duſt of the earth[n], as the words may be rendered; theſe are the metals and minerals within it; the gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, of which we read very early, Gen. ii. 12. or the beginning, the firſt and chief, the prima materia, even the duſts of the world, out of which man and all the creatures were made, Gen. ii. 6. and iii. 19. Job iv. 19. Eccl. iii. 20. and xii. 7. Dr Liſter[o] was of opinion, that ſand was once the moſt exterior and general cover of the ſurface of the whole earth; partly becauſe all our northern mountains are covered with it, more or leſs, at this day; and partly becauſe of its great hardneſs, durableneſs, and unalterable quality; and the higher the mountains be, he ſays, ſtill the more and coarſer the ſand is; and if ſo, this might with propriety be called the higheſt part of the duſt of the earth. But Chriſt was before any of them, as well as is more excellent than they. Or it may be, man is deſigned, who was made of the duſt of the earth; even the firſt man Adam, ſo Jarchi, Gen. ii. 7. before whom Chriſt was: yea, the human nature of Chriſt himſelf may be meant, which is fairer than any of the children of men, and the chief of all the individuals of human nature; being without ſin, and united to the Son of God, and alſo the curious workmanſhip of the Spirit of God. Now Chriſt, as the Son of God, as the only begotten of the Father, exiſted before his human nature did, or before he was the Son of man.

℣. 27. When he prepared the heavens, I was there, &c.] Made, beautified, and adorned them; when he gave them their form, figure, magnitude and motion; when he garniſhed them with the ſun, moon and ſtars; then was Chriſt preſent, not as a mere ſpectator, but as a co-worker; ſee Heb. i. 10. and even the third heaven, the place and ſtate of glorified ſaints, prepared for them from the foundation of the world, Matt. xxv. 34. When he ſet a compaſs upon the face of the depth; or compaſſed the waters with bounds, as Job ſays, chap. xxvi. 10. or made the earth with the ſea globular, which make one terraqueous globe: or made a circle [p]; all around it, called the circle of the earth, on which he ſits, Iſa. xl. 22. this compaſs may deſign the vaſt expanſe or firmament of heaven, which is ſtretched and drawn around the terraqueous globe as a canopy or curtain. Chriſt was with his Father on the firſt day's creation of the heavens; and on the ſecond day, when the firmament was made, and was before them both.

℣. 28. When he eſtabliſhed the clouds above, &c.] In which the waters are bound, and yet are not rent under them; and where in the thin air, they hang heavy with them; where they are weighed by meaſure, and a decree made for them when they ſhall fall; and when they do, the Lord makes ſmall the drops of water, which the clouds do drop and diſtil on men abundantly; the ſpreadings of which are beyond underſtanding, and are unaccountable, and muſt be referred to the power of God; who has ſettled and eſtabliſhed them in the heavens, and the laws of them, Job xxvi. 8. and xxviii. 25, 26. and xxxviii. 28, 29. When he ſtrengthened the fountains of the deep; gave them ſtrength, and ſtill continues it, to caſt out their waters, which run into the main ſea, and feed and fill it, and return to their place again; which ſtrength of flowing and reflowing can be attributed to nothing elſe but to the great power of God, Gen. vii. 11. Eccl. i. 7.

℣. 29. When he gave to the ſea his decree, that the waters ſhould not paſs his commandment, &c.] A perpetual decree, which never has been altered nor never will: he has placed the ſand for the bounds of the ſea every where, which it cannot paſs, though its waves toſs, foam and roar; this is his decreed place with which he has ſhut it up, as with doors, bars and bolts; ſo that thoſe proud waves may come hitherto and no farther, Jer. v. 22. Job xxxviii. 10, 11. When he appointed the foundations of the earth; which are laid on the ſeas and floods; nay, the earth is hung like a ball in the air upon nothing; and yet its foundations are ſuch as that it ſhall not be removed; being the purpoſe and decree, the power and might of the Lord himſelf, Job xxvi. 7. Pſal. xxiv. 2. and civ. 5. Now Chriſt was preſent when thoſe were laid, for he was concerned in the laying of them himſelf, Heb. i. 10. The Lord aſks Job, where he was then? Job xxxviii. 4. he was not then in being, but Chriſt was.

℣. 30. Then I was by him, as one brought up with him, &c.] He was then and from all eternity, by him, or with him [q]; which denotes his co-exiſtence with God, and his relation to him as his Father; his nearneſs to him, his equality with him, and his diſtinction from him: he was by him when the names of God's elect were put down in the book of life; he was by him and with him in the council and covenant of grace and peace; and ſo in the creation of all things, and has been ever ſince; not as a looker on, but as a party concerned; and not as ſubordinate and inferior to his Father, but equal with him. The word אמון tranſlated brought up, is differently rendered; Symmachus and Theodotion render it ſtrengthened; as Chriſt was ſet up in his mediatorial office, he was ſtrengthened in it by his Father; and was in his view, council and covenant, the man of his right hand, made ſtrong for himſelf: the Targum renders it faithful, ſo the Tigurine verſion; as Chriſt was to him that appointed him, faithful to all he promiſed and was intruſted with. Many tranſlate it, an artificer or workman [r], as אמן in Cant. vii. 1. and ſo Chriſt was a co-worker, a worker with God in the making of all things, the heavens, earth and ſea, and all in them; not as an inſtrument, but as a co-efficient cauſe of them; which is a proof of his proper deity, and equality with God. But others think the word has the ſenſe of nurſing, or being nurſed, educated, or brought up. Some [s] take it actively, as in Ruth iv. 16. Eſther ii. 7. Iſa. xlix. 23. and interpret it of Chriſt's nurſing the creation, or cheriſhing, ſupporting and preſerving all creatures in their being when made; particularly of his nouriſhing and cheriſhing the church and people of God committed to his care. Others [t] paſſively, of his being brought up, as our verſion; and ſo the Latin interpreter of the Targum renders it, nurſed up at his ſide; which expreſſes the tender regard of his Father to him, as his begotten Son; in whoſe boſom he lay and was bore, as a nurſing father bears his ſon in his boſom, Numb. xi. 12. and by whom, as Mediator, he was trained up in the performance of his office. And I was daily his delight; or delights [u]; exceeding delightful to him. The Father loved the Son from all eternity, with a love of complacency and delight, John xvii. 24. Matt. iii. 17. this delight was founded in relation to him, in Sonſhip; and in likeneſs, he being the expreſs image of his perſon; in ſameneſs of nature, he being of the ſame nature and perfections with his Father: and he delighted in him as a workman, in the works which he did, being the ſame he ſaw him do; and in him as Mediator, in his conſtitution as ſuch, and in engaging as a ſurety, to obey and ſuffer in the ſtead of his people, Iſa. xlii. 1. he not only delighted in him day by day, throughout the ſix days of the creation, when he was by him as a workman, but before, and even from the days of eternity; from the date of his commencement as Mediator; in the foreviews of his human nature, obeying and ſuffering in it; and of the ſalvation of the elect by him, and of his own glory in it. Rejoicing always before him; being always in his preſence, and acceptable to him; rejoicing in having the ſame nature and perfections with him, and in the relation he ſtood in to him; and alſo in the view of the works of creation and redemption he would be jointly concerned in with him; which joy always did and ever will continue. There is a mutual pleaſure and delight which the Father and Son have in each other, and in all that they are concerned; and eſpecially in what reſpects the ſalvation of the choſen people. The alluſion in the word uſed in this clauſe, is to childrens playing in the preſence of their parents; which is a diverſion to the one, and a pleaſure to the other.

℣. 31. Rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth, &c.] In that part of the earth which is habitable; in filling it with inhabitants; in preſerving and ſuſtaining it in being, and the inhabitants of it; in governing it, and ordering all things in it for the beſt, according to his infinite wiſdom and the counſel of his will; in beſtowing the bounties of his providence, and in being the light and life of men: all which were done by him with the greateſt eaſe, as well as pleaſure and delight; it was a kind of ſport or play unto him, as the word uſed ſignifies[w]; and ſo in the preceding verſe, which ſhews the alluſion is to a nurſe-child. Moreover, this may have a peculiar view to the ſaints and people of God, and to thoſe particular ſpots of ground in God's earth where they ſhould dwell; for as the earth was made, and is continued on their account; ſo the very place of their birth and abode, as well as of their converſion, were afore appointed and fixed by the Lord, which Chriſt in his eternal mind had a foreview of, and took a pleaſure in: beſides, they themſelves are the habitation of God, and Chriſt, and the bleſſed Spirit; the church of God is his dwelling-place on earth, where he delights to dwell, over whom he rejoices to do good, and whom he makes glad; ſo ſome read the words, making glad the habitable part of his earth[x]. Once more, the new earth, which will be after this is paſſed away, may be truly called his, or the ſecond Adam's earth; and in which only righteous perſons ſhall dwell, and with whom the tabernacle of God ſhall be, or with whom Chriſt ſhall dwell a thouſand years; and in the foreview of this he may be thought to take delight and pleaſure, even before the world was. The human nature of Chriſt may not be amiſs thought of, which was formed in the lower parts of the earth, and therefore he is called the fruit of the earth, Pſal. cxxxix. 15. Iſa. iv. 2. and may be ſaid to be habitable, in which the fulneſs of the Godhead dwells, and the Word tabernacled, and is the true tabernacle; in the foreview of which the Son of God rejoiced, as to be produced without ſin by the holy Spirit, and adorned with his graces, and to be united to his perſon; in which he was to work out the ſalvation of his people, and be glorified; and his joy, in the foreview of it, appears by his frequent appearances in an human form before his actual incarnation, as preludiums of it. And my delights were with the ſons of men; or of Adam, of fallen Adam; not with angels, but with men; not with all men, only ſome; and thoſe as conſidered as the objects of his own and his Father's love; as beheld in the glaſs of his Father's decrees; as choſen in him, and given him by his Father; as his children, and as his ſpouſe and bride. The word for delights is not only in the plural number, but its two firſt radical letters are doubled, which, in the Hebrew language, increaſes the ſignification of the word; and ſo expreſſes the exceeding great delight and pleaſure which Chriſt took in his people from everlaſting; his love was then a love of the utmoſt complacency and delight, and continued, notwithſtanding their fall in Adam, though by nature children of wrath, and tranſgreſſors from the womb. This appears by his early engagement as a ſurety for them; by his eſpouſing their perſons and their cauſe; by aſſuming their nature in time; by ſuffering and dying in their room and ſtead, and working out ſalvation for them; by bearing them on his heart in heaven, and there interceding for them; by taking them out of a ſtate of nature; by viſiting them with his grace and preſence; and by bringing them, through a variety of trials, ſafe to his kingdom and glory.

℣. 32. Now therefore hearken unto me, O ye children, &c.] Children of his and his Father, with whom his delights were; predeſtinated to the adoption of children; children of the covenant and promiſe, given to him as ſuch in the covenant; for whom he became man, ſuffered and died, to gather together regenerated ones, by which they appear to be the children of God: theſe wiſdom here addreſſes in the moſt affectionate manner; Chriſt, having finiſhed the account and deſcription of himſelf, reaſſumes his former exhortation, ℣. 5—10. and enforces it by the ſeveral particulars in the above deſcription. From the conſideration of his wiſdom, riches, eternity, nearneſs to God, and his delights with men, he exhorts them to hearken to him, to his voice in the goſpel, and to what he ſays there; ſuch who ſee themſelves loſt and periſhing, the hungry and thirſty, the naked and weary, the diſconſolate and afflicted, the poor and indigent; and alſo to his voice in his precepts and commands, to embrace his doctrines, and ſubmit to his ordinances. For bleſſed are they that keep my ways; it is a happineſs to be in the ways of Chriſt, to be kept in them, and to keep them; Chriſt has promiſed, and does vouchſafe his preſence in them; there is a pleaſure enjoyed in obſerving them; and though not for keeping, yet in keeping Chriſt's commands, there is great reward, Pſal. xix. 11.

℣. 33. Hear inſtruction, &c.] The inſtruction of wiſdom, the goſpel of Chriſt; which inſtructs men in things relating to God the Father; as that he is the God and Father of his people, the God of all grace, the giver and ſender of Chriſt, and all good things by him; in things reſpecting Chriſt, his perſon, office, grace and righteouſneſs; in things that appertain to the Spirit of God, his deity, perſonality, and operations of grace on the ſouls of men; in the knowledge of themſelves, their impurity, impotence and unrighteouſneſs; and in the way of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt, and therefore to be hearkened to. And be wiſe; this is the way to be wiſe to that which is good, both as to the knowledge and practice of it; to be wiſe unto ſalvation, and with reſpect to everlaſting things and a future ſtate; and the goſpel-inſtruction teaches men to behave wiſely, to walk in wiſdom towards them that are without. And refuſe it not; for this is not to be wiſe, but to act the part of fools; and ſuch as do ſo, deſpiſe their own ſouls, ſhew that they have no care of them, or concern for their eternal welfare, chap. i. 7. and xv. 32. for if this is rejected, there is no eſcaping eternal damnation, Heb. ii. 3.

℣. 34. Bleſſed is the man that heareth me, &c.] Chriſt in his goſpel, as ſpeaking by his miniſters; for hearing them is hearing him, Luke x. 16. they have their commiſſion from him; are his ambaſſadors, ſadors, and perſonate him; receive their gifts from him; ſpeak according to his mind and will, revealed in his word, and preach him himſelf. This ſhews with what attention and reverence the goſpel ſhould be heard; what credit ſhould be given unto it; how it ought to be put in practice; this accounts for the efficacy of it on the ſouls of men, it being no other than the word of Chriſt, or Chriſt himſelf ſpeaking; and from hence it appears, how ſad and dreadful will be the caſe of ſuch that deſpiſe it: to hear it is the way to have the knowledge of Chriſt, and an increaſe of it; faith in Chriſt, and a growth therein; the joy of faith, and a furtherance of it; love to Chriſt, and aboundings in it; and to have ſpiritual food and nouriſhment; wherefore it is both the duty and privilege of perſons to hear the goſpel of Chriſt, ſince theſe things come by it. Watching daily at my gates; the gates of wiſdom's houſe, the church of Chriſt, which are the public ordinances thereof; called in ſcripture the gates of Zion, Pſal. lxxxvii. 2. in alluſion to the gates of cities, where wiſdom cries, or the miniſters of Chriſt preach, chap. i. 21. and viii. 3. ſee Iſa. xxvi. 1, 2. or to the gates of kings palaces, where courtiers watch to be admitted and received as favourites, or to give in their petitions for themſelves or others, Eſther vi. 10. The church is the palace of the great King; it is an honour to be admitted here, to have a name and a place here, and to ſit with the King at his table. Or to the door of the tabernacle, where the people of Iſrael aſſembled for worſhip; or to the gates of the temple, where the prieſts and Levites watched, Exod. xxix. 42. Pſal. c. 4. and cxxii. 2. Watching is oppoſed to ſleep, both to bodily ſleep and to ſleepy frames of ſoul; and to intemperance, not only by eating and drinking, but with the cares of this life; and it denotes circumſpection, diligence and attention. Here ſenſible ſinners watch in the miniſtry of the word and ordinances, if any thing drops that they can catch at, ſuitable to their caſe and circumſtances; as Benhadad's ſervants did, 1 Kings xx. 33. and here ſouls, under darkneſs and deſertion, watch for ſpiritual light and comfort, as they that watch for the morning; and here every believer watches for his ſpiritual edification and eſtabliſhment in the truth: and which ſhould be daily, or day after day, one Lord's day after another; taking all opportunities, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, conſiſtent with the duties of their calling, to hear the word; and ſo they are to continue to the end of life; for happy is he that ſhall be found thus watching when his Lord cometh, Luke xii. 37. Waiting at the poſts of my doors; either in alluſion to ſcholars, who wait the opening of the ſchool-doors to go in firſt, as Jarchi obſerves: Chriſt is a teacher; ſenſible ſouls are his diſciples or ſcholars; the church is the ſchool where they learn of him, and learn him; and waiting at the door-poſts of it, ſhews early ſeeking to Chriſt, and eagerneſs for inſtruction from him, Luke xxi. 38. Or the alluſion may be to clients, waiting at the doors of counſellors [y], for counſel, and for patronage and protection, to plead their cauſe for them; Chriſt is the wonderful Counſellor, the Advocate with the Father, the Redeemer, mighty and ſtrong, to plead the cauſe of his people; and therefore it is right to wait at his doors, with whom are counſel and ſound wiſdom: or elſe to beggars, that wait at the door for alms; who knock and wait until the door is opened; tell their caſe, and wait for relief; receive repulſes, and wait ſtill; and will not depart till ſomething is given. So ſaints ſhould wait at the throne of grace, and upon the word and ordinances, for anſwers of prayer, performance of promiſes, and the preſence of God and Chriſt: and ſo ſhould ſinners wait on the outward miniſtry of the word, remembering the caſe of the poor man at the pool, who waited long, and at laſt had a cure, John v. 5—7. ſince faith comes hereby; the Spirit and his graces, Chriſt and the knowledge of him, are had by ſuch means, as follows.

ỳ. 35. For whoſo findeth me, findeth life, &c.] Of finding Chriſt, ſee the note on chap. iii. 13. Such that find Chriſt, find life or lives [z], life ſpiritual and eternal; till they are found of Chriſt, and find him in effectual calling, they are dead; but when called by his grace and converted, they live a life of juſtification and ſanctification; they live a life of faith on Chriſt, of holineſs from him, and communion with him: and ſuch that find life in this ſenſe, find ſpiritual food in and from Chriſt, to ſupport this life; and ſpiritual cloathing, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, called the juſtification of life, and which is the comfort of it; and reſt in him, which makes life pleaſant and delightful. Such an one finds that which of all things is moſt valuable, the life of his immortal ſoul; and which he can find no where elſe; and which being found, can never be loſt, for he finds eternal life in him; and has both a right unto it, and a meetneſs for it; yea, has the beginning, pledge, and earneſt of it, 1 John v. 11, 12. And ſhall obtain favour of the Lord; by which is meant, not favour among men, tho' that is had from the Lord, it is he that gives it; nor temporal bleſſings, for in this ſenſe favour is not to men of ſpiritual ſkill and wiſdom; rather ſpiritual bleſſings, an acceſs to God, acceptance with him; the preſence of God, and communion with him; peace of conſcience, and every needful ſupply of grace: but it ſeems moſt principally to deſign the love, grace and good-will of God, the ſpring and fountain of all bleſſings: and obtaining it does not intend getting an intereſt in it, for that is free and ſovereign; nor is there any thing in men, or done by them, which can procure it; but an enjoyment of it. The word [a] uſed ſignifies a drawing it out, as water out of a well; and denotes, that it is before it is drawn out or manifeſted; that it is in the heart of God, and lies hid there, from whence it flows as from a well or fountain; and is enjoyed in the exerciſe of the grace of faith; when the Lord remembers his people, and encompaſſes them about with it; or draws it out in great lengths, or grants continued and comfortable manifeſtations of it; ſee Pſal. xxxvi. 10.

ỳ. 36. But he that ſinneth againſt me, &c.] Or miſſes the mark, as the word [b] ſignifies; and which is obſerved by Aben Ezra; ſee Judg. xx. 16. Chriſt is the mark and ſcope of the counſels of God; of the covenant of grace; of the ſcriptures; of the goſpel, the truths and promiſes of it; of the graces of the Spirit, and of all ſpiritual duties and ſervices; and to whom we are to look for heaven and eternal happineſs, Phil. iii. 14. and ſuch miſs the mark who look for ſalvation elſewhere, either by the light of nature; or by the law of Moſes; or by any moral performances, or any religious exerciſes; or by a mere profeſſion of religion, even the beſt. The word is frequently uſed for ſinning; which is an aberration or ſtraying from, or miſſing the mark of the law. Some ſin againſt Chriſt doctrinally, who ſay, he is not come in the fleſh, or that Jeſus is not the Chriſt; who deny his proper deity, his divine and eternal Sonſhip; and treat his blood, righteouſneſs and ſalvation, with any degree of contempt: they ſin againſt him practically, that ſlight his goſpel, neglect his ordinances, tranſgreſs his laws, and evilly treat his people. Sinning againſt him is very aggravating; it is againſt him, in whom all grace and mercy is, and from whom it comes to the ſons of men; who is the Saviour of men from ſin, and in whom alone ſalvation is. Wherefore every one that thus ſins againſt him, wrongeth his own ſoul; is injurious to it, and to the ſpiritual and eternal welfare of it; all ſin is hurtful to the ſouls of men, eſpecially ſins againſt Chriſt; ſince there is no other Saviour but him, no other ſacrifice for ſin but his; and therefore to ſuch there can be no other than a fearful looking for of judgment, that trample him under foot, and treat his blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, in a contemptuous manner, Heb. x. 26—29. All they that hate me; as do the ſeed of the ſerpent, the whole world that lies in wickedneſs, all unregenerate perſons, and even many profeſſors of religion; they hate him privatively, being without love to him, or loving others more than him; and poſitively and practically, by deſpiſing his goſpel, or not walking worthy of it; by diſclaiming his doctrines, caſting off his yoke, and mal-treating his people; all which ariſe from the corruption of their nature; for this hatred or enmity is original and natural; it is deeply rooted in their minds, and irreconcileable without the grace of God, and is always undeſerved. Wherefore ſuch are ſaid to love death; not formally and intentionally, for death in any ſhape cannot be deſireable; not a corporal death, and much leſs an eternal one; but interpretatively and conſequentially, as they love that which brings death upon them both in body and ſoul, and ſo are reckoned to love death itſelf.

CHAP. IX.

IN this chapter, wiſdom or Chriſt is repreſented as having built a ſtately houſe or palace for the entertainment of his gueſts, ℣. 1. as having made large and ſuitable proviſions for them, ℣. 2. and as having ſent his ſervants to invite them to come and partake of them, and quit all other company but his, ℣. 3—6. When it is obſerved who are, and who are not to be reproved, with the reaſons of it, ℣. 7—9. and what is the ſum and ſubſtance of true wiſdom; and what the advantages of it, both here and hereafter, ℣. 10—12. And the chapter is concluded with the deſcription of the fooliſh woman, the oppoſite of wiſdom; who is repreſented as clamorous, ſimple and ignorant, ℣. 13 and plying paſſengers that go by her door, and inviting them in to partake of her proviſions, ℣. 14—17. the conſequence of which is ſure and certain death and deſtruction to her gueſts, ℣. 18.

℣. 1. Wiſdom hath builded her houſe, &c.] Or wiſdoms; of which ſee chap. i. 20. Chriſt, the wiſdom of God is meant, in whom and from whom all wiſdom is. Various are the opinions concerning this houſe built by him. Some take it to be the whole circle of ſciences, and the ſeven pillars to be the ſeven liberal ones, as Aben Ezra; though rather, as others, it may deſign the ſchools of the prophets, in which young men were trained up in the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things. Some would have the whole univerſe to be meant, and the ſeven pillars to be the ſeven days of creation, as Jarchi; or the ſeven planets, as others: it is an odd notion of Grotius, that the human body is intended, with its five ſenſes; and, to make up the number ſeven, adds the voice and memory: rather the human nature of Chriſt, which is a temple, a tabernacle, a houſe in which the Godhead dwells, is built by wiſdom, made without the hands of men; and then its ſeven pillars are the graces of the Spirit, by which it was ſupported and adorned; ſee Iſa. xi. 2. Some underſtand it of the temple of a regenerate man's heart; in which God, Father, Son, and Spirit dwell. But there are two other ſenſes, which bid faireſt one of them to be right; either the heavenly glory, the houſe not made with hands, Chriſt's Father's houſe, in which are many manſions for his people; and which is a city whoſe builder and maker is God, and is prepared by Chriſt; and ſtands firm upon the promiſes of God, the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and the grace of the bleſſed Spirit: or rather, the church of Chriſt on earth, the houſe of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth; this is built by Chriſt upon himſelf, the rock and foundation; the materials of it are true believers, precious and lively ſtones; built up a ſpiritual houſe, and a fit and ſuitable habitation for God through the Spirit. Such a houſe there was under the Old-Teſtament, and ſuch a one there is under the New; and which is continually building up by Chriſt by means of the word and ordinances, and will continue to the end of the world; ſee 1 Tim. iii. 15. Matt. xvi. 18. 1 Pet. ii. 5. Heb. iii. 6. She hath hewn out her ſeven pillars; miniſters of the goſpel, compared to pillars for ſtrength and ſtability, and for their being inſtrumental in ſupporting the intereſt and church of Chriſt; in alluſion to the pillars in Solomon's temple, Jachin and Boaz; ſee Gal. ii. 9. 1 Kings vii. 21. Theſe are ſaid to be hewn, being poliſhed, beautified and adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit by Chriſt, and thereby fitted for their work and ſervice; and ſaid to be ſeven, becauſe there is a complete and ſufficient number of them, which Chriſt has provided, and always will provide for his churches, as long as they continue in the world. Though it may be, theſe ſeven pillars may denote in general the firmneſs and ſolidity of this ſpiritual building the church, and the continuance of it by the power of God; or they may have reſpect to the ſeven ſtates of the church in ſo many periods of time, to laſt to the end of all things, ſignified by the ſeven churches in the book of the Revelation; ſo Cocceius[c].

℣. 2. She hath killed her beaſts, &c.] Or her ſacrifice[d]: a crucified Chriſt, the principal of the proviſions in wiſdom's houſe, or the church of Chriſt. The death of Chriſt was prefigured by the ſlaying of beaſts for ſacrifice under the old law; was foretold in prophecy, and is expreſſed by killing him in the New-Teſtament; and which ſhews his death, not to be natural, but violent. It is commonly aſcribed to the Jews as a wicked action of theirs; but was not without the counſel and determination of God, and the will and conſent of Chriſt; and this death was as a victim to juſtice, by way of ſacrifice and ſatisfaction for ſin, and was vicarious; was offered up in the room and ſtead of his people, to make atonement for their ſins; and which is no other than himſelf, his ſoul and body, as in union with his divine perſon; a ſacrifice voluntarily offered up by himſelf, exceeding acceptable and well-pleaſing to God; effectual to the purpoſes for which it was offered, and ſo never to be repeated: and his death, being a ſacrifice, becomes a feaſt; a crucified Chriſt is ſuitable food for faith, as he is the Lamb in the midſt of the throne, as though he had been ſlain; he is evidently ſet forth in the goſpel as crucified, and as ſuch is ſpiritual and ſavoury food to his people, nouriſhing and ſtrengthening, quickening and comforting, and extremely ſatisfying: thus the goſpel-feaſt, in which the ſlain Lamb of God makes the chiefeſt part, is expreſſed in the ſame language as here, my oxen and my fatlings are killed, Matt. xxii. 4. She hath mingled her wine; which alſo makes a conſiderable part in a banquet or feaſt, Eſther v. 6. and the church is called a banqueting-houſe, or an houſe of wine, Cant. ii. 4. The love of Chriſt is compared to wine, Cant. i. 2, 4. to old wine, for the antiquity of it, being more ancient than ours to him, or than ourſelves, even as old as eternity; to wine, on the lees well refined, for the purity of it, being free from all motives and conditions in the creature; to ſtrong, generous wine, which exhilarates and refreſhes the weak, the weary, and diſtreſſed. The goſpel of Chriſt is alſo compared to wine, Cant. vii. 9. to old wine, for the ancient doctrines of it; and to neat wine, for the purity of it; and to generous wine, for the pleaſure, joy and comfort it gives: the bleſſings of grace which it exhibits, may be ſo called from their comforting and refreſhing nature, which are had freely, Iſa. lv. 1. and ſo are the joys of heaven, Matt. xxvi. 29. Now the mingling of this wine is in alluſion to the mixing of wine, either with ſomething richer as ſpice, Cant. viii. 2. or rather with water, as Jarchi obſerves, which was uſual in thoſe hot countries, to make it fit and ſuitable drink for the bodies of men: the mixture was no doubt according to the ſtrength of the wine; the wine of Sharon, being ſtrong wine, was mixed two parts water and one wine[e]; which, with the ancients[f], were three parts water and two wine; though, according to Plutarch[g], they had three ways of mixing, which they called by three different names; the one was three parts water and two wine, the other three parts water and one wine, the third was one wine and two water; the firſt of them was reckoned the beſt mixture[h]: one Ceraſſus is ſaid to be the inventor of mixing wine with water[i]; others aſcribe it to Melampus[k], and others to Amphictyon. And this, ſpiritually underſtood, does not deſign any impurity or degeneracy, ſuch as is complained of, Iſa. i. 22. for the love of Chriſt is pure and ſovereign; the goſpel of Chriſt is free of all mixtures of human doctrines; the bleſſings of grace are all of free grace, without the mixture of mens works, and ſo is eternal life; ſalvation is all of free grace, and not by works of righteouſneſs done by men mixed with it. But this may deſign the various diſplays of the love of Chriſt in the ſeveral acts of it, before time, in time, and now in heaven; or the joint diſplay of the love of Father, Son and Spirit, in the ſalvation of men, and the harmony and agreement of the divine perfections therein; and the publication of the goſpel, and the accommodation of the truths of it to the capacities of men: and perhaps ſome reſpect may be had to the blood and water that iſſued from the ſide of the ſlain Lamb of God, here prophetically and figuratively held forth. She hath alſo furniſhed her table; which ſeems to deſign the miniſtration of the word, and the adminiſtration of ordinances in goſpel-times; eſpecially the ordinance of the ſupper, called the table of the Lord, 1 Cor. x. 21. a well-furniſhed table has a variety of excellent proviſion upon it: and ſuch is the miniſtry of the goſpel, which is ſignified by various ſorts of food, as bread, meat, milk, honey, and delicious fruits; and Chriſt, who is the ſum and ſubſtance of it, is expreſſed by ſeveral things that are eatable, as by a ſlain lamb, a fatted calf, the hidden manna, the bread of God and of life, whoſe fleſh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed; and ſo is he held forth in the ordinances, particularly in the ordinance of the ſupper; the table he ſits at, and welcomes his gueſts; encourages them to eat and drink, and ſups with them himſelf. Here his broken body, and his blood ſhed, are preſented to the faith of his people, to be eaten and drank in a ſpiritual manner; a table richly furniſhed indeed!

℣. 3. She hath ſent forth her maidens, &c.] Not moral virtues, or good works, which ſubſerve the intereſt of Chriſt and religion, adorn the goſpel and its profeſſors; nor the liberal arts and ſciences, ſaid to be handmaids to divinity; nor angels, miniſtring ſpirits to Chriſt; but the miniſters of the goſpel, who being ſo called, does not ſuppoſe or encourage womens preaching; but have the name to keep up the decency of the parable, and the propriety of the allegory: for ſince wiſdom is repreſented as a lady, a princeſs or queen, it is proper that her attendants ſhould be maidens, or that ſhe ſhould employ ſuch in inviting her gueſts; as Rebekah, Pharaoh's daughter, Eſther, and others, are ſaid to have their maidens to wait upon them: and beſides, it very fitly expreſſes the character of goſpel-miniſters; as that they are the ſervants of Chriſt, followers of him, obſequious to him, humble and modeſt, incorrupt in doctrine, pure in converſation, and whoſe voice is ſoft, pleaſant and delightful; being not the rough voice of the law, but the ſtill, ſmall, muſical voice of the goſpel; a voice of love, grace and mercy; of peace, pardon and righteouſneſs, liberty, life and ſalvation; very charming, alluring, and drawing. Theſe Chriſt has a property in; he chooſes and calls them, and fits them for his ſervice; and they give up themſelves to him, and willingly engage in it. And theſe he ſends forth; from him, they have their miſſion and commiſſion to preach the goſpel; to invite perſons to the goſpel-feaſt, to partake of the proviſions he has made: he ſends them forth publickly into the world, into all places where his people are, into the ſtreets and lanes; yea, to the hedges and highways, to invite, and even to compel them to come in. And this ſuppoſes ſuperiority in him, and authority given to them. She crieth upon the higheſt places of the city; this is to be underſtood of the preaching of the goſpel, both by Chriſt himſelf in perſon, in the city of Jeruſalem, in the temple, and other public places; and by his miniſters, and by him ſpeaking in them there or elſewhere; and which is not a mere whiſper, but a cry, a proclamation made aloud, and to be delivered with fervency and earneſtneſs: the city may mean the church of God, and the higheſt places the ordinances thereof; and may in general denote the publickneſs of them; which are in the church, as the wings or pinnacles of the higher parts or buildings of a city are in that, as the word [l] ſignifies.

℣. 4 Whoſo is ſimple, let him turn in hither, &c.] Into wiſdom's houſe, ſo well built and furniſhed; the church of Chriſt, as an houſe of inſtruction; a ſchool, where ſuch who are ſimple, weak and fooliſh, may learn. Here are many inſtructors; ſaints inſtruct one another; miniſters of the word are teachers; yea, Father, Son and Spirit, here teach and inſtruct, and none teach like them. Here many leſſons are to be learned concerning themſelves, concerning Chriſt, and concerning their duty to God and men; all ſorts of perſons may learn here, ſuch who know ever ſo much or ever ſo little. Or let him turn in here, as into an inn, into which paſſengers or travellers turn for accommodations; ſee ℣. 15, 16. The ſaints are travellers here, at a diſtance from their Father's houſe, and need refreſhment by the way; the church of God is an inn of good accommodations; here is room enough to entertain them; here are good lodgings for reſt and ſafety, and good proviſions, and all of free coſt. And now theſe are the words of wiſdom or Chriſt, either in perſon or by his maidens, his miniſters, inviting ſuch who are ſimple to turn in hither, and partake of the proviſions in it; that is, not ſuch who are quite ſtupid and inſenſible, ſottiſh, incorrigible and irreclaimable; but who are ſenſible of their folly and ſimplicity; who are but of weak capacities, apt to be credulous, and ſo eaſily impoſed upon and deceived. As for him that wanteth underſtanding; not the natural faculty of the underſtanding, nor an underſtanding of things natural and civil; but of things ſpiritual and evangelical, as of the grace of God; of ſalvation by Chriſt; of the work of the Spirit; of themſelves and their ſtate; of the goſpel and the myſteries of it; and who are ſenſible of their ignorance and want of underſtanding, which is the firſt thing the Spirit of God convinces men of; or who are ſo in compariſon of others, are weak in knowledge and experience. Now theſe Chriſt does not deſpiſe, but invites them into his houſe for inſtruction; and where can they be better? and who ſo fit and proper to be here, and be with wiſdom, than ſuch as theſe? She ſaith to him; as follows.

℣. 5. Come, eat of my bread, &c.] Which ſtands for all the proviſions of Chriſt's houſe; it deſigns the goſpel, which to a believer is more than his neceſſary food; and the ordinance of the ſupper, one of the ſymbols of which is bread; and more eſpecially Chriſt himſelf, the bread of God, the living bread that came down from heaven, which is to be eaten by faith; and this only, for every thing elſe is that which is not bread; and this daily, as the Iſraelites eat their manna; this is the believer's daily bread; and largely and freely, to which they are welcome by Chriſt; and with gladneſs and ſingleneſs of heart, joyfully and with ſincerity. And drink of the wine which I have mingled; of the love of Chriſt; or of the love of the Father, Son, and Spirit, which meet and mingle together: to drink of this is to partake of it by faith, and be perſuaded of intereſt in it; this may be drank largely of, for there is enough, a river of it; and without danger, it is not intoxicating as wine, wherein is exceſs; and it may be had freely, without money and without price, Cant. i. 2, 4. and v. 1. Iſa. lv. 1.

℣. 6. Forſake the fooliſh, &c.] Fooliſh men and their company; not men of weak abilities in things natural and civil, or who are reckoned fooliſh by the world; for ſo the ſaints are, whoſe company is not to be neglected and forſaken; but ſuch who are wickedly fooliſh, who are ignorant of divine things, and make a mock at ſin and at religion; ſuch company is very unſuitable for wiſdom's gueſts; ſuch as turn in to her houſe ought to forſake theſe; it is quite out of character for wiſdom's followers to be the companions of fools; it is very unprofitable to keep company with ſuch vain men, yea very pernicious and hurtful, and of very bad conſequence; it corrupts good manners, and cauſes grief, and breaks peace, ſooner or later; it is quite unbecoming them to converſe with them; they are called out from among them by Chriſt, and ſhould obey; and beſides they have better company to attend unto: and they ſhould alſo forſake fooliſh [m] things; the Septuagint verſion renders it, fooliſhneſs; and the Arabic verſion, imprudence; the Targum and Syriac verſion, want of underſtanding or judgment; fooliſh luſts, which are hurtful and war againſt the ſoul, and which ſhould be denied and abſtained from; and all fooliſh ways, their own or others, which are dangerous and lead to ruin; and all fooliſh doctrines, ſuch as are contrary to the ſcriptures, to the doctrine of Chriſt and his apoſtles; that tend to degrade any of the perſons of the Trinity, to obſcure or leſſen the grace of God in man's ſalvation, or to exalt the creature; all ſuch are to be forſaken, ſhunned, and avoided, and by no means countenanced and encouraged. And live; which may be conſidered either as an exhortation, as the foregoing; live on the proviſions of wiſdom's houſe, on her bread and her wine; live on Chriſt himſelf by faith; live not as the fooliſh do, but as the wiſe; live not to yourſelves, nor to the luſts of men, but to the will and glory of God; live not in ſin, but unto righteouſneſs; live not to the fleſh, nor after it, but to and after the Spirit: or as a promiſe by way of encouragement, and as enforcing the preceding exhortation, and ye ſhall live [n]; honourably and not ſcandalouſly, as they do that keep company with the fooliſh; comfortably and delightfully, as they do that turn into wiſdom's houſe, and are her gueſts; ſuch live in communion with Chriſt, and with his people; they live a ſpiritual life now, and ſhall live an eternal one hereafter. And go in the way of underſtanding; as ſuch do that quit the converſation of fooliſh men, and become the gueſts of wiſdom; ſuch are in, and go in the way of underſtanding, who frequently attend the throne of grace, and aſk wiſdom of the Father of lights; the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of divine things, which they that aſk have; Solomon got all his wiſdom and underſtanding this way: ſuch are in the way of it, and go in the way of it, who conſtantly and carefully read the ſcriptures, which are able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation; who go up to the houſe of the Lord as often as they have opportunity, that they may be taught by him; who ſit under the miniſtry of goſpel-preachers, that feed men with knowledge and underſtanding; who ſubmit to goſpel-ordinances, and keep the commandments of Chriſt; for ſuch are ſaid to have a good underſtanding; they ſhew that they have, and by theſe means get and increaſe it; ſee Pſal. cxi. 10. and cxix. 104. and who alſo converſe with knowing and experienced chriſtians; for he that walketh with wiſe men ſhall be wiſe, Prov. xiii. 20.

ỳ. 7. He that reproveth a ſcorner, getteth to himſelf ſhame, &c.] Intimating that though the ſimple, and ſuch as want underſtanding, and of whom there is hope of doing them good, are to be invited into wiſdom's houſe; yet not the haughty ſcorner, the abandoned ſinner, the ſcoffer at all religion, who walks after his own luſts, and is quite irreclaimable; it is but caſting pearls before ſwine, and giving that which is holy to dogs, to reprove and exhort ſuch perſons; though the goſpel is to be preached to every creature, yet when men deſpiſe it and make a mock at it, they are to be turned from, and no more is to be ſaid to them; as the Jews of old, they were the firſt invited to the goſpel-feaſt, the ſame that is deſcribed in the context; they made light of it, contradicted and blaſphemed the word, and ſo judged themſelves unworthy of of it; wherefore wiſdom's maidens, or Chriſt's miniſters, were bid to turn from them and go to the Gentiles, and preach it to them; for it is to no purpoſe to addreſs ſuch perſons; ſhame is the ſure conſequence of it, becauſe a man is diſappointed of the end he has in view, which is doing good. And he that rebuketh a wicked man, getteth himſelf a blot; this ſhews who is meant by a ſcorner, a very profligate man, bent on his wicked ways, and quite incorrigible; to rebuke ſuch a one is not only labour loſt, and in vain, but the rebuker getteth himſelf an ill name, and is ſure to have the dirt of reproach and ſcandal caſt upon him; though this a man might patiently bear, if there was any hope of doing good.

ỳ. 8. Reprove not a ſcorner, leſt he hate thee, &c.] For wicked men are apt to hate thoſe that publicly rebuke them, Amos v. 10. Hence miniſters of the word are of all men moſt hated; though this alſo ſhould be bore with, could it be thought, or there was any reaſon to believe, that the reproof would be of any ſervice. The ſcorner here, and in the preceding verſes, may not only deſign profane ſinners, ſenſualiſts, and atheiſts, that deſpiſe all religion, and ſcoff at all that is good; but alſo proud ſcornful phariſees, ſuch who derided Chriſt himſelf, and truſted in themſelves, and deſpiſed others, Chriſt and his apoſtles, and their miniſtrations, Luke xvi. 14. and xviii. 9. and ſuch, as Chriſt came not to call them himſelf, ſo he bid his diſciples let them alone, Matt. ix. 13. and xv. 14. Rebuke a wiſe man, and he will love thee; as David did Nathan; and who was determined to take kindly the reproof of any righteous man, Pſal. cxli. 5. Such who are ſpiritually wiſe will be thankful for the reproof of goſpel-miniſters, and even of private chriſtians, and will love and eſteem them for their faithfulneſs and uprightneſs, and for the good which they themſelves receive hereby.

ỳ. 9. Give inſtruction to a wiſe man, &c.] In the Hebrew text it is only, give to a wiſe man; give him reproof, correction, chaſtiſement, doctrine, or inſtruction, be it what it will, he will be the better for it. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, give occaſion; to him of ſhewing his wiſdom and of improving in it: and he will be yet wiſer; he will learn ſomething by every hint that is given him, whether it be by way of rebuke, or by way of inſtruction. Teach a juſt man; one that is truly ſo, that has ſeen the inſufficiency of his own righteouſneſs, and has renounced that, and does not truſt in it; and who has learned Chriſt, as the Lord his righteouſneſs; has ſeen the glory, fulneſs, and ſuitableneſs of his righteouſneſs, and truſts unto it and depends upon it; and in conſequence of this lives ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly; teach ſuch a man the doctrines of the goſpel, and every leſſon of obedience and duty, and he will increaſe in learning; he will grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Chriſt and all divine things; ſee Matt. xiii. 12.

ỳ. 10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wiſdom, &c.] This ſhews who the wiſe men are, and in what true wiſdom lies; no man is wiſe till he fears the Lord, and he that does ſo is a wiſe man, at leaſt then he begins to be one; this is the principal part of wiſdom, chap. i. 7. and is at the firſt of it; it is the beginning of grace; it is the firſt act of wiſdom, or grace; or which appears as ſoon as a man is converted and cauſed to know wiſdom in the hidden part; as repentance, faith, and love, quickly ſhew themſelves in one act or another, ſo does the fear of God; for the former are never without the latter; for fear is an awe and reverence of the divine Being, joined with love to him, truſt in him, and a deſire to ſerve and worſhip him in a right manner; no ſooner is a man converted, but preſently there is in him a fear of offending God, from a principle of love to him; for not a ſlaviſh, but a filial fear is here intended. And the knowledge of the Holy is underſtanding; either the knowledge of the holy ones, as the three divine perſons in the godhead, who are ſo called, Joſh. xxiv. 19. Prov. xxx. 3. Hoſea xi. 12. the knowledge of God the Father, who is holy in his nature and works; not a mere natural knowledge of him by the light of nature; nor a mere notional knowledge of him by revelation; not a legal knowledge of him as a lawgiver, and an offended judge; but an evangelical knowledge of him in Chriſt, as his God and Father; and as the God of all grace in him; ſo as to have faith and hope in him, acceſs unto him, and communion with him; this is right underſtanding: ſo the knowledge of Chriſt, God's holy one; a knowledge of him in his perſon, offices, and grace; an inward knowledge of him, a ſpiritual acquaintance with him, ſo as to approve of him, believe in him, and appropriate him to onesſelf; this is to attain to a good degree of underſtanding: as likewiſe the knowledge of the holy Spirit, the author of ſanctification; of his perſon, and operations of grace; as a convincer and comforter; as a Spirit of illumination and faith, of regeneration and ſanctification; and as the Spirit of adoption, and the earneſt of glory; this is another branch of ſpiritual underſtanding. Moreover ſuch knowledge which holy men have, and which makes them ſo; and which holy men of God, moved by the holy Ghoſt, have communicated in the ſacred ſcriptures, of which they are the penmen. The knowledge of holy things may alſo be meant; of the holy myſteries of religion, of the holy doctrines of the goſpel, which are all according to godlineſs, and teach men to live in a holy manner: the faith once delivered to the ſaints is a moſt holy faith, encourages and promotes holineſs of heart and life; as the doctrines of God's everlaſting love; eternal election; the unconditionality of the covenant of grace; redemption by Chriſt; converſion by efficacious grace; juſtification by Chriſt's righteouſneſs; pardon by his blood; ſatisfaction by his ſacrifice; and perſeverance by his power: and now a knowledge of theſe things, not notional but experimental, is underſtanding indeed; as well as a knowledge of holy and gracious experiences.

℣. 11. For by me thy days ſhall be multiplied, &c.] Theſe are the words of wiſdom, and contain a reaſon and argument why her call and advice in the preceding verſes ſhould be liſtened unto, ſince ſhe gives long life to her followers. She is a tree of life unto them, the author and giver of ſpiritual and eternal life; by means of her bread and her wine ſpiritual life is maintained, promoted, and preſerved; and length of days for ever and ever is the gift of her right hand; ſee chap. iii. 16, 18. The Targum is, "for by it thy days ſhall be multiplied;" which ſeems to refer it to the fear of the Lord, the beginning of wiſdom, in the preceding verſe, to which long life is attributed; ſee chap. x. 27. And the years of thy life ſhall be increaſed; or, they ſhall add years of life to thee[o]; wiſdom and underſtanding, the fear of the Lord, and the knowledge of the holy; if not in this world, yet in the world to come, which will be without end.

℣. 12. If thou be wiſe, thou ſhalt be wiſe for thyſelf, &c.] He is wiſe that hearkens to wiſdom's advice, that obeys her call, turns in to her houſe, and becomes her gueſt; and ſuch an one is wiſe for himſelf, it is for his own good, profit, and advantage; for the good of his ſoul, for his preſent peace and comfort, and for his future bliſs and happineſs. It is not for her own ſake that wiſdom preſſes her exhortations, and is ſo urgent on men to take her counſel and advice; it is for their own good; their wiſdom is not profitable to her, but to themſelves; they and they only reap the advantage and uſefulneſs of it; ſee Job xxii. 2, 3. The Syriac and Arabic verſions add, and unto thy friends; and the Septuagint verſion is, if thou becomeſt wiſe to thyſelf, thou wilt be wiſe to neighbours; they will receive ſome profit by it. But if thou ſcorneſt, thou alone ſhalt bear it; the evil, as the Vulgate Latin; the ſin of ſcorning, and the puniſhment due unto it; it will bring no real hurt to wiſdom, or Chriſt, nor to his miniſters, nor to his goſpel and ordinances, ſcoffed at; all the hurt will redound to the ſcoffer himſelf; and he alone ſhall bear it, and feel the ſmart of it, and all the dreadful conſequences following upon it. The Septuagint verſion here adds the following clauſe, "he that truſteth in lies, he feedeth on winds; the ſame purſues birds flying; "for he forſakes the ways of his own vineyard; "he wanders from the paths of his own huſbandry; he paſſes through a deſert without water, "and a land deſtined to thirſt, and he gathers un-"fruitfulneſs with his hands;" and which are retained in the Syriac and Arabic verſion, but are not in the Hebrew text.

℣. 13. A fooliſh woman is clamorous, &c.] Some by this woman underſtand folly itſelf, as oppoſed to wiſdom; others blind reaſon, ignorant of divine things; others carnal ſenſual pleaſure, which entices and draws men to that which is evil; others hereſy and ſuperſtition; others the old ſerpent, the devil; ſhe ſeems to be the ſame with the ſtrange woman and harlot before deſcribed, chap. ii. 16. and v. 3. and vii. 5, &c. and being ſet in direct oppoſition to wiſdom, or Chriſt, ſeems to deſign Antichriſt, who is deſcribed in the book of the Revelation as the great whore; and all the characters here agree with the ſame. Antichriſt is repreſented as a woman, Rev. xvii. 3, 4, 6, 18. and is fooliſh; for whatever worldly cunning and craft, and wicked ſubtlety there may be in the Romiſh Antichriſt, yet he is deſtitute of all ſpiritual wiſdom and knowledge; and is clamorous and noiſy, has a mouth ſpeaking great ſwelling words of vanity and blaſphemy, boaſting of infallibility, works of ſupererogation, merits, miracles, wealth, and riches; and very preſſing and importunate to gain proſelytes to his religion; the prieſts and jeſuits are compared to noiſy, clamorous, croaking frogs, Rev. xvi. 13. She is ſimple, and knoweth nothing; a woman of follies, extremely fooliſh and ſimple, and moſt groſsly ignorant; knows nothing that is good, as the Targum; that is, ſpiritually good; knows not God aright; is without the fear and love of him, and faith in him; nor knows Chriſt, and the way of righteouſneſs and life by him; nor the Spirit of God, and the operations of his grace upon the heart; nor the goſpel, and the doctrines of it; nor the ways, worſhip, and ordinances of God. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions are, ſhe knows not ſhame; but is bold and impudent, having a whore's forehead, and on it written, Myſtery, Babylon, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth, Rev. xvii. 5.

℣. 14. For ſhe ſitteth at the door of her houſe, &c.] Idle and inactive, looking out for her prey; not active and laborious as wiſdom, building her houſe, killing her beaſts, furniſhing her table, and ſending out her maidens to call in her gueſts; but expoſing herſelf in the moſt public manner, and being at the utmoſt eaſe, ſitting as a queen; ſee Rev. xviii. 7. and as it follows, On a ſeat, or throne[p]; the ſame ſeat or throne, power and authority, which the dragon gave to the beaſt or Antichriſt, placed at Rome, where this woman reigns; ſee Rev. xiii. 2. and xvii. 8. In the high places of the city; the city of Rome and its juriſdiction, the high places of which are their temples or churches; where this fooliſh woman is noiſy and clamorous, proclaims her folly, and endeavours to ſeduce and draw perſons to her ſuperſtition and idolatry. Merome, the word for high places, has ſome affinity with Rome, and comes from the ſame root[q].

℣. 15. To call paſſengers who go right on their ways.] Who have been religiouſly educated, and trained up in the principles of true chriſtianity; and who walk outwardly according to the rule of the divine word, and are in a fair way for heaven and eternal happineſs. Theſe ſhe has her eye upon as they paſs along, and calls unto them, and endeavours to turn them aſide out of the way they are going, to make them proſelytes to her antichriſtian religion; which, when ſhe ſucceeds in, ſhe glories and boaſts of; juſt as harlots are very deſirous of ſeducing and debauching chaſte, innocent and virtuous perſons; ſee Rev. ii. 20. Saying as follows:

℣. 16. Whoſo is ſimple, let him turn in hither, &c.] The harlot's houſe, popiſh chapels and churches. She uſes the ſame form of words that wiſdom does, ỹ. 4. having a form of godlineſs, a ſhew of religion, but without the power of it; her prieſts are wolves in ſheeps cloathing, and ſpeak lies in hypocriſy: and ſuch that ſhe fixes upon as proper perſons to work on, are the ſimple, the credulous and unwary; who are not on their guard, and are eaſily perſuaded and impoſed on. And as for him that wanteth underſtanding; is not well-grounded in the principles of chriſtianity he profeſſes; has not a ſpiritual and experimental underſtanding of them, She ſaith to him; addreſſes him in ſuch language as follows.

ỹ. 17. Stolen waters are ſweet, &c.] Wells and fountains of waters in thoſe hot countries were very valuable, and were the property of particular perſons; about which there were ſometimes great ſtrife and contention; and they were ſometimes ſealed and kept from the uſe of others; ſee Gen. xxvi. 18—22. Cant. iv. 12. now waters got by ſtealth from ſuch wells and fountains, were ſweeter than their own, or what might be had in common and without difficulty, to which the proverb alludes. By which in general is meant, that all prohibited, unlawful luſts and pleaſures, are deſirable to men, and ſweet in the enjoyment of them; and the pleaſure promiſed by them is what makes them ſo deſirable, and the more ſo becauſe forbidden: and particularly as adultery, which is a ſort of theft[r], and a drinking water out of another's ciſtern, chap. v. 15. being forbidden and unlawful, and ſecretly committed, is ſweeter to an unclean perſon than a lawful enjoyment of his own wife; ſo falſe worſhip, ſuperſtition and idolatry, the inventions of men, and obedience to their commands, which are no other than ſpiritual adultery, are more grateful and pleaſing to a corrupt mind, than the true and pure worſhip of God. And bread eaten in ſecret is pleaſant; or, bread of ſecret places[s]; hidden bread, as the Targum, Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions; that which is ſtolen and is another's[t], and is taken and hid in ſecret places, fetched out from thence, or eaten there: the ſweet morſel of ſin, rolled in the mouth and kept under the tongue; ſecret luſts, private ſins, particularly idolatry, to which men are ſecretly enticed, and which they privately commit, Deut. xiii. 6. the ſame thing is deſigned by this clauſe as the former.

ỹ. 18. But he knoweth not that the dead are there, &c.] In the houſe of this fooliſh and wicked woman, into which ſhe invites paſſengers to turn; the ſimple that is perſuaded by her, does not conſider that there are none there to be his companions, but ſuch who are dead in a moral or ſpiritual ſenſe; that though they live in pleaſure, they are dead whilſt they live. Aben Ezra refers this to hell in the next clauſe; where her gueſts are, and where thoſe that are ſlain by her have their everlaſting abode; and where the giants are, as the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions; or the mighty ones ſhe has caſt down there, as the Targum; ſo the word rephaim ſometimes ſignifies: and ſome think that reference is had to the giants of the old world, that corrupted their way on earth, and brought a deluge on it; ſee chap. vii. 26. And that her gueſts are in the depths of hell; not only in the way to it, and on the brink of it, but in the very midſt of it: there are many in hell ſhe has invited into her houſe, and perſuaded to turn in there, and commit fornication with her; and all that worſhip the beaſt, or commit ſpiritual adultery with the whore of Rome, will go down to perdition with her, and have their portion in hell-fire, in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone; which they do not conſider, that are drawn into her idolatrous practices, Rev. xiv. 9—11.

CHAP. X.

FROM this chapter to the twenty fifth, are various proverbial ſentences, without any very apparent connection or coherence with each other; deſcribing righteous and wicked men; ſetting forth their different temper, conduct and actions, and the fruits and effects of them. It ſhould be obſerved, that frequently in the preceding chapters, two perſons are repreſented as women; one goes by the name of wiſdom, the other is called the fooliſh woman and an harlot; the former is clearly to be underſtood of Chriſt; and the latter, being oppoſed to him, muſt be Antichriſt, the whore of Rome, and mother of harlots: now in the following part of this book, two ſorts of perſons are ſpoken of; the one as wiſe, righteous, good, &c. and the other as fooliſh, wicked, &c. who are no other than the followers of Chriſt and Antichriſt; which obſervation is a key to the whole book.

ỹ. 1. The proverbs of Solomon, &c.] This title is repeated from chap. i. 1. and very properly ſtands here; ſince here begin thoſe pithy ſentences of Solomon, which bear the name of Proverbs; the preceding chapters being a ſort of preface or introduction to them; in which Solomon recommends the ſtudy of wiſdom, ſhews the profit and advantage of it, gives directions about it, and prepares for the reception of thoſe wiſe ſayings that follow; which are for the moſt part independent of each other, and conſiſt generally of clauſes ſet in a contraſt to one another, and often expreſſed by ſimilies and metaphors. A wiſe ſon maketh a glad father; as Solomon made glad his father David: for no doubt there were appearances of his wiſdom before he came to the throne, though greater afterwards; which made David rejoice that he was placed on the throne before his death, to whom he had committed the charge of building the houſe of the Lord. But a fooliſh ſon is the heavineſs of his mother; brings grief and trouble to her, as perhaps Rehoboam did to his mother: though all this is to be underſtood conjunctly of both parents, and not ſeparately of each; not as if a wiſe ſon only was matter of joy to his father, who may be thought to be a better judge of his wiſdom, and more abroad to hear the fame of it, and to obſerve the effects of it; or as if a fooliſh ſon only cauſed grief to his mother, becauſe more at home, and more privy to his fooliſh behaviour; but as being equally joyous or afflicting to both parents. Nor is this to be underſtood of ſuch who are wiſe and fooliſh as to their natural capacities only; but who are ſo in a moral ſenſe, either virtuous or vicious, good or wicked. Wherefore parents ſhould be concerned for the education of their children, whoſe behaviour much depends upon it; and children for their conduct towards their parents and in the world, ſince their joy and grief are influenced by it. Some interpret the words myſtically, the father, of God; the mother, of the church; and the ſons, of the children of them both: and ſo may fitly deſcribe the different followers of Chriſt and Antichriſt; the one being wiſe, the other fooliſh; the one acceptable to God, the other not.

℣. 2. Treaſures of wickedneſs profit nothing, &c.] By which are meant either a large abundance of riches in general, which for the moſt part are enjoyed by wicked men, and abuſed to wicked purpoſes, chap. xi. 4. or an affluence of them, obtained in a wicked way, by fraud, oppreſſion, and the like; ſee Mic. vi. 10. Or are either not uſed at all, or put to wicked uſes: what are not uſed, profit not the poſſeſſors of them, for they are kept to the hurt of the owners of them; and thoſe which are got by ill means, or put to an ill uſe, periſh by evil travel, Eccl. v. 13, 14. Nor can any one by his riches either redeem himſelf or his brother from deſtruction, or give to God a ranſom for him; nor can he by them ſave himſelf from a corporal death, one year, one month, one day, one hour, one moment; nor will they be of any ſervice to him in the day of judgment, when wrath comes forth againſt him. But righteouſneſs delivereth from death; either that which is righteouſly got, though it be ever ſo little, is a means of preſerving life, and keeps their ſouls from famiſhing, ℣. 3. or elſe what is liberally diſpenſed, for alms are called righteouſneſs, Pſal. cxii. 9. Dan. iv. 27. Matt. vi. 1. 2 Cor. ix. 10. Theſe are oftentimes the means of ſaving the lives of perſons ready to periſh, on whom they are beſtowed, and who will venture their lives to ſave their benefactors; and ſuch liberal perſons are oftentimes bleſſed with long life, and are kept alive when threatened with death, Pſal. xli. 1—3. and though their good deeds are not meritorious of eternal life, yet they are rewarded with it in a way of grace, Matt. xxv. 34—38. Moreover, righteouſneſs may be conſidered as legal and evangelical; a legal righteouſneſs, or the righteouſneſs of men in obedience to the law, cannot deliver from the ſentence of death the law has paſſed; it is not properly a righteouſneſs; it is imperfect, cannot juſtify, ſave, or bring to heaven, or intitle to life; notwithſtanding this a man muſt die: but there is an evangelical righteouſneſs; and this is either imparted and implanted in men, is the new man, which is created in righteouſneſs and holineſs; and this delivers from a moral or ſpiritual death, a death in treſpaſſes and ſins men are in; for by it they are quickened, live a life of faith on Chriſt, and have communion with God; have his image inſtamped on them, and live to him, and to Chriſt, and to righteouſneſs, being freed from the ſervitude and dominion of ſin; living in which is no other than death: or this righteouſneſs is imputed, which is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, wrought out for them, reckoned to them, received by them, and by which they are juſtified; this delivers them, though not from a corporal death, yet from the ſting and curſe of it, and from it as a penal evil, or as a puniſhment for ſin; and it delivers from a legal death, or from the ſentence and condemnation of the law, and from the ſecond and eternal death, and intitles them to life everlaſting.

℣. 3. The Lord will not ſuffer the ſoul of the righteous to famiſh, &c.] Or to periſh by famine: not but that good men may be afflicted with it, as Jacob and his ſons were, when the famine was in Egypt and in other lands; and as the apoſtles, particularly the apoſtle Paul, were often in hunger and thirſt, yet not ſo as to be deſtroyed by it; for in famine the Lord redeems ſuch from death; though the young lions lack and ſuffer hunger, they that fear the Lord ſhall not want any good thing; at leaſt whatever they may ſuffer this way, does not ariſe from the wrath of God, nor does it, nor can it ſeparate from the love of God and Chriſt, Job v. 20. Pſalm xxxiv. 8, 9. Rom. viii. 35. Moreover, the ſouls of ſuch ſhall not be famiſhed for want of ſpiritual food; ſhall not have a famine of the word and ordinances; their ſouls ſhall be fed, as with marrow and fatneſs, with the fineſt of the wheat, and with honey out of the rock: the church, tho' in the wilderneſs, is nouriſhed for a time, and times, and half a time, Rev. xii. 14. But he caſteth away the ſubſtance of the wicked; that which is got in a wicked way; as ſometimes he cauſes it to diminiſh by little and little; at other times he forcibly and ſuddenly drives it away, and cauſes it to take wings and fly away; though it has been ſwallowed down with great greedineſs and in great abundance, he makes them throw it up again, and caſts it out of their belly, whether they will or no, ſo that it does not profit them, Job xx. 15.

℣. 4. He becometh poor that dealeth with a ſlack hand, &c.] That is either remiſs in giving to the neceſſities of others, according to his abilities, and as caſes require; or that is negligent and ſlothful in his buſineſs. Or, that worketh with a deceitful hand; or, with a hand of deceit [v], as it may be rendered; who pretends to work, but does not; makes a ſhow as if he did, but acts deceitfully; or who uſes many tricking and deceitful ways and methods to live, as uſually ſlothful perſons do. Aben Ezra obſerves, it may be rendered and interpreted, he becomes poor that makes a deceitful balance; thinking to enrich himſelf by ſuch fraudulent practices: or, as others, a deceitful balance maketh poor [w]; ſuch ſeldom or ever thrive, or it does not long proſper with them who uſe ſuch unlawful methods. But the hand of the diligent maketh rich; that is, with the bleſſing of God along with it, as in ℣. 22. ſuch who are ſharp [x] and acute, as the word ſignifies; who are careful and induſtrious, mind their buſineſs, and do the honeſt part; theſe, with a divine bleſſing, frequently grow rich: or rather, who are like thoſe that dig in the earth for gold, who ſearch for it with great eagerneſs and diligence; for from this root is a word often uſed for gold, Prov. iii. 14. and viii. 19. and xvi. 16. All this is true in a ſpiritual ſenſe; ſuch who are ſlothful in attendance on the means of grace, the word and ordinances, are ſlack and negligent in duty, bring a ſpiritual poverty upon them; and, like the Laodicean church, who, through her lukewarmneſs and carnal ſecurity, became poor and wretched, blind and naked: on the other hand, ſuch who are diligent in the uſe of means, are frequent at the throne of grace, forſake not the aſſembly of the ſaints, conſtantly wait at wiſdom's gates; theſe grow rich in grace and in all good works.

&c.] Which is the time of gathering the fruits of the earth, and laying them up againſt winter, as the ant is ſaid to do, chap. vi. 8. But he that ſleepeth in harveſt, is a ſon that cauſeth ſhame; to himſelf, and to his parents and relations. The ſum of the proverb is, that in the time of health and youth, perſons ſhould be active and induſtrious in their ſeveral callings and ſtations, and provide againſt a time of ſickneſs and old age; and that they ſhould loſe no opportunities, neither in a natural nor ſpiritual way, of doing or receiving good.

℣. 6. Bleſſings are upon the head of the juſt, &c.] That ſeeks for righteouſneſs, not by the works of the law, but by faith; that lives by faith upon the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and is juſtified by it, made, accounted, and reckoned juſt through it; and in conſequence of his faith, does juſtly, and lives ſoberly, righteouſly and godly: upon his head, who is Chriſt, bleſſings are; for he is the head of every ſuch man, 1 Cor. xi. 3. not the pope of Rome, but Chriſt is head of the church; he is the repreſentative and fœderal head of all the elect, both in eternity and time; he is a political head to them, as a king is to his ſubjects; an œconomical one, as the huſband is the head of the wife, a father the head of his family, and a maſter the head of his ſervants; and he is in ſuch ſenſe an head to them, as a natural head is to its body; he is of the ſame nature with them, ſuperior to them, a perfect, only, everliving and everlaſting head. Upon him all the bleſſings of grace and goodneſs are; his people are bleſſed with them in him, their head, Epheſ. i. 3. and from him they deſcend to them, the members of his body, juſt as the oil on Aaron's head ran down his beard to the ſkirts of his garments. So in an ancient writing of the Jews[y], this paſſage being mentioned, it is aſked, Who is the head of the righteous? The anſwer is, the middle pillar; by whom they ſeem to mean a middle perſon, the Mediator, the Meſſiah. Or elſe, a part being put for the whole, the meaning is, that bleſſings are upon the perſons of righteous ones, as the word is uſed in chap. xi. 26. and xxv. 22. the Targum renders it, "the heads of the righteous." All covenant-bleſſings, ſpiritual ones, ſuch as are bleſſings indeed, ſolid and ſubſtantial, irreverſible and for ever; particularly a juſtifying righteouſneſs, from whence they are denominated juſt; pardon of ſin, peace of ſoul, every ſanctifying grace, the bleſſing of adoption, and a right to eternal life: theſe being ſaid to be on the head of them, may denote that they come from above, and deſcend in a way of grace upon them; that they are viſible and manifeſt; that they reſide, continue, and remain upon them; that they are as an ornament and crown unto them; and that they are a ſecurity of them, that no wrath and vengeance can fall upon them. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Arabic verſions read, the bleſſing of the Lord is upon the head of the juſt; and ſuch are all the bleſſings before mentioned. But violence covereth the mouth of the wicked; that is, either his violent dealings are open and manifeſt, and are a ſcandal to him, as well as entail a curſe on him; or rather, the fruit and effect of his violence and oppreſſion, the puniſhment due thereunto, is ſo righteouſly inflicted on him, that his mouth is ſtopped, and he has not one word to ſay againſt the juſt judgments of God upon him, for his violent uſage of men, whether here or hereafter; ſee Pſal. cvii. 42. Some render the words, the mouth of the wicked covereth violence[z]; palliates and excuſes it, and calls it by another name; or hides and conceals that which is in the heart, and does not utter it; ſee ℣. 18. The Targum is, "in the mouth of the wicked rapine is covered;" as a ſweet morſel under their tongue, though in the end bitterneſs.

℣. 7. The memory of the juſt is bleſſed, &c.] Men to whom he has been uſeful, either in temporals or ſpirituals, bleſs him, or wiſh all bleſſings to him whilſt alive, whenever they make mention of his name; and after death they ſpeak well of him, and pronounce him bleſſed; for ſuch are had in everlaſting remembrance; the memory of them is ſweet and precious; their name is famous and valuable, and always ſpoken of with honour and commendation; ſee Pſal. cxii. 6. The Jewiſh writers take it for a command, and render it, let the memory of the juſt be bleſſed; and ſay, that he that tranſgreſſes it, breaks an affirmative precept; they make an abbreviation of the word by the initial letters, and join them to the names of their celebrated men. But the name of the wicked ſhall rot; ſhall be forgotten, be buried in oblivion, and never mentioned: and though they may call their houſes, lands and cities, by their own names, in order to tranſmit their memory to poſterity; yet theſe, by one means or another, are deſtroyed, and their memorials periſh with them; ſee Eccl. viii. 10. Pſal. xlix. 11. and ix. 6. and if their names are mentioned after they are gone, it is with deteſtation and abhorrence, as things putrified are abhorred; ſo they leave an ill ſavour behind them, when the good name of the righteous is as precious ointment, Eccl. vii. 1. It is a ſaying of Cicero[a], that "the life of the dead lies in the memory of the living."

℣. 8. The wiſe in heart will receive commandments, &c.] Such who have true wiſdom in the hidden part of the heart, of which the fear of the Lord is the beginning: theſe will, not only as good ſubjects, honour their King, and attend to his lawful commands; and as dutiful children, regard thoſe of their parents; and as faithful ſervants, hearken to thoſe of their maſters; but, as ſuch that fear the Lord, will receive and chearfully obey the commandments of God and Chriſt. But a prating fool ſhall fall; like Diotrephes, that prated againſt the apoſtle John and other ſaints. Or, a fool of lips[b]; whoſe folly is proclaimed and made known by his lips; who, out of the abundance of it in his heart, ſpeaks and pours it out by his lips: ſuch an one falls into ſin and into miſchief; he falls into diſgrace in this world, and into hell in the next. The Targum is, "the fool by his lips ſhall be taken;" as in a ſnare.

℣. 9. He that walketh uprightly, walketh ſurely, &c.] Or, that walketh in perfection[c], as the Targum. Not that walks without ſin, no man does that; but that walks in the ſincerity, integrity, and uprightneſs of his heart, both before God and men; who worſhips God in ſpirit and in truth, and ſpeaks the truth in his heart to his neighbour; who is an Iſraelite indeed, in whom is no guile; who walks uprightly according to the truth of the goſpel; who makes the word of God the rule of his life and actions; who walks by faith on Chriſt, uſing him as the way to the Father; believing in him for ſalvation; walking on in him as he has received him, and eſpecially dealing with his uprightneſs or righteouſneſs for his juſtification before God; who walks, as Chriſt did, in imitation of him; who walks in love, as he did, and in all humility, meekneſs, patience and ſelf-denial; who walks in and after the Spirit of Chriſt; and in the truths of the goſpel, and in all the ordinances thereof; and in all holy converſation and godlineſs, ſtudying to exerciſe a conſcience void of offence towards God and men. Such a man walks ſurely, or ſecurely, ſafely, confidently, as the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and all the Oriental verſions, interpret the word. Such an one has nothing to fear in his walk; he walks on terra firma, on good ground, in a good way, which leads to life eternal: he has a good guide, the Spirit of God, which goes before him, and will be his guide even unto death, and lead him in the way everlaſting, unto the land of uprightneſs; he has a good guard about him, not only the angels of God that encamp around him, but God himſelf is a wall of fire to him, and his power ſurrounds and protects him; he has many precious promiſes to ſupport him; not only that the Lord will be a buckler to him, but will withhold no good thing from him, chap. ii. 7. Pſal. lxxxiv. 11. he has the gracious and ſupporting preſence of God, when he paſſes through the fire and water of afflictions, and even through the valley of the ſhadow of death, ſo that he has nothing to fear; and has moreover the teſtimony of a good conſcience; and having a good hope through grace, he walks in hope, as the Targum is; yea, rejoices in hope of the glory of God, and holds faſt that rejoicing to the end. But he that perverteth his ways, ſhall be known; who does not walk in a plain, direct and even path, according to the rule of the word, as the upright man; but winds about here and there, goes into crooked paths, walks in craftineſs as deceitful workers, whoſe folly ſhall be made manifeſt; though they think to hide it, and deceive men, they and their wickedneſs ſhall be expoſed, their tricks and artful methods ſhall be laid open, and they be known to be what they are; if not in this life, yet at the laſt judgment, 1 Tim. v. 24. 2 Tim. iii. 9. Jarchi and Aben Ezra obſerve another ſenſe of the word, he ſhall be broken, and compare with it Judg. viii. 16. Iſa. liii. 3.

℣. 10. He that winketh with the eye, &c.] The Syriac and Arabic verſions add, with fraud. A deſcriptive character of a wicked man, chap. vi. 13. who ſo does, either to draw and allure perſons to go along with him, and join him in his evil practices; or by way of ſcorn and contempt of others; or as a token to another of its being the proper time to circumvent his neighbour, or do him an injury. Such an one cauſeth ſorrow; to himſelf in the iſſue, however he may for the preſent pleaſe himſelf with his evil doings; and to others, whom he allures and deceives. The Arabic verſion is, heaps afflictions or ſorrows on men; whom he corrupts and draws into his evil company and converſation. But a prating fool ſhall fall; or, be taken, as the Targum; or beaten, as the Vulgate Latin; ſee the note on ℣. 8.

℣. 11. The mouth of a righteous man is a well of life, &c.] Like a fountain of living water, continually running and flowing with water, wholſome, reviving and refreſhing; ſo the righteous man's mouth, out of the abundance of his heart, overflows with good things, which miniſter grace to the hearers, and are for the uſe of edifying; things that are pleaſant and profitable, grateful and acceptable, comforting, refreſhing and pleaſing, and which tend to the good of the life that now is, and that which is to come. But violence covereth the mouth of the wicked; ſo that nothing comes out of it but what is pernicious and hurtful; what ſavours of rapine and violence; nothing but lying and deceit, curſing and ſwearing, and ſuch like filthy and corrupt communication; ſee the note on ℣. 6. The Targum is, the mouth of the ungodly covers injury; which is meditated in the heart; ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion.

℣. 12. Hatred ſtirreth up ſtrifes, &c.] A man, whoſe heart is full of hatred and malice againſt his neighbour, will ſtir up, or awake, as the word [d] ſignifies, contentions and quarrels which were happily laid aſleep; theſe he renews by tale-bearing, and whiſperings, and evil ſurmiſes; by raiſing lies, ſpreading falſe reports and calumnies, and by virulent reproaches and ſlanders. But love covereth all ſins; not its own, but others; in imitation of the pardoning love and grace of God, which covers all the ſins of his people with the blood and righteouſneſs of his Son. Love ſpreads its mantle over the ſins of its fellow-creatures and chriſtians, and forgives them, even all of them; inſtead of expoſing them, hides and conceals them; and inſtead of loading and aggravating the infirmities of others, puts the beſt conſtructions on them, hopes and bears, and believes all things, 1 Cor. xiii. 7. ſee 1 Pet. iv. 8. where the apoſtle ſeems to have reſpect to this paſſage. This is not to be underſtood as conniving at or ſuffering ſin upon others, or as contrary to chriſtian reproofs and rebukes for it.

℣. 13. In the lips of him that hath underſtanding, wiſdom is found, &c.] He that has an underſtanding, eſpecially of divine, ſpiritual and evangelic things, which is the pure gift of God; wiſdom will be found in his lips, his mouth will ſpeak of it; not of mere natural wiſdom, but ſpiritual wiſdom; of the wiſdom of God in his works; of Chriſt, the wiſdom of God; of the goſpel, the hidden wiſdom; of inward experience of the grace of God, wiſdom in the inward part, Pſal. xxxvii. 30. from his lips, will drop wiſe ſayings, very inſtructive and informing; which thoſe that ſeek for and obſerve, may find to their profit and advantage, and to the great credit and honour of the underſtanding man; whilſt the fooliſh man gets both ſtripes and diſgrace, as follows. But a rod is for the back of him that is void of underſtanding; or, wants a heart [e]: that has no underſtanding of ſpiritual things in his heart, and ſo utters nothing but what is fooliſh and wicked, and ſooner or later is chaſtiſed for it. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, read this clauſe in connection with the former, thus; he that brings forth wiſdom out of his lips, ſmites with a rod him that is void of underſtanding.

℣. 14. Wiſe men lay up knowledge, &c.] Which they get by reading, prayer, meditation, hearing the word of God, and converſation with good men: this they lay up in their hearts, minds and memories, that they may not forget it, and as a rich treaſure they highly value it; that they may bring it forth at proper times, and on proper occaſions, for the benefit of others; ſee Matt. xii. 35. and xiii. 52. or hide [f] it; conceal it; do not boaſt and brag of it, as fooliſh men do. But the mouth of the fooliſh is near deſtruction; who raſhly and unguardedly utters things which bring ſwift and ſudden deſtruction on himſelf and others; or terror and conſternation, as the word [g] alſo ſignifies. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, but the mouth of the fooliſh is near to confuſion; he boaſts of his knowledge, betrays his ignorance, and ſo brings himſelf to ſhame and confuſion.

℣. 15. The rich man's wealth is his ſtrong city, &c.] What a fortified city is to perſons in time of war, that is a rich man's wealth to him; by it he can defend himſelf from the injuries of others, and ſupport himſelf and family in times of public calamity; for money is a defence, and anſwers all things, Eccl. vii. 12. and x. 19. Or his wealth is ſo in his own apprehenſion and conceit; he puts his truſt and confidence in it, and thinks himſelf ſafe and ſecure by it; when he is truſting to uncertain riches, which will fail him; theſe may fly away from him in life, and leave him expoſed to diſtreſs and danger; and however, will not ſecure him at death from the wrath of God and everlaſting deſtruction. Or he is lifted up with his riches, is in high ſpirits, and deſpiſes others; thinking himſelf ſafe, as in a ſtrong caſtle, and fears nothing, diſtreſſes, diſeaſes or death. The deſtruction of the poor is their poverty; or their poverty is their conſternation, as the word [h] ſignifies, it frights them; they, knowing their circumſtances, are afraid of every body and of every thing; not being able to defend themſelves againſt their enemies, or ſupport themſelves in times of public calamity, as war, famine or peſtilence.

℣. 16. The labour of the righteous tendeth to life, &c.] To natural life, and the ſupport of it; all that he labours for is to get a livelihood for himſelf and family; that is all he deſires, nor does he ſeek great things for himſelf: or to ſpiritual life; ſo his ſpiritual exerciſes in praying, reading and hearing the word, and waiting upon ordinances, have a tendency to promote and maintain a ſpiritual life in him: or to eternal life; not that the works of a righteous man, ſo the Targum, Septuagint and Arabic verſions, render it in the plural number, are meritorious of eternal life; for life and righteouſneſs are not to be had by the works of men, but by the grace of God; yet as the righteous man labours for the meat which endures to everlaſting life, given by the Son of God, his labour may be ſaid to tend to life eternal, John vi. 27. The fruit of the wicked to ſin; whatever he enjoys, whether got by labour; though the word ſeems purpoſely omitted, as ſome obſerve, to ſignify that is not intended; or whether left him as an inheritance; or whatever way acquired, lawfully or unlawfully; all his revenues and riches, the increaſe of his ſubſtance and fields, are all uſed to ſinful purpoſes, to pride, luxury, and wantonneſs; and ſo tend to death, even death eternal, the juſt wages of ſin.

℣. 17. He is in the way of life, &c.] Of eternal life, which is truly, properly, and by way of eminency, life, Matt. xix. 17. and which is a life of glory; a life of perfection, of perfect holineſs, knowledge, obedience, love, peace and joy; a life free from all the inconveniencies of the preſent life, animal or ſpiritual; a life of pleaſure, and which will laſt for ever: the way to it, is not by works of righteouſneſs done by men, ſince by theſe the law is not fulfilled, nor juſtice ſatisfied; and therefore no juſtification of life by them, or what intitles to eternal life; it is ſinful, dangerous, and a vain thing to ſeek for eternal life in this way; Chriſt is the only true way to it; who, by his obedience, ſufferings and death, has opened the new and living way; and through his blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, way is made for all that believe in him, to enter into eternal life: and ſuch are in the way to it, who are in Chriſt, ſecretly in election, openly in effectual vocation; when they are made new creatures, are quickened by the Spirit and grace of Chriſt, and have that principle in them, which is a well of living water, ſpringing up unto everlaſting life; who have a ſight of Chriſt, and come unto him by faith; who truly believe in him, with which eternal life is connected. Particularly he is in the way unto it, That keepeth inſtruction; the inſtruction in righteouſneſs, which the ſcriptures give, eſpecially the goſpel-part of them; which is an inſtruction into the mind and will of God about man's ſalvation; into the grace of God, as diſplayed therein; into the perſon and offices of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; into the doctrines of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and life, through him. Now he to whom this inſtruction comes with power, and is the ſavour of life unto life; who receives it in the love of it; who obſerves [i] it, as the word here uſed ſignifies; takes notice of and follows its direction, pointing out Chriſt as the way of ſalvation, inſtructing to look to him and believe in him, and be ſaved; and who retains and holds faſt ſuch inſtruction, and abides by it; and finds the word of the goſpel, and eats it, and is nouriſhed by it unto everlaſting life; he is moſt aſſuredly in the way of it. But he that refuſeth reproof, erreth; that is, from the way of life. He that rejects the counſel and advice, the admonitions and reproofs, given in the word of God, by the miniſters of it; or by parents and maſters, friends or relations, that wiſh him well; he wanders far off from the way that leads to life, and goes into the paths of ſin, and conſequently is in the way of death. Some render it, cauſeth to err [k]; either others, as Aben Ezra; or both himſelf and others, as Jarchi: and then it may be underſtood of him that forſaketh reproof [l], as it may be rendered; that is, that declines giving reproof, when it lies in his way, and is his duty to do it. Aben Ezra reads this clauſe in connection with the former, as ſaid of one and the ſame perſon, "he is "in the way of life that keepeth inſtruction, and "forſakes or rejects the reproof of him that cauſeth "to err."

℣. 18. He that hideth hatred with lying lips, &c.] Or he whoſe lying lips hide hatred, which is much the ſame; who pretends to be a friend, and outwardly behaves as one, but inwardly nouriſhes and cheriſhes hatred in his heart, which he covers and conceals, till he has a proper opportunity of ſhewing it; as Abſalom to Amnon, Joab to Amaſa, the men of Anathoth to Jeremiah, and Judas to Chriſt; ſee chap. xxvi. 24—26. Or, he that hideth hatred, is a man of lying lips [m]; he is a liar, as the perſon next deſcribed is a fool. And he that uttereth ſlander, der, is a fool; that brings it out by wholeſale, and hides it not; who openly defames his neighbour, and in the moſt public manner; and with a multitude of words, detracts from his good name, credit and reputation, and loads him with calumny and reproach; ſuch a man is a fool, a very wicked man: yea, not only the public ſlanderer, but the ſecret diſſembler, who thinks himſelf a cunning man becauſe he hides himſelf; each of theſe is a fool, the one as well as the other. Gerſom thinks there is a compariſon made between the diſſembler and the ſlanderer; the one being a liar, and the other a fool; and that the former is more abominable and pernicious than the latter.

ỳ. 19. In the multitude of words there wanteth not ſin, &c.] Where a great deal is ſaid, without care and forethought, there will not only be many weak things uttered, but much falſhood, and at leaſt many idle things, which cannot be excuſed from ſin; not but that much and long ſpeaking may be to great profit and advantage, when it is with care and judgment, and founded on cloſe meditation and ſtudy. Or, ſin ceaſeth not[n]; along with a torrent of words is a flow of ſin, which ceaſes not as long as that continues: it is a ſaying of the Jewiſh Rabbins, "he that multiplies words, brings on or brings unto ſin." But he that refraineth his lips, is wiſe; lays a reſtraint on his mouth, bridles his tongue; does not ſuffer his lips to utter any thing raſhly and inconſiderately; is ſparing of his words, and is careful of what he ſays, that it is true and proper to be ſpoken; and conſiders well the time when, place where, and perſons to whom he ſpeaks; and all circumſtances weighed, conducts accordingly: ſuch a man is a wiſe, prudent and underſtanding man; ſee chap. xvii. 27, 28.

ỳ. 20. The tongue of the juſt is as choice ſilver, &c.] Which utters things precious, pure, pleaſant and profitable; things for worth and value as choice ſilver; the doctrines of the goſpel, the power of which he has felt upon his heart; the precious promiſes of it, which have been applied unto him; and the rich experience of grace he has been favoured with: things pure and incorrupt like ſilver free from droſs; as the doctrines of grace, fetched out of the mines of the ſacred ſcripture, free from the droſs of error, without any human mixture; conſiſtent and all of a piece, and which tend to purity of heart and life; things the reverſe of a corrupt communication, nothing filthy and unclean; a pure language, the language of Canaan; the language of repentance, faith and love, of prayer and thankfulneſs: things which are grateful and acceptable, are with grace, and miniſter grace to the hearers; things profitable and edifying; for the righteous man's mouth ſpeaks wiſdom, and his tongue talks of judgment; and his lips feed many, as in the next verſe; ſee Pſalm xxxvii. 30. The heart of the wicked is little worth; good for nothing, as the Vulgate Latin verſion. The righteous man's tongue is better than the wicked man's heart; there is no good thing in his heart naturally; all manner of evil is in it, and comes out of it; no ſin can be named but what is in his heart; all that is in it is ſinful; the thoughts of it, and the imagination of his thoughts, are only evil, and that continually; the affections are inordinate, and ſet on ſinful luſts and pleaſures; the mind and conſcience are defiled with ſin; the underſtanding is darkened with it, and the will is obſtinate and perverſe, and bent upon it: his heart is wicked, and exceedingly wicked; it is wickedneſs itſelf, very wickedneſs, deſperately wicked, incurably ſo without the grace of God. Such therefore know not their hearts, who ſay, they have good hearts; and they are fools that truſt in them: this ſhews the neceſſity of regeneration, and that powerful and efficacious grace is requiſite to it.

ỳ. 21. The lips of the righteous feed many, &c.] Not their bodies; words are but wind, and will not feed; it is not enough to ſay to the diſtreſſed, be ye warmed and filled, and give nothing; unleſs this can be underſtood of obtaining food for others by their prayers, as Jarchi interprets it: but the ſouls of many; theſe the righteous feed, by communicating the ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding of divine things, they are partakers of; by ſetting before them the bread of life, the honey and milk of the goſpel, they have under their tongue; and by the good counſel and advice, comforts and admonitions, they give them; ſee Jer. iii. 15. Cant. iv. 11. But fools die for want of wiſdom; not a corporal death, which is common to men of every rank and quality, wiſe men die even as fools; but they continue under the power of a ſpiritual death, for want of enlightning and quickning grace, and ſo die an eternal death: not for want of natural wiſdom, which they may have a greater ſhare of than thoſe who live ſpiritually and eternally; but for want of ſpiritual wiſdom and knowledge; the knowledge of Chriſt, and the way of life and ſalvation by him, and the knowledge of God in Chriſt; and not always for the want of the means of ſuch wiſdom and knowledge; as the ſcriptures, which are able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation; and the goſpel, which is the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; but through the neglect and contempt of them: though ſometimes men periſh through want of the means of knowledge, and the neglect of thoſe who ſhould inſtruct them, Hoſ. iv. 6.

ỳ. 22. The bleſſing of the Lord, it maketh rich, &c.] In the diligent uſe of means; ſee ỳ. 4. riches are from the Lord, and ſhould be acknowledged as ſuch, and not attributed to the induſtry, diligence, ſagacity, and merit of men; but ſhould be looked upon as had through the bleſſing of the Lord upon the labours of men; and when they come this way they come as a bleſſing, and with one: it may be underſtood of being made rich in a ſpiritual ſenſe; it is the bleſſing, good-will, and favour of God that makes men rich in Chriſt; that beſtows upon them his unſearchable riches; that enriches them with all ſpiritual bleſſings in him; that makes them rich in faith and in good works, and with the riches of grace and of glory. And he addeth no ſorrow with it; no ſorrow goes along with the bleſſing, but what is a bleſſing itſelf, as one obſerves; riches enjoyed, through the bleſſing of God, are not attended with that ſorrow in getting, keeping, and loſing them, as the riches of wicked men unlawfully gotten are; ſee 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. for as the good man comes by them eaſily, without any anxious care and ſinful ſolicitude; he ſeeking the kingdom of God and his righteouſneſs, all theſe things are added to him, over and above, without much thought about them, or expectation of them, Matt. vi. 33. ſo it is with great delight, pleaſure and chearfulneſs he enjoys them, and readily communicates them to others; whilſt the wicked man is full of anxiety, diſtreſs, and ſorrow; ſee Eccl. v. 12, 13, 18. and vi. 2. This is eminently true of ſpiritual riches; there is no ſorrow attending them; the fruit and effect of them are peace, joy, and comfort.

℣. 23. It is as ſport to a fool to do miſchief, &c.] To do any injury to the perſons and properties of men; which ſhews a moſt wicked and malicious ſpirit, a very depraved nature indeed: or rather to commit ſin[o] of any ſort, which he has deviſed in his own heart; it is as a laughing[p], as the words may be rendered; it is a laughing matter to him, he commits ſin, and when he has done it, laughs at it; inſtead of being aſhamed of it, and humbled for it, he makes a mock at it, and a jeſt of it, as well as of all religion, and of the reproofs and admonitions of good men. Sin is paſtime, he takes as much delight and pleaſure in it as men do in their ſports, and commits it as openly and freely; yea not only takes pleaſure in doing it himſelf, but in them that do it; ſee Prov. xiv. 9. Rom. i. 32. But a man of underſtanding hath wiſdom; to avoid ſin, and not to do it, which is true wiſdom, Job xxviii. 28. for he has, as it may be rendered, from the uſe of the word in the Arabic language[q], a bridle or reſtraint upon him, that he cannot do miſchief and delight in it, as the fool does: or ſo is wiſdom to a man of underſtanding[r]; that is, to do it; as it is a pleaſure to a fool to commit ſin, ſo it is a delight to an underſtanding man to do that which is wiſe and good; it is meat and drink to do the will of God; he takes as much pleaſure in it as men can do in their ſports and paſtimes; he has a truer pleaſure, and a better reliſh than they have; he delights in the law of God after the inward man; and wiſdom's ways, or the ways of Chriſt, are pleaſantneſs to him; he runs the ways of his commandments with great alacrity and chearfulneſs.

℣. 24. The fear of the wicked, it ſhall come upon him, &c.] What he dreads in his own mind will be his unhappy caſe, ſooner or later it comes upon him; his fear of diſtreſſes, calamities, and judgments in this life, and of eternal wrath and vengeance hereafter; for the moſt profligate and abandoned wretches, the greateſt atheiſts, who endeavour to work themſelves up to a diſbelief of a God and a future ſtate, have at times their frights and fears about theſe things; and as are their fears of God, ſo will his wrath be, Pſal. xc. 11. Jarchi illuſtrates this in the inſtance of the builders of Babel, who were afraid of being ſcattered upon the face of the earth, which thing feared came upon them through and for their building of the tower; and ſo it ſometimes is, that the very thing which men fear comes upon them by the means which they take to prevent it; ſo the Jews were afraid that if their people believed in Jeſus of Nazareth, the Romans would come and ſeize their city and nation, and therefore endeavoured to perſuade them to reject him; for which rejection of him the thing they feared came upon them. But the deſire of the righteous ſhall be granted; or he ſhall give[s]; that is, God ſhall give it; who has it in his hands or power to give it, as Jarchi's note is: what a righteous man deſires from right principles, and with right views; what is for his own good and the glory of God; what he aſks in faith, and with ſubmiſſion to the divine will, and is according to it, is ſooner or later, in God's own time and way, granted unto him: particularly his deſires after righteouſneſs; after the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and to be found alone in that, living and dying; after holineſs of heart and life, that he might be cleanſed and kept from ſin, and preſerved to the coming of Chriſt; after more grace, an increaſe of it, and freſh ſupplies from Chriſt; after more communion with God and Chriſt, and conformity to them; after glory and happineſs, and a being with them to all eternity. Some underſtand this of the righteous man's deſire upon the wicked; that his fear might come upon him, and the glory of divine juſtice appear in his ſwift and ſudden deſtruction; as expreſſed in the following verſe; ſo Aben Ezra.

℣. 25. As the whirlwind paſſeth, ſo is the wicked no more, &c.] The wicked themſelves are like a whirlwind, noiſy, boiſterous, and bluſtering; ſuch is the man of ſin, who ſpeaks like a dragon, breathing out ſlaughter and threatning againſt the ſaints; and ſo are his followers, fierce and heady, and like a whirlwind, pernicious and deſtructive, bearing down, carrying away and deſtroying all before it; ſo the locuſts of the bottomleſs pit, under their king Abaddon, or Apollyon, the deſtroyer; and all tyrannical perſecutors, who are as the boar out of the foreſt, and the wild beaſt of the field: and theſe paſs away like a whirlwind, ſwiftly, ſuddenly, and at once; now they are ſeen in great power and authority, and anon they are not any more, Jer. iv. 13. Pſal. xxxvii. 35, 36. as the whirlwind, which digs up the earth, makes a circle and buries itſelf in it; ſo the wicked dig a pit for others and fall into it themſelves, Pſal. vii. 14, 16. and ix. 15, 16. and as a whirlwind paſſes away to the joy of men, ſo when the wicked periſh there is ſhouting; as will be at the deſtruction of Antichriſt more eſpecially, Prov. xi. 10. Rev. xix. 1. and it is in the whirlwind and ſtorm of divine wrath which falls upon the head of the wicked, by which they are cauſed to paſs away, Jer. xxiii. 19. Job xxvii. 20—23. ſo that they are not: not that they are annihilated at death, they will riſe again and come to judgment, and live in torment for ever; when they paſs away, they are ſomewhere; they are not indeed in the land of the living, in their own houſes, as formerly, which will know them no more; they are not in their grandeur and proſperity, enjoying their riches and honour; but they are in their own place, in hell they lift up their eyes, though they wiſh they had no being. But the righteous is an everlaſting foundation; he is in a firm and ſtable ſtate here and hereafter; intereſted in everlaſting love, in which he is rooted and grounded; ſecured in an everlaſting covenant, ordered in all things and ſure; having a ſhare in everlaſting ſalvation, and eternal redemption wrought out by Chriſt; being juſtified by his everlaſting righteouſneſs, which will anſwer for him in a time to come; and a partaker of thoſe graces of the Spirit, faith, hope and love, which are a well of living water ſpringing up to everlaſting life; and having everlaſting ſtrength and everlaſting conſolation in Chriſt, and a title to eternal life through him. Or, but the righteous has an everlaſting foundation[t]; the ſenſe is the ſame; which foundation is not external privileges of birth and education, or a mere outward profeſſion of religion, or works of righteouſneſs done; theſe are not everlaſting, but ſandy foundations; but Chriſt is the righteous man's foundation, and he is the only one, 1 Cor. iii. 11. Some take the ſenſe to be, the righteous, that is, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, is an everlaſting foundation; he is the foundation of the church, the rock on which it is built; he is the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, on which they were laid, and by whom they are ſaved; he is the foundation of every particular believer, they are rooted and built up on him; he is the foundation of their faith, hope, love, peace, joy and comfort, and of their eternal glory and happineſs: and an everlaſting one he is; he is ſo in his perſon as God-man; in his offices of Prophet, Prieſt and King; in the efficacy of his blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice; and is a foundation which is ſure, and will never fail: he has been the foundation of his people in all ages; and he is the ſame to day, yeſterday, and for ever. Hence, though the wicked paſs away as the whirlwind, and by one, the righteous ſhall not; they are on a foundation, and cannot be blown off of it, by the ſtorms and tempeſts of Satan's temptations, their own corruptions, the perſecutions of men, the errors of the wicked, or by the whirlwind of divine wrath and vengeance. Some render it, the righteous is the foundation of the world[u]; the pillar and ſupport of it; as the righteous are the ſalt of the earth, they are the ſtay of it: the whirlwind of God's wrath would tear up the courſe of nature, diſſolve the earth, and all things in it, were it not for the ſake of the righteous; and when they are called and gathered in, there will be a general diſſolution of all things, 2 Pet. iii. 9, 10.

℣. 26. As vinegar to the teeth, &c.] Which, with its coldneſs and ſourneſs, blunts the teeth, and makes it troubleſome to eat: the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, "as the ſour "grape is hurtful to the teeth;" ſets them on edge. And as ſmoke to the eyes; dims the ſight, cauſes the eye to water, and is very pernicious and vexatious: So is the ſluggard to them that ſend him; that is, the ſlothful meſſenger, as the Targum explains it; who being ſent on an errand, is dilatory, does not make haſte to bring back the anſwer; which is very vexatious to thoſe that ſend him, raiſes their paſſions, makes them fretful and very angry, be it on what account it will: ſo ſlothful and unprofitable ſervants, to whom talents are given for uſefulneſs, which they hide or uſe not, are very provoking to Chriſt, and whom he will order into outer darkneſs; thoſe who have gifts for ſacred ſervice, ought not to be ſlothful in buſineſs, but fervent in ſpirit, ſerving the Lord, Matt. xxv. 26, 29. Rom. xii. 6—11.

℣. 27. The fear of the Lord prolongeth days, &c.] Not beyond the time fixed in the unalterable purpoſes and decrees of God, Job xiv. 5. but longer than ſome others, or than thoſe that fear the Lord expect to live; or longer than, according to the courſe of nature, and the weakneſs of their conſtitutions, it could be thought they ſhould live. Long life is promiſed to them that fear the Lord; godlineſs has the promiſe of this life and of that to come; the fear of the Lord is the means of preſerving perſons from thoſe things which are pernicious to the health of men, and ſo of prolonging their days; as well as it has length of days, for ever and ever, even eternal life annexed to it; ſee Pſal. xxxiv. 11—14. But the years of the wicked ſhall be ſhortened; through diſeaſes, which their ſins bring upon them, which cut them off before they have lived out half their days; or by means of which, their ſins, they come into the hand of the civil magiſtrate, and die before their time; or are taken off in their full ſtrength by the immediate judgment of God, as were Ananias and Sapphira; and ſo they die in the midſt of their days, and before the time, which, according to the courſe of nature, and the common period of life, in all human probability they might have arrived unto, Pſal. lv. 23. Eccl. vii. 17.

℣. 28. The hope of the righteous ſhall be gladneſs, &c.] Or, is gladneſs[w]; it is now attended with joy; he has a pleaſure in the exerciſe of the grace of hope as to future things; he rejoices in hope of the glory of God, and is enabled to hold faſt the rejoicing of his hope firm unto the end, Rom. v. 2. Heb. iii. 6. and the iſſue of his hope will be an abundant entrance into the joy of his Lord; a being brought into his preſence, in which is fulneſs of joy; he is not aſhamed of his hope now, and he will not be diſappointed hereafter. But the expectation of the wicked ſhall periſh; his hope and expectation, either of riches, and honour, and pleaſure in this world, or of a long life in it; or of happineſs in the other, and of eſcaping the wrath of God, and the vengeance of eternal fire; all which being grounded on a wrong bottom, ſhall be fruſtrated; ſee Job viii. 13. and xi. 20. and xxvii. 8.

℣. 29. The way of the Lord is ſtrength to the upright, &c.] Who are upright in heart and life; who have the uprightneſs or righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and right ſpirits renewed in them; in conſequence of which they walk uprightly, ℣. 9. To theſe the way of the Lord is ſtrength; both the way which he himſelf takes, and the way which he preſcribes and directs his people to walk in: the way in which he walks in providence towards them, is the ſtrength of them; he is their ſhade on their right hand; he ſhews himſelf ſtrong on their behalf; he is their fortreſs and ſtrong tower, as the God of providence, even a wall of fire round about them: and the way he takes in the diſcoveries of his love; in the communications of his grace; in the application of precious promiſes; by granting the influences of his Spirit; and by leading to his Son, the man of his right hand, made ſtrong for himſelf and them, is very ſtrengthening unto them: ſo likewiſe the way in which he leads his people, the way of his word and ordinances; which, as it is pleaſant, ſo ſtrengthening; the more they walk in them, the ſtronger they are; they go from ſtrength to ſtrength, they grow ſtronger and ſtronger by them; whilſt they are waiting on the Lord in them, their ſpiritual ſtrength is renewed: moreover, walking in the way of the Lord, gives them ſpirit and courage, and makes them bold and intrepid; ſo that they fear no enemy, nor any dangers and difficulties, but go on their way chearfully and pleaſantly. But deſtruction ſhall be to the workers of iniquity; not to all that do iniquity, for no man lives without ſin; but to thoſe who give up themſelves to it, make a trade of it; whoſe courſe of life is ſinful, and do nothing elſe but ſin; this their way leads to ruin; deſtruction and miſery are now in all their ways, and will be the certain iſſue of them, even deſtruction of both ſoul and body; which will be ſwift and ſudden, come upon them before they are aware, and will be everlaſting; it will continue for ever, and there will be no deliverance from it. The word[x] ſignifies terror and conſternation; and ſuch ſeize on a wicked man at death, to whom death is the king of terrors; and which will ſtill more ſtrongly poſſeſs him, when in hell he lifts up his eyes; and alſo at the day of judgment, when he ſhall ſee the Judge coming in the clouds of heaven, ſitting on a fiery throne, and ſhall hear him pronounce him curſed. The clauſe may be rendered, but the way of the Lord is terror to the workers of iniquity[y]; the way of the Lord in his works of providence, in which he oftentimes does terrible things in righteouſneſs; and he is very terrible to men in his judgments here, and will be more ſo in his awful proceedure at the laſt judgment.

℣. 30. The righteous ſhall never be removed, &c.] They may be removed from place to place in this world, through the perſecutions of their enemies, or through one providence or another, as they often are; they may be removed from a ſtate of outward proſperity, to a ſtate of adverſity, as Job was; they may be removed from ſpiritual and comfortable frames of ſoul, to carnal or uncomfortable ones; for good frames are very precarious and uncertain things; and they will be removed out of this world into another; here they have no continuing city: but they ſhall never be removed from the love of God, nothing can ſeparate them from that; they are ſet as a ſeal on his heart, and are engraven on the palms of his hands, and there is no removing them from thence; they may be ſtaggered about their intereſt in the love of God; they may be without the manifeſtations and diſcoveries of it to their ſouls; they may be under the hidings of God's face; they may be at a diſtance from his houſe and ordinances, or may not enjoy the preſence of God in them for a time; yet not ſeparated from his affections; they ſhall never be removed out of the hands of Chriſt, into which they are put for ſecurity, and out of which none can pluck them, men or devils; how ſhould they, ſince they are in thoſe hands that made the heavens and the earth, ſupport all in being, and hold the reins of government? Was it poſſible they could be removed from hence, it would impeach the wiſdom of God, who has put them there; argue weakneſs in Chriſt, and ſuppoſe danger to them. Nor can they be removed out of the family of God; ſons of God abide in his houſe for ever; they are no more foreigners and ſtrangers, once children no more ſervants; they may be corrected and chaſtiſed, yet be children; they may judge themſelves unworthy of the relation, and be ready to conclude, that their ſpots are not the ſpots of God's children, and fear they are none of them, and yet the relation continues: nor will they ever be removed from their ſtate of juſtification, by which they are denominated righteous, into a ſtate of condemnation; for full ſatisfaction is given to law and juſtice for them; their juſtification is complete, it is from all ſin; the righteouſneſs by which they are juſtified is everlaſting, and even their faith which receives it ſhall never fail; to which may be added, that they are ſecured from wrath to come, and intitled to eternal life. In a word, they are on the ſure foundation of electing grace; they are in the immoveable covenant of grace; they are on the rock of ages, Chriſt Jeſus; all the divine perſons and perfections are on their ſide; they are kept by the power of God, through faith unto ſalvation; ſee Pſal. lv. 22. and cxxv. 1, 2. But the wicked ſhall not inhabit the earth; but a very little while, as Gerſom obſerves; and the time of their abode on earth is ſo ſhort, as ſcarce to be called an inhabitation of it. Moreover, they ſhall not inhabit the earth, the righteous will, even the new earth, which none but righteous perſons ſhall inhabit, 2 Peter iii. 13. ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 9, 11, 22, 29.

℣. 31. The mouth of the juſt bringeth forth wiſdom, &c.] As the earth brings forth its increaſe, and a tree brings forth its fruit; hence ſpeech is called the fruit of the lips; wiſdom is good fruit; a good man is comparable to the fruitful earth, and to a good tree; whoſe mouth brings forth wiſe things in abundance, which are very pleaſant and profitable; not worldly wiſdom, much leſs deviliſh; not merely natural wiſdom, but ſpiritual and evangelical; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 30. But the froward tongue ſhall be cut out; or cut down[z]; as an unprofitable tree, which brings forth nothing but perverſe things; things contrary to God and good men, to truth and right reaſon, to the light of nature, the law of God, and goſpel of Chriſt. Such a tongue of perverſities[a], as it may be rendered; that brings forth blaſphemies againſt God, his tabernacle and his ſaints, as the tongue of Antichriſt does, deſerves to be cut out, as the tongue of a blaſphemer.

℣. 32. The lips of the righteous know what is acceptable, &c.] To God and man; what is well pleaſing to God, and what miniſters grace to the hearers, or what is grateful: and ſuch things they will deliver out; they are uſed and accuſtomed to them; not only the righteous know in their judgment what is acceptable, but they uſe themſelves to ſay thoſe things; they not only know them in theory, but practiſe them: ſome men know what is acceptable, but their lips do not know it; they are not uſed to it, but the contrary. But the mouth of the wicked ſpeaketh frowardneſs; or perverſe things, as before. Or, the mouth of the wicked knoweth frowardneſs[b]; or perverſe things; or is uſed only to ſpeak froward things; things contrary to truth and righteouſneſs, and which they know to be ſo; their mouth ſpeaks things contrary to their hearts; their hearts and mouths do not agree, when they both flatter and lie.

CHAP. XI.

℣. 1. A Falſe balance is abomination to the Lord, &c.] Under which are included all falſe weights and meaſures, and all fraudulent practices in commerce and dealing; which are forbidden by the Lord, and are abominable to him, as being injurious to the eſtates and properties of men: and more eſpecially muſt be abominable in profeſſors of religion, as being contrary to the grace of God; for though there may be common honeſty where there is not the grace of God, yet there cannot be the true grace of God where there is not honeſty; for the grace of God teaches to deny all ſuch worldly luſts. But a juſt weight is his delight; or a perfect ſtone[c]; the ancient practice being to make uſe of ſtones for weights. Now to give juſt weight, and alſo juſt meaſure, and to do juſtly in all civil dealings with men, is what God requires, and is well-pleaſing in his ſight[d]; ſee Lev. xix. 35, 36. This may be underſtood of balances and weights in religious affairs; the balance of the ſanctuary is the word of God, with which all doctrines are to be weighed, and if found wanting, they are to be rejected; this is agreeable to the will of God: falſe balances are abominable to him; ſuch as carnal reaſon, vain philoſophy, and the traditions of men, uſed by Antichriſt and his followers; the harlot, deſcribed in ſome preceding chapters, oppoſed to wiſdom or Chriſt, who directs to the ſearch of the ſcriptures, and the uſe of them to try doctrines by, John v. 39. ſee Acts xvii. 11. 1 John iv. 1.

℣. 2. When pride cometh, then cometh ſhame, &c.] The one follows the other, or rather, keep pace together; as ſoon as one comes, the other comes; as in the caſe of the angels that ſinned, Adam and Eve, Haman, Nebuchadnezzar, and others; and will be the caſe of the Romiſh Antichriſt, who, whilſt vaunting and priding himſelf in his glory and grandeur, will fall into ſhame, diſgrace and deſtruction, Rev. xviii. 7, 8. But with the lowly is wiſdom; or wiſdom ſhall come, as Jarchi: the conſequence of which is honour and glory; as with Chriſt, who is meek and lowly, are all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge; ſo with his humble followers, who reckon themſelves the leaſt of ſaints, and chief of ſinners, and own, that it is by the grace of God they are what they are, is true wiſdom; they are wiſe unto ſalvation, and in the way to honour and glory; ſuch humble ſouls ſhall be exalted, Luke xiv. 11.

℣. 3. The integrity of the upright ſhall guide them, &c.] The Spirit of God is the beſt guide of an upright man; he leads into all truth, and unto the land of uprightneſs, and continues to be a guide, even unto death; and it is right to walk after him, and not after the fleſh: and beſides him, the upright man has the word of God as a lamp to his feet, and a light to his paths, which he does well to take heed to; and next to that is the ſincerity and uprightneſs of his heart, which will not ſuffer him, knowingly and willingly, to go aſide into crooked paths, or to do amiſs; integrity of heart, and innocency of hand, go together; ſuch are the followers of the Lamb, as deſcribed Rev. xiv. 4, 5. ſee Pſal. xxv. 21. But the perverſeneſs of tranſgreſſors ſhall deſtroy them; the perverſe ways, words and actions of ſuch as tranſgreſs the law of God, deal treacherouſly with God and men, as the word[e] ſignifies, ſhall be their ruin: the perverſe doctrines and worſhip of the man of ſin, and his followers, ſhall bring deſtruction upon them, 2 Theſſ. ii. 4, 8, 12. The word for perverſeneſs is only uſed here and in chap. xv. 4. and there plainly ſignifies the perverſeneſs of the tongue or ſpeech, and ſo may have reſpect to corrupt doctrine.

℣. 4. Riches profit not in the day of wrath, &c.] When God takes away the ſoul, and ſummons to judgment, and brings to it; and as riches profited not Rome pagan, in the day of the Lamb's wrath upon it; ſo neither will they profit Rome papal, when it will come in remembrance before God, to give it the cup of the wine of the fierceneſs of his wrath; ſee Rev. vi. 15—17. and xviii. 15—17. But righteouſneſs delivereth from death; from the curſe of a corporal death; from the power of a ſpiritual one; and from dying the ſecond, or an eternal one; ſee the note on chap. x. 2. the Targum is, "from an evil death."

℣. 5. The righteouſneſs of the perfect ſhall direct his way, &c.] Or make it plain[f]; that is, the righteouſneſs of thoſe who are perfect in Chriſt, complete in him, perfectly juſtified by his righteouſneſs; that righteouſneſs makes their way plain; it is the direct way, the high way, the path-way to eternal life and happineſs; ſee chap. xii. 28. But the wicked ſhall fall by his own wickedneſs; or, in his wickedneſs[g]; in his own wicked way, which he has choſen and delights to walk in; he ſhall ſtumble therein, and fall into ruin and deſtruction, into hell and damnation: or by means or becauſe of it, he will fall; his wickedneſs will be the cauſe of his fall; as it will be the cauſe of the fall of Babylon, Rev. xviii. 2, 5.

℣. 6. The righteouſneſs of the upright ſhall deliver them, &c.] From death, as in ℣. 4. and from falling by ſin, totally and finally; or into it, ſo as to periſh eternally; as well as it ſhall deliver thoſe out of Babylon, who are the Lord's people, that will be found therein when that is about to fall; ſee Rev. xviii. 4. But tranſgreſſors ſhall be taken in their own naughtineſs; in the very act of ſin, and be puniſhed for it; taken in it as in a net, and which they have ſpread for others, or as in a pit, which they have dug for others; taken as wild beaſts are taken to be deſtroyed; and that in the very midſt of their wickedneſs, when fighting againſt God and the Lamb, as the beaſt and falſe prophet will, Rev. xix. 20.

℣. 7. When a wicked man dieth, his expectation ſhall periſh, &c.] His expectation of a longer life, of getting more riches, attaining to more honour, enjoying more pleaſure here, and of having happineſs hereafter, and of being delivered from wrath to come; he will then find, when he comes to die, that his expectations in this world are vain, and thoſe which reſpect happineſs in another world are ill grounded; or when he dies, the expectation of others that depended on him, truſted in him, and looked for great things from him, will then be at an end. And the hope of unjuſt men periſheth; which is as the giving up of the ghoſt, and expires when a man does; it is only in this life, or however it ceaſes when that does; he has no hope in his death, as the righteous man has; if he does not live without hope in the world, he has none when he goes out of it, or that will be of any uſe unto him: moreover, the hope of unjuſt men to oppreſs and injure others, ceaſes when they die, Job iii. 17. The word rendered unjuſt men, is by ſome[h] underſtood of ſtrength, ſubſtance, riches; and ſo the meaning may be, that ſuch a hope that is placed in ſtrength and riches, periſhes at death. Jarchi interprets it of children, which are a man's ſubſtance; as if the ſenſe was, that the hope of the children of ſuch perſons is then cut off.

℣. 8. The righteous is delivered out of trouble, &c.] One after another he comes into, if not in this life yet at death; which is to him a perfect deliverance out of all tribulation; ſee Rev. vii. 14. or when the wicked die, as in the preceding verſe, then the righteous are delivered from the trouble they gave them, or deſigned to give them; though it ſeems rather to deſign deliverance from trouble in the firſt ſenſe, ſince it follows, And the wicked cometh in his ſtead; as Haman did in the room of Mordecai, and was hanged upon the gallows the other was delivered from, and he had prepared for him; and as Daniel was delivered from the lions den, and his enemies thrown into it; and as in the latter day the righteous will be delivered from all their perſecutors, and Antichriſt will be deſtroyed with the breath of Chriſt's mouth, and the brightneſs of his coming; and then they that deſtroyed the earth ſhall be deſtroyed themſelves, Rev. xi. 18.

4 ℣. 9. An hypocrite with his mouth deſtroyeth his neighbour, &c.] Deceives him with his flatteries and lies, and draws him into deſtructive ſchemes and practices; or corrupts him, as the word [t] ſignifies, and as the Targum renders it, with falſe doctrines; ſo with fair words and good ſpeeches, ſuch who lie in wait to deceive, impoſe upon the ſimple and credulous; and falſe teachers, with their damnable hereſies, bring ſwift deſtruction on men; and particularly Antichriſt and his emiſſaries, through ſpeaking lies in hypocriſy, corrupt and deſtroy many, 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2. But through knowledge ſhall the juſt be delivered; from the hypocrite and deceitful worker, and from being corrupted and deſtroyed by the words of his mouth: Jarchi ſays, through the knowledge of the law, which warns againſt him; but rather through the knowledge of the goſpel, which the juſt man has; for as by this ſuch eſcape the pollutions of the world, ſo likewiſe they are delivered, are kept and ſecured from the error of the wicked: through a man's knowledge of himſelf, of his deſcent from Adam, of the corruption of his nature, of the plague of his heart, and the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin; of his loſt and undone ſtate; of his impotency to that which is good, of his incapacity to fulfil the law, and atone for ſin; and of the inſufficiency of his own righteouſneſs to juſtify him before God; he is delivered and preſerved from giving into the notions of the purity of human nature, the power of free-will, and the doctrine of juſtification by works: through his knowledge of the perſon of Chriſt; of his offices and relations; of him as a Saviour; of the efficacy of his blood, the excellency of his righteouſneſs, and the completeneſs of his ſacrifice; and through the knowledge of God in Chriſt, and of the Spirit and of his operations of grace, as well as of the ſacred ſcriptures in general; he is ſafe from being carried away with any errors concerning any of the divine perſons, particularly concerning the Deity, Sonſhip, and ſatisfaction of Chriſt; in ſhort, as ignorance is the mother of devotion, ſuperſtition and error in the church of Rome; ſpiritual experimental knowledge of the above things is the beſt preſervative from all errors and hereſies which corrupt and deſtroy the ſouls of men, to be found in that apoſtate church, or elſewhere.

℣. 10. When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth, &c.] As it always does, even in the worſt of times; in times of public calamity and diſtreſs, and when enemies riſe up on all hands; it is well with them in life, in death, and to all eternity; ſee Iſa. iii. 10. but there are particular times when it goes well with them, which is matter of joy to others; when they proſper in the world, increaſe in riches and honour, and are advanced to places of authority and truſt; juſt magiſtrates in a city or commonwealth are a bleſſing, and ſo cauſe joy; ſee chap. xxix. 2. and when it goes well with them in ſpiritual things, they increaſe in gifts and grace, the humble hear of it and are glad; the city or church of God, the community of the ſaints rejoice: and as it went well with them in Conſtantine's time, when paganiſm was deſtroyed and perſecution ceaſed; and at the time of the Reformation, when the pure doctrines of the goſpel were revived, which were both times of joy to the city of God; ſo in the latter day, when the Lord's people will be righteous, the church will be the joy of many generations; and when the kingdom ſhall be given to the ſaints of the moſt High, and the kingdoms of the world become the Lord's and his Chriſt's, there will be great voices in heaven, rejoicings in the church, and a new ſong ſung, Iſa. lx. 21, 15. Rev. xi. 15, 17. and xiv. 3, 4. And when the wicked periſh, there is ſhouting; as there will be great rejoicings, ſhoutings and hallelujahs, when Babylon is fallen, Rev. xviii. 20, 21. and xix. 1, 2.

℣. 11. By the bleſſing of the upright the city is exalted, &c.] That is, either by the bleſſings with which they are bleſſed; and theſe are either temporal or ſpiritual: when good men are bleſſed with temporal bleſſings, the place where they live is the better for it; and eſpecially the poor, for they do not eat their morſel alone; and where there are many of theſe and in proſperous circumſtances, it is the exaltation and glory of a city taken in a literal ſenſe; and which is the more bleſſed for their ſakes, as well as they themſelves are a bleſſing to it: and as the upright are bleſſed with ſpiritual bleſſings, with bleſſings indeed, with the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God; when they are fruitful and flouriſhing in grace, the city or church of God is in an exalted ſtate: or rather this is to be underſtood of the bleſſings with which the upright bleſs others; and may be interpreted of the bleſſed deeds or good works which they do, and which are profitable to men; or of their bleſſed counſel and advice which they give on emergent occaſions, and which proves ſalutary, and for the good of the city; or rather for their bleſſed prayers which they put up for the peace and proſperity of it, and which ſucceed. So by the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt, or by the bleſſed doctrines of his apoſtles, thoſe upright and ſincere miniſters of the word, the city of the living God was greatly exalted in their times; as it alſo was in the times of Conſtantine, and at the Reformation; and this now is a reaſon why the city rejoices at its going well with the righteous, whether in temporals or ſpirituals. So Aben Ezra thinks the words have a connection with the former. But it is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked; by the corrupt communication which proceeds out of their mouths; by their obſcene and filthy talk the inhabitants of a place are corrupted; evil communications corrupt good manners; by their ſwearing and curſing, their oaths and imprecations, by their lying and perjury, they bring the judgments of God upon a city, to the overthrow of it. So by falſe doctrines, as the faith of particular perſons is ſubverted, ſo whole cities, or viſible congregated churches have been corrupted and deſtroyed, as with the Arian hereſy and others.

℣. 12. He that is void of wiſdom deſpiſeth his neighbour, &c.] Not only in his heart, but by giving him opprobrious language; he ſpeaks contemptibly of him, either becauſe he thinks he is wiſer than his neighbour, and therefore calls him fool at every turn; as thoſe who are moſt deſtitute of wiſdom conceit they have the largeſt ſhare of it, and deſpiſe others; or elſe becauſe he is richer than his neighbour, as the poor is generally deſpiſed by the rich; or becauſe he fancies he is holier than he, as the phariſee who truſts in himſelf that he is righteous and deſpiſes others: or a man that wants a heart[k], as it may be rendered; that wants a good one, or wants grace in his heart; he deſpiſes the counſel and advice, the admonitions and inſtructions which his neighbour gives him for his good. But a man of underſtanding holdeth his peace; and will not deſpiſe his neighbour, or give him ill language, becauſe he is not ſo wiſe, or ſo rich, or ſo righteous as he; if he cannot ſpeak any good of him, he will not ſpeak evil of him; or he holds his peace, is ſilent and will not anſwer the man void of wiſdom, that deſpiſes and reproaches him; he will not render railing for railing, when he is reviled he will revile not again; and by ſo doing he ſhews himſelf to be a man of underſtanding, or of intellects; a wiſe and prudent man.

℣. 13. A tale-bearer revealeth ſecrets, &c.] The Arabic verſion adds, in the congregation, openly and publicly; that goes about with tales from place to place, who is like a walking merchant or pedlar, as the word[l] ſignifies; who takes up his wares at one place, and expoſes them to ſale, and vends them at another; ſo a tale-bearer, he goes from houſe to houſe and picks up tales at one place and carries them to another and tells them; and as by his going about he gets into the ſecrets of perſons and families, or is intruſted with them, his character not being known, he reveals them to others, and ſo breaks the truſt committed to him; ſee 1 Tim. v. 13. The Targum and Syriac verſion render it, an accuſer; and the ſame name is given to the devil in the New Teſtament, and indeed ſuch a man is no better. But he that is of a faithful ſpirit concealeth the matter; that is faithful to his friend, that truſts him with his ſecrets, of which there are but few; he conceals the matter he is entruſted with; the things, as the Septuagint verſion; the ſecrets which are imparted to him; or the word[m] that he has heard, and has been ſpoken to him in privacy, and in ſtrict friendſhip: or he covers the matter[n] or thing; he hides the infirmities of his friend and neighbour, and does not expoſe them as the tale-bearer does; ſee 1 Pet. iv. 8.

℣. 14. Where no counſel is, the people fall, &c.] Where there is no wiſe and prudent, ſound and good counſel, as the word ſignifies; where that is not, there had as good be none, or better; a people, a kingdom, a commonwealth, nation, or city, fall into ruin and deſtruction, or into ſchemes which bring them to it; they are like a ſhip without a pilot, or without an helm, or one to ſteer it: the Targum, Syriac, and Vulgate Latin verſions render it, "where there is no governor;" and the Arabic verſion, "they that have no providence (or fore-"caſt) fall as a leaf falls;" and ſo the Septuagint verſion, "they that have no government fall as "leaves," as leaves fall in autumn; and the word ſignifies the helm of government[o], in alluſion to a ſhip. But in the multitude of counſellors there is ſafety; becauſe what one may miſs, another may hit upon; and if they agree in their advice, it may be the more depended upon; and if not, yet their different ſentiments being compared together, and the reaſons of them, a perſon may the better judge which is beſt to follow, and what is fit to be done: it may be rendered, in the greatneſs or largeneſs of a counſellor[p], for the word is in the ſingular number; that is, in the large capacity or endowments of a counſellor; in one that is abundantly qualified for a counſellor; whoſe abilities are not to be queſtioned; in the advice of ſuch a one a man may ſafely confide; and who that anſwers to this character as Jeſus Chriſt, the wonderful counſellor? in whoſe counſel we may reſt with the greateſt ſafety; and which may be found in his word, in the ſcriptures, which David ſays ſhould be the men of his counſel, Pſal. cxix. 24. ſee Iſa. ix. 6. and xxviii. 29.

℣. 15. He that is ſurety for a ſtranger ſhall ſmart for it, &c.] Or in breaking ſhall be broken[q], ruined and undone; he engaging or becoming a bondsman for one whoſe circumſtances he knew not; and theſe being bad bring a load upon him, ſuch an heavy debt as cruſhes him to pieces. Mr Henry obſerves that our Lord Jeſus Chriſt became a ſurety for us when we were ſtrangers, and he ſmarted for it, he was bruiſed and wounded for our ſins; but then he knew our circumſtances, and what the conſequence would be, and became a ſurety on purpoſe to pay the whole debt and ſet us free; which he was capable of doing without being broken or becoming a bankrupt himſelf; for he was not broken, nor did he fail, Iſa. xlii. 4. Jarchi's note is, "the wicked ſhall be broken, to whoſe heart "idolatry is ſweet." And he that hateth ſuretiſhip is ſure; or thoſe that ſtrike[r], that is, with the hand, uſed in ſuretiſhip; ſee chap. vi. 1. ſuch an one is ſafe from coming into trouble by ſuch means. The Targum is, "and hates thoſe that place their "hope in God."

℣. 16. A gracious woman retaineth honour, &c.] Or a woman of grace[s]; one that has the grace of God in her heart, and is of a virtuous converſation, and by both amiable and lovely to others; as ſhe receives honour or glory from them, which ſhe deſerves, ſo ſhe retains the ſame. The Targum is, "a gracious woman divides glory;" that is, between herſelf and her huſband; to which the Arabic verſion agrees, which renders it, "a gracious "woman raiſes up glory to her huſband." Jarchi interprets it of the congregation of Iſrael; his note is, "the congregation of Iſrael continually draws "nigh to the glory of God and his law;" and it may be applied to the true church of Chriſt which ſeeks the glory of Chriſt, and retains the glory of goſpel-doctrines, of goſpel-ordinances, of goſpel-diſcipline, and of goſpel-converſation, when the harlot, the apoſtate church, has loſt all honour of theſe things. And ſtrong men retain riches; ſome render it, as ſtrong men retain riches[t]; as they, when they have got them into their poſſeſſion keep them, it being in the power of their hands ſo to do, againſt all that would take them from them; ſo a gracious woman is as tenacious of her honour for chaſtity, modeſty, wiſdom, and conduct: or by thoſe ſtrong men, or terrible and violent ones, as the word [u] ſignifies, may be meant the beaſt of Rome and his followers, cruel perſecutors; whoſe principal care it is to amaſs the riches and wealth of others, which when they have got, they hold faſt.

℣. 17. The merciful man doeth good to his own ſoul, &c.] Or to himſelf; a man of mercy or grace, a liberal, bountiful man, he comfortably enjoys what God has given him, Eccl. v. 18. and he does good to others with it, and thereby does good to himſelf alſo; as well as he is ſolicitous in a ſpiritual ſenſe for the good and welfare of his immortal ſoul. But he that is cruel troubleth his own fleſh; a ſordid, avaricious man withholds from himſelf that which is meet, will not allow himſelf the neceſſaries of life, nor will he provide that which is fit and convenient for his family; he hides himſelf from his own fleſh, and will not communicate to the wants of his neareſt friends and relations, and ſhuts up his bowels of compaſſion againſt his own brother; all which may be called a troubling his own fleſh; ſee Iſa. lviii. 7. R. Levi Ben Gerſom interprets this of ſuch who place religion in afflicting and macerating the body by faſting, which the law does not require; and it may fitly be applied to the papiſts, who do this by penances and faſtings, and whippings and ſcourgings; and which the apoſtle calls a neglecting of the body, not in any honour to the ſatisfying of the fleſh, Col. ii. 23.

℣. 18. The wicked worketh a deceitful work, &c.] Such a wicked man as before deſcribed; that neither enjoys the good things of life he has, nor ſuffers others to enjoy them; and all to accumulate riches, which are deceitful and periſhing; and who abſtains from meats, which God has created for uſe, under a pretence of religion, and ſo deceives his own ſoul: and indeed every ſin which a wicked man commits, is a deceitful work; it promiſes him that pleaſure, or profit, or liberty, which it does not give him, and in the iſſue is the ruin of him; and ſo all falſe doctrines, propagated by deceitful workers, are deceitful works, by which they deceive the ſimple, and at laſt themſelves; they obtain a deceitful reward of their work, as Guſſetius [w] renders it. But to him that ſoweth righteouſneſs; does acts of beneficence and liberality; ſee 2 Cor. ix. 9, 10. and all other good works, or works of righteouſneſs, ſhall be a ſure reward; according to what a man ſows, and the manner in which he ſows, ſo ſhall he reap, 2 Cor. ix. 6. Gal. vi. 8. or, a reward of truth; inſtead of being given up to believe a lie, he ſhall receive the love of the truth, and abide in it, which will bring him to eternal glory and happineſs; he being choſen to it through ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, 2 Theſſ. ii. 10—13. and inſtead of a deceitful reward, ſhall have a true, real, ſolid and ſubſtantial one.

℣. 19. As righteouſneſs tendeth to life, &c.] Or, is unto life: not mere outward acts of moral righteouſneſs; theſe may be done where there is no principle of ſpiritual life, and are no other than dead works, and will never bring to everlaſting life; indeed the beſt righteouſneſs of man's is no juſtification of life, nor can it intitle to it, nor is meritorious of it. Godlineſs, or true holineſs, has the promiſe of this life and that to come, 1 Tim. iv. 8. and ſo here in the Hebrew text it is, unto lives [x], in the plural number. Internal grace, or powerful godlineſs, which is the new man that is created in righteouſneſs, gives a meetneſs for everlaſting life, and iſſues in it; particularly the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, as that is a perfectly juſtifying one; it makes a man alive in a law-ſenſe, and gives a title and claim to eternal life. So he that purſueth evil, purſueth it to his own death; or, it is to his own death; it iſſues in that: not he that is overtaken in a fault, or falls into ſin through the infirmity of the fleſh and the force of temptation, but ſuch who eagerly follow after it and overtake it; who give up themſelves unto it, weary themſelves in committing it, draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and ſin as it were with a cart-rope; theſe often by their ſins bring diſeaſes upon them, which end in a corporal death; or by means of which they come into the hand of the civil magiſtrate, and are capitally puniſhed; and however, die the ſecond death, or an eternal one, the juſt wages of ſin, Rom. vi. 23.

℣. 20. They that are of a froward heart, are abomination to the Lord, &c.] Such as are men of perverſe diſpoſitions and principles; that are contrary to the light of nature, the law of God, and goſpel of Chriſt; who, like the Jews of old, pleaſe not God, and are contrary to all men, to all good men; as Antichriſt and his followers, theſe work abomination, and make a lie, and ſpeak lies in hypocriſy; are double-hearted men, hypocrites, that ſay one thing and mean another; and, under the pretence of religion, do the vileſt things: ſuch of all men are abominable in the ſight of God, and will have their portion in the lake of fire, in the hotteſt place in hell, as hypocrites will, Rev. xxi. 8, 27. Matt. xxiv. 51. But ſuch as are upright in their way, are his delight; or, in the way; there being no need of a ſupplement: ſuch as are in the way, Chriſt, and walk by faith in him, and in the paths of truth and holineſs, in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameleſs, who are the undefiled in the way, as in Pſal. cxix. 1. where the ſame words are uſed as here: or, are perfect in Chriſt; though not in faith, nor in their walk and converſation; yet are ſincere, Iſraelites indeed, and walk uprightly according to the truth of the goſpel. Theſe the Lord takes delight and pleaſure in; he is well pleaſed with their perſons in Chriſt; and in their walk and works, as they flow from right principles, and are directed to right ends, and being upright in all; ſee Pſal. lxxxiv. 11.

℣. 21. Though hand join in hand, the wicked ſhall not be unpuniſhed, &c.] Though they give the hand to one another, unite in their counſels, enter into combinations, confederacies, and ſtrict alliances, and join all their force and ſtrength together; or though with both hands, with all their might and main endeavour to ſecure themſelves, yet they ſhall not go unpuniſhed. This may be exemplified in the kings of the earth, that will join each other, and gather their armies together, to make war againſt Chriſt; when they will be conquered, taken, and ſlain, Rev. xix. 19—21. Jarchi interprets it, from hand to hand, and explains it thus; from the hand of God into their hand, ſhall come the reward of their work, and ſhall not go unpuniſhed: to which may be added, even though there may be a ſucceſſion of parents and children, and their ſubſtance may be handed down from the one to the other, yet at laſt juſt puniſhments will take place.

To which is oppoſed, But the ſeed of the righteous ſhall be delivered; theſe are the ſeed of the church in all ſucceſſive ages; the ſeed that are accounted of by the Lord for a generation; particularly the remnant of the woman's ſeed, that keep the commandments of God, and have the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt; againſt whom the dragon, the old ſerpent the devil, was wroth, and went forth to make war, in order utterly to deſtroy them; but they eſcaped his hands, were delivered from him, and preſerved by the power and grace of God, as a ſeed to ſerve him, Rev. xii. 17.

℣. 22. As a jewel of gold in a ſwines ſnout, &c.] The alluſion ſeems to be to the ringing of ſwine, to prevent their rooting up the earth; which is uſually done by putting an iron ring into their ſnout; which is much more proper and ſuitable than a gold ring, or a jewel ſet in gold, which is very unbecoming ſuch a creature; and is ſoon had to the dunghil, or to ſome miry place, and there defiled. So is a fair woman which is without diſcretion; or, has departed from taſte [y]; from a taſte of virtue and honour; loſt all ſenſe of modeſty and chaſtity; forſaken her huſband, and given up herſelf to the embraces of others. As her beauty is fitly expreſſed by a jewel of gold, which is valuable and deſirable, and rightly placed and uſed is ornamental; ſo ſhe is properly repreſented by a ſwine, wallowing in the impurities of luſt; to which her beauty was the ſnare, and whereby it is quickly ſullied and loſt. Jarchi applies this to a diſciple of a wiſe man, or a ſcholar that departs from the good way, or from the law; which he explains by taſte or ſenſe: but it may be better applied to the ſcarlet whore, or apoſtate church of Rome; which has departed from Chriſt, once her profeſſed huſband; from the doctrines of the goſpel, and the ordinances of it; from all taſte and ſavour of true religion; and even from common ſenſe and right reaſon, as in the affair of tranſubſtantiation, and other things; and may be fitly compared to a ſwine with a jewel of gold in its ſnout, being decked with gold, and precious ſtones, and pearls; and yet drunk with the blood of the ſaints, and martyrs of Jeſus; and wallowing in all the filth of fornication, of idolatry, and ſuperſtition; as well as in all manner of other ſins and iniquities, Rev. xvii. 4—6.

℣. 23. The deſire of the righteous is only good, &c.] Or, what is good [z]; only good is the object of it. His deſire is to do good, and that only; though he does not always do what he would do: as he delights in the law of God, after the inward man; as he is a righteous, holy, and good man, and would be conformable thereunto, and ſerves it with his mind, will and affections; his deſires are to the Lord, and to the remembrance of his name; he deſires his favour, the diſcoveries of his love, communion with him, and communications of grace from him; he deſires all ſpiritual good things, and every thing that is good for himſelf and others, and which he deſires in ſubmiſſion to the will of God; and all things do work for, and iſſue in his good. Good is what he is continually deſirous of, wiſhing and praying for; and good is what he has eventually here and hereafter: though there may be many irregular and unlawful deſires in him at times, and all things he has may not ſeem good; yet acting as a good man, his deſires are only good, and there is nothing attends him but what is for his good. But the expectation of the wicked is wrath; what he is deſirous of, wiſhing, and looking for, is wrath and vengeance upon all that diſpleaſe him, and he is angry with; he deſires no good to them, but evil; he deſires and hopes for nothing but what is offenſive to God, and will bring upon him his fierce wrath and ſore diſpleaſure; ſo that eventually nothing elſe will be the fruit and conſequence of his expectation and hope; and ſome are ſo ſhockingly profane, and ſo dreadfully hardened, that they wait for hell, as Jarchi on the place obſerves; they look for damnation and expect it, and are eaſy about it.

℣. 24. There is that ſcattereth, and yet increaſeth, &c.] That ſcattereth his own, as the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions add: that diſperſes his money here and there, among many poor objects, plentifully and liberally; and his ſubſtance is ſo far from being leſſened by ſuch a conduct, that, by the bleſſing of God, it is increaſed more and more; or become richer, as the Vulgate Latin; ſee Pſal. cxii. 9. So he that diſperſes and diſpenſes the word of God, and ſpreads the truths of the goſpel, and freely and fully preaches them, increaſes himſelf in ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding. And there is that withholdeth more than is meet; or, right or juſt [a], by the laws of God and men; from himſelf, from his family, from his friends and relations, and from the poor of the church and of the world; and from the cauſe and intereſt of Chriſt, and what is neceſſary to ſupport that, according to his ability. But it tendeth to poverty, or want [b]: ſuch a man is often brought to beggary; there is a moth and rottenneſs ſent into his ſubſtance, which ſecretly conſume it: ſo he that withholds any truth or doctrine, that keeps back any thing that may be profitable to the ſaints; this tends to the impoveriſhing of his ſoul, and the ſouls of them that attend on his miniſtry.

℣. 25. The liberal ſoul ſhall be made fat, &c.] Or, the ſoul of bleſſing [c]: that is, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, the ſoul which bleſſeth; not that merely prays for a bleſſing upon others, and wiſhes them well, and gives them good words; but beſtows bleſſings on them, gives good things unto them, liberally, chearfully and plentifully; and ſo is a bleſſing to the poor, and receives a bleſſing from them again; as ſuch alſo do from the Lord, by whom they are made fat; or are bleſſed with temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings; and are in thriving and flouriſhing circumſtances, both in ſoul and body. So he that comes full fraught with the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt to others, is enriched with it himſelf, and becomes more and more flouriſhing in gifts and grace. And he that watereth, ſhall be watered alſo himſelf; he that largely communicateth to others, like a flowing fountain of water, ſhall have an abundance communicated to him again from God, the inexhauſtible fountain of mercies. Watering the plants in Chriſt's vineyard, is one part of the work of a goſpel-miniſter; I have planted, Apollos watered, &c. 1 Cor. iii. 6—8. and ſuch who do their work well, are watered, rewarded, warded, refreſhed and comforted of God, being largely taught and richly furniſhed for ſuch ſervice by him; ſo the Targum, "and he that teacheth, "alſo he himſelf ſhall learn."

℣. 26. He that withholdeth corn, the people ſhall curſe him, &c.] That hoards it up for a better price, in hopes of a better market; and does not bring it out, and expoſe it to ſale, when there is a ſcarcity of it; ſo the Targum adds, in famine; or, in ſtraits, as the Syriac verſion; in a time of diſtreſs through famine: this will bring the curſe of the poor upon him, who will imprecate the moſt dreadful things on him and his family. Jarchi interprets it of the law, and of withholding the teaching of it; but it may be better applied to the goſpel, and the withholding the miniſtration of that, and ſo cauſing a famine, not of bread and of water, but of hearing the word of the Lord; which is done by the Papiſts, by prohibiting goſpel-miniſters preaching the word; forbidding the people to read it in their own language; locking it up from them in a language they underſtand not; and ſo ſtarve the ſouls of men, which brings upon them a curſe. But bleſſing ſhall be upon the head of him that ſelleth it; at a moderate price, ſo that the poor may be able to come at it; ſuch will have their bleſſing; they will wiſh all happineſs to them and their families, here and hereafter. Or, that breaks[d] it; ſeparates it from the heap, breaks and grinds it into flour, and then ſells it: or imparts it freely; ſo the Septuagint verſion, that communicates; and the Arabic verſion, that gives: and may be fitly applied to a faithful miniſter of the goſpel, who breaks the bread of life, and freely and plentifully imparts it to the ſouls of men; and who has the hearty prayers and good wiſhes of the people to whom he miniſters. The maſter of a family uſed to break the bread, as Chriſt often did.

℣. 27. He that diligently ſeeketh good, &c.] Or early; who riſes betimes in the morning, as the word[e] ſignifies, and ſeeks both to do good, and to enjoy it all the day; who, in the firſt place, ſeeks the kingdom of God and his righteouſneſs; who, in the morning of his youth, inquires after the beſt things; and diligently purſues what is for his own good and welfare, and that of others, and for the glory of God: procureth favour, both of God and men: or, ſeeketh favour[f]; or that which is acceptable and well-pleaſing unto God. But he that ſeeketh miſchief, it ſhall come unto him; that ſeeks to do hurt to others; that which he ſeeks to do to them ſhall come upon himſelf; ſee Pſal. ix. 15. ſo Antichriſt that leads into captivity, ſhall go into captivity; and that kills with the ſword, ſhall be killed by it, Rev. xiii. 10.

℣. 28. He that truſteth in his riches ſhall fall, &c.] As leaves in autumn, which are withered and dry. To truſt in riches is to truſt in uncertain things; things not to be depended on, being here to day and gone to morrow; it is like leaning upon a broken ſtaff, which giving way, the perſon falls: and ſo the fall of Babylon will be, whilſt ſhe is truſting in, and boaſting of her riches and grandeur, Rev. xviii. 7, 8. But the righteous ſhall flouriſh as a branch; that abides in the tree, is alive and green, full of leaves, and laden with fruit: ſo the righteous are as branches in Chriſt, and receive life and nouriſhment from him, and abide in him; and bring forth fruit and flouriſh, like palm-trees and cedars, in the houſe of the Lord, and grow in every grace, and in the knowledge of Chriſt; ſee Jer. xvii. 7, 8.

℣. 29. He that troubleth his own houſe, &c.] His family, his wife, and children, and ſervants; by being bitter to the one, and by provoking the others to wrath, and continually giving out menacing words to the reſt; or through idleneſs, not providing for his family; or through an over-worldly ſpirit, puſhing on buſineſs, and hurrying it on beyond meaſure; or through a niggardly and avaricious temper, withholding meat and drink, and cloaths convenient for them; ſee chap. xv. 27. or through profuſeneſs and prodigality. Such an one ſhall inherit the wind; nothing but vanity and emptineſs; he ſhall come to nothing, and get nothing; and what he does, he ſhall not keep, and on which he cannot live. And the fool ſhall be ſervant to the wiſe of heart; he who has both got and loſt his ſubſtance in a fooliſh way, ſhall be ſo reduced as to become a ſervant to him who has purſued wiſe meaſures, both in getting and keeping what he has; and to whom perhaps the fool formerly ſtood in the relation of a maſter. Such a change will be with reſpect to Antichriſt and the ſaints, Dan. vii. 25—27.

℣. 30. The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life, &c.] Either the fruit which grows upon Chriſt, the tree of life, and which they receive from him; even all the bleſſings of grace, peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and life, Rev. ii. 7. or the fruits which the righteous bring forth under the influence of divine grace; they are trees of righteouſneſs, and are filled with the fruits of righteouſneſs by Chriſt, and have their fruit unto holineſs, and their end everlaſting life. Aben Ezra interprets it, "the fruit of "the righteous is as the fruit of the tree of life;" that is, lovely, beautiful, deſirable, ſalutary, and iſſues in life. And he that winneth ſouls is wiſe; Antichriſt trades in the ſouls of men, that is one part of his wares, Rev. xviii. 13. but his negotiations about them are to the loſs, and not to the ſaving of them: whereas wiſe and faithful miniſters of the word, ſuch as are here deſcribed, uſe all prudent methods to gain and ſave the ſouls of men, 1 Cor. ix. 19—22. even their precious, immortal ſouls, which are of more worth than a world, are the immediate production of God, made after his image, which by ſin they come ſhort of; and having ſinned, are liable to eternal death; the redemption of which is precious; the charge of which Chriſt has taken, and therefore is called the Shepherd and Biſhop of ſouls; and which he commits to the care of his under-ſhepherds, who watch for them, as they that muſt give an account. To win them is to teach them, for the word[g] has the ſignification of teaching or doctrine; ſee chap. iv. 2. the miniſters of Chriſt are teachers, qualified and ſent by him as ſuch; and their buſineſs is to teach men their ſtate by nature, how ſinful, miſerable, and helpleſs they are; and alſo Chriſt, and the way of life by him; that ſalvation is in him, and in no other; that juſtification is only by his righteouſneſs, peace and pardon by his blood, and atonement by his ſacrifice: they alſo teach various other things; as the fear of God, faith in Chriſt, love to him, and obedience to all his commands. To win ſouls, is to proſelyte them and convert them to the true religion; to bring them into a love and liking of it, and to embrace it: the ſouls that Abraham got or made in Haran, are ſuppoſed to be ſuch; and the ſame with thoſe trained or inſtructed in his houſe, whom he armed for the reſcue of Lot, Gen. xii. 5. and xiv. 14. the former of which texts, Jarchi compares with this, as explanative of it. The phraſes of turning many to righteouſneſs, done by the wiſe; and of converting a ſinner from the error of his way, whereby a ſoul is ſaved from death, Dan. xii. 3. Jam. v. 20. are a proper comment on theſe words: which moreover may be rendered, he that taketh ſouls[h]; as a fort or caſtle is taken, and which is ſometimes expreſſed by winning; ſee 2 Chron. xxxii. 1. chap. xviii. 9. The ſoul of man is a hold, and a ſtrong-hold of foul ſpirits; it is Satan's palace or caſtle, which he keeps and holds againſt Chriſt, but is won and taken by him; which is uſually done by means of the word, and the miniſtry of it, which are made effectual to the pulling down of ſtrong-holds, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. Or the alluſion is to the taking or catching of birds in a ſnare, or fiſhes in a net. The ſouls of men are got into the ſnare of the devil, and they are taken out from hence by breaking this ſnare; by which means they eſcape the hands of the fowler, Satan, and come into better hands: the old ſerpent laid a bait for our firſt parents, by which he gained his point, and that was the fruit of the forbidden tree; but the bait which wiſe men lay to catch ſouls, is the fruit of the tree of life, mentioned in the former clauſe, the bleſſings of grace in Chriſt. Again, Chriſt's miniſters are called fiſhers of men, and are ſaid to catch men, Matt. iv. 19. Luke v. 10. which they do by caſting and ſpreading the net of the goſpel; the goſpel is the net; the world is the ſea into which it is caſt; where natural men are in their element, as fiſhes in the ſea: the caſting of the net is the preaching of the goſpel; and by means of this, ſouls are caught and gathered in to Chriſt and his churches, Matt. xiii. 47, 48. Once more, the words are by ſome rendered, he that allureth ſouls[i]; which is done, not by the terrors of the law, but by the charming voice of the goſpel; by which ſouls are drawn to God and Chriſt, and brought among his people: and one that is an inſtrument of all this had need be wiſe, and ſo he appears to be; he that teacheth men the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things, had need to be as he is, as a ſcribe well inſtructed in the kingdom of God; he who is to be the inſtrument of converting ſinners, muſt have a mouth and wiſdom to addreſs them in a proper manner; as he that wins a caſtle, or takes a fort, ought to have military ſkill as well as courage; and to caſt a net well, requires art as well as ſtrength.

℣. 31. Behold, the righteous ſhall be recompenſed in the earth, &c.] Which Aben Ezra underſtands of the recompence of their good works. There is a reward for the righteous, and which they have now in keeping, though not for keeping the commandments of God; they have the promiſe of this life, as well as of that which is to come, and which is made good to them; they have every good thing now which is proper and convenient for them; and they ſhall be recompenſed in the new earth, in which only righteous perſons will dwell. But it ſeems better, with Jarchi, to interpret it of the recompence of their ſins and tranſgreſſions; that is, of their chaſtiſements and afflictions, with which they are chaſtiſed by their heavenly Father, when they ſin againſt him; which are all in love and for their good; and which they have only here on earth, whilſt they are in this world; they will be all over in another, when there will be no more ſin, and no more chaſtiſement for it, much leſs condemnation; ſee 1 Cor. xi. 32. Much more the wicked and the ſinner; who ſhall not only be puniſhed on earth, as they often are, but in hell to all eternity. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, render the whole, thus; if the righteous be ſcarcely ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and the ſinner appear? Which words are uſed by the apoſtle Peter, to ſhew, that if judgment or chaſtiſement begin at the houſe of God, or with the righteous, that the end of the wicked muſt be very bad; which intirely agrees with the ſenſe of this paſſage; ſee 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. a behold is prefixed to the whole, as a note, either of admiration, or rather of attention to what is ſure and certain, and worthy of regard and conſideration. The Targum is, "behold, the righteous "are ſtrengthened in the earth; but the wicked and "the ſinners ſhall be conſumed out of the earth:" which ſeems to agree with Aben Ezra's ſenſe of the words; ſee Pſal. civ. 35.

℣. 1. WHoſo loveth inſtruction, loveth knowledge, &c.] That loves the inſtruction of wiſdom or Chriſt, chap. iv. 13. and viii. 10. the means of inſtruction, the ſcriptures, which are profitable for inſtruction in righteouſneſs, and are written for our learning; the goſpel, which inſtructs into the perſon, office and grace of Chriſt; the miniſters of the word, who are ſo many inſtructors in Chriſt; and even the rod of afflictions, by which men are taught their duty, and the will of God: and theſe are to be loved; and he that loves them, clearly ſhews that he loves knowledge; ſince the means of inſtruction, making uſe of them, and getting inſtruction by them, are attended with labour, trouble and difficulty; which a man would not chooſe, had he not a love unto, and a deſire after knowledge, and an increaſe of it; as the knowledge of God, of Chriſt, and of his truths. Aben Ezra inverts the words; "he that loves know-"ledge, loves inſtruction;" but the ſenſe is much the ſame. But he that hateth reproof, is brutiſh; or a beaſt[k]: as the man that is willing to be inſtructed in order to gain knowledge, ſhews himſelf to be a wiſe and underſtanding man; ſo he that hates the reproof the word of God gives, or the miniſters of it, or God by them, appears to be no better than a brute, than the horſe or mule that want underſtanding: ſo the man of ſin hates the ſcriptures, the goſpel and the miniſters of it, and the reproofs and convictions they give of his idolatry, ſuperſtition and will-worſhip; nor does he care that his doctrines and practices ſhould be brought to this teſt, or that the people ſhould have knowledge of them; but keeps them from them, and ſets up his own infallibility as the rule of judgment; and it is one character of his followers, that they receive not the the love of the truth, 2 Theſſ. ii. 10. and both he and they are repreſented by a beaſt, Rev. xiii. 1, 11. and xvii. 3. and are more brutiſh than any man; ſee chap. v. 11, 12.

℣. 2. A good man obtaineth favour of the Lord, &c.] One that is made ſo by the grace of God, for no man is ſo naturally; there is none good, nor does good, no not one, until ſome good thing is put into him, or the good work of grace is begun in him. And ſuch a man obtains favour or good-will from the Lord; that is, as Gerſom explains it, what he himſelf wills, for the will of God is his will; or rather, the good-will of God, his grace and favour; freſh manifeſtations and diſcoveries of which he obtains and enjoys, not by merit, thro' any goodneſs of his own, or by means of his obedience; but he draws it out, as the word [l] ſignifies, as out of a fountain, by prayer and ſupplication, and by freſh repeated acts of faith upon it; which may be ſaid to be had and enjoyed, when it is remembered to him, he is encompaſſed with it, or it is ſhed abroad in his heart, or his heart is directed into it; and he alſo obtains and enjoys all the bleſſings of grace here, and glory hereafter, as ſpringing from it. But a man of wicked devices will he condemn; whoſe thoughts, and the imaginations of his heart, are evil continually; who is always contriving miſchief to others: ſuch a man ſhall be ſo far from enjoying the favour of God, that he ſhall be pronounced guilty of death, and condemned to it; he ſhall be baniſhed from the preſence of the Lord, and be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction. As the man of ſin is continually deviſing wicked things againſt God, againſt Chriſt, againſt his intereſt and people; he ſhall be condemned by the Lord, conſumed with the breath of his mouth; go into perdition, and be caſt into the lake burning with fire and brimſtone: and this will be the portion of all his followers, that join with him in forming and executing his wicked devices.

℣. 3. A man ſhall not be eſtabliſhed by wickedneſs, &c.] Not any man, though he may be eſtabliſhed in his wickedneſs, ſo as not to be rooted out of it; yet he cannot be ſo eſtabliſhed by it, as not to be removed from a proſperous ſtate and condition, into an unhappy and diſtreſſed one; he may ſeem to be in a firm and ſettled ſtate of proſperity, amidſt all his wickedneſs; be like a green bay-tree, ſpreading itſelf and ſeemingly immoveable, when on a ſudden it is blown down and rooted up, and is no more: ſo Babylon will ſeem to be in a ſettled ſtate of grandeur, eaſe and reſt, and ſay, I ſit a queen, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow; when in one day, and in one hour, her deſtruction ſhall come upon her, Rev. xviii. 7, 8. But the root of the righteous ſhall not be moved; they are rooted and grounded in the love of God, which is immoveable; they are rooted and built up in Chriſt, and ſo are as mount Zion, which can never be removed; the root of the matter or of grace is in them, which can never be loſt; whilſt others wither away becauſe they have no root in them, theſe abide; and though they may be ſhaken with the perſecutions of men, the temptations of Satan, the errors of the wicked, and their own corruptions, yet they afreſh take root again downward, and bring forth fruit upward.

℣. 4. A virtuous woman is a crown to her huſband, &c.] One that is loving and chaſte, conſtant and faithful, obſequious and ſubmiſſive to him; that is diligent in the affairs of her houſe, takes care of her family, brings up her children, and keeps up a good order and decorum among her ſervants, is an honour and credit to her huſband. Such is the true church of Chriſt, who is compared to a woman, Rev. xii. 1. to a woman of purity and chaſtity, whoſe members are virgins, not defiled with the corruptions, errors and ſuperſtition of the apoſtate church; to a woman of fortitude and courage, as the word [m] ſignifies, who reſiſts ſin, temptation, error, hereſy and idolatry, even unto blood; and whoſe true members love not their lives unto death, but freely lay them down in the cauſe of truth; ſuch an one is an honour to Chriſt her huſband. But ſhe that maketh aſhamed; makes her huſband aſhamed, by her levity and wantonneſs, her negligence and ſlothfulneſs, ſo that he is aſhamed to be ſeen with her, or to be known that he ſtands in ſuch a relation to her; ſhe is as rottenneſs in his bones; a conſtant grief to his mind, a preſſure upon his ſpirits, a waſting of his body, and a conſumption of his eſtate; ſhe is, as the Targum has it, as a worm in wood, which rots and conſumes it [n]; ſo the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions. Thus the apoſtate church of Rome, that profeſſes to be the ſpouſe of Chriſt, has made him aſhamed of her; as being the Jezebel, that ſeduces his ſervants to fornication or idolatry; and whoſe doctrine and ſuperſtition eat, like a canker, the vitals of religion.

℣. 5. The thoughts of the righteous are right, &c.] Or judgment [o]. The thoughts of mens hearts are naturally evil, nor can any think a good thought of themſelves; but the thoughts of the righteous are directed and influenced by the grace of God, and are formed according to that Word which is a diſcerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart; their thoughts concerning God and religion, concerning Chriſt and his goſpel, his ways and worſhip, his truths and ordinances, they are judiciouſly framed according to the rule of God's word, the revelation he has made, and ſo are right; and ſuch are their reſolutions and deſigns to ſerve the Lord their God, and him only, and to cleave to him with full purpoſe of heart. But the counſels of the wicked are deceit; the deſigns, ſchemes, and contrivances of wicked men are to trick, and overreach, and defraud their neighbours in civil affairs; and of falſe teachers, to deceive the hearts of the ſimple in religious ones. The coming of the man of ſin was with all deceivableneſs; and all the gaudy ſhew and pageantry he makes, and pretended miracles he works, are to deceive the inhabitants of the earth; and by his ſorceries all nations are deceived, 2 Theſſ. ii. 10. Rev. xiii. 14. and xviii. 23.

℣. 6. The words of the wicked are to lie in wait for blood, &c.] Which ſome underſtand of perjury and falſe witneſs, as Jarchi, whereby the lives of innocent perſons are taken away: or it may be interpreted either of the ſmooth words, and fair ſpeeches, and ſecret artifices, Antichriſt and his emiſſaries make uſe of to entrap the innocent, and draw them into their net, to their ruin; ſee Pſal. x. 7—10. as the Jews attempted to deal with Chriſt, Luke xx. 20, 21. or of the laws and edicts of the beaſt, that ſuch ſhould be killed who would not worſhip his image; and with the blood of theſe innocent ones, the whore of Rome is ſaid to be drunk, Rev.

Rev. xiii. 15. and xvii. 6. But the mouth of the upright ſhall deliver them; the innocent laid in wait for; either by their prayers to God, which are of great avail with him, and through whoſe importunity he will avenge his elect, and deliver them; or through their apologies for them, and defences of them, as in the times of pagan perſecution; or rather, through the doctrines of the Reformation, whereby many ſimple and unwary ſouls were delivered, who were in danger of being enſnared: and whereby the eyes of many princes were opened, and were ſtirred up to protect thoſe innocent ones, and prevent their blood being ſhed.

℣. 7. The wicked are overthrown, and are not, &c.] With ſuch an overthrow as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. The kingdom of the beaſt ſhall not only be full of darkneſs, as at the pouring of the fifth vial, and be in the utmoſt confuſion, but it ſhall be brought to ruin and deſtruction; which ſtands oppoſed to the houſe of the righteous, in the next clauſe: the ten kings, the ſupporters of Antichriſt, ſhall be overcome by the Lamb, with whom they will make war; the beaſt, and the falſe prophet, ſhall be taken by him, and deſtroyed; and Babylon ſhall ſink like a milſtone into the ſea, and be no more; the wicked ſhall be conſumed out of the earth; theſe heathens ſhall be no more in the land; the man of ſin ſhall never revive again. But the houſe of the righteous ſhall ſtand; not his material dwelling-houſe; nor the earthly houſe of his tabernacle, his body; nor his family, as the generality of interpreters, for the family of the righteous may be extinct, and eſpecially not continue as righteous; but the church of God, as the gloſs upon the text, the houſe of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth; the church which is built on the rock, Chriſt; the mountain of the Lord's houſe, which ſhall be eſtabliſhed upon the top of the mountains in the latter day, when the kingdom of Antichriſt ſhall be overthrown, and be no more. This is the ſame with the houſhold of faith, and the houſhold of God, and here called the houſe of the righteous; becauſe they dwell in it, have a place and a name in it, better than ſons and daughters; and indeed none but they ought to be in it, that have on the wedding-garment, the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs; and who walk uprightly, and work righteouſneſs. Now this houſe ſhall ſtand; its foundation, which is Chriſt, is ſure, an everlaſting one; its pillars are firm and ſtable, the miniſters of the word, which will be to the end of the world; the ordinances of it will continue till Chriſt's ſecond coming; the doctrines of it are the word of God, which ſtandeth for ever, when all fleſh is as graſs. This houſe ſtands, notwithſtanding all the perſecutions of men; it has ſtood againſt all the fury of Rome, pagan and papal, and ſtill will continue, notwithſtanding the craft of falſe teachers to undermine it; and though it may ſometimes be in a waſte and ruinous condition ſeemingly, yet the Lord will raiſe it up again, and glorify this houſe of his glory, and make it beautiful and honourable: it ſhall ſtand, becauſe it is the Lord's houſe, of his building, and where he delights to dwell in; becauſe it is the houſe of Chriſt, which he, wiſdom, has built; and where he preſides as a Son, as a Prophet, Prieſt and King; and becauſe it is the houſe where his people are born and brought up, and therefore ſhall continue till every one are brought in; and becauſe it is built on a rock, againſt which the gates of hell cannot prevail, Matt. xvi. 18. compare with this Matt. vii. 24, 25.

℣. 8. A man ſhall be commended according to his wiſdom, &c.] Not according to his birth and pedigree; not according to his riches and wealth; not according to the places of honour and truſt he may be in; but according to his wiſdom, which he diſcovers in his words and actions, in his life and converſation: not according to the wiſdom that is earthly, ſenſual and deviliſh; not according to the wiſdom of the world, which comes to nought, either natural or civil; eſpecially that which lies in ſophiſtry and ſubtilty, in wicked craft and cunning, whereby men trick, overreach and defraud one another; but according to that which is ſpiritual and evangelical; which lies in the knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt, and of thoſe things which belong to ſalvation; the beginning of which is the fear of the Lord, and which comes from above, and is pure and peaceable. A man poſſeſſed of this is commended by all wiſe and good men, and by the Lord himſelf; as the wiſe man is by Chriſt, Matt. vii. 24, 25. who builds his houſe on a rock; for which reaſon it ſtands as in the preceding verſe. But he that is of a perverſe heart, ſhall be deſpiſed; and which appears by the perverſe words he ſpeaks againſt God and Chriſt; againſt his people, ways, and worſhip, as Antichriſt and his followers do; and by his perverſe actions, which are contrary to the light of nature, to the law of God, and goſpel of Chriſt: and ſuch vile perſons are contemned in the eyes of all good men, and are had in abhorrence by the Lord himſelf; for ſuch who deſpiſe him are lightly eſteemed; ſee chap. xviii. 3.

℣. 9. He that is deſpiſed and hath a ſervant, &c.] Meaning not the ſame perſon as before, but one in mean circumſtances of life; and becauſe he has not that ſubſtance as others have, at leaſt does not make that ſhew and figure in the world as ſome; and is mean in his own eyes, as Jarchi; and does not affect grandeur, and to look greater than he is; has juſt a ſufficiency to keep a ſervant to wait upon him; or as ſome render it, is a ſervant to himſelf[p]; to this purpoſe the Septuagint, and ſo Jarchi and Gerſom interpret it, who does his own work at home and abroad, in the houſe and in the field, and ſo gets himſelf a competent living. He is better than he that honoureth himſelf, and lacketh bread; that boaſts of his pedigree, and brags of his wealth; dreſſes out in fine clothes, keeps a fine equipage, makes a great figure abroad, and has ſcarce bread to eat at home, and would have none, if his debts were paid; the former is much the better man on all accounts, and more to be commended; ſee chap. xiii. 7. And ſo, as Cocceius obſerves, the leaſt ſhepherd (under Chriſt) that has ever ſo few ſheep, one or two under his care, whom he brings to righteouſneſs, and by whom he is loved, is preferable to the pope of Rome, who is adored by all; and yet neither has nor gives the bread of ſouls; and without the offerings of others has not any thing to eat.

℣. 10. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beaſt, &c.] Or knoweth it[q]; knows the worth of it and values it, and takes care of it, and is concerned for the preſervation of it; he provides ſufficient food for it, and gives it; he does not overwork it, but allows it proper reſt from labour; and if in any diſorder will make uſe of all ſuitable means to heal it; ſee an inſtance of the care of Jacob, that righteous man, of his cattle, Gen. xxxiii. 14. and on the other hand, ſee an inſtance of a wicked man's cruelty to his beaſt in Balaam, for which he was reproved, Numb. xxii. 28. by various laws and rules which God has given, it is his will that men ſhould be merciful to their beaſts, Deut. xxv. 4. Exod. xx. 10. and ſuch who are ſo will be more eſpecially pitiful and tender-hearted to their fellow-creatures. But the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel; or are the mercies of a cruel one [r]; the moſt tender things which are expreſſed or done by them are nothing but cruelty; and what then muſt be their more ſevere expreſſions and actions? ſo the moſt tender concern which Antichriſt and his followers ſhew to the ſouls of men breathes nothing but cruelty; the compaſſionate methods they take to convert heretics, as they call them, are dark dungeons and ſtinking priſons, racks and tortures, fire and faggots; theſe are their wholſome ſeverities; this their kindneſs to men, to deliver them up to the ſecular power, to inflict pains and puniſhments on them the moſt grievous to ſave their ſouls. Thus while the beaſt of Rome looks like a lamb, he ſpeaks like a dragon, and exerciſes all the cruelty of the firſt beaſt, Rome pagan, Rev. xiii. 11, 12.

℣. 11. He that tilleth his land ſhall be ſatisfied with bread, &c.] This was man's work in innocence; this he was doomed to do with the ſweat of his brow after his fall; every man has his land to till, or ſome calling, work, or buſineſs to be employed in, either civil or ſacred; and it becomes him to be diligent therein, and ſuch as are ſhall not want bread, but ſhall have a ſufficiency of it. But he that followeth vain perſons is void of underſtanding; that neglects his buſineſs, loiters away his time, ſpends it in the company of vain, empty, and unprofitable perſons; as he ſhews himſelf by ſuch a choice that he is void of underſtanding, or wants a heart [s], to improve his time and talents; ſo ere long it is much if he does not want a piece of bread. Thus he that is concerned to have the fallow-ground of his heart plowed up, and righteouſneſs, truth and holineſs ſown therein, that it may bring forth fruit; or who is careful about the welfare and ſalvation of his immortal ſoul, and makes diligent uſe of all means to promote its ſpiritual good, ſhall be filled with the bread of life, ſhall find it and eat it, to the joy and rejoicing of his heart; and on the contrary, he that aſſociates himſelf with vain perſons, empty of all that is ſpiritually good, that have only empty notions of religion; or who attend to the profane and vain boaſtings of Antichriſt, and all falſe teachers; and give heed to ſeducing ſpirits and doctrines of devils, whoſe words eat as do a canker; theſe, as they ſhew themſelves to want wiſdom, ſo they are and will be brought into ſtarving and famiſhing circumſtances in a ſpiritual ſenſe. Jarchi interprets the former clauſe of a man that is ſtudious in his doctrine, that revolves it in his mind, that he may not forget it; and the Arabic verſion renders the laſt clauſe, "they that run after falſe "dæmons, their minds are deficient;" ſee Rev. ix. 20.

℣. 12. The wicked deſireth the net of evil men, &c.] To be maſter of all the wicked arts and methods evil men uſe to enſnare and oppreſs others; to get them and their ſubſtance into their hands; or deſireth the evil net, as the Targum; the evil net of Antichriſt which he lays for the poor, whom he draws into it and catches them; ſee Pſalm x. 9. Jarchi underſtands it of hunting [t], and of wicked men deſiring to be fed and nouriſhed with what evil men get by hunting; compare with this Ezek. xiii. 18—21. Some render it the fortreſs or ſtrong-hold [u] of evil men, in which they fortify and ſecure themſelves to do miſchief to others, and to prevent any beſieging them, ſo Gerſom; and this is what all wicked men are deſirous of. But the root of the righteous yieldeth fruit; or ſhall give [w] that; that ſecurity and protection from real evil and miſchief which the wicked cannot obtain; or he, that is, God, ſhall give the righteous root [x], firmly fix them that they ſhall not be moved; or as we ſupply it, and ſo Aben Ezra, yieldeth fruit, much more deſirable than the net of evil men the wicked covet: righteous men are compared to trees, they are called trees of righteouſneſs, Iſa. lxi. 3. theſe have a root in the love of God, in the perſon of Chriſt, and in the grace of the Spirit, and this root yieldeth fruit; the love of God is the root and ſource of all good things, of all the bleſſings of grace, of the fruit of grace, faith, hope, and love, and of evangelical obedience; the perſon of Chriſt is the ſource of all ſpiritual bleſſings, of ſalvation and eternal life; the righteous have their being in him as a root; they are bore by him, have all their life, grace, holineſs, fruitfulneſs, and perſeverance therein from him; and the grace of the Spirit in the heart, which is the root of the matter, the hidden man of the heart, from hence are fruits meet for faith and repentance, and good works, which are both pleaſant and profitable. The Targum is, "the root of the righte-"ous ſhall remain, or be eſtabliſhed;" ſee ℣. 3.

℣. 13. The wicked is ſnared by the tranſgreſſion of his lips, &c.] A wicked man often brings himſelf into trouble by giving his tongue too great a liberty, and by making free with the characters of others; ſometimes by treaſonable ſpeeches againſt his ſovereign; ſometimes by bearing falſe witneſs, and by lies and perjuries, of which he is convicted in open court; and by calumnies, reproaches, detraction, and ſcandal raiſed by him, and caſt on his neighbour, who ſues him for theſe things: or in the tranſgreſſion of the lips is an evil ſnare; or the ſnare of an evil man [y]; by the wicked things they ſay they lay a ſnare for others, which the ſimple and uncautious are taken in; ſo heretics enſnare men by their good words and fair ſpeeches, and plauſibility of their doctrines; ſo Antichriſt, by lies in hypocriſy, and by his deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs. But the juſt ſhall come out of trouble; or eſcape it; he eſcapes the ſnare that is laid for him, and ſo the trouble conſequent upon it; a juſt man eſcapes trouble by not giving his tongue the liberty wicked men do; and when he by any means falls into trouble, he gets out of it again by giving good words to thoſe in whoſe hands he is; and by his prayers and ſupplications unto God. The righteous are ſometimes in trouble, and in ſuch ſort of trouble as others are not; by reaſon of their own corruptions, Satan's temptations, the hidings of God's face, as well as various outward afflictions; out of all which the Lord delivers them ſooner or later, in life or in death, Pſal. xxxiv. 19. Jarchi exemplifies this in the caſe of righteous Noah, who eſcaped the flood, when the world of the ungodly were deſtroyed by it, for the tranſgreſſion of their lips, ſaying as in Job xxi. 15. what is the almighty? &c.

℣. 14. A man ſhall be ſatisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth, &c.] The wholſome advice, the good inſtruction, and ſound doctrine he delivers to others, which are the fruit of his lips, and come forth by them from his heart; theſe redound to his own advantage, are not only a ſatisfaction to his mind upon reflection, but becauſe of theſe he is filled with good things, even to ſatiety, both in this life and that to come; ſee 1 Tim. iv. 6. or a man ſhall be ſatisfied with good from the fruit of the mouth; or be ſatisfied from the fruit of the mouth of a man[z]; that is, of another man, either of a private man, by his prayers, by the account he gives of his own experience, by the converſation he has with him about the truths of the goſpel; or of a faithful miniſter of the word, who is the means of feeding the ſouls of men with good things even to ſatisfaction, with the wholeſome words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, with the ſincere milk of the word, with the bread of life, even with the fineſt of the wheat. And the recompence of a man's hands ſhall be rendered unto him; if his words turn to his account, much more his works; if he is filled with good things for the ſake of the one, much more will he be recompenſed in a way of grace on account of the other; and not for the one without the other, nor for words without works: or the recompence of a man's hands, or of his works which his hands do, he ſhall render to him[a]; that is, God, who renders to every man according to his works; which ſerves not to eſtabliſh the doctrine of merit, but to ſhew the goodneſs and grace of God in taking notice of and accepting the imperfect works of men through Chriſt, and for his ſake.

℣. 15. The way of a fool is right in his own eyes, &c.] Whether it be the way of open profaneneſs, or ſelf-righteouſneſs, it appears to him to be the right way; it ſeems to him a very plain one, and he finds it pleaſant; and truſting to carnal ſenſe, corrupt reaſon, and a falſe judgment, and having a high opinion of himſelf and his own knowledge, never aſks after the right way, nor takes the advice of others. But he that hearkeneth unto counſel is wiſe; that aſks advice and takes it of ſuch who are men of age and experience, men of longer ſtanding and are wiſer than himſelf; who conſults the word of God about the right way of walk, worſhip and ſalvation, and makes the teſtimonies of God the men of his counſel, which are able to make him wiſe unto ſalvation; who hearkens to the counſel of goſpel-miniſters, and obeys it; and eſpecially to Jeſus Chriſt the wonderful counſellor, and to the advice he gives, Rev. iii. 18. and who not only hears his words but does them; ſuch an one is a wiſe man, Mat. vii. 24, 25.

℣. 16. A fool's wrath is preſently known, &c.] Having no command of himſelf, he cannot repreſs it, nor keep it in; no ſooner is he provoked but he ſhews it in his countenance, and by his words and actions; it is to be ſeen in the fire of his eyes, in the frowns of his face, in the gnaſhing of his teeth, and in the ſtamping of his feet, as well as in the bitter expreſſions of his mouth: or a fool's wrath in that day is known[b]; in the ſame day in which the provocation is given; yea in the ſame hour, and in the ſame moment; he cannot defer ſhewing it for the leaſt ſpace of time; or it is openly known, it is to be ſeen and obſerved by every one; or thus, a fool is preſently known by his wrath[c]; ſee Eccl. vii. 9. But a prudent man covereth ſhame; conceals his anger and reſentment at any injury done him by words or actions, which if ſuffered to break out would bring ſhame and diſgrace to him; or he covers the injury itſelf, the diſgraceful words that are ſpoken of him, and the ſhameful actions done unto him; he puts up with the contempt that is caſt upon him, and bears it patiently; takes no notice of the offence given him, and much leſs ſeeks revenge; in which he acts a prudent part, for by ſo doing he creates leſs trouble to himſelf, and gains more credit and reputation from others.

℣. 17. He that ſpeaketh truth ſheweth forth righteouſneſs, &c.] He that blows or breathes out truth[d], as the word ſignifies; that utters it freely and fully without any heſitation; that ſpeaks nothing but truth, and ſpeaks out the whole truth without any reſerve; ſuch a man upon every occaſion will declare that which is juſt and right, and ſhew himſelf to be an honeſt and upright man; he that uſes himſelf to ſpeak truth in common converſation, will in a court of judicature, whether upon his oath or not, teſtify that which is juſt and the real matter of fact; there is a connection between truth and righteouſneſs, for though they are diſtinct things they go together, what is true is juſt, and what is juſt is true; ſo he that ſpeaks the truth of the goſpel, or is a faithful preacher of it, will ſhew forth righteouſneſs, what is the righteouſneſs of the law, and what is the righteouſneſs of faith; how inſufficient a man's own righteouſneſs is to juſtify him in the ſight of God; the neceſſity of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, how free and full, excellent and glorious, ſuitable and uſeful it is, Rom. i. 17. But a falſe witneſs deceit; that is, one that is uſed to lying when he is called to give teſtimony upon any affair in judgment; he will declare that which is falſe and deceitful, having no regard to truth and juſtice. So a falſe teacher, inſtead of ſhewing men the inſufficiency of their own righteouſneſs, and directing them to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt for juſtification, will utter deceitful doctrine, and build up their hopes upon the ſandy and deceitful foundation of their own works; as popiſh teachers, and ſuch as verge towards them.

℣. 18. There is that ſpeaketh like the piercings of a ſword, &c.] Whoſe words are like ſharp ſwords, cutting, wounding, dividing, killing; ſee Pſal. lvii. 4. and lix. 7. and lxiv. 3. ſuch are the words of falſe witneſſes, who by their falſe teſtimonies and perjuries are as guilty of the murder of men as cut-throats; ſuch are the words of ſlanderers, backbiters, and tale-bearers, who grieve the innocent, wound their characters, deſtroy their good name and credit, and ſeparate chief friends; and ſuch are the words of Antichriſt, who looks like a lamb, but ſpeaks like a dragon, Rev. xiii. 11. But the tongue of the wiſe is health; or healing[e]; by giving a faithful teſtimony, which ſets matters right; by clearing and defending the character of thoſe who are falſly accuſed and wrongfully charged; by making up differences and reconciling perſons at variance thro' the detracting and lying inſinuations of others; and by ſpeaking comfortable, chearful and refreſhing words to the injured and abuſed; eſpecially the tongue of a wiſe miniſter of the goſpel is health, or healing, to wounded ſouls, to whom he miniſters the goſpel of the grace of God, which directs to Chriſt for healing, peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life.

℣. 19. The lip of truth ſhall be eſtabliſhed for ever, &c.] The man that ſpeaks truth is and will be eſtabliſhed in his credit and reputation among men; he is uniform and all of a piece, and what he ſays is believed; truth, though it may be oppoſed, will prevail againſt lies and falſhood; the word of truth, the goſpel of Chriſt, will ſtand for ever; the miniſters of truth and righteouſneſs will be continued to the end of the world; Chriſt, who is truth itſelf, abides the ſame to-day, yeſterday, and for ever. But a lying tongue is but for a moment; if a liar ſpeaks truth for once he does not continue in it long, but quickly returns to his former courſe; or rather the lie he tells is very ſhort-lived, it is ſoon diſcovered, and he comes into contempt and diſgrace, and loſes all his credit and reputation among men of honour and honeſty, and is ſometimes ſuddenly ſnatched away by death, as Ananias and Sapphira; all error and hereſy in a ſhort time will ceaſe and be no more; and Antichriſt, whoſe coming is with lying wonders, the direct oppoſite of the lip of truth, will be brought to ruin in a moment. Aben Ezra, Kimchi, and Ben Melech, who are followed by ſome chriſtian interpreters, as Montanus, and ſome in Vatablus render it, but, or forever, I will cauſe the lying tongue to ceaſe, or be at reſt, from ſpeaking; as if they were the words of God threatning to cut off the lying tongue; but Jarchi and Gerſom render it for a moment, or a very ſhort time, as we and others do; or, whilſt one winks[f], in the twinkling of an eye; ſo ſoon is ſuch a perſon removed.

℣. 20. Deceit is in the heart of them that imagine evil, &c.] That ſecretly deviſe miſchief in their hearts againſt their neighbours; that plow evil as the word[g] ſignifies, and ſow diſcord among men; and by many artful and deceitful methods promote contention and diviſion in order to anſwer ſome baſe deſigns of theirs; but ſooner or later they are deceived themſelves, are diſappointed of their views, the conſequence of which is vexation and ſorrow. But to the counſellors of peace is joy; ſuch who conſult the good of others, who adviſe to peace, concord, and unity; who ſeek to cultivate it in their families and neighbourhoods, and in the church of God, in which, if they ſucceed, they have joy and pleaſure; if not, they have a ſatisfaction in their own minds and conſciences that they have done what is right and good; ſuch have a conſcience-peace now, and an eternal one hereafter; or as Aben Ezra calls it, the joy of ſalvation; ſee Matt. v. 9.

℣. 21. There ſhall no evil happen to the juſt, &c.] The evil of ſin: no iniquity, as the Targum; which, and the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, interpret of ſin not being agreeable, convenient, ſuitable and pleaſing to a righteous man. Moreover, the Lord, by his Spirit and grace, weakens the power of ſin in them; and, by his providence, prevents and removes occaſion of ſinning; and by his power preſerves from it, from being overcome and carried away with it, at leaſt finally and totally. Or the evil of puniſhment is here meant; no penal evil ſhall befal them; the puniſhment of their ſin has been inflicted on Chriſt their ſurety, and therefore ſhall never be laid on them; and whatever afflictions may happen to them, which have the name and appearance of evil, theſe work together for their good, ſpiritual and eternal; ſo that in reality, no evil thing, properly ſpeaking, happens to them; ſee Pſal. xci. 10. Or whatever does come to them, comes not by chance unto them; but by the decree and will of God, and is overruled for good. But the wicked ſhall be filled with miſchief; or with evil[h], the evil of ſin; with malice and wickedneſs, with all impiety and unrighteouſneſs, with ignorance and error; with all kind of ſins, both againſt the firſt and ſecond table of the law, and ſo with all the conſequents of ſin: with the evil of puniſhment; with an evil conſcience, with the terrors of it; with many diſtreſſes here, and with everlaſting deſtruction hereafter. Some underſtand it of the miſchief they deviſe to others, which they are full of and big with; and though they are, as Aben Ezra interprets the word, yet no evil ſhall happen to the righteous; the miſchief contrived by them ſhall fall upon themſelves.

℣. 22. Lying lips are abomination to the Lord, &c.] Such that ſpeak lies in common talk; and that deliver out doctrinal lies, falſe doctrines, lies in hypocriſy, as are the doctrines of Rome; theſe are abominable unto God; as being contrary to his nature as the God of truth; contrary to the ſcriptures of truth he has indited; contrary to the truth of the goſpel he has publiſhed; contrary to his Son, who is truth itſelf; and to the Spirit of truth, which leads into all truth, as it is in Jeſus; wherefore an abomination and a lie are joined together, Rev. xxi. 27. But they that deal truly are his delight; or the objects of his good-will and pleaſure, as the word[i] ſignifies; they are grateful and acceptable to him; he is well pleaſed with them, and delights in them. Not only ſuch that ſpeak the truth, but do the truth[k], as the words may be rendered; whoſe words and actions, doctrine and life, agree together: it is not enough to embrace, profeſs, or preach the truth, but he muſt practiſe it; ſee John iii. 21. 1 John i. 6. he muſt deal truly with God and men, or faithfully, as the Targum and Vulgate Latin verſion; he muſt be true to his word and promiſes, and faithfully perform what he has agreed unto. Or, that work faith; that work the work of faith, that faith which works by love; that live on Chriſt and his righteouſneſs; ſuch are well pleaſing to God; without which faith, it is impoſſible to pleaſe him, Heb. xi. 6.

℣. 23. A prudent man concealeth knowledge, &c.] Of things natural or divine, which he is furniſhed with; not but that he is willing to communicate it, as he ſhould, at proper times, in proper places, and to proper perſons; but he does not needleſly and unſeaſonably ſpeak of it; he does not make a ſhew of it, or boaſt and brag of it: he modeſtly forbears to ſpeak of what he knows, but when there is a neceſſity for it, even of that which may be lawfully divulged; which is a point of prudence and modeſty; otherwiſe it is criminal to reveal ſecrets, or publiſh what ſhould be kept private, or ſhould not be known. Aben Ezra interprets it of a wiſe man's hiding his knowledge in his heart, that he may not forget it. But the heart of fools proclaimeth fooliſhneſs; that which they have in their hearts and minds, and which they take for deep knowledge, profound and recondite learning, they proclaim with their mouths in a noiſy and clamorous way; and while they declare their ill-ſhaped notions, their incoherent and unconnected ideas of things, they betray their ignorance and folly, as oſtentatious men do.

℣. 24. The hand of the diligent ſhall bear rule, &c.] Shall become rich, ſo Jarchi interprets it, according to chap. x 4. Through diligence men get riches, and through riches they arrive to power and authority over others: from apprentices and journeymen-workmen, they become maſters of their buſineſs; diligent men become maſters of families, and have ſervants and workmen under them; become magiſtrates in cities, and bear rule over their fellow-citizens, and are advanced to places of power and authority in the commonwealth; ſee chap. xxii. 29. But the ſlothful ſhall be under tribute; the ſlothful or deceitful hand[l], for ſo it may be rendered and ſupplied; for uſually ſuch who are ſlothful, and do not care for buſineſs, get their living by deceitful methods, by tricking and ſharping; and ſuch become ſubject to others, to them that are diligent; hence ſaid to be under tribute, or tributary; becauſe thoſe that are tributary, are in ſubjection to thoſe to whom they pay tribute.

℣. 25. Heavineſs in the heart of man maketh it ſtoop, &c.] Either an anxious care and ſolicitude about living in the world, as the word[m] ſignifies; when it ſeizes a man's ſpirits, it depreſſes them, and keeps them down: or a fear and dread of adverſity, or ſorrow and grief, on account of ſome calamity and diſtreſs; when it gets into a man's heart, it ſinks and bows it down, that it cannot take any pleaſure or comfort in any thing. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, a terrible word troubles the heart of a juſt man; or troubles the heart of man, as the Syriac verſion; the Targum is, "a word of fear in the heart of man cauſes "fear:" ſuch is the law, which is a word of terror; which ſpeaks terrible things to men; fills the mind with terror; works wrath in the conſcience, and induces a ſpirit of bondage to fear; bows and keeps under the ſpirits of men, through a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation. But a good word maketh it glad; a comforting, chearing and encouraging word from any friend, that compaſſionates their diſtreſſed caſe; this lifts up the heart, and inſpires it with joy; ſo a word in ſeaſon, ſpoken by a goſpel-miniſter, raiſes up a ſoul that is bowed down, and gives it comfort and joy: ſuch a good word is the goſpel itſelf; it is good news from a far country, which is like cold water to a thirſty ſoul, very refreſhing and reviving. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions here render it, a good meſſage, and ſuch the goſpel is; which, when brought to the heart of a poor ſinner, depreſſed with the terrors of the law, cauſes joy in it; ſuch is the word of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life by Chriſt; ſuch is the word that he himſelf ſpoke, Matt. ix. 2. Kimchi inſtances in Pſal. lv. 22.

℣. 26. The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour, &c.] Not than his neighbour who is righteous alſo; for though one may have more excellent gifts than another, or a larger meaſure of grace; one righteous man may have more faith than another, yet not more righteouſneſs; every truly righteous man is juſtified by the ſame righteouſneſs, even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and therefore one cannot be more excellent, conſidered as righteous: but the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour, who is ungodly and unrighteous, or however who has no other righteouſneſs than his own; tho' his neighbour may be of more noble birth, and have even the title of his excellency given him; though he may have a larger ſhare of wealth and riches; and though he may have attained a greater degree of natural wiſdom and underſtanding, be a man of brighter parts, and of a larger capacity; yet being righteous, he is more excellent than he: his ſuperior excellency lies in his righteouſneſs, from whence he is denominated; the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, is far better than the beſt righteouſneſs of his neighbour; it being the righteouſneſs of God, his is the righteouſneſs of a creature; a perfect righteouſneſs, whereas his is imperfect; a ſplendid and glorious one, his filthy rags; a very extenſive one, by which all the ſeed of Iſrael are juſtified, his ſuch as not one individual perſon can be juſtified by it; an everlaſting one, that will anſwer for him that has it in a time to come, his like the morning-cloud and early dew that paſſes away: yea, the inherent righteouſneſs of a righteous man, or the grace of Chriſt, imparted to him and implanted in him, that principle of holineſs in him is greatly better than the righteouſneſs of his neighbour a phariſee; for this is true and real holineſs, truth in the inward part, whereas the other's is only a ſhadow of holineſs, a form of godlineſs without the power; this has the Spirit of God for its author, it is his workmanſhip, and a curious piece it is, whereas the other is only the produce of nature; this makes a man all-glorious within, and gives him a meetneſs for heaven, whereas, notwithſtanding the other, the man is inwardly full of all manner of iniquity, and has neither a right nor meetneſs for eternal glory. Nay, the external works of righteouſneſs done by a truly righteous man, are preferable to his neighbour's, deſtitute of the grace of God; the one being a courſe of obedience to the will of God, and a reſpect to all his commandments; when the other conſiſts only of a little negative holineſs, and of an obſervance of a few rituals of religion: the one ſpring from a heart purified by the blood of Chriſt, and the grace of the Spirit, and from principles of grace and love, and are done to the glory of God; whereas the other do not ariſe from a pure heart, and faith unfeigned; nor are they done ſincerely, with a view to the glory of God, only to be ſeen of men, and gain credit and reputation among them; and in theſe reſpects the righteous man is more excellent as ſuch than his neighbour, who at moſt and beſt is only externally and morally righteous: his ſuperior excellency does not lie in nature, in which they are both alike; nor in outward circumſtances, in which they may differ; nor in the opinion of men, with whom the ſaints are the offſcouring of all things; but in the eſteem of Chriſt, and through his grace and righteouſneſs; ſee Pſal. xvi. 3. Some render the words, the righteous explores his way more than his neighbour[n]; ſeeks and finds out a better way than he does; and is careful that he is not ſeduced and carried out of the way, and periſh. But the way of the wicked ſeduceth them; or cauſes them to err; it deceives, by promiſing the honour, pleaſure, and profit, which it does not lead unto and give, and which they find not in it; and hereby they are led to wander from the way of the righteous, by which they attain a ſuperior excellency to them.

℣. 27. The ſlothful man roaſteth not that which he took in hunting, &c.] Becauſe he takes none. The ſlothful man takes no pains to get any thing for a livelihood, by hunting or otherwiſe; and though he loves to live well, and eat roaſt-meat, yet what he roaſts is not what he has got himſelf, but what another has laboured for. It is obſerved[o], that fowlers burn the wings of birds taken by them, that they may not fly away; to which the alluſion may be. Or, the deceitful[p] man, as it may be rendered; though he may get much in a fraudulent way, yet it does not proſper with him, he does not enjoy it; it is taken away from him before he can partake of it, or receive any comfort from it, or advantage by it; juſt as a man that has took any thing in hunting, he cannot keep it; it is taken away from him, perhaps by a dog or ſome man, before he can roaſt it, and make it fit for eating. Ben Melech, from Joſeph Kimchi, obſerves, that fowlers, when they catch fowls, burn the top of their wings, that they may not fly away at once; and they do not cut their wings off, that they may be left, and appear beautiful to them that buy them: but the ſlothful or deceitful man does not let the fowl remain in his hands till he burns it; for before that it flies out of his hands, and it is loſt to him; which is figuratively to be underſtood of riches and wealth, gathered by violence and deceit, and loſt ſuddenly. What is ill gotten, does not ſpend well; it does not laſt long, it is preſently gone; there is no true enjoyment of it. Or he will not ſhut it up within lattices[q], and reſerve it, but ſpend it directly; ſee Cant. ii. 9. But the ſubſtance of a diligent man is precious; what is gotten by induſtry and diligence, and in an honeſt way, is valuable; it comes with a bleſſing; there is comfort in the enjoyment of it, and it continues. Some render it, the ſubſtance of a precious man is gold[r]; ſo the Targum, "the ſubſtance of a man is precious gold;" and to the ſame purpoſe the Vulgate Latin verſion: a diligent man grows rich; and what he gets ſpends well, and his ſubſtance is daily increaſing.

℣. 28. In the way of righteouſneſs is life, &c.] The life of the ſoul, or ſpiritual life, as Aben Ezra; and eternal life, as Gerſom. One that is in the true way of righteouſneſs, is one that is juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which juſtification is the juſtification of life: ſuch an one is made alive, and reckons himſelf alive in a law-ſenſe; and enjoys true ſpiritual peace and comfort, ariſing from the love and favour of God, and acceptance with him, in which he ſees his intereſt, and in which is life; and this righteouſneſs, by which he is juſtified before God, intitles him to eternal life; to which the path of holineſs, he is directed and enabled to walk in, leads; though it is a narrow way, and a ſtrait gate, Matt. vii. 14. Chriſt, and righteouſneſs and holineſs in and by him, are the way, the truth, and the life, or the true way to eternal life; and all in this way now live ſpiritually, and ſhall live eternally, John xiv. 6. And in the pathway thereof there is no death; no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt, the way, and are juſtified by his righteouſneſs; the law's ſentence of death ſhall not be executed on them, though it paſſed upon them in Adam; ſpiritual death ſhall not again prevail over thoſe who are paſſed from death to life; nor ſhall they be hurt of the ſecond death; they ſhall never die that death, it ſhall have no power over them; life and immortality are the ſure effects of being in the way of righteouſneſs. The Targum renders it, the way of the perverſe; and the Septuagint verſion, of thoſe that remember evil; and the Syriac and Arabic verſions, the way of angry men is unto death; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, "the out of the way path leads to death:" and ſo ſome Hebrew copies read, inſtead of no death, unto death; but the moſt read as we do, and which the Jewiſh commentators follow.

CHAP. XIII.

℣. 1. A Wiſe ſon heareth his father's inſtruction, &c.] As he ſhould, and has good reaſon to do; ſince it muſt be cordial, faithful and diſintereſted, as well as the effect of age and experience. He aſks for it and loves it, as Jarchi ſupplies the text; he likes and approves of it, is well pleaſed with it, and delights in it; ſeeing it tends to his profit and advantage; he receives it, as the Targum, ſo Ben Melech; he liſtens to and obeys it, and acts agreeably to it, which ſhews him to be wiſe; and this is the way to be wiſer and wiſer. So one that is ſpiritually wiſe, will attend to and receive the inſtruction of wiſdom or Chriſt; who ſtands in the relation of an everlaſting Father to his children; whoſe inſtruction is the doctrine of the goſpel; which a wiſe man hears, ſo as to underſtand it; to love and like it, and approve of it; cordially to embrace and obey it, and put it in practice; ſee Matt. vii. 24. The word alſo ſignifies correction[s], becauſe inſtruction often comes by it; and he that is a wiſe man, will hear the rod and him that has appointed it, and learn to know his mind by it, and receive inſtruction from it: or is chaſtiſed by his father[t], and takes it well, Micah vi. 9. But a ſcorner heareth not rebuke; that is, a ſon who is a ſcorner, as the Targum and Aben Ezra; one that makes a mock at ſin, and ſcoffs at religion: ſuch a man will be ſo far from hearing, attending to, and receiving the rebuke and reproof of his father, that he will ſcoff alſo at that; ſuch as were the ſons-in-law of Lot, and the ſons of Eli and Samuel. So ſcornful men, that make a jeſt of every thing that is ſacred, will not hearken to the reproof of God's word, to the rebukes of goſpel-miniſters, or even to the rebukes of providence, which will iſſue in their deſtruction, chap. v. 11, 12.

mouth, &c.] Or, of the mouth; either another's or his own, ſince the word his is not in the text; though it is ſupplied by the Targum, Aben Ezra, the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions, as by us. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, ſhall eat of the fruits of righteouſneſs. I ſhould chooſe to tranſlate the whole, thus; a good man ſhall eat of the fruit of his mouth: ſo Aben Ezra interprets it, a good man ſhall eat; and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it. The ſenſe is, that a good man brings forth good things out of the good treaſure of his heart by his mouth; which not only miniſter grace to the hearers, and are for the uſe of edifying to others, but alſo to himſelf; whilſt he gives wholſome counſel and advice to others, it is of ſervice to himſelf; whilſt he comforts others, he comforts himſelf; and whilſt he teaches and inſtructs others, he teaches and inſtructs himſelf: ſo a good miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, whilſt he feeds others with knowledge and underſtanding, he himſelf is nouriſhed up with the words of faith and good doctrine; ſo Jarchi refers it to a man's doctrine, and the reward of it here and hereafter. But the ſoul of the tranſgreſſors ſhall eat violence; Jarchi interprets it, "the delight of tranſgreſſors "is violence [u]"; that is what their ſouls deſire, chooſe, will, and take pleaſure in, even uſing violence, and doing miſchief to others; and to the ſame purpoſe is the note of Gerſom: but Aben Ezra ſupplies it from the former clauſe, as we do; and the ſenſe is, that the ſame meaſure they mete out to others, ſhall be meaſured out to them again; what they give others to eat, they ſhall eat themſelves, even the bread of violence; ſee chap. iv. 16. and x. 6. And this will be the caſe of all perfidious and treacherous ones, as the word [w] uſed ſignifies; of falſe teachers and cruel perſecutors; and of Babylon, of whom it will be ſaid, reward her as ſhe rewarded you, Rev. xviii. 6.

℣. 3. He that keepeth his mouth, keepeth his life, &c.] He that keeps his mouth ſhut, keeps it as with a bridle; keeps it from ſpeaking things of other perſons, particularly of ſuch as are in high places, of kings and princes, and civil magiſtrates: he keeps himſelf quiet and comfortable; keeps himſelf from many troubles, which otherwiſe he would come into; keeps his life from danger, to which it would be expoſed, ſhould he ſpeak evil of dignities, or give himſelf the freedom, as ſome do, whereby they are brought to an untimely end; ſee chap. xviii. 21. beſides, perſons ought to be careful of their words, ſince by them a man will either be juſtified or condemned hereafter, Matt. xii. 37. But he that openeth wide his lips, ſhall have deſtruction; or conſternation [x]: he that is raſh and inconſiderate, haſty with his lips, a talkative man; that ſpeaks freely every thing that comes into his mind, regardleſs of the characters of men, or conſequences of things; is often brought into frights and fears, through the menaces and threatenings of men in power, whoſe characters he has made too free with, and oftentimes is brought to ruin and deſtruction: ſo he, whoſe throat is as an open ſepulchre, belching out filthy words, horrid oaths, curſes and imprecations, deſtruction is near him, even in all his ways; and the man of ſin, that opens his mouth in blaſphemy againſt God, and his tabernacle, and his ſaints, ſhall go into perdition, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. and xvii. 8.

℣. 4. The ſoul of the ſluggard deſireth, and hath nothing, &c.] He deſires knowledge, but does not care to be at any pains to get it, and ſo has it not; he deſires riches, but chooſes not to make uſe of the means, to be diligent and induſtrious, and ſo he is without them; he deſires to wear good cloaths and rich raiment, but is unwilling to labour for them, and therefore is cloathed with rags; he deſires food, and plenty of it, but refuſes to work for it; and he that will not work ſhould not eat, and therefore he has it not, but ſtarves and famiſhes: and in ſpiritual things, the ſluggard deſires heaven and happineſs, but does not care to do the duties of religion; he would die the death of the righteous, but is unwilling to live his life; to abſtain from ſin, and live ſoberly and righteouſly, is too hard ſervice for him; he does not chooſe to do or ſuffer any thing for the cauſe of Chriſt and true religion. Jarchi's note is, that "in the future ſtate, "he ſhall ſee the glory of the wiſe man, and deſire "it; but ſhall not attain to it." But the ſoul of the diligent ſhall be made fat; become rich; increaſe in temporal things, and have great plenty and proſperity: and ſo in ſpiritual matters, ſuch who are diligent in the uſe of means, conſtantly attend on the word and ordinances, and labour for the meat which endures to everlaſting life; ſuch are filled and ſatisfied, as with marrow and fatneſs; and become fat and flouriſhing, and fruitful in every good word and work; and ſhall at laſt arrive to that ſtate, where there will be no more hunger and thirſt.

℣. 5. A righteous man hateth lying, &c.] Or a word of falſhood [y]; as being contrary to honour, truth and conſcience. He hates it in himſelf and others; he hates all ſorts of lies, lies in common converſation, religious lies, doctrinal ones, falſe doctrines, lies ſpoken in hypocriſy; ſuch as the followers of Antichriſt ſpread, being given up unto them that they might be damned, 1 Tim. iv. 2. 2 Theſſ. ii. 11, 12. theſe are an abomination to God and all good men, Rev. xxi. 27. But a wicked man is loathſome, and cometh to ſhame; or, cauſes or ſpreads a ſtink [z]: all wicked men are loathſome and abominable, being very corrupt in principle and practice; all over defiled with ſin, and covered with wounds, bruiſes, and putrifying ſores, from the crown of the head to the ſole of the feet; and eſpecially liars, who are often brought to ſhame and confuſion in this life, and will hereafter come to everlaſting ſhame and contempt. Or, makes himſelf to ſtink [a]; in the noſtrils of all good men, and ſo brought to ſhame: or digs; a metaphor, as Cartwright thinks, from thoſe that dig in the earth, where ſuch as are covered with ſhame, would gladly put their heads.

℣. 6. Righteouſneſs keepeth him that is upright in the way, &c.] Men of uprightneſs and integrity, whoſe hearts are ſincere in the ways of God; the principle of grace and righteouſneſs in them, keeps them in thoſe ways, and will not ſuffer them to turn aſide into crooked paths; the word of righteouſneſs, the doctrine of the goſpel, is a means of preſerving them from ſin, and of keeping them in the right way; particularly the doctrine of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and juſtification by it, is a great antidote againſt ſin, and a powerful motive and incentive to the performance of good works, and all the duties of religion: it engages men to obſerve every command of Chriſt, to walk in all his ways; and is a great preſervative from falſe doctrine and antichriſtian worſhip. But wickedneſs overthroweth the ſinner; it is the cauſe of his utter overthrow, of his being puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction. It is in the Hebrew text, ſin [b] itſelf; the ſinner is ſo called, becauſe he is perfectly wicked, as Jarchi obſerves; he is nothing but ſin, a mere maſs of ſin and corruption. Aben Ezra renders it, the man of ſin; and it may be well applied to him who is emphatically called ſo, and is likewiſe the ſon of perdition; who, for his wickedneſs, will be overthrown and deſtroyed at the coming of Chriſt, and with the brightneſs of it, 2 Theſſ. ii. 3, 8.

℣. 7. There is that maketh himſelf rich, yet hath nothing, &c.] Some perſons make a great ſhew of riches, and would be thought to be rich; put on fine cloaths, live at a high rate, and appear in great pomp, and yet not worth a farthing; which they do to gratify their pride and ambition, and to draw in others to truſt them with their ſubſtance. So in ſpirituals; ſome perſons, as hypocrites, would be thought to be rich in grace, and to be poſſeſſed of all the graces of the Spirit, faith, hope and love; and yet have nothing of true grace, only what is counterfeit; the root of the matter is not in them; no principle of life and grace, only a name to live; nothing of the power, only the form of godlineſs; no oil of grace in the veſſels of their hearts, only the lamp of an outward profeſſion: ſome, as the Phariſees, would be thought to be rich in good works, when they have no good thing in them, and do nothing that is ſpiritually good; either what they do, is not done according to the revealed will of God, as many things done by the Phariſees formerly, and by the Papiſts now, or they do not flow from love; nor are they done in faith, nor in the name and ſtrength of Chriſt, nor to the glory of God by him: ſome, as the ſame perſons, would be thought to be rich in righteouſneſs, when they have no true righteouſneſs at all; not the righteouſneſs of the law, which requires perfection of obedience; not the righteouſneſs of faith, which is the righteouſneſs of another; the righteouſneſs of God is imputed, and is without the works of men; they have no righteouſneſs that can juſtify them, or ſave them, or bring them to heaven: ſome, as the Arminians, would be thought to be rich in ſpiritual ſtrength, and in the power of their free-will, when they have neither will nor power to any thing ſpiritually good; neither to regenerate and convert themſelves, nor to come to Chriſt, nor to do any good work: ſome, as the Perfectioniſts, would be thought to be ſo rich as to be free from ſin, and perfect in grace, when they have none at all, as ſays the apoſtle, 1 John i. 8. their picture is drawn in Ephraim, and their language ſpoke by him, Hoſ. xii. 8. The apoſtate church of Rome would be thought rich with the merits of ſaints, and works of ſupererogation, when ſhe has no merit at all; nor is it poſſible for a creature to merit any thing at the hands of God; compare with all this Rev. iii. 17. There is that maketh himſelf poor, yet hath great riches; there are ſome, on the other hand, who greatly degrade themſelves; live in a very mean way, as though they were very poor; either through covetouſneſs, or becauſe they would not draw upon them the envy of their neighbours, or encourage their friends to borrow of them, or invite thieves to ſteal from them, or for ſome low end or another: the pope of Rome ſometimes affects to ſeem poor, though at other times, and in other reſpects, he would be thought rich; at the Lateran proceſſion, the new-elected pope ſcatters pieces of braſs money among the people, ſaying, as Peter, whoſe ſucceſſor he pretends to be, did, Silver and gold have I none; yet comes into great riches. Theſe words may be applied ſpiritually, in a good ſenſe; there are ſome who are ſenſible of their ſpiritual poverty, and own it; they ingenuouſly expreſs the ſenſe they have of their own nothingneſs and unworthineſs; they declare they have nothing, and can do nothing; they renounce all their own works in the buſineſs of ſalvation, and aſcribe it wholly to the grace of God; they have very mean thoughts, and ſpeak very meanly of themſelves, as leſs than the leaſt of ſaints, and the chief of ſinners: yea, ſome carry the matter too far in the expreſſions of their poverty; will not be perſuaded that they have the true riches of grace, at leaſt will not own it; but give way to their doubts and fears about it, when they are poſſeſſed of much; to whom, ſome think theſe words are applicable. However, they are to ſuch who are poor in ſpirit, as before deſcribed; who have, notwithſtanding great riches, the riches of juſtifying grace, the riches of Chriſt's righteouſneſs; the riches of pardoning grace, a large ſhare thereof, much being forgiven them; the riches of ſanctifying grace, faith, more precious than that of gold that periſheth, with all other graces; the riches of ſpiritual knowledge, preferable to gold and ſilver: they have Chriſt, and all things along with him; they have God to be their portion, and exceeding great reward; they have a large eſtate, an incorruptible inheritance in heaven; they have a better and a more enduring ſubſtance there; theirs is the kingdom of heaven, Matt. v. 3. it is prepared for them, and given to them; compare with this 2 Cor. vi. 10.

℣. 8. The ranſom of a man's life are his riches, &c.] As Benhadad's were to him, when he was in the hands of the king of Iſrael, 1 Kings xx. 34. and as the treaſures the ten men had in the field were to them, for the ſake of which Iſhmael, the ſon of Nethaniah, ſlew them not, Jer. xli. 8. This is the advantage of riches; when a man is taken captive in war or by pirates, or is in the hands of thieves and robbers, he can redeem himſelf by his money; or when his life is in danger by diſeaſes, he can procure healing medicines; or by famine, he can get food to preſerve it, when a poor man cannot: but this is not to be done always, and is only to be underſtood of a temporal life; for as to the ſpiritual and eternal redemption of the ſoul of man, that requires a greater ranſom-price than ſuch corruptible things as ſilver and gold; nothing ſhort of the precious blood of Chriſt is ſufficient for that, Job xxxvi. 18. Pſal. xlix. 6—8. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. Moreover, theſe words may not ſo much deſign the convenience as the inconvenience of riches to men; ſince theſe often invite thieves to aſſault their perſons, and break into their houſes, and threaten their lives; and put wicked men upon forming ſchemes, and drawing up charges and accuſations againſt them, purely to get their money; which bring their lives into danger, and which they can only redeem by their riches. But the poor heareth not rebuke; no charge and accuſation is brought againſt him; no rebuke or reproof is given him; no notice is taken of him, becauſe nothing is to be got from him; he may ſleep with his door unlocked, thieves will give him no diſturbance; he may travel upon the road without being bid to ſtand [c]. Jarchi interprets this of him that is poor in the law; that hearkens not to reproofs and admonitions, given him to depart from evil: but rather, it may be applied to the poor in ſpirit; who truſt not in themſelves and their own righteouſneſs, but in the grace of God and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; who indeed hear the rebukes of good men, and take them kindly; and of bad men, and return not revilings for them; and alſo the rebukes of providence, or the chaſtiſements of their heavenly Father, yet they will never hear any rebuke in wrath from him here or hereafter; when the rich in their own conceit, who truſt in their riches and righteouſneſs, and think to ranſom their ſouls from death by them, will have rebukes with flames of fire.

[b] חטאת peccatum, Montanus, Vatablus, Cocceius, Michaelis; lapſationem, Schultens.

ỷ. 9. The light of the righteous rejoiceth, &c.] The light of joy and gladneſs, which is ſown for them, and ariſes to them; the light of ſpiritual knowledge and experience they have; the light of ſound doctrine; the light of good works, and a goſpel-converſation; all this, as it is delightful to themſelves and others, ſo it is increaſing more and more to the perfect day, and it continues: ſo the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, light is always for the righteous; eſpecially it will be in the latter day, and particularly in the new Jeruſalem-ſtate, when there will be no night, Rev. xxi. 23—25. But the lamp of the wicked ſhall be put out; the light of the righteous is like that of the ſun, bright and pleaſant; but the light of the wicked is like that of a lamp, leſſer and not ſo agreeable, nor will it laſt; their proſperity is ſhort-lived, their joy is but for a moment; the pleaſures of ſin are but for a ſeaſon; their candle ſoon goes out; it is put out in obſcure darkneſs, and they themſelves are reſerved to blackneſs of darkneſs, Job xviii. 5, 6. and xx. 5. Prov. xx. 20. as proſperous and flouriſhing as the kingdom of Antichriſt has been or is, it will be full of darkneſs, Rev. xvi. 10.

ỷ. 10. Only by pride cometh contention, &c.] Though it comes by other things, yet by this chiefly, and there are no contentions without it: or truly, verily, certainly [d], by pride, &c. Unleſs the words may be better rendered, an empty man through pride will give contention [e], or make it; ſuch as are empty of knowledge and wiſdom; and ſuch are generally the moſt proud, and are very apt to raiſe contentions, and foment diviſions: contentions in families, in neighbourhoods, in towns, cities and countries, and in churches, are generally owing to pride; what contentions and confuſions has the pride of the pope of Rome brought into kingdoms and ſtates, into councils, and into the church of God? But with the well-adviſed is wiſdom; ſuch who are humble and modeſt, will ſeek counſel of God; will conſult the ſacred oracles, and aſk advice of thoſe who are ſuperior to them in knowledge and underſtanding; and ſo will neither raiſe contentions themſelves, nor join with thoſe that make them, but do all they can to lay them; theſe ſhew that true wiſdom is with them.

ỷ. 11. Wealth gotten by vanity ſhall be diminiſhed, &c.] In an unjuſt or unlawful way, either by robbery and theft, as Aben Ezra; or by fraud and tricking, by overreaching and circumventing others; or by vain practices, as by cards or dice, and by ſtage-playing and the like; or by curious and illicit arts, as necromancy, judiciary aſtrology, and ſuch like things; whatever is gotten in a wicked way very ſeldom laſts long; it leſſens by little and little till it comes to nothing [f]; ſee Jer. xvii. 11. and ſometimes very quickly and ſuddenly, all at once; thus that maſs of riches which the church of Rome has got together by her vain and wicked practices, by her idolatry, pardons, and indulgences, will in one hour come to nought, Rev. xviii. 17. But he that gathereth by labour ſhall increaſe; or that gathereth by the hand or in it [g]; by hand-labour in an honeſt way, or with the diligent hand which maketh rich; who labours with his hand and gets by it ſufficient to ſupport himſelf and his family, and to give to the neceſſities of others; who does not lay it up in coffers, but keeps it in his hand to diſtribute; ſuch generally thrive and flouriſh: ſome copies read it, he that gathereth עד unto the hand [h], that gathers and puts it into the hands of others; that liberally communicates to the poor; he ſhall increaſe, as commonly liberal perſons do; ſo the Targum, "he that gathereth and giveth to the poor "ſhall increaſe in ſubſtance."

ỷ. 12. Hope deferred maketh the heart ſick, &c.] That is, the object hoped for; if it is not enjoyed ſo ſoon as expected, at leaſt if it is delayed any length of time, the mind becomes uneaſy, the heart ſinks and fails, and the man is diſpirited and ready to deſpond, and give up all hope of enjoying the deſired bleſſing; whether it be deliverance from any evil, or the poſſeſſion of any good. But when the deſire cometh, it is a tree of life; when that which is hoped and wiſhed for, and has been long expected and deſired comes; when there is an accompliſhment of mens wiſhes, it is as grateful to him as the tree of life was in Eden's garden; it gives him an unſpeakable pleaſure and delight. This may be applied to many things in a ſpiritual way, as to the firſt coming of Chriſt; and ſome have thought this is greatly regarded and chiefly intended; this was the object of the hope of Old Teſtament-ſaints; and it was hoped for on a good foundation, on the promiſe of God, which was frequently repeated, enlarged and confirmed; yet this promiſed and hoped for bleſſing was deferred a long time; from the firſt promiſe of it to its accompliſhment were four thouſand years; though not deferred longer than the appointed time, yet longer than the ſaints expected, and which ſometimes made their hearts ſick; they became weak and feeble, fearful and diſſpirited, leſt it ſhould never come to paſs, which occaſioned freſh promiſes and aſſurances to them; ſee Iſa. xxxv. 3, 4. Hab. ii. 3. Mal. iii. 1. but when the deſire came, Chriſt the deſired object; and who is deſirable for the excellencies of his perſon, his mediatorial qualifications, the work of redemption and ſalvation he came about, and the bleſſings he brought with him; and who is the deſire of all nations that was to come, Hag. ii. 7. it was exceeding joyful and delightful to all that expected him, and were looking for redemption in Iſrael, or Chriſt; the coming deſire [i], as it may be rendered, is a tree of life, or lives, the author of life, natural, ſpiritual, and eternal; ſee chap. iii. 18. It may be applied alſo to the ſpiritual preſence of Chriſt, and communion with him; this is what believers, being ſometimes without, hope and wait for; and ſometimes it is deferred a long time, at leaſt they think it ſo, which makes them very uneaſy, and even ſick of love, as the church was, Cant. v. 8. but when what they ſo earneſtly deſire is granted them, it is as if they were in Eden's garden, or rather in the paradiſe above, plucking the fruit of the tree of life: likewiſe it may be applied to eternal glory and happineſs; this is the object of hope in the preſent ſtate; it is ſometimes impatiently expected and deſired, and the language of the ſoul is, Why is his chariot ſo long in coming? come, Lord Jeſus, come quickly; and when this deſired happineſs is enjoyed, how ſweet will it be, and the ſweeter for having been ſo much longed and wiſhed for; and when the ſaints will be in the paradiſe of God, and eat of the tree of life in the midſt of it, and never hunger more.

[i] תאוה באה deſiderium veniens, V. L. Pagninus, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 13. Whoſo deſpiſeth the word, ſhall be deſtroyed, &c.] The word of God. Either Chriſt, the eſſential Word; which muſt be a great evil, conſidering the dignity of his perſon; great ingratitude, conſidering the grace of his office; very dangerous, conſidering what a quick, ſharp and powerful Word he is: and ſuch may be ſaid to deſpiſe him, who deſpiſe his miniſters, and the goſpel preached by them; and which may be meant by the Word, that being the word of God and of truth, the word of righteouſneſs, peace, life and ſalvation; and is to them that periſh fooliſhneſs; and to whom it is ſo, they ſhall periſh, and be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction, for their contempt of it and diſobedience to it. Or the written word may be meant, the ſcriptures, which are given by inſpiration of God, and therefore ought to be had in the greateſt reverence; and yet are greatly ſlighted and deſpiſed by the man of ſin and his followers; who ſet up and prefer their unwritten traditions to them, and ſo make them of none effect: ſuch are all falſe teachers, that deſpiſe or abuſe them, they bring deſtruction to themſelves; for ſo the words may be rendered, ſhall bring deſtruction to himſelf, or ſhall receive detriment from it: ſo the Targum, from the Word itſelf; the Syriac verſion, by it; and the Arabic verſion, by the commandment itſelf; by the threatenings in it, and according to them: or, becauſe of it; becauſe of the contempt of it. But he that feareth the commandment; receives the word with reverence, trembles at it; fears God, and keeps his commandments, and fears to break them; he ſhall be rewarded, with good, as the Targum adds; for in keeping the commandments of God there is great reward: or, ſhall enjoy peace, or be in ſafety[k]; for great peace have they which love the law of God, and ſerve it: or, ſhall be ſound, and in health[l]; when thoſe that deſpiſe it, ſhall be corrupted[m], as the word in the preceding clauſe may be rendered.

℣. 14. The law of the wiſe is a fountain of life, &c.] Or doctrine[n]; the doctrine of thoſe who are taught by the word, and are wiſe unto ſalvation; the words or doctrines of the wiſe, which are given forth by one Shepherd; the inſtructions of ſuch who are like ſcribes, well inſtructed themſelves unto the kingdom of heaven: theſe are as a fountain of living water; which are the means of quickening dead ſinners, and of reviving and refreſhing the ſouls of weary ſaints; and bring life and immortality to light, and point and lead to eternal life: and ſo direct ſouls, To depart from the ſnares of death; the ſnares of ſin, Satan, and the world, to ſhun and avoid them; with which men being entangled, are brought to deſtruction and death.

℣. 15. Good underſtanding giveth favour, &c.] A good underſtanding in things natural and civil, gives favour among men; and ſo a good underſtanding in divine and ſpiritual things, gives a man favour among religious people, makes him taken notice of by them, and acceptable to them: and ſuch an underſtanding no man has, unleſs it be given him; and ſuch appear to have one that do the commandments of God, Pſal. cxi. 10. The Iſraelites, for having and keeping the ſtatutes of the Lord, were accounted by others a wiſe and an underſtanding people; and Chriſt, as man, when he increaſed in wiſdom, grew in favour with God and men. It may be rendered, good doctrine, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, or right doctrine, as the Arabic verſion, gives grace[o]; is the means of conveying grace into the hearts of men, and of increaſing it. What if it ſhould be rendered, Grace gives a good underſtanding[p]? ſince it is certain, that an underſtanding to know God and Chriſt, is a gift of grace, 1 John v. 20. But the way of tranſgreſſors is hard; ungrateful and unpleaſant to themſelves and others; it is a rough and rugged way, in which they ſtumble and fall; and cannot walk with pleaſure themſelves, when their conſciences are awakened, and they are loaded with guilt, and filled with terror; and muſt be very diſagreeable to thoſe who have ſeen the evil of them.

℣. 16. Every prudent man dealeth with knowledge, &c.] In order to get more, and with men of knowledge for the ſame purpoſe; all he does is with knowledge and diſcretion; he does not meddle with things, nor has he to do with perſons he knows nothing of; he both acts and ſpeaks with knowledge, cautiouſly, wiſely, conſidering well time, place and perſons: and every wiſe and good man deals with evangelical knowledge, and ſtudies to grow in the knowledge of the goſpel, and the myſteries of it; in the knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt; the iſſue of which is life eternal. But a fool layeth open his folly; or ſpreads[q] it; and expoſes it to the view of every one, by his fooliſh talk and indiſcreet actions.

℣. 17. A wicked meſſenger falleth into miſchief, &c.] That does not do his errand right, nor deliver his meſſage faithfully; ſuch an one falls from the degree of honour in which he was, into diſgrace; he loſes his maſter's favour that ſent him; he is degraded from his poſt and office: he falls by evil, or into evil[r]; by the evil of ſin, into the evil of puniſhment. So wicked miniſters and falſe teachers, ſuch who transform themſelves into the apoſtles of Chriſt and into angels of light, who corrupt the word of God, and handle it deceitfully; theſe ſhall receive their juſt condemnation; ſince they do a deal of miſchief to the ſouls of men, and therefore ſhall fall into miſchief themſelves, even into everlaſting perdition. But a faithful ambaſſador dor is health; or, an ambaſſador of truths[s]; one that performs his embaſſy well and truly, he is ſalutary, uſeful, and profitable to himſelf, and to them that ſend him: the word for ambaſſador, is tranſlated an hinge, chap. xxvi. 14. and he is ſo called, becauſe upon his negotiations abroad, the hinge of political affairs turn at home. An ambaſſador of Chriſt, who does his work faithfully, keeps back nothing that is profitable, but declares the whole counſel of God; the ſound doctrines he delivers, are health to the ſouls of men; as well as he is approved of God and Chriſt; and ſo it turns to his own health and advantage, who will hear one day ſaid unto him, Well done, good and faithful ſervant.

℣. 18. Poverty and ſhame ſhall be to him that refuſeth inſtruction, &c.] Of parents, maſters, and miniſters of the word; the inſtruction of wiſdom, the inſtruction of the goſpel, in things relating to their preſent ſpiritual peace, and to their eternal welfare: ſuch generally come to poverty and diſgrace in this life, and to everlaſting ſhame and contempt in another; ſee chap. v. 11, 12. But he that regardeth reproof; the reproof of the word, and of the miniſters of it, and of all good men; and takes it kindly, and acts according to it, ſhall be honoured; with riches and reputation; if not with the riches of this world, yet with the riches of grace and glory; and ſhall have honour among the ſaints, and from the Lord himſelf; who will honour thoſe that honour him, as they do who regard the reproof and inſtruction of his word, 1 Sam. ii. 30.

℣. 19. The deſire accompliſhed is ſweet to the ſoul, &c.] Whether the deſire be after riches and honour, after wiſdom and knowledge; or after the beſt things, the knowledge of God, and communion with him; an intereſt in Chriſt, and the bleſſings of his grace, as pardon, righteouſneſs, &c. and a right and title to eternal glory and happineſs, and the enjoyment of that: and how ſweet are theſe things the ſoul deſires, when they are poſſeſſed! ſee ℣. 12. ſuch are the deſires of the godly, as the Septuagint render the word. But it is abomination to fools to depart from evil; they cannot bear the thoughts of parting with their luſts; they are ſo delightful to them, not knowing any thing of the ſweetneſs of the things before mentioned; and which they can never enjoy without departing from ſin, to which they are exceedingly averſe.

℣. 20. He that walketh with wiſe men, ſhall be wiſe, &c.] Who is a companion of them that fear the Lord; converſes frequently with them in private about ſpiritual and experimental things, and walks with them in public in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord; he by thoſe means grows wiſer and wiſer, gains a large ſtock of ſpiritual knowledge and experience; for this holds good both in natural and ſpiritual wiſdom, a man of any capacity at all will improve by keeping wiſe company. But a companion of fools ſhall be deſtroyed; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, ſhall become like them; be a fool as they are, and grow ſtill more and more fooliſh. The Septuagint verſion is, ſhall be known; known by the company he keeps to be a fool alſo: or rather, ſhall be broken[t]; ruined and deſtroyed, evil communications corrupt good manners, and ſo bring to ruin and deſtruction.

℣. 21. Evil purſueth ſinners, &c.] They purſue the evil of ſin, and the evil of puniſhment purſues them, and at laſt overtakes them; their damnation, though it may ſeem to ſlumber and linger, it does not; it is upon the full ſpeed after them, and will quickly ſeize upon them. Some underſtand this of the evil of ſin in the conſcience, which purſues the ſinner, and fills him with terror. But to the righteous good ſhall be repaid; or, he ſhall recompenſe the righteous with good[u], or good to the righteous; that is, God ſhall do it; for all the good things they have done, from a right principle, and to a right end; which good works of theirs will purſue and follow them; and for all the ill things they have ſuffered for righteouſneſs-ſake, a reward of grace, though not of debt, will be given them; as they have had their evil things here, they ſhall have their good things hereafter; as well as are often recompenſed in this life, either in themſelves or in their poſterity, as follows.

℣. 22. A good man leaveth an inheritance to his childrens children, &c.] He not only has a ſufficiency for the preſent ſupport of himſelf and family; but is ſo proſpered and ſucceeded, as to leave an inheritance after him; and which is continued to and enjoyed, not only by his immediate offſpring, but theirs alſo; for being got honeſtly, it wears well; ſee ℣. 11. And the wealth of the ſinner is laid up for the juſt; the riches which wicked men get, are laid up in the purpoſes of God for good men; and in his providence they are tranſlated from the one to the other: ſo the riches of the Egyptians were deſigned for the Iſraelites, and by the providence of God were put into their hands; ſee Job xxvii. 16, 17. Prov. xxviii. 8. Eccl. ii. 26.

℣. 23. Much food is in the tillage of the poor, &c.] The poor are generally employed in tilling land; from whoſe labours in plowing and ſowing, much food ariſes to men, bread to the eater, and ſeed to the ſower: or a poor farmer, that has but a ſmall farm, a few acres of land to till; yet, through his diligence and induſtry, with the bleſſing of God upon it, he gets a comfortable livelihood for himſelf and family; much food, or a ſufficiency of it for the preſent year, and ſeed to ſow his land again the following year. But there is that is deſtroyed for want of judgment; or diſcretion in tilling his land, and managing the affairs of huſbandry, which is God's gift, Iſa. xxviii. 26. or, through injuſtice[w], as ſome render it; for want of doing that which is right and juſt; not paying his labourers their hire and wages, as he ought, and ſo it is blaſted, and comes to ruin. This may be ſpiritually applied. By the poor may be underſtood the poor miniſters of the goſpel; who, though poor, make many rich, 2 Cor. vi. 10. much ſpiritual food is to be had under their labours and miniſtrations, they being employed in cultivating the churches: or elſe, the poor ſaints and poor churches themſelves may be meant; who are tilled by them, among whom is plenty of ſpiritual proviſions; as in the poor proteſtant churches, who, though in the wilderneſs, are nouriſhed for a time, and times, and half a time, when there is no food in the apoſtate church of Rome: and ſo by the tillage, may be meant the church of Chriſt itſelf, which is God's huſbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9. his agriculture, his tillage, his arable land; which he has ſeparated and diſtinguiſhed from the wide world, and employs his power and care about. For he is the huſbandman, John xv. 1. it is he that breaks up the fallow-ground of mens hearts; that makes the ground good which he tills; who ſows the ſeed of the word, and the ſeed of his grace there; who waters it with the dews of his grace, and cauſes his people to grow as the corn, and ripens them for glory: and when the harveſt is come, the end of the world or of life, he ſends his reapers, his angels, to gather them, the wheat, into his garner. And he employs the miniſters of the word as under-huſbandmen, as labourers under him and with him; theſe are the plowmen that hold the plough of the goſpel, and manage that; theſe are his ſeedſmen that go forth, bearing the precious ſeed of the word, and ſow it under his direction; and theſe water the ground that is ſown and planted; their doctrines diſtil as the rain and dew upon it; and theſe bring in their ſheaves with joy at laſt. And now in this tillage is much ſpiritual food; in God's huſbandry, the church, are the word and ordinances, in which are milk for babes, and meat for ſtrong men, ſalutary, wholſome, nouriſhing and ſtrengthening food; here Chriſt, the beſt food, is ſet forth to faith to feed upon; true and real food, meat and drink indeed, ſpiritual, ſavoury, ſatisfying food; ſoul-reviving, refreſhing and nouriſhing food; here is plenty of it, enough and to ſpare: and yet there are ſome that are deſtroyed for want of ſpiritual judgment and diſcerning; who take the poiſon of falſe teachers, inſtead of the food to be had under a goſpel-miniſtry: ſo the followers of the man of ſin are given up to believe a lie and be damned; for want of judgment, they receive the groſſeſt abſurdities, and periſh; as others alſo give in to damnable hereſies, denying the deity, ſatisfaction, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and other ſoul-deſtroying notions; ſee Hoſ. iv. 6. 2 Theſſ. ii. 10—12. 2 Peter ii. 1.

℣. 24. He that ſpareth his rod, hateth his ſon, &c.] Who withholds or withdraws his rod of correction, which is in his hand, which he has power to uſe, and ought to exerciſe at proper times; he, inſtead of loving his ſon, may be ſaid to hate him; for ſuch fond love is no better than hatred; and if he really hated him, he could ſcarcely do a more ill thing by him, than not to correct him for a fault; which was the ſin of good old Eli, and both he and his ſons ſuffered for it. But he that loveth him; that has a true love for his ſon, and a hearty concern for his welfare and future good; he will regulate his affections by his judgment, and not give way to a fond paſſion, to the prejudice of his child: but he chaſteneth him betimes, or in the morning[x]; in the morning of his infancy, before vicious habits are contracted, or he is accuſtomed to ſinning, and hardened in it; or as ſoon as a crime is perpetrated, before it is forgot or repeated: or every morning, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra; that is, continually, as often as it is neceſſary, or as faults are committed.

℣. 25. The righteous eateth to the ſatisfying of his ſoul, &c.] He is bleſſed with a ſufficient competency to live upon; and he is contented with what he has, and uſes it moderately; he has enough to eat, and is contented with his portion, and eats no more than ſufficeth; he eats to the ſatisfying of his appetite, and no more; he does not indulge to luxury and exceſs: and ſo as to ſpiritual things; he eats to the ſatisfying of his ſoul, with the goodneſs and fatneſs of God's houſe, with the word and ordinances, with the promiſes of the goſpel, and with Jeſus Chriſt, the bread of life; with theſe he is ſatisfied, as with marrow and fatneſs. But the belly of the wicked ſhall want; not only ſpiritual food, which he has no appetite for, but corporal food; he ſhall ſtarve in the midſt of plenty, not having a heart to put that food into his mouth, and fill his belly with it, as nature requires, through his coveteouſneſs; or having ſpent his ſubſtance in rioting and wantonneſs, wants bread to ſatisfy the craving of his appetite.

CHAP. XIV.

℣. 1. EVERY wiſe woman buildeth her houſe, &c.] Not only by her fruitfulneſs, as Leah and Rachel built up the houſe of Iſrael; but by her good houſewifry, prudent oeconomy; looking well to the ways of her houſhold; guiding the affairs of her houſe with diſcretion; keeping all things in a good decorum; and bringing up her children in virtue, and in the fear and admonition of the Lord. So Chriſt, who in this book goes by the name of wiſdom, or the wiſe woman, builds his houſe upon himſelf, the rock; and all his people on their moſt holy faith, by means of the miniſtry of the word, and adminiſtration of ordinances: he guides and governs his houſe, where he is, as a Son in it and over it; and of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, taken care of, and wiſely and plentifully provided for: and ſo goſpel-miniſters, who are wiſe to win ſouls, being well inſtructed in the kingdom of God; theſe wiſe women[y], ſo it is in the original text, or wiſe virgins; theſe wiſe maſter builders lay the foundation Chriſt miniſterially, and build ſouls on it; and ſpeak things to the edification of the church and people of God, and the building of them up in faith and holineſs. But the fooliſh plucketh it down with her hands; the Vulgate Latin verſion adds, being built; this ſhe does by her idleneſs and lazineſs; by her laviſh and profuſe way of living; by her negligence and want of oeconomy; by her frequenting playhouſes, and attention to other diverſions; and ſo her family and the affairs of it go to wreck and ruin. Thus the apoſtate church of Rome, who is called a woman, and may be ſaid to be a fooliſh one, being a wicked one and a harlot; ſee Rev. xvii. 2, 3. pulls down the true church and houſe of God with both hands, as much as in her lies, by her falſe doctrines, and ſuperſtitious worſhip and idolatry; and by her murders and maſſacres of the ſaints, with the blood of whom ſhe is ſaid to be drunk; nay, not only pulls it down with her hands, but treads upon it with her feet; Rev. xi. 2. So likewiſe all falſe teachers do as this fooliſh woman does, by their impure lives and impious doctrines, defile the temple of God, ſubvert the faith of many; by means of whom the tabernacle of David, or houſe of God, is fallen down; the ruins and breaches of which Chriſt will repair in the latter day.

℣. 2. He that walketh in his uprightneſs, feareth the Lord, &c.] It is plain that the fear of the Lord is upon the heart, and before the eyes, of ſuch that walk according to the word of God, with a ſincere deſire to glorify him; for it is by the fear of the Lord that men depart from evil, and becauſe of that they cannot do what others do; and therefore when a man walks uprightly, and his converſation is in all holineſs and godlineſs, it ſhews that the fear of God has a place in his heart, which influences his outward behaviour. But he that is perverſe in his ways, deſpiſeth him; either God himſelf, whom the upright walker fears; for he that acts perverſly, contrary to the law of God, or tranſgreſſes that, and goes out of the way, deſpiſes God the lawgiver, tramples upon his authority, ſtretches out his hand, and commits acts of hoſtility againſt him; and he that perverts the goſpel of Chriſt, deſpiſes his miniſters, and deſpiſes Chriſt himſelf, and him that ſent him. Or elſe the meaning is, that ſuch a perverſe walker deſpiſes him that fears the Lord; ſo Aben Ezra interprets it; and ſuch are generally the contempt of wicked men: to this ſenſe is the Vulgate Latin verſion, "he that walks in a right way and fears God, is deſpiſed by him that walks in an infamous way;" but the Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, is deſpiſed; meaning the perverſe man.

℣. 3. In the mouth of the fooliſh is a rod of pride, &c.] A proud tongue, or a tongue ſpeaking proud and haughty things; with which fooliſh or wicked men ſmite others, and wound and hurt their reputation and credit, and in the iſſue hurt themſelves alſo; their tongue is not only a rod to others, but a ſcourge to themſelves, or is the cauſe of evil coming upon them; ſuch was the tongue of Pharaoh, as Jarchi on the place obſerves, Exod. v. 2. and of thoſe the pſalmiſt ſpeaks of, Pſal. lxxiii. 9. and particularly of Antichriſt, whoſe mouth is opened in blaſphemies againſt God, and his tabernacle, and his ſaints, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. But the lips of the wiſe ſhall preſerve them; from ſpeaking ſuch proud and haughty things againſt God and men; or from being hurt by the tongues of men or their own; yea, what comes out of their mouth, is confounding and deſtructive to their enemies, Rev. xi. 5.

℣. 4. Where no oxen are, the crib is clean, &c.] Or empty[z], ſo Jarchi and Aben Ezra. Oxen were uſed in Judea in ſeveral parts of huſbandry; in plowing the land, bringing home the corn, and in threſhing or treading it out, Deut. xxii. 10. and xxv. 4. Now where theſe are not, or not uſed, where huſbandry is neglected, there is no ſtraw in the crib for beaſts, and much leſs food for men; or rather, no corn or wheat[a] on the threſhing-floor[b], or in the barn, granary or ſtorehouſe; for ſo the ſame word is rendered, Jer. l. 26. and in this manner it is interpreted by Gerſom here, as alſo by Kimchi[c]: the word tranſlated clean, is uſed for wheat, Amos viii. 5. By ſupplying the negative particle, the whole may be rendered, thus; where no oxen are, the threſhing-floor, granary, or ſtorehouſe, is without wheat; or there is no wheat on the floor, or in the barn, &c. the note of Jarchi on the text is, "where there are no ſcholars of the wiſe men, there is no inſtruction in the conſtitutions." But much better is the myſtical ſenſe, thus; that where there are no miniſters of the goſpel, there is no food for ſouls. Oxen are an emblem of faithful and laborious miniſters. The ox was one of the emblems in the cherubim, which deſign goſpel-miniſters; the names by which oxen are called agree with them. Here are two words uſed of them in the text; the one comes from a root which ſignifies to teach, lead, guide and govern; and the ſame word for oxen, ſignifies teachers, leaders, guides and governors; names which moſt properly belong to miniſters of the word: the other word comes from a root which ſignifies to ſee, to look; becauſe theſe creatures are ſharp-ſighted. Miniſters are ſeers, overſeers, and as John's living creatures in Rev. iv. 6. one of which was an ox, were full of eyes, within, and before, and behind. So miniſters of the word had need to have good ſight, to look into the ſcriptures, and ſearch them; to look to themſelves and to their flock, and to look out to deſcry enemies, and danger by them; and to look into their own experience, and into things both paſt and to come. There is a likeneſs in miniſters to theſe creatures, as to the nature of them; they are clean creatures, as ſuch ſhould be that miniſter in holy things; and chew the cud, as ſuch ſhould revolve in their minds, and conſtantly meditate upon divine things; and, like them, are patient and quiet under the yoke; and are not only ſtrong to labour, but very laborious in the word and doctrine; ſubmit to the yoke, draw the plough of the goſpel; bring home ſouls to Chriſt, to his church, and to heaven; and tread out the corn, the myſteries of grace, out of the ſacred writings. Now where there are no ſuch laborious and diligent miniſters of the word, as there are none in the apoſtate church of Rome, there is no ſpiritual food for the ſouls of men; but a famine of the word, and men periſh for lack of knowledge. But much increaſe is by the ſtrength of the ox; as there is a large increaſe of the fruits of the earth, through the tillage of it by proper inſtruments; as by the ſtrong and laborious ox, whoſe ſtrength is employed in plowing the ground[d], and treading the corn; which is put for all means of huſbandry, where that is uſed or not: ſo through the unwearied labours of goſpel-miniſters, the bleſſing of God attending them, there is much ſpiritual food; ſee chap. xiii. 23. There is an increaſe of converts, a harveſt of ſouls is brought in; and an increaſe of gifts and of grace, and of ſpiritual light and knowledge, and plenty of proviſions; which ſpiritual increaſe, through the miniſtry of the word, is owing to God, 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7.

℣. 5. A faithful witneſs will not lie, &c.] For that would be contrary to his character as faithful; and as he will not witneſs to a falſhood upon oath in a court of judicature, ſo neither will he tell a lie in common converſation. This may be applied to goſpel-miniſters, who are witneſſes of Chriſt; the goſpel they preach is a teſtimony concerning him, and they bear a faithful witneſs to the truth; nor will they, knowingly and willingly, deliver out a falſhood or a doctrinal lie, ſince no lie is of the truth: the character of a faithful witneſs is given to Chriſt, Rev. i. 5. and iii. 14. who is a witneſs of his Father's love and grace, of his mind and will, and of the doctrines of the goſpel relating to himſelf, and the method of ſalvation by him; and he is faithful to him that appointed him; nor can he, nor will he lie, for he is truth itſelf. But a falſe witneſs will utter lies; or blow[e] them out, and ſpread them abroad in great plenty; he will not ſtick to tell them, and, having no conſcience, will utter them as faſt as he can, with all boldneſs and confidence; for one that fears not to bear teſtimony to a falſhood upon oath, will not ſcruple to lie in common talk. Or the words may be rendered, he that uttereth lies will be a falſe witneſs; he that accuſtoms himſelf to lying, in his converſation with men in private company, will become a falſe witneſs upon occaſion in a public court of judicature: ſuch a one is not to be depended on; leſſer ſins lead to greater, lying to perjury. So falſe teachers, and the followers of the man of ſin, ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, doctrinal ones, which they are given up to believe; and ſuch as do ſo, are falſe witneſſes, deceivers and Antichriſt.

℣. 6. A ſcorner ſeeketh wiſdom and findeth it not, &c.] So the ſcornful Greeks, that ſcoffed at the plainneſs and ſimplicity of the goſpel, ſought natural wiſdom, and thought they found it, and profeſſed they had; but profeſſing themſelves to be wiſe they became fools, and with all their wiſdom knew not God; and falſe teachers, that boaſted of their evangelical wiſdom, and of their great attainments in goſpel-light, and derided others, were ever learning and never came to the knowledge of the truth; and the ſcornful Jews that mocked at the true Meſſiah, would ſeek him, the wiſdom of God, as they have done, and find him not; ſee John vii. 34. Men often ſeek for wiſdom in a wrong way and manner, in the uſe of wrong means; and ſeek it of wrong perſons, and to wrong ends and purpoſes, and ſo ſeek amiſs and find not; and ſome ſeek for wiſdom, even evangelical wiſdom, in a ſcornful manner, in a jeering ſarcaſtic way, as the ſcoffing Athenians did, Acts xvii. 18, 19. and find it not, nor Chriſt the ſubſtance of it, and ſo periſh for lack of knowledge of him. But knowledge is eaſy unto him that underſtandeth; the knowledge of wiſdom, or of Chriſt, is eaſy to him that has a ſpiritual underſtanding given him; the knowledge of the goſpel, and the doctrines of it, is eaſy to him to whom it is given to know the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven; there is nothing perverſe or froward in the words and doctrines of Chriſt; they are all plain to a man whoſe underſtanding is opened by the Spirit of God; eſpecially ſuch as relate to the glory of Chriſt's perſon, and to the way of life and ſalvation by him; ſee chap. viii. 8, 9.

℣. 7. Go from the preſence of a fooliſh man, &c.] A wicked one; avoid him, ſhun his company, depart from him, have no fellowſhip with him, it being dangerous, infectious, and hurtful. When thou perceiveſt not in him the lips of knowledge; when it is obſerved that his lips pour out fooliſhneſs, what is corrupt and unſavoury, unchaſte and filthy; what does not miniſter grace to the hearers, nor is for the uſe of edifying, nor any ways improving in uſeful knowledge, but all the reverſe: the Targum is, "for there is no knowledge in his lips," in what is expreſſed by them; ſome underſtand this ironically, and render the words thus, go right againſt a fooliſh man[f]; join in company with him, and thou ſhalt not know the lips of knowledge, or learn any thing by him; if you have a mind to be ignorant, keep company with a fooliſh man; ſo Jarchi and Gerſom: or rather to this ſenſe the words may be rendered, go to a fooliſh man, ſeeing thou knoweſt not the lips of knowledge[g], ſince thou doſt not approve of wiſe and knowing men, whoſe lips would teach knowledge; and deſpiſeſt the goſpel, and goſpel-miniſters; go to the pope of Rome, as Cocceius on the text obſerves, and hear him, what his holineſs and infallibility ſays; or ſome other falſe teacher.

℣. 8. The wiſdom of the prudent is to underſtand his way, &c.] The way of his calling, in which he ſhould abide, and how to manage it in the beſt manner; the way of his duty, that he may walk inoffenſively both towards God and men; and the way of life and ſalvation, which is by Jeſus Chriſt, which to underſtand and to walk in is the higheſt wiſdom and prudence. But the folly of fools is deceit; or the wiſdom of fools, which the oppoſition requires, and is meant, and is what the holy Ghoſt calls folly, as elſewhere, 1 Cor. iii. 19. this is itſelf deceit; it is ſcience, falſly ſo called; it lies in tricking and deceiving; and the iſſue of it is, not only the deceiving of others but themſelves alſo: ſuch is the folly of the man of ſin and his followers, which lies in deceiving the inhabitants of the earth with their ſorceries and ſuperſtitions, with their lying wonders and miracles; ſee 2 Theſſ. ii. 10. Rev. xiii. 14. and xviii. 23.

℣. 9 Fools make a mock at ſin, &c.] At ſinful actions, their own or others; they make light of them, a jeſt of them, call evil good and good evil; take pleaſure in doing them themſelves, and in thoſe that do them; yea ſport themſelves with the miſchief that ariſes from them unto others; they make a mock at reproofs for them, and ſcoff at thoſe that inſtruct and rebuke them; and laugh at a future ſtate, and an awful judgment they are warned of, and in a ſcoffing manner ſay, Where is the promiſe of his coming? Some, as Aben Ezra obſerves, render it a ſin-offering, and interpret it of the ſin-offerings and ſacrifices under the law, as derided by wicked men; but may be better applied to the ſin-offering or ſacrifice of Chriſt, who made his ſoul an offering for ſin, to make ſatisfaction and atonement for the ſins of his people; this is mocked at by falſe teachers, who deny it; and is expoſed to deriſion and contempt by the papiſts, by their unbloody ſacrifice of the maſs, and by their merits and works of ſupererogation, which they prefer to the ſacrifice and ſatisfaction of Chriſt. The words may be rendered, ſin makes a mock of fools[h]; it deceives them, it promiſes them pleaſure, or profit, or honour, but gives them neither, but all the reverſe. But among the righteous there is favour; they enjoy the favour of God and man; or there is good will[i], good will towards men; they are ſo far from making a mock at ſin, and taking delight in the miſchief that comes by it to others, that they are willing to do all good offices unto men, and by love to ſerve their friends and neighbours: or there is acceptance[k]; they are accepted with God upon the account of the ſin-offering, ſacrifice, and ſatisfaction of Chriſt, which fools mock and deſpiſe.

℣. 10. The heart knoweth his own bitterneſs, &c.] Or the bitterneſs of his ſoul[l], the diſtreſs of his conſcience, the anguiſh of his mind; the heart of man only knows the whole of it; ſomething of it may be known to others by his looks, his words, and geſtures, but not all of it; ſee 1 Cor. ii. 10. Job xxiii. 2. bitterneſs of ſoul often ariſes from outward troubles, pains, and diſeaſes of body, loſſes, croſſes, and diſappointments, 1 Sam. i. 10, 15. Job iii. 20. and vii. 11. and x. 1. Iſa. xxxviii. 15, 17. Sometimes it is upon ſpiritual accounts; but this is not the caſe of every heart; men may be in the gall of bitterneſs, and have no bitterneſs of ſoul on account of it; the ſenſualiſt and voluptuous worldling feels nothing of it, nor the hardned and hardhearted ſinner; only ſuch who are awakened and convinced by the Spirit of God; to theſe, as ſin is a bitter thing in itſelf, it is ſo to their taſte; it makes bitter work for repentance in them; it brings trembling and aſtoniſhment on them; fills them with ſhame and confuſion of face, cauſes ſelf-lothing and abhorrence, and ſevere reflections upon themſelves; ſeeing ſin in its own colours, they are cut to the heart and killed with it; they are preſſed down with the guilt of ſin, and the load of it; and having no views of pardon are in that diſtreſs and bitterneſs of ſoul which no tongue can expreſs nor heart conceive, but what has felt the ſame. And a ſtranger doth not intermeddle with his joy; or mingle himſelf with it [m]; he does not ſhare in it or partake of it; this is more eſpecially true of ſpiritual joy, which as it is unſpeakable to the man that poſſeſſes it, it paſſes the underſtanding of a natural man; he can form no true idea of it: ſpiritual joy is what a ſenſible ſinner partakes of upon the goſpel, the joyful ſound of ſalvation, reaching his ears and his heart; at the revelation of Chriſt in him and to him, as a Saviour; when an application of pardoning grace is made to his ſoul, and he has a view of the compleat righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and his intereſt in it, and can ſee all his ſins expiated and atoned for by his ſacrifice; when he is favoured with a ſight of the fulneſs of grace in Chriſt, and of the ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation he has wrought out for him; and likewiſe when he is indulged with a viſit from him, and enjoys communion with him; and when he has a glimpſe of eternal glory, and a well-grounded hope of right unto it, and meetneſs for it: now a ſtranger, one that is a ſtranger to God and godlineſs, to Chriſt and the way of ſalvation by him, to the Spirit and his work of grace upon the heart, to the goſpel and the doctrines of it, to his own heart and the plague of it, to the ſaints and communion with them; knows nothing at all of the above joy, nor can he interrupt it, nor take it away.

℣. 11. The houſe of the wicked ſhall be overthrown, &c.] Houſes built to perpetuate their names and eternize their memory; and which, though built high and ſtately, ſtrong and firm, yet by one accident or another ſhall come to ruin, when they imagined they would continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations, Pſal. xlix. 11. or their families ſhall become extinct, none to be their heirs and inherit their eſtates, and tranſmit their name to poſterity; or the ſubſtance of their houſe, their riches and wealth, eſpecially that gotten diſhoneſtly, ſhall waſte away: and in a ſpiritual ſenſe the houſe or hope of ſuch, as to eternal ſalvation, being built on the ſand, or ſomething of their own, their external duties, or an outward profeſſion of religion, ſhall not ſtand; though they lean upon it and would hold it faſt, but it ſhall fall, and great ſhall be the fall of it; and particularly the apoſtate church of Rome, that ſynagogue of Satan, that habitation of devils, that hold of every foul ſpirit, and cage of every unclean bird, ſhall be overthrown with an utter overthrow, ſhall fall and never riſe more, Rev. xviii. 2. But the tabernacle of the upright ſhall flouriſh; their low and mean cottages, which are run up ſlightly, like tents moveable from place to place, yet ſhall be eſtabliſhed, chap. xv. 25. their families ſhall become numerous like a flock of ſheep, Pſal. cvii. 41, 42. and their ſubſtance increaſe; they ſhall flouriſh in worldly things and grow rich, or however in ſpirituals, in gifts and grace; ſhall flouriſh in the courts of the Lord, and tabernacles of the moſt High, like palm-trees and cedars; for the alluſion is to the flouriſhing of trees, Pſal. xcii. 13, 14. eſpecially they will be in ſuch flouriſhing circumſtances in the latter day, when Antichriſt will be deſtroyed, and when the tabernacle of God will be with men, Pſal. lxxii. 8. Rev. xxi. 3.

℣. 12. There is a way which ſeemeth right unto a man, &c.] As the way of ſin and wickedneſs does, it promiſing much carnal pleaſure and mirth; there is a great deal of company in it, it is a broad road, and is pleaſant, and ſeems right, but it leads to deſtruction; ſo the way of the hypocrite and phariſee that truſts to his own righteouſneſs, and deſpiſes others, and even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; or however does not ſubmit to it, but tramples upon him, and counts the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and ſo is deſerving of ſorer puniſhment than the profane ſinner; yet on account of his good works, as he calls them, fancies himſelf to be in a fair way for heaven and happineſs; ſo popery, through the pomp and grandeur and gaudineſs of worſhip, through the lying miracles of the prieſts, and the air of devotion that appears in them, ſeems to be a right way. But the end thereof are the ways of death; which lead unto eternal death; for that is the wages of ſin, let it appear in what ſhape it will.

℣. 13. Even in laughter the heart is ſorrowful, &c.] As Belſhazzar's was in the midſt of his feaſt and jollity, when he ſaw the writing on the wall; ſo ſin may ſtare a man in the face, and guilt load his conſcience and fill him with ſorrow, amidſt his merriment; a man may put on a merry countenance, and feign a laugh, when his heart is very ſorrowful; and oftentimes this ſorrow comes by ſinful laughter, by mocking at ſin and jeſting at religion. And the end of that mirth is heavineſs; ſometimes in this life a ſinner mourns at laſt, and mourns for his wicked mirth, or that he has made himſelf ſo merry with religious perſons and things, and oftentimes when it is too late; ſo the end of that mirth the fool in the goſpel promiſed himſelf was heavineſs, when his ſoul was required of him; this was the caſe of the rich man who had his good things here, and his evil things hereafter.

℣. 14. The backſlider in heart ſhall be filled with his own ways, &c.] One that is a backſlider at heart, whoſe heart departeth from the Lord; in whom there is an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God; and indeed apoſtaſy begins at the heart, and ſhews itſelf in the life and converſation: there may be a backſliding when the heart does not wickedly depart from God; but is through the infirmity of the fleſh and the force of temptation; from which backſlidings the Lord's people are recovered, and which are healed by his grace: but here ſuch an one is meant who willingly and heartily backſlides; and ſuch ſhall have the reward of their hands and actions given them, or the full and due puniſhment of their ſins; they ſhall have their belly full of their own wicked ways and works, the juſt recompence of reward for them. And a good man ſhall be ſatisfied from himſelf; ſhall eat the fruit of his own doings, ſhall be bleſſed in his deeds, and have peace and ſatisfaction therein; though not ſalvation by them, or for them: he ſhall be ſatisfied with the grace of God beſtowed on him and wrought in him; and from a feeling experience of the grace of God within him, ſhall be ſatisfied that he has in heaven a better and an enduring ſubſtance; or he ſhall be ſatisfied from above himſelf[m], from the grace that is in Chriſt, out of the fulneſs which is in him; and ſhall be filled with all the fulneſs of God he is capable of; and eſpecially in the other world, when he ſhall awake in his likeneſs. The Targum is, "a good man "ſhall be ſatisfied with his fear;" and ſo the Syriac verſion, with the fear of his ſoul; it may be rendered as by the Vulgate Latin verſion, a good man ſhall be above him[n]; that is, above the backſlider; ſhall be better filled, and be more happy than he.

℣. 15. The ſimple believeth every word, &c.] Every thing that is ſaid to him, every ſtory that is told him, and every promiſe that is made him; and ſo is eaſily impoſed upon, and drawn in to his hurt: every word of God, or doctrine of his, ought to be believed; becauſe whatever he ſays is true, he cannot lie; every word of his is pure, free from all error and falſhood; it is a tried word, and found to bear a faithful teſtimony, and if we receive the witneſs of men, the witneſs of God is greater; beſides his word is profitable for inſtruction, and for the increaſe of peace, joy, and comfort, and is effectual to ſaving purpoſes: every word of Chriſt is to be believed, who is a teacher ſent from God; whoſe miſſion is confirmed by miracles, and whoſe doctrine is not his own as man, but his Father's; he is the faithful witneſs, and truth itſelf; his words are more than human, and beſides are pleaſant and wholſome: and every word and doctrine of his apoſtles, who received their miſſion, commiſſion, and doctrines from him, is alſo to be believed; but every ſpirit, or every one that pretends to be a ſpiritual man, and to have ſpiritual gifts, is not to be believed; but the words and doctrines of ordinary men and miniſters are to be firſt tried by the unerring rule of the ſacred ſcriptures; yea, the doctrines of the apoſtles were examined by them; ſee 1 John iv. 1. Acts xvii. 11. they are ſimple, weak, ſilly, fooliſh perſons, that believe all they hear, whether right or wrong, true or falſe, good or hurtful; they are children in knowledge, who are toſſed to and fro with every wind of doctrine, and are deceived with good words and fair ſpeeches, Eph. iv. 14. Rom. xvi. 18. This truly deſcribes the followers of the man of ſin; who give heed to ſeducing ſpirits, and doctrines of devils; who believe as the church believes; that believe with an implicit faith; believe every word and doctrine the pope and councils ſay they ſhould, though ever ſo abſurd; as for inſtance, the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation: theſe are ſimple or fools with a witneſs, who give up their underſtandings, and even their ſenſes unto, and pin their faith upon another. But the prudent man looketh well to his going; or its going[o]; to the courſe and tendency of the word he hears, or the doctrine which is propoſed to his faith; he conſiders well whether it is agreeable, or is contrary to the perfections of God; whether it derogates from the glory of any of the divine perſons; whether it makes for the magnifying the riches of God's grace, and for the debaſing of men; or for the depretiating of the one, and ſetting up of the other; and whether it is a doctrine according to godlineſs, or no, that tends to promote holineſs of heart and life, or to indulge a looſe converſation; and according to theſe criteria, he judges and determines whether he ſhall believe it or no. Or, to his going; that is, to the going of the deceiver and impoſtor; he obſerves narrowly the methods he takes, the artifices he makes uſe of, the cunning ſlight by which he lies in wait to deceive; how craftily he walks, and handles the word of God deceitfully; and he takes notice of his moral walk and converſation, and, as our Lord ſays, ye ſhall know them by their fruits, Matt. vii. 16. Or elſe the meaning is, and which ſeems to be the ſenſe of our verſion; that he looks well unto, and carefully obſerves his own goings; he takes heed to his ways, that they are right; that he is not in ways of his own deviſing and chooſing, but in God's ways; in the way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt; in the path of faith on him, and in the way of holineſs; that he has choſen the way of truth, and walks in that; and that every ſtep he takes in doctrine, is according to the word of truth; and that whatever he does in worſhip, is agreeable to the divine rule; and that every path of duty he treads in, is according to the ſame, and as he has Chriſt for a pattern, and the Spirit for a guide; and that his walk is as becomes the goſpel, worthy of the vocation wherein he is called, and that it is circumſpect and wiſe; and ſuch a man may be truly ſaid to be a prudent man: the Targum is, "he attends "to his good;" and ſo he does.

℣. 16. A wiſe man feareth, and departeth from evil, &c.] He fears God, and is careful not to offend him; wherefore he departs from ſin, ſtands at a diſtance from it, abſtains from all appearance of it; being influenced by the goodneſs and grace of God unto him, he fears the Lord and his goodneſs, and therefore avoids all occaſions of ſinning againſt him: his motive is not merely fear of puniſhment, as Jarchi, but a ſenſe of goodneſs; and now, as it is through the influence of divine fear, that men depart from evil; ſo to do this ſhews a good underſtanding, and that ſuch a man is a wiſe man, chap. xvi. 6. Job xxviii. 28. But the fool rageth, and is confident; he fears neither God nor men, he ſets his mouth againſt both; he rages in heart, if not with his mouth, againſt God and his law, which forbid the practice of ſuch ſins he delights in; and againſt all good men, that admoniſh him of them, rebuke him for them, or diſſuade him from them: and is confident, that no evil ſhall befal him; he has no concern about a future ſtate, and is fearleſs of hell and damnation, though juſt upon the precipice of ruin; yet, as the words may be rendered, he goes on confidently, nothing can ſtop him; he puſhes on, regardleſs of the laws of God or men, of the advices and counſels of his friends; or of what will be the iſſue of his deſperate courſes in another world.

℣. 17. He that is ſoon angry, dealeth fooliſhly, &c.] A man that is quick and ſhort, of a haſty ſpirit, and preſently diſcovers anger and reſentment in his face; he ſays and does many fooliſh things, which he afterwards is ſorry for, and repents, and is aſhamed of; and he is to be pitied and forgiven. And a man of wicked devices is hated; one that hides his anger, covers his reſentment, contrives ſchemes to revenge himſelf, and waits an opportunity to put them in execution, is juſtly hateful to God and men.

[n] Et ſuper eum erit vir bonus, V. L. De Dieu.

[o] לאשרו greſſum illius, ſc. ſermonis, Baynus, ſo ſome in Mercerus.

℣. 18. The ſimple inherit folly, &c.] It is natural and hereditary to them, they are born like wild aſſes colts; the fooliſh ſayings and proverbs, cuſtoms and practices of their anceſtors, though they have been demonſtrated to be mere folly, yet theſe, their poſterity, approve them; they love, like and retain them as their patrimony, Job xi. 12. Pſalm xlix. 13. Such are the fooliſh traditions, cuſtoms, principles and doctrines of the church of Rome, handed down from father to ſon; and becauſe popery is the religion they have been bred and brought up in, though ſo fooliſh and abſurd, they will not relinquiſh it. But the prudent are crowned with knowledge; natural, civil and ſpiritual, eſpecially the latter; evangelical knowledge, the knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt, and of goſpel-truths; they are honoured with an acquaintance with them; and they eſteem the knowledge of theſe above all things elſe, and reckon all things elſe but loſs and dung in compariſon of them; they are as a crown unto them, and the knowledge of them is the way to the crown of life; yea, is itſelf life eternal, Phil. iii. 8. John xvii. 3. Or, they crown themſelves with knowledge[p]; they labour after it, purſue it with eagerneſs, follow on to know the Lord, and attain to a large ſhare of it; ſurround, encompaſs, and lay hold upon it, and gird themſelves about with this girdle of truth. Or, they crown knowledge[q]; do honour to that, by putting it in practice; by adding to it temperance, and every virtue, and by bringing others to it; and are an ornament to it in their lives and converſation; they adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour.

℣. 19. The evil bow before the good, &c.] Wicked men before good men. This, as Jarchi obſerves, reſpects future time; even the latter day-glory, or the ſpiritual times of the Meſſiah, when the kingdom under the whole heaven ſhall be given to the ſaints of the moſt High: for though there may have been ſome few inſtances of this kind, as Haman bowing before Mordecai, and the heathen emperors before Conſtantine; and there may be ſome now, in ſome caſes where obligation requires; yet this is far from being general, as it will be in the ſpiritual reign of Chriſt; when the ſons of thoſe that afflicted the church will come bending to her, and they that have deſpiſed her ſhall bow themſelves down at the ſoles of her feet; and even great perſonages too ſhall bow down and lick the duſt of her feet; the kings of the earth, who before have been in confederacy with Antichriſt, and have perſecuted the ſaints, now ſhall hate the whore, and honour the true church of Chriſt: this will be in the Philadelphian ſtate, which is the ſame with the ſpiritual reign of Chriſt; ſuch who called themſelves Jews, and are not, ſhall come and worſhip before the feet of the church, and own that ſhe and her members are the favourites of heaven, Dan. vii. 27. Iſa. xlix. 23. and lx. 14. Rev. iii. 9. And the wicked at the gates of the righteous; or, come to the gates of the righteous, as the Syriac verſion ſupplies it; they come and knock there, ſtand and wait, or lay themſelves down; become proſtrate and humble ſupplicants for relief and protection, as beggars do. This may alſo reſpect their attendance at wiſdom's gates, at the gates of Zion, on public ordinances, for counſel and inſtruction, which before they deſpiſed, chap. viii. 34. The Septuagint verſion is, ſhall ſerve thy gates; that is, at them; ſee Iſa. lx. 11, 12.

℣. 20. The poor is hated even of his own neighbour, &c.] As well as of ſtrangers; that is, he is ſhy of him; he does not care to take any notice of him, or be friendly with him, leſt he ſhould be burdenſome to him. Poverty brings a man into contempt and diſgrace; the ſame man, in affluence and indigence, is reſpected or diſreſpected: this is true, as Gerſom obſerves, of a man that is poor, whether in money or in knowledge, in his purſe or in his underſtanding. But the rich hath many friends; or, many are the lovers of the rich[r]: for the ſake of their riches; either for the ſake of honour or profit, or becauſe the rich want nothing of them, or becauſe they themſelves may gain ſomething by them: this alſo is obſerved by the above Jewiſh commentator, to be true of the rich in ſubſtance or in wiſdom; but the former ſenſe is beſt; for a wiſe man, if poor in the world, is but little regarded.

℣. 21. He that deſpiſeth his neighbour, ſinneth, &c.] He that deſpiſeth his neighbour in his heart, ſpeaks ſlightly of him, overlooks him, is not friendly to him; will neither converſe with him, nor relieve him in his neceſſity; for it ſeems to be underſtood of his poor neighbour; and ſo the Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, he that deſpiſeth the poor; that deſpiſes him for his poverty; becauſe of his pedigree and education, and the low circumſtances he is in; or on account of his weakneſs and incapacity, or any outward circumſtance that attends him; ſuch a one ſins very greatly, is guilty of a heinous ſin; and he will be reckoned and dealt with as a ſinner, and be condemned and puniſhed, and ſo be unhappy and miſerable. But he that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he; or, "that gives to the poor," as the Targum; who has compaſſion on him in his diſtreſs, and ſhews it by relieving him: he that ſhews favour to the meek and humble ones, as the word[s] may be rendered, and as they generally are that are in affliction and poverty, for theſe tend to humble men; and ſuch who regard them in their low eſtate are happy or bleſſed; they are bleſſed in things temporal and ſpiritual, and both here and hereafter; ſee Pſal. xli. 1—3. Matt. v. 7.

℣. 22. Do they not err that deviſe evil? &c.] Certainly they do; they go aſtray from the right way, from the word of truth, from the goſpel of Chriſt, who contrive ſchemes to commit ſin, and do miſchief to their neighbours; or who plow[t] it, and ſow it, and expect a fine harveſt; but they will be miſtaken, and find it will not turn to account, and that they have took a wrong courſe, and have gone out of the way: none more miſchievous deviſers or contrivers of evil than the Papiſts, and none more ſadly and fatally err. But mercy and truth ſhall be to them that deviſe good; who deviſe liberal things, to do good to the poor and needy; to their neighbours, their fellow-creatures and fellow-chriſtians: ſuch receive grace and mercy at the hands of God, and his truth will appear in making good all promiſes to them; mercy and truth will preſerve them from the evil way, and guide them in the right way, ſo that they ſhall not err as others do; neither from the doctrines of grace and truth, nor from the practice of them.

℣. 23. In all labour there is profit, &c.] Or abundance[u]; much is got by it, food, raiment, riches, wealth, wiſdom, honour; either with the labour of the hands or head, and nothing is to be got without labour; and he that is laborious in his calling, whether it be by manual operation, working with his hands that which is good; or by hard ſtudy, much reading, and conſtant meditation, is like to gain much for his own uſe and the good of others. But the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury; or want[w], of food and raiment, the common neceſſaries of life; a man that ſpends his time in idle talk, boaſting of what he can do and does, and yet does nothing, is in a fair way to come to beggary: ſo all talk about wiſdom, and knowledge, and religion, without making uſe of the proper means of improvement, tends to the poverty of the mind; and generally they are moſt empty of knowledge, natural or ſpiritual, that talk and brag moſt of it; empty caſks make the greateſt ſound; good diſcourſe, wholſome words, ſound doctrine, thoroughly digeſted, tend indeed to edification, to the enriching of the mind; but vain words, the enticing words of mens wiſdom; logomachies, ſtriving about words to no profit; and all great ſwelling words of vanity, which are all mere lip-labour; they tend to ſpiritual poverty and leanneſs of ſoul.

℣. 24. The crown of the wiſe is their riches, &c.] Riches being uſed by them to increaſe and improve their knowledge and wiſdom, and for the good of men, are an honour to them, and give them credit and reputation among men of ſenſe and goodneſs; ſee Eccl. vii. 11, 12. But the fooliſhneſs of fools is folly; mere folly, extreme folly, juſt the ſame as it was; riches make them never the wiſer; yea, their folly is oftentimes made more manifeſt through the ill uſe they make of their riches; ſpending them in the gratification of their ſinful luſts; and making no uſe of them for their own improvement in knowledge, or for the good of their fellow-creatures. The Targum is, "the glory of fools "is their folly;" and that is no other than their ſhame, and in which they glory; ſuch fools are wicked men.

℣. 25. A true witneſs delivereth ſouls, &c.] Or, a witneſs of truth[x]: one that witneſſes truth upon oath in a court of judicature, he delivers ſouls; men, not one man only, but many; a whole family, or more, in danger of being ruined; he delivers them, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions add, from evils; from evil charges and accuſations brought againſt them; from the oppreſſion of their enemies, from the loſs of their good name, and from ruin and deſtruction, that otherwiſe would have come upon them; he delivers their lives[y], as it may be rendered, in danger of being loſt by falſe accuſations: ſo a witneſs of the truth of Chriſt, or a faithful miniſter of the goſpel, not only ſaves himſelf, but them that hear him; and is an inſtrument of delivering the ſouls of men from error and damnation. But a deceitful witneſs ſpeaketh lies; boldly, openly, by wholeſale; he blows them out[z], to the ruin of the good names and characters, and to the deſtruction of the lives of the innocent: and ſo a falſe teacher, one that lies in wait to deceive, ſpeaks lies in hypocriſy, doctrinal lies, to the ruin of the ſouls of men. The Targum is, "he that "ſpeaketh lies is deceitful;" he is deceit[a] itſelf, as in the Hebrew text. Such is the man of ſin, and ſuch are his emiſſaries.

℣. 26. In the fear of the Lord is ſtrong confidence, &c.] Such who fear the Lord, may be confident that he has a love to them, a delight in them; that his eye is upon them, and his heart towards them; and will communicate every needful good to them, and protect and defend them: or the Lord himſelf that is feared, who is the object of fear, called the fear of Iſaac, Gen. xxxi. 42. he is a ſtrong tower, a place of defence to thoſe that fear him and truſt in him, chap. xviii 10. And his children ſhall have a place of refuge; the children of God, as thoſe that fear him are; the Lord is a place of refuge to them, from the avenger of blood, from the vindictive juſtice of God; from the ſtorm and tempeſt of divine wrath, and from the curſes of a righteous law; as well as from the rage and perſecutions of men.

℣. 27. The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, &c.] Where the true fear of God is, there is a real principle of grace, which is a well of living water, ſpringing up unto everlaſting life; eternal life is connected with it; it makes meet for it, and iſſues in it: or the Lord, who is the object of fear, he is the fountain of life; as of natural, ſo of ſpiritual and eternal life; ſpiritual life ſprings from him, is ſupported and maintained by him, the conſequence of which is life everlaſting. To depart from the ſnares of death; ſins, tranſgreſſions, as Aben Ezra interprets it; theſe are the works of mens hands, in which they are ſnared; theſe are the cords in which they are holden, and ſo die without inſtruction; the wages of them are death, even death eternal: likewiſe there are the ſnares of the world and of the devil, temptations to ſin, with which being enſnared, lead to death; now the fear of the Lord is a means of delivering from and of avoiding thoſe ſnares, and ſo of eſcaping death.

℣. 28. In the multitude of people is the king's honour, &c.] For it is a ſign of a good and wiſe government, of clemency and righteouſneſs being exerciſed, of liberty and property being enjoyed, of peace, plenty and proſperity; which encourage ſubjects to ſerve their king chearfully, and to continue under his reign and government peaceably; and which invites others from different parts to come and ſettle there alſo; by which the ſtrength and glory of a king are much increaſed. This is true of the King of kings, of Jeſus Chriſt, who is King of ſaints; his honour and glory, as Mediator, lies in a large number of voluntary ſubjects, made willing to ſerve him in the day of his power upon them, as numerous as the drops of the morning-dew; ſuch as he had in the firſt times of the goſpel, both among the Jews and among the Gentiles; and as he will have more eſpecially in the latter day, when thoſe prophecies ſhall be fulfilled in Iſa. lx. 4—8. and ſo this is interpreted of the King Meſſiah, in an ancient writing[b] of the Jews. But in the want of people is the deſtruction of the prince; or, the conſternation[c] of him; if his people are deſtroyed in wars, his ambition or cruelty has led him to; or they are driven out from his kingdom by perſecution or oppreſſion; hence follows a decay of trade, and conſequently of riches; uncultivation of land, and ſo want of proviſion: in courſe of time there is ſuch a decreaſe, that, as there are but few to carry on trade and till the land, ſo to fight for their prince, and defend his country; wherefore, when attacked by a foreign power, he is thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, and is brought to deſtruction. This will be the caſe of the prince of darkneſs, the man of ſin, Antichriſt; who, though however populous he may be, or has been, ruling over tongues, people and nations, yet ere long he will be deſerted by them; one nation after another will fall off from him; they and their kings will hate him, make him bare and deſolate, and burn him with fire, Rev. xvii. 15, 16. Some render it, the conſternation of leanneſs[d]; ſuch conſternation as cauſes leanneſs in a king.

℣. 29. He that is ſlow to wrath is of great underſtanding, &c.] Or long in wrath[e]; it is long before he is angry; he is long ſuffering, bears much and long, is very patient; ſuch an one appears to underſtand himſelf and human nature, and has a great command over his paſſions; which ſhews him to be a man of great wiſdom and underſtanding. But he that is haſty of ſpirit exalteth folly; or is ſhort of ſpirit[f]; is ſoon angry; preſently diſcovers reſentment in his words, looks and geſtures; ſuch an one exalts folly, prefers it to wiſdom, ſets it above himſelf, and makes it his maſter: or he lifts it[g] up; expoſes his folly to public view, ſo that it is ſeen of all men to his diſgrace.

℣. 30. A ſound heart is the life of the fleſh, &c.] A heart made ſo by the grace of God, in which are ſound principles of truth, righteouſneſs and holineſs; theſe preſerve from ſin, and ſo from many diſeaſes; whereby the life of the fleſh or body is kept ſafe and ſound, or that is kept in health and vigour: or a quiet heart[h]; a heart free from wrath, anger and envy, and ſuch like paſſions and perturbations; this contributes much to the health of the body, and the comfort of life: or a healing heart, or ſpirit[i]; that is humane, kind and friendly; that pities and heals the diſtreſſes of others, and makes up differences between perſons at variance: ſuch an one is the life of fleſhes[k], as in the original text; or of men, of the ſame fleſh and blood; the life of others, as well as of his own fleſh; ſuch an one contributes to the comfortable living of others as well as of himſelf. But envy the rottenneſs of the bones; a man that envies the happineſs and proſperity of others, this preys upon his own ſpirits, and not only waſtes his fleſh, but weakens and conſumes the ſtronger parts of his body, the bones; it is as a moth within him, as the Arabic verſion: the Targum is, "as rottenneſs in wood, ſo is envy in the bones;" hence Ovid[l] calls it livor edax, and ſo Martial[m].

℣. 31. He that oppreſſeth the poor, reproacheth his maker, &c.] That does him any injury, either by ſcoffing at him, and reproaching him for his poverty; or by vexatious law-ſuits; or by withholding from him his wages; or not giving him that relief which he ought: ſuch an one not only injures the poor man; but reproaches God that made him, not only a man, but a poor man; and who is the maker of the rich man alſo, chap. xxii. 2. But he that honoureth him, hath mercy on the poor; he that is deſirous of honouring God and glorifying him, will give of his ſubſtance to the poor; having compaſſion on him in his neceſſitous circumſtances, will relieve him; and in ſo doing he honours God, whoſe image the poor man bears, and who has commanded him ſo to do. The words may be rendered, he that hath mercy on the poor, honoureth him; that is, his maker: ſo the Targum, "he that hath mercy on him that ſuffers injury, honoureth him."

℣. 32. The wicked is driven away in his wickedneſs, &c.] That is, at death, as the oppoſite clauſe ſhews; he is driven out of the world, his heart is ſo much ſet on; from all the good things of it, which are his all, his portion; from the place of his abode, which will know him no more; and from all his friends and acquaintance, with whom he has lived a merry and jovial life; he ſhall be driven out of light into darkneſs, even into outer darkneſs; into hell, which is a place of torment, a priſon, a lake burning with fire and brimſtone; he ſhall be driven as a beaſt is driven: and ſuch is the man of ſin, who ſhall go into perdition; and ſuch are his followers, and that will be their end, Rev. xiii. 1, 11. and xvii. 8. he ſhall be driven ſore againſt his will; the righteous depart, and deſire to depart; but the wicked are driven, and go unwillingly, with reluctance; they would fain flee out of the hand of God, and yet they have no power to withſtand; go they muſt, they are driven forcibly and irreſiſtibly: and it may alſo denote the ſuddenneſs of their death, and the ſwiftneſs of their deſtruction. The driver is not mentioned; it may be underſtood of the Lord himſelf, who, in and by a ſtorm of his wrath, hurls them out of their place; or of death, as having a commiſſion from him, when a man has no power over his ſpirit to retain it; or of angels, good or bad, employed by the Lord in driving their ſouls to hell upon their ſeparation from their bodies. The circumſtance, in his wickedneſs, may denote their dying in their ſins unrepented of, unforgiven, and without faith in Chriſt; in the midſt of them, in their full career of ſin, under the power, filth and guilt of it; and as ſometimes, in the horror of a guilty conſcience, in black deſpair, without any hope or view of pardon, the reverſe of the righteous man; and ſo will have all their wickedneſs to anſwer for, it being not taken away, but found upon them: or this may be expreſſive of the cauſe of the wicked man's being driven away, namely, his wickedneſs; for ſo it may be rendered and interpreted, becauſe of his wickedneſs[n]; it is for that he ſhall die and go to hell: or it may be rendered, into his evil[o]; and ſo denote the everlaſting puniſhment into which he ſhall go, being driven. But the righteous hath hope in his death; not in the death of the wicked man, as Aben Ezra, when he ſhall be delivered, and he can do him no more hurt; but in his own death; he dies as other men; his righteouſneſs, though it delivers him from eternal death, yet not from a corporal one; though the death of a righteous man is different from others; he dies in Chriſt, in the faith of him, and in hope of eternal life by him; and to die his death is very deſirable: he has a hope of intereſt in the bleſſings of grace and glory; which is a good hope through grace; is wrought in him at regeneration; and is founded on that righteouſneſs from whence he is denominated righteous, even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and is of ſingular uſe and advantage to him in life: and this grace he exerciſes at death; it carries him through the valley of death, and above the fears of it; he hopes, though he dies, he ſhall riſe again; and he hopes to be in heaven and happineſs, immediately upon his diſſolution, and to all eternity; he hopes to ſee God, be with Chriſt, angels and good men, for evermore. Jarchi's note is, "when he dies, he truſts he ſhall enter into the garden of Eden, or paradiſe."

℣. 33. Wiſdom reſteth in the heart of him that hath underſtanding, &c.] It is in his heart, as the treaſury where it is laid up, and where it is kept in ſafety; here it lies hid and undiſcerned, unmoleſted and undiſturbed; no noiſe is made about it, or any oſtentation of it; it dwells quietly and conſtantly there. But that which is in the midſt of fools is made known; the leaſt ſhare of knowledge which ſuch perſons have, or think they have, does not lie long in the midſt of them; they take every opportunity of ſhewing it to others, or of letting others know what they have attained to; and thereby, inſtead of getting the character of wiſe and prudent men, obtain that of fools; for though a prudent man is communicative of his knowledge to others, it is at proper times, and in proper places, and to proper perſons, which fools do not obſerve; but without any manner of judgment or diſcretion, or regard to perſons, places and ſeaſons, vainly thruſt out their knowledge, and ſo proclaim their folly. The Syriac verſion is, "in the heart of fools it ſhall not be known;" it has no place there.

℣. 34. Righteouſneſs exalteth a nation, &c.] Adminiſtered by the government, and exerciſed by ſubjects towards one another; doing juſtice between man and man: this exalts a nation, as it did the people of Iſrael, whilſt practiſed among them; this ſets a people above their neighbours, and high in the eſteem of God and men; and is attended with privileges and bleſſings, which make a nation great and honourable. Some underſtand this of almsdeeds or beneficence to the poor; which, both in the Hebrew and Greek languages, is called righteouſneſs; ſee Matt. vi. 1. and the note there. It may be put for the whole of true religion, which is an honour to a nation, where it obtains; and is what makes the holy nation, and peculiar people, ſo truly illuſtrious; and particularly the righteouſneſs of Chriſt makes ſuch who are intereſted in it, really great and noble, and promotes and exalts them to heaven and happineſs. But ſin is a reproach to any people; where vice reigns, iniquity abounds, profaneneſs, impiety and immorality of all ſorts prevail, a people become mean and deſpicable; they fall into poverty and contempt; are neither able to defend themſelves, nor help their neighbours, and ſo are deſpiſed by them. The word rendered reproach, moſt commonly ſignifies mercy or goodneſs; and ſome render it, and the mercy of a people is a ſin-offering [p]; or as one; or it is ſo to the nations: it is as good as a ſacrifice for ſin, of which the word is ſometimes uſed, or better, more acceptable to God, who will have mercy, and not ſacrifice; even beneficence and kindneſs to the poor, the ſame with righteouſneſs as before. I think it may be as well rendered, the piety or religion of the nations is ſin [q]; it being idolatry, as Aben Ezra obſerves: ſuch is the religion of the antichriſtian nations, who worſhip idols of gold and ſilver; and though they may afflict themſelves, as Gerſom remarks of the idolatrous nations, with faſting and penance, with whippings and ſcourgings; yet it is nothing elſe but ſin, will-worſhip and ſuperſtition.

℣. 35. The king's favour is toward a wiſe ſervant, &c.] Who does his prince's buſineſs well, committed to him; manages all his affairs wiſely and prudently; is diligent and careful to do every thing for the king's honour, and the good of his ſubjects; ſuch an one has a ſhare in royal favour, a place in the affections of his maſter; and is ſure to be promoted to honour by him, and exalted to higher places of truſt and profit, as well as to be protected and defended by him: ſo Chriſt, the King of kings, ſhews favour to his wiſe and faithful ſervants, Luke xii. 42—44. But his wrath is againſt him that cauſeth ſhame; who neglects his buſineſs, or does it fooliſhly; in ſuch a manner as his prince is aſhamed of him, and which brings ſhame and diſgrace to himſelf; all which provokes the anger of his maſter, who diſcharges him from his ſervice, and this fixes a mark of infamy upon him; ſee Luke xii. 45—48.

CHAP. XV.

℣. 1. A Soft anſwer turneth away wrath, &c.] Mild words, gentle expreſſions, delivered with kindneſs and tenderneſs, humility and ſubmiſſion; theſe will work upon a man's paſſions, weaken his reſentments, and break and ſcatter the ſtorm of wrath raiſed in his breaſt, juſt breaking forth in a very boiſterous and bluſtering manner; ſo high winds are ſometimes laid by ſoft ſhowers. Thus the Ephraimites were pacified by Gideon's mild anſwer; and David by Abigail's very ſubmiſſive and reſpectful addreſs, Judg. viii. 1—3. 1 Sam. xxv. 25—32. But grievous words ſtir up anger; ſuch as are rough and menacing, ſcornful and ſneering, reproachful and reviling, proud, haughty and overbearing; like thoſe of Jephtha to the Ephraimites; and of the Ephraimites to the Gileadites; and of Nabal to David's ſervants, concerning him; and of Rehoboam, who anſwered the people roughly; in all which inſtances, anger was ſtirred up, and either were or like to have been attended with bad conſequences, Judg. xii. 1—4. 1 Sam. xxv. 10, 11, 21, 22. 1 Kings xii. 13, 14. Or a word cauſing, or rather expreſſing grief [r]; upbraiding others with being the cauſe of grief to them.

℣. 2. The tongue of the wiſe uſeth knowledge aright, &c.] As the heart of a wiſe and good man is filled with uſeful knowledge, civil, moral, ſpiritual and evangelical; ſo he takes care to communicate it, at proper times and ſeaſons, in proper places, and to proper perſons; adapting it to their caſe and circumſtances, ſo as it may be for their comfort, edification and inſtruction, and miniſter grace unto them; which is uſing knowledge well, as the word [s] ſignifies: ſuch an uſe of it recommends it, and makes it appear beautiful and lovely, decorates and adorns it. Thus every good man, out of the good treaſure of knowledge in his heart, brings forth his good things ſeaſonably, to the uſe of edifying; in like manner, miniſters of the word, ſcribes well inſtructed in the things of God, bring forth both new and old, to the profit of thoſe to whom they miniſter; ſo Chriſt, as man and Mediator, had the tongue of the learned, to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to weary ſouls. But the mouth of fools poureth out fooliſhneſs; their knowledge as they take it to be, but it is no other than folly; this they throw out in great plenty, in a hurry, without fear or wit; they bubble it out, as the word [t] ſignifies, as water out of a fountain; their hearts are full of it, and their mouths proclaim it, chap. xii. 23.

℣. 3. The eyes of the Lord are in every place, &c.] Which are expreſſive of his omniſcience, of the full, clear, diſtinct, and perfect knowledge, which he has of all creatures and things; ſo that nothing is hid from him, but all open and manifeſt to him; as they are to Chriſt, the eſſential Word, Heb. iv. 13. and alſo of the providence of God, with reſpect to all perſons in general, and to his own people in particular; and as he is infinite and immenſe, omnipreſent and in all places of the world, ſo his omniſcience and providence reach every where, to places moſt diſtant and ſecret, and to perſons in them, who cannot be concealed from him, ſince he fills heaven and earth, Jer. xxiii. 23, 24. Beholding the evil and the good; meaning not evil things and good things, though that is true; the one he beholds with diſlike, the other with pleaſure; but evil men and good men: he beholds them, as from a watch-tower, as the word [u] ſignifies, from above, from heaven, where he is; ſee Pſal. xxxiii. 13, 14. By evil men may be meant, both profane ſinners and carnal profeſſors; ſuch as are more openly wicked, and declare their ſin, as Sodom, or more ſecretly ſo; he ſees into all the wickedneſs there is in their hearts, all their ſecret devices againſt his people; the works done by them in the dark, as well as their more open ones; and his eyes are upon all of them, to bring them into judgment at the laſt day: his eyes are particularly on the proud, to abaſe them; ſuch as are under a diſguiſe of religion, and have a form of godlineſs, he has his eyes upon; he ſees through all their diſguiſes; he knows on what foot they took up their profeſſion; he diſcerns between that and true grace; he ſees how they retain their luſts with their profeſſion; obſerves the ſprings and progreſs of their apoſtaſy; and will fix his eyes on the man without a righteouſneſs, not having on the wedding-garment, and order him into outer darkneſs. He alſo beholds good men; he ſees all their bad things, their ſins, and corrects them for them; their good things, their graces, and the exerciſe of them; their good works, the fruits of his own grace; their weakneſſes, and ſupports and ſtrengthens them; their wants, and ſupplies them; their perſons, and never withdraws his eyes from them: theſe are on them continually, to protect and defend them; nor will he leave them till he has brought them ſafe to heaven; ſee 1 Chron. xvi 9.

℣. 4. A wholſome tongue is a tree of life, &c.] A tongue that delivers out ſalutary inſtructions, wholſome advice and counſel; a healing tongue [w], as it may be rendered, which pacifies contending parties, and heals the diviſions between them; to have the benefit of ſuch a man's company and converſation, is like being in paradiſe. Such is the tongue of a goſpel-miniſter, which delivers out the wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; ſound ſpeech and doctrines, which cannot be condemned; healing truths to wounded conſciences, ſuch as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and atonement by the blood of Chriſt. Theſe are the means of quickening dead ſinners, reviving and comforting diſtreſſed ones, and ſhew the way of eternal life unto them. But perverſeneſs therein is a breach in the ſpirit; impure, unchaſte, unſavoury and corrupt language, does miſchief to the ſpirits of men; evil communications corrupt the heart and manners, defile the ſoul and the converſation; falſe and unſound doctrines eat as a canker; and as they make the heart of God's people ſad, whom he would not have made ſad; ſo they bring diſtreſs and deſpair into the ſpirits of others, and make ſad wounds and breaches there, which are never healed, and that both in the ſpirits of ſpeakers and hearers; for damnable hereſies bring ſwift deſtruction on the propogaters of them, and them that receive them.

℣. 5. A fool deſpiſeth his father's inſtruction, &c.] They are fools that deſpiſe any inſtruction that is wiſe, good and profitable; and eſpecially a father's inſtruction, whoſe love, tender affection and care, will not ſuffer him, knowingly, to give any but what is good and wholſome: wherefore to deſpiſe it, is not only a contempt of his authority, but a ſlight of his love; which are both very aggravating, and ſufficiently demonſtrate his folly; and of which he may be himſelf convinced, when it is too late, and ſay, How have I hated inſtruction, and deſpiſed reproof? He is a fool that deſpiſes the inſtruction of any one ſuperior to him in years and experience; of miniſters of the word; and eſpecially of our Father which is in heaven, declared in the ſacred ſcriptures, which are written for inſtruction in righteouſneſs. But he that regardeth reproof is prudent; the reproof of a father, whoſe corrections are to be ſubmitted to, and received with reverence; and eſpecially of the Father of ſpirits, whoſe rebukes are in love, and for profit and advantage; yea, he is a wiſe man that regards the reproof of the word of God, and the miniſters of it; and indeed of any Chriſtian, whether his ſuperior, equal, or inferior, as David did, Pſal. cxli. 5.

℣. 6. In the houſe of the righteous is much treaſure, &c.] God ſometimes bleſſes the righteous with great riches, as he did Abraham; or, however, if they have but little, it is better than the riches of many wicked; becauſe they have what they have with a bleſſing, and they are content with it: and they have abundance of ſpiritual treaſure; they have God for their portion; Chriſt, and all good things along with him; the rich graces of the Spirit; a rich experience of the grace of God; and all this is but a pledge and earneſt of what they ſhall poſſeſs hereafter. But in the revenues of the wicked is trouble; they have much trouble in getting their riches, by which they pierce themſelves through with many ſorrows; they have much trouble in keeping them; cannot reſt nor ſleep becauſe of their abundance, leſt it ſhould be taken away from them; and they have much trouble in parting with them, when they are, by one providence or another, ſtripped of them; and beſides, they have them with a curſe, and are ever attended with uneaſineſs, on one account or another.

℣. 7. The lips of the wiſe diſperſe knowledge, &c.] Scatter it about for the benefit of others; they are communicative and diffuſive of it unto others, that fruit may abound to their account: ſo the firſt miniſters of the goſpel diffuſed the ſavour of the knowledge of Chriſt and his goſpel in every place; their words went into all the earth, and their ſound to the end of the world; and ſo every goſpel-miniſter will ſpeak according to the oracles of God, and according to the abilities and meaſure of the gift which he has received; and to the utmoſt of his power feed ſouls with knowledge and underſtanding. But the heart of the fooliſh doth not ſo; does not diſperſe knowledge, for he has no ſolid, ſubſtantial knowledge in him: or, the heart of the fooliſh is not right[x]; it is full of folly and wickedneſs: or, the heart of the fooliſh does not diſperſe that which is right[y]; true and right things, and the knowledge of them; but, on the contrary, as in ℣. 2. pours out fooliſhneſs.

℣. 8. The ſacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, &c.] Even thoſe ſacrifices which were of divine appointment under the former diſpenſation, when offered by wicked men, without faith in Chriſt, without any ſenſe of ſin, repentance for it, and reformation from it; when theſe were uſed as a cloke for ſin, under which they ſheltered and ſatisfied themſelves, and went on in ſin; when they brought them with a wicked mind, as in chap. xxi. 27. when either what they brought were not according to the law, the lame and the blind; or were not their own, but robbery for burnt-ſacrifice; or ſuppoſing that theſe would atone for their ſins of themſelves; when either of theſe, or all this was the caſe, it was an abomination to the Lord; ſee Iſa. i. 11—15. and lxi. 8. and lxvi. 3. Wherefore much more muſt pagan ſacrifices be an abomination to him; which were not of his appointing, and were offered to devils, and not to him; and which were many of them very inhuman and ſhocking; as giving a man's firſt-born for his tranſgreſſion, and the fruit of his body for the ſin of his ſoul: and ſo likewiſe papal ſacrifices, the ſacrifice of the maſs; the unbloody ſacrifice, the offering up again of the body and blood of Chriſt, they pretend to; which, as it is wicked and blaſphemous, is an abomination to the Lord, and perhaps is chiefly intended. Sacrifice may ſtand for every religious duty, performed by a wicked man, being hypocritically done and with no good view; and all their good works, which ſeem to be ſo; and are either not according to the word and will of God, being never commanded by him, of which ſort are many among the Papiſts; or they are not done in faith, and ſo ſin, and do not ſpring from love to God; but are done with a heart full of enmity to him, and are not directed to his glory: in ſhort, whatever is done by them, let it have ever ſuch an appearance of devotion and goodneſs; yet if it is placed in the room of Chriſt, and uſed to the ſetting aſide of his righteouſneſs, ſatisfaction and ſacrifice, it is an abomination to the Lord. But the prayer of the upright is his delight; the prayer of ſuch, whoſe hearts are right with God; who have right ſpirits renewed in them; are Iſraelites indeed; have the truth of grace, and root of the matter in them; are honeſt, ſincere, and upright in heart: the prayer of ſuch, which is an inwrought one, wrought in his heart by the Spirit of God, and ſo comes from God, and is his own breathing in him, muſt be well-pleaſing to him; that which is fervent, earneſt and importunate, which cometh not out of feigned lips, but from the heart, and is put up with a true heart, in the ſincerity of it; the prayer of faith, the cry of the humble; the prayer which is addreſſed to God as a Father, in the name of Chriſt the Mediator, which comes perfumed with the incenſe of his mediation, introduced with the celebration of the divine perfections, contains humble confeſſions of ſin and unworthineſs, aſcribes all bleſſings to the grace of God, and expreſſes thankfulneſs for favours received, is very acceptable and delightful to God; though it is the prayer of a poor, mean, deſpicable creature in his own eyes, and in the eyes of others, Pſalm cii. 17. and ix. 12. Cant. ii. 14. Luke xviii. 11—14. This ſtands oppoſed to the pompous rites and ceremonies, the gaudy worſhip and coſtly ſacrifices of wicked men; ſuch as uſed by the Papiſts.

℣. 9. The way of the wicked is an abomination unto the Lord, &c.] The way his heart deviſes, which he chooſes and delights in, in which he walks; nor will he leave it, nor can he be diverted from it, but by the powerful grace of God. This is a way not good, but evil, and ſo an abomination to the Lord; and the whole tenour and courſe of his life, which is meant by his way being evil: hence his ſacrifices, and all his external duties of religion performed by him, are abominable to the Lord; for whilſt he continues in a courſe of ſin, all his religious exerciſes will be of no avail, cannot be pleaſing and acceptable to God. But he loveth him that followeth after righteouſneſs; either after a juſtifying righteouſneſs; not the righteouſneſs of the law, which the carnal Jews followed after, but did not attain unto; nor is righteouſneſs to be had by the works of the law, nor any juſtification by it, nor can a man be acceptable to God on account of it; but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which he has wrought out, and is revealed in the goſpel: to follow after this ſuppoſes a want of one; a ſenſe of that want; a view of the glory, fulneſs, ſuitableneſs, and excellency of Chriſt's righteouſneſs; an eager deſire after it, ſometimes expreſſed by hungering and thirſting after it, as here by a purſuit of it; which means no other than an earneſt and importunate requeſt to be found in it: and ſuch, as they ſhall be ſatisfied or filled with it; ſo they are loved by the Lord, and are acceptable to him through the righteouſneſs they are ſeeking after: or elſe it may be underſtood of following after true holineſs of heart and life, without which there is no ſeeing the Lord; and though perfection in it is not attainable in this life, yet a gracious ſoul preſſes after it, which is well-pleaſing in the ſight of God.

God; the way of his commandments: the Vulgate Latin verſion is, the way of life; the ſame with the way of righteouſneſs, which apoſtates, having known and walked in, turn aſide from; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 15, 21. And ſuch deſerve ſevere correction, the chaſtiſement of a cruel one, correction in wrath and hot diſpleaſure; which when they have, is very diſagreeable to them; they behave under it like a bullock unaccuſtomed to the yoke, and yet they are but dealt righteouſly with. Or the words may be rendered, he has had bad diſcipline or inſtruction[z], that forſakes the way; due care has not been taken of him; he has not been properly inſtructed, nor ſeaſonably corrected; had he, he would not eaſily have departed from the way in which he ſhould go; ſee chap. xxii. 6. The Targum is, "the diſcipline of "an evil man cauſes his way to err;" or him to err from his way. And he that hateth reproof ſhall die; that hates the reproof of parents, maſters, and miniſters of the word; as he may be ſaid to do, that neglects and rejects it, and does not act agreeably to it: and ſuch a man, dying in impenitence and without faith in Chriſt, dies in his ſins; and ſometimes ſhamefully, or a ſhameful death, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, or an untimely one; as well as dies the ſecond death, an eternal one.

ỳ. 11. Hell and deſtruction are before the Lord, &c.] Or the grave[a], which is the pit of deſtruction; where bodies being put, putrify, and are deſtroyed by worms: this is known by the Lord, even the grave of every one from the beginning; the graves of Adam, Abel, Abraham; he knows where their duſt lies, and will raiſe it up again at the laſt day. Hades, or the inviſible ſtate of the departed, as the Septuagint has it, is manifeſt before him; he knows where departed ſpirits are; what their condition and employment be; and ſo the place and ſtate of the damned, known by the name of hell; and may be called deſtruction, where ſoul and body are deſtroyed by the Lord with an everlaſting deſtruction; and is the deſtruction which the broad way of ſin leads unto. Now though we know not where this place is, who are there, and what the torments endured in it; yet all is before the Lord, and known to him: tophet is ordained of old; everlaſting fire is prepared by the Lord for devils and wicked men; ſee Job xxvi. 6. How much more then the hearts of the children of men? which, tho' deſperately wicked, are known by him; who is the ſearcher of the hearts, and the trier of the reins of the children of men: he to whom hell is naked, and can look into that outer darkneſs, the blackneſs of darkneſs, can look into a man's heart, a ſecond hell, in which all manner of wickedneſs is, and obſerve it all; he needs no teſtimony of man; he knows what is in man, all his ſecret thoughts, wicked purpoſes, deſigns and devices; ſee Jer. xvii. 9, 10. John ii. 25. Heb. iv. 12, 13.

ỳ. 12. A ſcorner loveth not one that reproveth him, &c.] He that makes a jeſt of religion; ſcoffs at godlineſs and godly men; treats the goſpel and the miniſters of it with contempt; makes a mock at good men, and all that is good; a peſtilent fellow, as the Vulgate Latin verſion: ſuch an one not only does not love, for more is intended than is expreſſed; but hates him that reproves him, and eſpecially if publickly, Amos v. 10. he thinks ill of him; bears him a grudge, and abhors him; and ſpeaks evil of him, and reproaches him; and does all he can to the injury of his perſon and name; hence the advice of the wiſe man, chap. ix. 7, 8. Some render it, he loves not reproving himſelf, or to reprove himſelf[b]; he does not care to look into his own heart and ways, or to call himſelf to an account for what he does; nor to check himſelf in the purſuit of ſin, nor argue with and reprove himſelf for it. Neither will he go unto the wiſe; to the private houſes of wiſe and good men; nor to the houſe of wiſdom, or place of public inſtruction, where wiſe diſpenſers of the word give good advice and counſel; ſcorners do not chooſe to go to either, leſt they ſhould be reproved for their evil ways, and be adviſed to leave them; neither of which is agreeable to them; ſee John iii. 20, 21.

ỳ. 13. A merry heart maketh a chearful countenance, &c.] Or, a joyful heart[c]; that is joyful in the God of its ſalvation; that rejoices in Chriſt Jeſus; is filled with joy and peace through believing in him, in his perſon, blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice; that has a comfortable view of his juſtification by his righteouſneſs, of peace and pardon by his blood, of the atonement of his ſins by his ſacrifice; to whom he has ſaid, be of good chear, thy ſins are forgiven thee; who has peace in him, tho' tribulation in the world: as ſuch a man's heart muſt be made glad, this will make his countenance chearful, or cauſe him to lift up his head with joy; as it is in natural things, ſo it is in ſpiritual ones. But by ſorrow of the heart the ſpirit is broken; a man is dejected, his ſpirits ſink, and it is ſeen in his countenance: there is a great ſympathy between the body and mind, the one is much affected by the other; when the heart is full of ſorrow, the animal ſpirits are low, the nerves are looſened, the whole frame of nature is enfeebled, and the body emaciated; this is often the caſe through outward troubles[d]: phyſicians ſay[e], that grief weakens the ſtrength, and deſtroys the ſpirits, more than labour does. The ſorrow of the world worketh death; and ſometimes through ſpiritual troubles, a ſenſe of ſin and guilt of it, a legal ſorrow, which produces a legal contrition of ſpirit; and ſuch a wounded ſpirit, who can bear? This is the effect of a mere work of the law upon the conſcience; and ſtands oppoſed to the ſpiritual joy, and the effects of it, the goſpel brings.

ỳ. 14. The heart of him that hath underſtanding, ſeeketh knowledge, &c.] He that has in his heart an underſtanding of divine and ſpiritual things, of the goſpel and of the truths of it, will ſeek earneſtly and diligently in the uſe of proper means after more knowledge; as he will deſire to know more of Chriſt, his perſon, offices and grace; he will follow on to know him, and not be content with the preſent degree of knowledge he has attained unto; he will hear and read the word, and pray and meditate, in order to come to a more perfect knowledge of the Son of God, and of thoſe things which relate to his ſpiritual peace and eternal welfare. But the mouth of fools feedeth on fooliſhneſs; on fooliſh talking and jeſting; on fooliſh and unlearned queſtions; on fooliſh and falſe doctrines; on fooliſh and hurtful luſts; on wind and aſhes, a deceived heart having turned then aſide: they take pleaſure and ſatisfaction in thoſe things; feed their fancy with them, and feaſt upon them, which ſhews what fools they are; and ſuch all unregenerate men be.

℣. 15. All the days of the afflicted are evil, &c.] And ſome are afflicted all their days, from their youth up; ſo that not only the days of old age are evil days, in which they have no pleaſure, but even the days of their youth; all their days, as Jacob ſays, few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, Gen. xlvii 9. becauſe they had been filled up with affliction and trouble of one ſort or another. Or, all the days of the poor [f]; either in purſe, who want many of the good things of life; or in knowledge, as Gerſom and Aben Ezra obſerve. But he that is of a merry heart hath a continual feaſt; a heart that has the kingdom of God in it, which lies not in meat and drink, but in righteouſneſs, peace, and joy in the holy Ghoſt; which has the love of God ſhed abroad in it by the Spirit, where Chriſt dwells, by faith; and that lives by faith on him, and on the proviſions of his grace; all this is a conſtant, continual feaſt, to a gracious ſoul, made joyful hereby.

℣. 16. Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treaſure and trouble therewith.] Not that a little is better than much of that which is good, as the things of this world are in themſelves; poverty is not better than riches ſimply conſidered; but as theſe are attended with different circumſtances: if a man has but little of worldly ſubſtance, yet if he has the fear of God in his heart, and before his eyes; that fear which has God for its author and for its object, and which is itſelf a treaſure; and may be here put for all grace, for the riches of grace ſaints are partakers of; ſuch a man's little is better than another man's abundance without the fear of the Lord, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it: for ſuch a man, though he has but little, which is the common portion of good men, yet he does not lack; he has enough, and is content; what he has he has with a bleſſing, and he enjoys it, and God in it, and has communion with him; and has alſo other bread to eat, the world knows nothing of: and particularly having the fear of God, the eye of God is upon him with pleaſure; his heart is towards him, and ſympathiſes with him in all his troubles; his hand communicates unto him both temporal and ſpiritual meat, which is given to them that fear the Lord; his angels encamp about him, his power protects him; his ſecrets are with him, and inconceivable and inexpreſſible goodneſs is laid up for him: wherefore he is better off with his little, having the fear of God, than another with his great abundance and affluence, being deſtitute of it: and beſides, having a great deal of trouble along with his treaſure; trouble in amaſſing and getting it together; trouble in keeping it from being loſt, or taken away by thieves and robbers, for fear of which he cannot ſleep; trouble through an inſatiable deſire of having more; he has no reſt nor peace becauſe he has not ſo much as he would have, or as others have. Beſides, he has what he has with a curſe; God ſends upon him curſing, vexation and rebuke, in all he ſets his hand to, Deut. xxviii. 2. where the ſame word is uſed as here: and he has it alſo with the cry of the poor; ſo ſome render the word, a noiſe or tumult [g], and interpret it of the cries and tears of thoſe that are oppreſſed and injured; ſo Jarchi and Gerſom: or, with terror [h], as ſome render it; with the terrors of a guilty conſcience, with the fear of hell and everlaſting damnation. Better have a little with a good conſcience, than ever ſo much attended with ſuch circumſtances; it is not any man's little, but the good man's little, that is preferable to the wicked man's much; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 16.

℣. 17. Better is a dinner of herbs, where love is, &c.] What Plautus [i] calls aſperam & terreſtrem cœnam, an harſh and earthly ſupper, made of what grows out of the earth; which is got without much coſt or care, and dreſſed with little trouble; a traveller's dinner, as the word [k] ſignifies, and a poor one too to travel upon, ſuch as is eaſily obtained, and preſently cooked, and comes cheap. Now, where there are love and good nature in the hoſt that prepares this dinner; or in a family that partakes of ſuch an one, having no better; or among gueſts invited, who eat friendly together; or in the perſon that invites them, who receives them chearfully, and heartily bids them welcome: ſuch a dinner, with ſuch circumſtances, is better than a ſtalled ox, and hatred therewith; than an ox kept up in the ſtall for fattening; or than a fatted one, which with the ancients was the principal in a grand entertainment; hence the alluſion in Matt. xxii. 4. Luke xv. 23. In the times of Homer, an ox was in high eſteem at their feſtivals; at the feaſts made by his heroes, Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Ajax, an ox was a principal part of them, if not the whole; the back of a fat ox, or a ſurloin of beef, was a favourite diſh [l]. Indeed in ſome ages, both among Greeks and Romans, an ox was abſtained from, through a ſuperſtitious regard to it, becauſe ſo uſeful a creature in plowing of the land; and it was carried ſo far, as to ſuppoſe it to be as ſinful to ſlay an ox, as to kill a man [m]: and Aratus [n] repreſents it as not done, neither in the golden nor ſilver age, but that in the brazen age men firſt began to kill and eat oxen; but this is to be confuted by the laws of God, Gen. ix. 3. Deut. xiv. 4. and by the examples of Abraham and others. Now if there is hatred, either in the hoſt, or in the gueſts among themſelves, or in a family, it muſt ſtir up ſtrifes and contentions, and render all enjoyments unpleaſant and uncomfortable; ſee chap. xvii. 1. Eccl. iv. 6. but where the love of God is, which is better than life, and the richeſt enjoyments of it; which ſweetens every mercy, and cannot be purchaſed with money; and ſecures the beſt of bleſſings, the riches of grace and glory, and itſelf can never be loſt; where this is, the meaneſt diet is preferable to the richeſt and moſt coſtly banquets of wicked men; who are hated and abhorred by the Lord, for their oppreſſion and injuſtice, their luxury, or their covetouſneſs; for poor men may be loved of God, and the rich be abhorred by him, Pſal. x. 4. Luke xv. 19—23.

℣. 18. A wrathful man ſtirreth up ſtrife, &c.] A man of a wrathful diſpoſition, of a furious ſpirit, of an angry temper; that is under the power and dominion of ſuch a paſſion, and indulges it, and takes all opportunities to gratify it; he ſtirs up ſtrife and contention where there was none, or where it was laid; as a man ſtirs up coals of fire and raiſes a flame; ſee chap. xxvi. 21. He ſtirs up ſtrife in families, ſets one relation againſt another, and the houſe in an uproar; he ſtirs up contentions in neighbourhoods, and ſets one friend and neighbour againſt another, whence proceed quarrels and lawſuits; he ſtirs up ſtrife in churches, breaks brotherly love, and cauſes animoſities and diviſions; he ſtirs up ſtrife in kingdoms and ſtates, whence come wars and fightings, confuſion, and every evil work. But he that is ſlow to anger, appeaſeth ſtrife; a man of a quiet and peaceable diſpoſition, poſſeſſed of the true grace of charity; who is not eaſily provoked, long-ſuffering, bears and endures all things; he allays the heat of anger; he quenches the coals of contention; he calms the ſtorm, and makes it quiet, as the word [o] ſignifies; he "mitigates ſtrifes raiſed," as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; he compoſes differences, reconciles the parties at variance, and makes all huſh and ſtill; and ſo prevents the ill conſequences of contention and ſtrife.

℣. 19. The way of the ſlothful man is as an hedge of thorns, &c.] Or, ſtrewed with thorns, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions; the Targum is, "the ways of the ſlothful are briars and thorns." Either really being made ſo by his own conduct; who, by his ſlothfulneſs, has implicated and entangled himſelf in ſuch difficulties, that he cannot extricate himſelf; his way is not paſſable, at leaſt not very eaſily; it is as it were hedged up with thorns; ſee Hoſ. ii. 6. or in his own apprehenſions; who raiſes ſuch difficulties about doing buſineſs, which to him ſeem unſurmountable; at leaſt which diſcourage him from attempting it, it being like breaking through thorns and briars; hence he will not plow becauſe of the cold, nor go abroad becauſe there is a lion in the ſtreets, chap. xx. 4. and xxii. 13. and xxvi. 13. or the way of his duty, eſpecially of virtue and religion, is as troubleſome and diſagreeable to him, as breaking through a thorn-hedge, or treading upon briars and thorns; to attend the duties of public worſhip, prayer, and hearing the word, is very irkſome to him; to be preſent at family-worſhip, at prayer, and hearing the ſcriptures or religious diſcourſes read, is like ſitting upon thorns unto him. This, as Aben Ezra obſerves, is to be underſtood of a wicked man, as the oppoſition in the next clauſe ſhews. But the way of the righteous is made plain; it is a caſt up way, as the word [p] ſignifies; a cauſe-way, an high way, and a plain one, in which a truly righteous and good man finds no difficulty; yea, it is ſo plain, that men, though fools in other reſpects, ſhall not err therein, Iſa. xxxv. 8. nor is it grievous and troubleſome, but, on the contrary, very delightful, as the ways of Chriſt and wiſdom are; his commandments are not grievous, his yoke is eaſy, and his paths pleaſant; and the righteous man walks at liberty and with pleaſure in them; and without offence or ſtumbling, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it.

℣. 20. A wiſe ſon maketh a glad father, &c.] See the note on chap. x. 1. But a fooliſh man deſpiſeth his mother; that bore him and brought him up, and perhaps was too indulgent to him; which aggravates his ſin, and her ſorrow; ſee the note on chap. x. 1. or cauſes her to be deſpiſed by others, as Jarchi interprets it; ſuch a man's ſin, which is great folly, and ſhews him to be a fooliſh man, is highly reſented by the Lord, and will be ſeverely puniſhed; ſee chap. xxx. 17. The Targum is, "a fooliſh ſon deſpiſes his mother;" and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, which makes the antitheſis more clear; and the Hebrew text deſigns one grown up to man's eſtate.

℣. 21. Folly is joy to him that is deſtitute of wiſdom, &c.] Or that wants a heart [q], a wiſe and underſtanding one; by folly is meant ſin, for all ſin is folly; and that is very pleaſing and joyous to a wicked man, he chooſes it and delights in it; inſtead of being aſhamed of it, and ſorry for it, he glories in it, and makes his boaſt of it; and not only takes pleaſure in committing it himſelf, but alſo in thoſe that do it; ſee chap. x. 23. But a man of underſtanding walketh uprightly; he who has his underſtanding enlightned by the Spirit of God; who has an underſtanding given him by the Son of God; who has a ſpiritual and experimental underſtanding of the goſpel, and the truths of it: he walks according to the rule of the divine word; he walks as he has Chriſt for an example, and by faith on him; and after the ſpirit, and not after the fleſh: or directs himſelf in walking [r], his goings, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, according to the above rule, example, and guidance, by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit and grace of God; otherwiſe it is not in man that walketh of himſelf to direct his ſteps, Jer. x. 23.

℣. 22. Without counſel purpoſes are diſappointed, &c.] If a man determines and reſolves upon a matter, and at once haſtily and precipitately goes about it, without mature deliberation, without conſulting with himſelf, and taking the advice of others in forming a ſcheme to bring about his deſigns, it generally comes to nothing; ſee Luke xiv. 28—32. or without a ſecret [s], without keeping one; if a man divulges his intentions, it is much if they are not fruſtrated; ſo the Targum, "vain are the thoughts (or deſigns) where there is no ſecret;" if a man makes no ſecret of what he deſigns to do, he is eaſily counter-worked, and his purpoſes diſappointed. But in the multitude of counſellors they are eſtabliſhed; his purpoſes are, as in chap. xx. 18. having the advice of others, and theſe many, he is confirmed that he is right in what he has thought of and purpoſed to do; and therefore goes about it with the greater ſpirit and chearfulneſs, and is moſt likely to ſucceed, and generally does; ſee chap. xi. 14.

℣. 23. A man hath joy by the anſwer of his mouth, &c.] When his advice is aſked, and he gives good and wholeſome counſel, and that being taken ſucceeds; it is a pleaſure to a man that he is capable of aſſiſting his friend, and doing him ſervice, or a common good, whether it be in things natural, civil, or religious; when his ſpeech is with ſalt, ſeaſoned with grace, and he knows how he ought to anſwer every man; when that which is good proceeds from him, and is to the uſe of edifying, and miniſters grace to the hearers, and is acceptable to them; when with readineſs he gives an anſwer to every man that aſks him a reaſon of the hope that is in him, with meekneſs and fear, Col. iii. 6. Eph. iv. 29. 1 Pet. iii. 15. And a word ſpoken in due ſeaſon, how good is it? whether by way of advice and counſel to ſuch who ſtand in need of it, or of exhortation and inſtruction to thoſe that want it, or of comfort to thoſe that are diſtreſſed; treſſed; ſuch is a word of promiſe ſpoken and applied by the Spirit of God to the hearts of his people in a time of need; and ſuch is the goſpel of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation, as ſpoken by Chriſt and his miniſters to weary and wounded ſouls; it cannot be well and fully expreſſed how ſweet, how good, how ſuitable, as well as ſeaſonable it is; ſee chap. xxv. 11. Iſa. l. 4.

℣. 24. The way of life is above to the wiſe, &c.] Of the way of life, ſee the note on chap. x. 17. this is ſaid to be above, or it tends to what is above; it leads to heaven and happineſs above; the life itſelf it is the way of or to is above, it is hid with Chriſt in God; eternal life, glory, and happineſs is above; it is an houſe eternal in the heavens, an inheritance reſerved there, and will be there enjoyed by the ſaints: the way to it is above; Chriſt is the way, and he is in heaven, at the Father's right hand, through whom only men can come at this life; wherefore thoſe who are in the way of it have their thoughts, their hearts, their affections, and converſations above, Matt. vi. 21. Col. iii. 1, 2. Phil. iii. 20. Faith, which deals with Chriſt the way, and by which men walk in him, is ſignified by ſoaring aloft, mounting up with wings as eagles, by entering within the vail, and dwelling on high, and by looking upwards, and at things unſeen, and being the evidence of them. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, the way of life is above the learned man, or wiſe man; the man that has no other than natural learning and wiſdom, this way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt lies out of his knowledge; it is what the moſt ſagacious and penetrating man could never diſcover; it is hid from the wiſe and prudent, and revealed to babes: or this is only known to ſuch who are truly wiſe unto ſalvation; it is plain to them, and they highly eſteem it, and chooſe to walk in it; it is an aſcent to him that underſtands, as the Syriac verſion renders it; it is a going up hill, it is an aſcending upwards and heavenwards; ſuch a man is continually looking upwards unto Chriſt, the author and finiſher of his faith; preſſing towards him, the mark for the prize; keeping his eye, not on things on earth, things temporal, which are ſeen here below, but on things above, things unſeen, which are eternal in the heavens. That he may depart from hell beneath; not from the grave, as ſheol ſometimes ſignifies; for wiſe men die as well as fools, and come to the grave, which is the houſe appointed for all living; even thoſe who are in the way of life that is above, do not eſcape death and the grave: but ſuch are ſecured from everlaſting ruin and deſtruction, from being deſtroyed ſoul and body in hell; they ſteer quite a different courſe and road from that; every ſtep they take upwards carries them ſo far off from hell, which is the contrary way; the broad road of ſin is the lower way, or what leads to hell and deſtruction beneath; the narrow way of faith in Chriſt is the upper way, and that leads to eternal life above.

℣. 25. The Lord will deſtroy the houſe of the proud, &c.] To whom he has the utmoſt averſion; he ſets himſelf againſt them and reſiſts them, and will not only deſtroy them but their ſtately houſes too, which they have fancied ſhall continue for ever; and alſo their families, their children and poſterity; theſe ſhall be as ſtubble, and ſhall be burnt up in his wrath, and neither root nor branch left. Moreover the man of ſin, the ſon of perdition, may be more eſpecially intended, that exalts himſelf above all that is called God, with all the ſons of pride ſupported by him; his houſe, which is the houſe of the fooliſh and adulterous woman, the idolatrous church of Rome, ſhall be rooted up; the city of Rome, the ſeat of the beaſt itſelf, where his houſe or palace is, ſhall be deſtroyed, and all that belong unto him, even all they that have deſtroyed the earth, Rev. xi. 18. But he will eſtabliſh the border of the widow; whoſe advocate, judge, and defender he is; when men, rich, proud, and oppreſſive, attempt to remove the land-mark of the widow's border, and ſo leſſen her land and enlarge their own, God will not ſuffer it to be done, but will eſtabliſh it in its place; that is, ſuch who are weak and helpleſs, as widows are, and cannot defend themſelves and their property, he will protect them and ſecure it for them. So the church of Chriſt, during the reign of Antichriſt, being obliged to flee into the wilderneſs, looks like a widow deprived of her huſband, and has but little ſtrength to ſupport and defend herſelf, as is ſaid of the church of Philadelphia, Rev. iii. 8. yet the Lord will ſecure and preſerve her, and firmly ſettle and eſtabliſh her, yea enlarge her borders and make them of pleaſant ſtones; ſpread the kingdom of Chriſt from ſea to ſea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. Frequent mention is made of the eſtabliſhing of the church in the latter day, Pſal. xlviii. 8. and lxxxvii. 5. Iſa. ii. 2.

℣. 26. The thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord, &c.] They are known unto the Lord, who is the ſearcher of the heart, and a diſcerner of the thoughts and intents of it; he knows they are vain and ſinful, yea that they are only evil and that continually, and therefore are hateful and abominable to him; it may be rendered the thoughts of evil, as by the Targum; or evil thoughts, as the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and the Oriental verſions; but Aben Ezra interprets as we, the thoughts of a wicked man which are never otherwiſe but evil; whereas in a good man, though there are many evil thoughts which are abominable to himſelf, yet there are ſome good thoughts, and which are pleaſing to the Lord, as follows. But the words of the pure are pleaſant words; that is, unto the Lord; which are the ſame with their thoughts, and are the effect of them, and ſo ſtand oppoſed to the thoughts of the wicked; theſe expreſſed either in a way of prayer or of praiſe, are ſweet and pleaſant, and acceptable unto God through Chriſt; as likewiſe their words and diſcourſe in religious converſation, which alſo miniſter grace unto the hearer, and are very delightful and pleaſing to ſaints: the words may be ſupplied thus, but the thoughts of the pure, of ſuch who are pure in heart, whoſe hearts are purified by faith in the blood of Chriſt, are words of pleaſantneſs, ſo Gerſom; there is a language in thought which is known to a man's ſelf, and by the Lord; there is the meditation or diſcourſe of the heart, and this being about divine and ſpiritual things is pleaſing to God; he hearkens to it, and writes a book of remembrance for them that fear him, and have thought on his name; ſee Pſal. xix. 14. Mal. iii. 16.

℣. 27. He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own houſe, &c.] Or that covets a covetouſneſs[t], an evil one, as in Hab. ii. 9. that ſeeks riches by unlawful means, that gathers the mammon of falſhood, or unrighteouſneſs, as the Targum; he entails a curſe and brings ruin and deſtruction upon his family; the Septuagint and Arabic verſions are, he deſtroys himſelf; himſelf; or his own ſoul, as the Syriac verſion; it may be underſtood of a man that is over anxious and eager to be rich, and hurries on buſineſs, and gives his ſervants no proper time for food and reſt; ſee the note on chap. xi. 29. But he that hateth gifts ſhall live; that rejects them with abhorrence, when offered to bribe him to pervert judgment, or do an unjuſt thing; otherwiſe gifts may be lawfully received from one friend by another; the ſin is when they are given and taken for the ſake of doing what is baſe and ſinful; and a man that ſhakes his hand from receiving gifts on ſuch a foot, he and his family ſhall proſper and increaſe in worldly things; and doing this from a right principle of grace ſhall live comfortably in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and thrive and flouriſh in his ſoul, and live an eternal life hereafter; ſee Pſal. xv. 1, 5, 6.

℣. 28. The heart of the righteous ſtudieth to anſwer, &c.] He thinks before he ſpeaks, meditates what he ſhall ſay, what anſwer to give to men; whether in things civil, natural, or religious; and what to return to the Lord when he is reproved by him; or what to ſay in prayer to him, or by way of thankfulneſs for mercies received from him; ſee chap. iii. 6. Hab. ii. 1. though our Lord adviſes his diſciples, when ſummoned before their perſecutors, not to meditate beforehand what they ſhould anſwer, ſince they ſhould have immediate aſſiſtance, Luke xxi. 14. but this was in extraordinary caſes; in common ones the obſervation of the wiſe man ſhould be attended to. A Jewiſh[u] writer renders the words, the heart of the righteous meditates wormwood, or bitter things; ſee chap. v. 4. as the judgment of God, death, and hell; this ſenſe is mentioned by Aben Ezra, but rejected. But the mouth of the wicked poureth out evil things; without any previous thought and conſideration, without fear or wit; in great abundance, as water out of a fountain; thus an evil man out of the evil treaſure of his heart brings forth evil things readily and at once, having no concern about the conſequences of things, Matt. xii. 25. ſee the note on ℣. 2.

℣. 29. The Lord is far from the wicked, &c.] Not as to his eſſence or powerful preſence, which is every where, for he is God omnipreſent; but with reſpect to his favour and good-will, he is far from helping in diſtreſs, and from hearing their cries when they apply unto him in deſperate circumſtances; nor does he admit them to nearneſs and communion with him now, as he does the righteous; nor will he receive them to himſelf at the laſt day, but bid them depart from him; they are far from him and from his law, and from all righteouſneſs; and he is far from them, and keeps them at a diſtance from him. But he heareth the prayer of the righteous; they draw nigh to him and he draws nigh to them; he is nigh to all that call upon him in truth; and there is none like them that has God ſo nigh them as they have; his eyes are upon them, and his ears are open to their cries; he is a God hearing and anſwering their prayers, and beſtows upon them the favours they aſk for, and ſtand in need of.

℣. 30. The light of the eyes rejoiceth the heart, &c.] Not ſo much the viſive power, the faculty of ſeeing, a ſtrong and clear eye-ſight; though this is a great mercy, and from the Lord, and to be prized, and does give joy of heart; but rather the objects ſeen by the light of the eyes, as Jarchi; as green gardens, flowing rivers, pleaſant meadows, riſing hills, lowly vales, herbs, plants, trees, birds, beaſts, and creatures of every kind; nor is the eye ever ſatisfied with ſeeing; eſpecially light itſelf beheld rejoiceth the heart, and particularly that grand luminary and fountain of light, the ſun. Light is ſweet, ſays the wiſe man, Eccl. xi. 7. and a pleaſant thing it is for the eyes to behold the ſun, which is a proper comment on this text: and much more pleaſant and delightful, cheering and rejoicing, muſt be the ſpiritual light of the eyes of the underſtanding, when opened by the Spirit of God at converſion; it is marvellous light ſouls are then called into, and wonderful things do they then behold, which rejoice their hearts; as Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs himſelf, the light of the world, the glories of his perſon and office, the fulneſs of grace that is in him, pardon of ſin by his blood, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, and free and full ſalvation through him for the worſt and chief of ſinners: in the light which is thrown into them they ſee light; the light of God's countenance, his face and favour, which put gladneſs into them; the light of the divine word and the precious truths of it; yea the light, joy, and happineſs of the world to come, in the hope of which their hearts rejoice. Jarchi myſtically interprets this of the light of the eyes in the law; but it is much better to underſtand it of the light of the eyes in the goſpel, and the myſteries of it. And a good report maketh the bones fat; or a good hearing[w]; not the ſenſe of hearing, or a quick exerciſe of that, though a very great bleſſing; but good things heard. Some underſtand this of a good name, or fame[x], which is ſometimes the ſenſe of the phraſe; either a good report which a man hears of himſelf, which makes his ſpirit chearful; and this affects his body and the juices of it, which fill his bones with marrow and cover them with fatneſs; or which he hears of his friends, and is pleaſing to him, as it was to the apoſtle John that Demetrius had a good report of all men, 3 John 12. But rather this is to be underſtood of the good news, or good hearing, from a far country, as the ſame phraſe is rendered in chap. xxv. 25. and here in the Arabic verſion is ſo tranſlated, even the goſpel which is a report; ſee Iſa. liii. 1. Rom. x. 16. a report concerning God, the perfections of his nature, the purpoſes of his heart, the covenant of his grace, his love, grace, and mercy towards men in Chriſt Jeſus; a report concerning Chriſt, concerning his perſon and offices, concerning his incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, and death; concerning his reſurrection, aſcenſion, ſitting at the right hand of God, interceſſion for his people, and ſecond coming to judgment; and concerning ſalvation, peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life by him; a report concerning the good land, the heavenly Canaan, and the glories of it, the way unto it, and the perſons that ſhall poſſeſs it: and this is a good report; it is good tidings of good things, a report of good things laid up in covenant, which are come by Chriſt the great high-prieſt, which ſaints are intereſted in, and ſhall partake of here and hereafter; it is a true report, and to be believed, ſince it is made by God himſelf, by Jeſus Chriſt the faithful witneſs, and by the apoſtles of Chriſt, who were eye and ear-witneſſes of the things they reported; and ſuch a report being heard, received, and embraced, greatly contributes to the ſpiritual health and proſperity of the children of God, it makes them fat and flouriſhing; ſuch pleaſant words are as the honey-comb, ſweet to the ſoul, make glad the heart, and are marrow and health to the bones; ſee chap. iii. 8. and xii. 25. and xvi. 24.

℣. 31. The ear that heareth the reproof of life, &c.] That is given according to the word of life, in a warm, fervent, and lively manner, with zeal, and in good earneſt; which reproves the life of another by his own, as well as by words; and which tends to the ſpiritual and eternal life of the perſon reproved; being taken, a man that diligently hearkens to, kindly and cordially receives, and chearfully obeys ſuch reproof given him, Abideth among the wiſe; he not only chooſeth to be among them, that he may have the advantage of their wiſe counſels and reproofs, but he becomes wiſe himſelf thereby, and attains to the character of a wiſe man, and is numbered among them; ſuch a man abides in the houſe of wiſdom, the church of God, and attends upon and has converſation with the wiſe diſpenſers of the word, and ſhall have a part with them in the church above, in the kingdom of heaven, where the wiſe will ſhine as the firmament; the word here uſed does not denote a lodging for a night, as it ſometimes ſignifies, but a perpetual abiding.

℣. 32. He that refuſeth inſtruction, &c.] The inſtruction of parents, maſters, miniſters, and of God himſelf; or correction[y], inſtruction either by the word or by the rod; he that withdraws himſelf from it, will not be in the way of it, that ſhuns, neglects, and deſpiſes it, or careleſsly and contemptuouſly attends it: Deſpiſeth his own ſoul; ſhews that he makes no account of it, has no regard for it or care about it, when it is ſo precious a jewel, and the loſs of it irreparable; not that a man can ſtrictly and properly deſpiſe his ſoul, but comparatively, having a greater regard for his body, and eſpecially for his carnal luſts and pleaſures, than for that; or as a man diſeaſed and refuſes proper medicines may be ſaid to deſpiſe his health. But he that heareth reproof getteth underſtanding; or a heart[z]; he gets underſtanding by liſtening to reproof, and behaving according to it; he better underſtands himſelf and his caſe, what he ſhould ſhun and avoid, what he ſhould receive, embrace, and do; inſtead of loſing his ſoul, as the man that refuſes correction does, he finds the life of it, and poſſeſſes it, and with it a large ſhare of experience and ſpiritual wiſdom.

℣. 33. The fear of the Lord is the inſtruction of wiſdom, &c.] It is the beginning of wiſdom, chap. ix. 10. it leads unto it, inſtructs a man in it; by means of it he attains to true ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom; it teaches him to abſtain from ſin, and to ſerve the Lord; and to ſeek the ſalvation of his ſoul in the way God has appointed, which is by his Son Jeſus Chriſt, which to do is the higheſt wiſdom. And before honour is humility; the fear of God and humility go together, where the one is the other is; and as the one is the way to wiſdom, the other is the way to glory; Chriſt's humiliation was before his exaltation; men are firſt humbled and laid low in their own eyes, and then they are raiſed out of their low eſtate and are ſet among princes; and ſhall inherit the throne of glory, being made kings and prieſts unto God; it is a frequent ſaying of Chriſt's, he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted, Luke xiv. 11. ſuch an one is raiſed to an high eſtate of grace, and at laſt to eternal glory.

CHAP. XVI.

℣. 1. THE preparations of the heart in man, &c.] The ſenſe of theſe words, according to our verſion, depends upon the next clauſe, and the meaning of the whole is, that a man can neither think nor ſpeak without God: the orderings or marſhallings of the heart[a], as it may be rendered; that is, of the thoughts of the heart, which are generally irregular and confuſed; the ranging them in order as an army in battle array, or as things regularly placed on a well-furniſhed table; the fixing them on any particular ſubject, though about things civil and natural, ſo as cloſely to attend to them, and proceed in a regular manner in the conſideration of them, are not without the concurrence of divine providence: and whereas the thoughts of mens hearts are evil, and that continually, and nothing but evil thoughts naturally proceed from thence; the ordering and marſhalling of them, and fixing them to the attention and conſideration of divine and ſpiritual things, are not without the ſupernatural grace of God; for we cannot think a good thought of ourſelves, nor indeed any thing of ourſelves in a ſpiritual manner, 2 Cor. iii. 5. all preparations for religious ſervice and duty, whether it be to pray unto God, or to preach in his name, are from the Lord; it is he that works in men both to will and to do, that gives them the willing mind, or a ſuitable frame for ſervice, as well as ability to perform it; that pours out the ſpirit of grace and ſupplication on them, and diſpoſes and directs their minds to proper petitions, and furniſhes his miniſtring ſervants in their ſtudies with agreeable matter for their miniſtrations, Pſal. x. 17. 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6. And the anſwer of the tongue is from the Lord; who made man's mouth, and teaches him what to ſay, both before God and man; what he ſhall ſay in prayer to him, or in preaching to others; for the door of utterance in either ſervice is from him, as well as the preparation for it: moſt verſions and interpreters make theſe clauſes diſtinct, the one as belonging to men, the other to God; thus, to men belong the preparations of the heart, but from the Lord is the anſwer or ſpeech of the tongue; the former is ſaid by way of conceſſion, and according to the opinion of men; and the ſenſe may be, be it ſo, that man has the marſhalling and ordering of his own thoughts, and that he can lay things together in his mind, and think pertinently and properly on a ſubject, and is capable of preparing matter for a diſcourſe; yet it is as eaſy to obſerve, that men can better form ideas of things in their minds, than they can expreſs their ſenſe and meaning; and though they may be ever ſo well prepared to ſpeak, yet they are not able to do it, unleſs the Lord gives them utterance, and aſſiſts their memories; they loſe what they had prepared, or deliver it in a diſorderly and confuſed manner, and ſometimes think to ſay one thing and ſay another;

their tongues are overruled by the Lord to ſay what they never intended, as in the caſes of Balaam and Caiaphas. The Targum is, "from man is the counſel of the heart, and from the Lord is the ſpeech of the tongue."

℣. 2. All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes, &c.] All right and well, not only ſome but all, having an high opinion of himſelf; for this is to be underſtood of a ſelf-righteous man, who is pure in his own eyes, though not cleanſed from his filthineſs, and ſo fancies every way he walks in, and every thing he does is pure; this is owing to want of knowledge of the impurity of his nature; was he ſenſible of this he would ſee that his beſt righteouſneſs is as filthy rags; and to his ignorance of the ſpirituality of the law, which was he acquainted with, he would find on comparing himſelf with it, that he and all he did was polluted and unclean: ſome read the words, all the ways of a pure man are before his eyes; the eyes of the Lord, he ſees them and approves of them; ſo Aben Ezra; and to this agrees the Septuagint verſion, all the works of a humble man are manifeſt with God; and the Arabic verſion, all the works of a humble man are clean before God; but the former reading and ſenſe ſeem beſt. But the Lord weigheth the ſpirits; he ſearches and tries the hearts; he ſees, knows, and obſerves the principles of all actions, and can as exactly adjuſt the nature and quality of them as a man with a pair of ſcales in his hands can tell preciſely the weight of any thing put into them; the Lord weighs the ſpirits, or hearts, from whence all actions flow, by his omniſcience, and accordingly judges of them by them, and not by the outward appearance; and he weighs all actions by his law, in the balance of the ſanctuary, where they are found wanting, and come greatly ſhort of that purity and perfection, phariſaical perſons imagine there is in them.

℣. 3. Commit thy works unto the Lord, &c.] Natural, civil, or religious; ſeek to him for ſtrength and aſſiſtance in all, and leave the ſucceſs of all with him: or roll thy works on or unto the Lord[b]; devolve all upon him, caſt all care upon him and his providence for ſupply, ſupport, and ſuſtenance in life; and commit the buſineſs of the ſalvation of thy ſoul and the important affairs of it wholly to him, who is able, willing, and faithful to keep what is committed to him; and having ſo done may ſit down eaſy and ſatisfied, as one that is rid of a burden by caſting it on another better able to bear it, or more equal to the work committed to him: the Targum is, reveal thy works to God; and ſo the Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions, reveal thy works to the Lord; thy caſe, condition, and circumſtances; thy wants and neceſſities; ſeek and aſk for a ſupply of him, make known thy requeſts to him; for though he is not ignorant of the affairs of his people, yet he will be ſought unto to do the things for them he intends to do, and they ſtand in need of. And thy thoughts ſhall be eſtabliſhed; when a man has, by faith and in prayer, committed himſelf, his caſe, his ways and works, to the Lord; his mind is made eaſy, his thoughts are compoſed and ſettled, and he quietly waits the iſſues of things; he ſays, the will of the Lord be done; he knows that he cauſes all things to work together for good; and whatever is for his good and God's glory ſhall be brought to paſs; and this makes him calm, ſedate and eaſy; and he is in a fair way of having his deſigns, deſires, and endeavours accompliſhed! ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 5.

℣. 4. The Lord hath made all things for himſelf, &c.] This is true of the Lord with reſpect to the creation of all things by him. All things are made by him, the heaven, earth and ſea; and all that are in them, angels, men, beaſts, birds, fiſhes, and all creatures: and theſe are made for himſelf, and not another; not for the pure or good men, as Aben Ezra, though all things are for the elect's ſake; but for God himſelf, beſides whom there was no other before the creation, nor is there any other God but him, who is the firſt cauſe and laſt end of all things: nor were thoſe all things made for him, through any want he had of them, being God all-ſufficient and bleſſed for evermore, but to ſhew his greatneſs, and communicate his goodneſs; they are made for his ſervice, which all creatures are obliged unto, and whom all in their way obey, and for his honour and glory. It is alſo true of his works of providence, and of his ordering and diſpoſing of all things in the courſe of that, to anſwer ends of his own glory; his kingdom of providence rules over all; there is a general providence, which reſpects all creatures and things; and there is a particular providence attending the Lord's own people; and in all, the glory of his wiſdom, juſtice, truth and goodneſs, is conſpicuous: but this is chiefly, if not ſolely, to be underſtood of God's decrees and purpoſes; and of his ordering and appointing all things, to bring about his own glory. Every thing is appointed of God; he has foreordained whatever comes to paſs; there is a purpoſe for every thing under the heavens, and a time fixed for the execution of it. Junius reſtrains it to all men; but it is true of all creatures and things, though eſpecially men: all things are appointed by the Lord, reſpecting the temporal eſtate of men; their birth and the time of it, with all the circumſtances attending it; the place of their abode, their calling, ſtation of life, and uſefulneſs; all adverſe and proſperous diſpenſations; their death, with all the events leading to it: and ſo likewiſe all things reſpecting their ſpiritual and eternal eſtate; the choice of them to ſalvation; their redemption by Chriſt; the time of his coming, ſufferings and death, and the circumſtances thereof; the converſion of God's elect, the time, place and means; theſe are all according to the purpoſe of God; as are alſo all their times of affliction, temptation, deſertion, and of joy and comfort. In a word, the final ſtate of all men, good and bad, is fixed by the Lord; and all this is for himſelf, which ſome render, to anſwer to himſelf[c]; all creatures are made to anſwer to his original deſign in making them, to the laws of their creation, and to anſwer his ends and purpoſes; and which is ultimately his own glory: or for his praiſe, as Jarchi; for his will and pleaſure, as R. Iſaac; for the thing in which he is well pleaſed, as R. Jonah; or for his own ſake, as Kimchi; and all which agree, as with the ſenſe of the words, ſo with Rev. iv. 11. The Targum and Syriac verſion very wrongly render them, "all the works of God, or the Lord, are for them that obey him." Yea, even the wicked for the day of evil; this is added to illuſtrate the general propoſition in the preceding clauſe, and to obviate an objection that might be taken from the deſtruction of the wicked, againſt all things being for the glory of God; for even the deſtruction of the wicked, which is under a divine appointment, is for his glory. It is not the ſenſe of this text, nor of any other paſſage of ſcripture, that God made man to damn him; nor is this to be inferred from the doctrine of predeſtination: God made man, neither to damn him, nor to ſave him, but for his own glory; and that is ſecured, whether in his ſalvation or damnation: nor did or does God make men wicked; he made man upright, and he has made himſelf wicked; and being ſo, God may juſtly appoint him to damnation for his wickedneſs, in doing which he glorifies his juſtice. The day of evil, or evil day, is the day of wrath and ruin, unto which wicked men are reſerved by the appointment of God, agreeable to the Targum, Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions. This is true of wicked angels, wicked men, and particularly of that wicked one, the man of ſin and ſon of perdition, Antichriſt; the word here uſed is in the ſingular number.

℣. 5. Every one that is proud in heart, is an abomination to the Lord, &c.] Though he may diſſemble his pride, and not diſcover it in his looks, by his words and geſtures; yet the Lord ſees and knows the heart, the naughtineſs of it, and the pride that is in it: and not only a proud look, but a proud heart is abominable to him; every one that is ſo arrogant, as to arraign the decrees of God, and quarrel with him about them, to whom the apoſtle ſays, Nay but, O man, O proud, vain man, who art thou, that replieſt againſt God? Rom. ix. 19—21. every proud phariſee, that truſts in himſelf that he is righteous, and deſpiſes others, that juſtifies himſelf before men, is an abomination in the ſight of God, Luke xviii. 9. and xvi. 15. particularly Antichriſt, who has not only a proud look, a look more ſtout than his fellows, but a proud heart; exalts himſelf above all that is called God; and not only ſpeaks big words againſt the moſt High, but has it in his heart to change times and laws; and proudly imagines he ſhall always continue in his grandeur and proſperity, Dan. vii. 20, 25. 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. Rev. xviii. 7. Though hand join in hand, he ſhall not be unpuniſhed; though he endeavours with both hands, with all his might and main, to ſecure himſelf and prevent his ruin, he ſhall not be able to do it; though he enters into confederacy with, and calls in the kings of the earth to his aſſiſtance, it will be of no avail, both he and they ſhall be deſtroyed; or out of hand, immediately, his deſtruction will come upon him, Rev. xvi. 14, 16. and xviii. 8. and xix. 19—21. ſee the note on chap. xi. 21. The Targum is, "from evil he ſhall not be cleared;" and the Syriac verſion, "he that ſtretcheth out his hand "againſt his neighbour, ſhall not be cleared from "evil."

℣. 6. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged, &c.] Or expiated[d], and atoned for: not by the mercy and truth of men; not by alms-deeds or ſhewing mercy to the poor; nor by ſpeaking truth and keeping promiſes, and doing juſtice between man and man; for though theſe are duties to be performed, they will not atone for ſin; and may be done by perſons deſtitute of the grace of God, and whoſe iniquities are not purged or pardoned: but by the mercy and truth of God; through his mercy, in ſending Chriſt to be the propitiation for ſin; and through his truth, in fulfilling his promiſes concerning Chriſt; and particularly concerning pardon on the foot of his ſacrifice and ſatisfaction, where mercy and truth have met together: or through the grace and truth come by Jeſus Chriſt; or thro' his atoning ſacrifice, by which he has finiſhed tranſgreſſion, made an end of ſin, and made reconciliation for iniquity; in which there is a rich diſplay of his own and of his Father's grace and mercy, truth and faithfulneſs. And by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil; having that put into their hearts, and excited and influenced by the grace and goodneſs of God, men are engaged to abſtain from evil, and the appearance of it; it teaches them to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, and to live ſoberly and godly in this world.

℣. 7. When a man's ways pleaſe the Lord, &c.] As they do, when a man walks according to the rule of his word; when he walks, as he has Chriſt for an example; when he walks after the Spirit, and not after the fleſh; when he walks by faith, and does all he does in faith; without which it is impoſſible to pleaſe God, Heb. xi. 6. and when all his ways and actions are directed to the glory of God. He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him; as Abimelech with Iſaac, Eſau with Jacob; and the enemies of the church and people of God with them in the latter day, Rev. iii. 9.

℣. 8. Better is a little with righteouſneſs, &c.] Gotten in a righteous way, held by a righteous claim, uſed in a righteous manner, attended with a life of righteouſneſs and holineſs; and alſo along with an intereſt in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which renders acceptable unto God, yields peace and comfort, and intitles to eternal glory and happineſs. A truly righteous man may have but little of this world's goods; but his ſmall pittance is better than great revenues without right; obtained in an unjuſt way; detained from the right owner of them, and uſed in an unrighteous manner, in a courſe of ſin and wickedneſs: or, without judgment[e]; how to make uſe of them aright, and without a righteouſneſs that will juſtify them at the day of judgment; ſee the note on chap. xv. 16. A little the true church of Chriſt enjoys in the wilderneſs; having Chriſt and his grace, Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, is better than all the revenues of the church of Rome, gotten by the unlawful methods they are; and which in one hour will come to nought, Rev. xviii. 17.

℣. 9. A man's heart deviſeth his way, &c.] This is to be underſtood, not of a wicked man, in whoſe heart is frowardneſs, and who deviſes miſchief and evil imaginations continually, chap. vi. 14, 18. for ſuch are an abomination to the Lord; nor will he direct their goings, or proſper and ſucceed them in their ways: but of a good man, or righteous man, as Aben Ezra; who thinks of the way in which he ſhould go, and deſires to walk in a right way, as Jarchi; and who is influenced by the Spirit and grace of God, to think and act in this manner; for otherwiſe the way of man is not in himſelf; it is not of his own deviſing and finding out; nor is his diſpoſition to walk in it of himſelf; and it is only ſuch a man, a good man, whoſe ſteps are ordered by the Lord, as follows; ſee Jer. x. 23. Pſal. xxxvii. 23. But the Lord directeth his ſteps; to go right on, and not turn to the right hand or the left; and to walk ſafely and ſurely, through a variety of troubles and difficulties, to his kingdom and glory.

℣. 10. A divine ſentence is in the lips of the king, &c.] Or divination[f], as the word ſignifies; or what is like to divination, as Aben Ezra and Gerſom interpret it[g]. What he ſays is as an oracle, and ſhould be ſtrictly true. Some underſtand it of the ſagacity and penetration of kings, as was in Solomon, and appeared in his judging the two harlots; but ſuch is not to be found in kings in common: rather therefore this expreſſes and deſigns what ſhould be, and not what is in kings. Theſe, as the kings of Iſrael, ought to have the book of God before them, and read in it, and judge and pronounce ſentence in every caſe according to it: they ſhould ſpeak as the oracles of God; and when they do, a divine ſentence may be ſaid to be in their lips. But it is beſt to underſtand this of the King of kings, of the King Meſſiah; into whoſe lips grace is poured, and from whence none but words of wiſdom, grace, and truth flow; who taught the way of God in truth; who had the word of God in his heart and in his mouth continually; and on whom the Spirit of wiſdom without meaſure dwelt; and is the wiſdom and word of God, as well as the power of God. His mouth tranſgreſſeth not in judgment; this cannot be ſaid of any earthly king; they ought not indeed to tranſgreſs in judgment with their mouths, but it is notorious that they too often do: could this be applied to kings in common, they would have a better claim to infallibility than the pope of Rome has. But this is true of Chriſt, the King of ſaints; who is a King that reigns in righteouſneſs, and decrees judgment; ſits upon his throne, to order and eſtabliſh it with judgment: nor does his mouth ever tranſgreſs in judgment, or ever ſay, or he do a wrong thing; his ſceptre is a ſceptre of righteouſneſs.

℣. 11. A juſt weight and balance are the Lord's, &c.] Theſe are of his deviſing; what he has put into the hearts of men to contrive and make uſe of, for the benefit of mankind, for the keeping and maintaining truth and juſtice in commercial affairs; theſe are of his appointing, commanding and approving, Lev. xix. 35, 36. All the weights of the bag are his work; or, all the ſtones[h]; greater or ſmaller, which were formerly uſed in weighing, and were kept in a bag for that purpoſe; theſe are by the Lord's appointment and order. This may be applied to the ſcriptures of truth, which are of God; are the balance of the ſanctuary, in which every doctrine is to be weighed and tried; what agrees with them is to be received, and what is found wanting is to be rejected. The Targum is, "his works, "all of them, are weights of truth."

℣. 12. It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedneſs, &c.] The Targum is, "the abomina-"tion of kings are they that work wickedneſs." It ſhould be an abomination to kings to commit wickedneſs themſelves, and thoſe that do it ſhould be abhorred by them; or they ſhould ſhew their reſentment at it, by removing them from their preſence, or by puniſhing them: and though there have been ſuch kings as David, Pſal. ci. 4, 7. yet there are but few ſuch; this is not true of kings in common; and therefore rather expreſſes what they ſhould be, than what they are; but is perfectly applicable to Chriſt, who loves righteouſneſs and hates iniquity, Pſal. xlv. 7. For the throne is eſtabliſhed by righteouſneſs; this is the ſupport, ſtrength and ſecurity of every kingdom, and of the thrones of kings; and it is with judgment and righteouſneſs that the throne of Chriſt is eſtabliſhed; yea, juſtice and judgment are the habitation of his throne, Iſa. ix. 7. Pſal. lxxxix. 14.

℣. 13. Righteous lips are the delight of kings, &c.] Such that ſpeak truth and righteouſneſs, and adviſe to the adminiſtration of juſtice and judgment, and to do that which is moſt for their own true honour and the peoples good, are, or ought to be highly valued and eſteemed by kings; but the contrary is too often the caſe; kings hearken to thoſe that ſpeak lies, that flatter them, and gratify their pride, ambition, and love of power, to the hurt of their ſubjects. And they love him that ſpeaketh right; agreeable to right reaſon; which makes for the honour of kings, and the good of thoſe over whom they rule. Chriſt loves and delights in thoſe that deliver out his doctrines in the taught words of the holy Ghoſt, without any mixture or corruption; that explain, inculcate and enforce his laws and commands; and faithfully declare the whole counſel of God, both with reſpect to faith and practice; all which is for his glory, as King of ſaints, and to the profit and advantage of thoſe who ſubmit to the ſceptre of his kingdom.

℣. 14. The wrath of a king is as meſſengers of death, &c.] Or, angels of death, as the Targum. As the wrath of Ahaſuerus was to Haman; when it is either diſcovered in the countenance of a king, or expreſſed by his words, or ſignified by a meſſenger; it ſometimes has been immediate death to a perſon, and often as terrible as if a meſſenger brought the ſentence of death; yea, it is as if one meſſenger after another was ſent on ſuch an errand, and therefore the word is in the plural number. How terrible is the wrath of the King of kings; and even to kings themſelves, who are repreſented as flying to rocks and mountains to hide them from it! Rev. vi. 15—17. But a wiſe man will pacify it; by a proper acknowledgment of the offence committed; or by a prudent repreſentation of his caſe, or the caſe of his friends; by ſoft anſwers and ſtrong arguments, as Jonathan pacified the wrath of king Saul his father againſt David. He is a wiſe man that believes in Chriſt, and pleads his propitiatory ſacrifice for the expiation of his ſin, at the ſame time frankly acknowledging it.

℣. 15. In the light of the king's countenance is life, &c.] When he looks with a pleaſant, ſmiling countenance, on a perſon that has been under his diſpleaſure, and eſpecially if under a ſentence of death, it is as life from the dead: ſo the light of the countenance of God, the King of kings; the diſcoveries of his love, the manifeſtations of himſelf, his gracious preſence, communion with him, the comforts of his Spirit, the joys of his ſalvation, are life unto his people, invigorate their graces, quicken their ſouls, and make them chearful; ſee Pſal. xxx. 5. and iv. 6, 7. And how delightful and pleaſant is the countenance of Chriſt; which is like Lebanon, excellent as the cedars; and is as the ſun when it ſhineth in its ſtrength; and who himſelf is the ſun of righteouſneſs, that ariſes on his people with healing in his wings! How reviving his love! how comfortable fellowſhip with him! his abſence is as death, his preſence gives life. And his favour is as a cloud of the latter rain; which falling a little before harveſt, as was uſual in Judea, revived the corn and filled it: and ſuch is the favour of God in Chriſt, which is free, diſtinguiſhing and undeſerved, as rain is; the objects of it are very unworthy; worthy; and it is given often unaſked for, as well as undeſerved, and in great abundance, and cauſes great chearfulneſs and fruitfulneſs: and ſuch is the favour of Chriſt, in coming into the world in the laſt days to ſave ſinners; his coming is ſaid to be as the former and the latter rain, Hoſ. vi. 3. He came from heaven, as that does; is the free gift of God, as that is; is in conſequence of a decree as that; and came ſuddenly, and with great acceptance to thoſe, who knew him and waited for him; and his ſpiritual coming unto his people, and the diſcoveries of his love and free favour to them, are very reviving, chearing and refreſhing; ſee Pſal. lxxii. 6.

℣. 16. How much better is it to get wiſdom than gold? &c.] To obtain and poſſeſs Chriſt, the fountain of wiſdom, in whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, which treaſures are infinitely preferable to thouſands of gold and ſilver; to gain the knowledge of him, and of God in him, with which eternal life is connected, and in compariſon of which all things are loſs and dung; to have wiſdom in the hidden part, or grace in the heart, which is much more precious than gold that periſheth; to have a ſpiritual, experimental knowledge of the goſpel, and the truths of it, which are more to be deſired than gold, yea, than fine gold; all which are to be got by diligent ſearch and inquiry, by prayer and aſking for, and to be had or bought without money and without price: and the getting of them is above all other gettings; ſuch wiſdom is more valuable in itſelf, has a greater intrinſic worth in it than gold; it is more profitable and uſeful, more ſolid and ſatisfying; it is not only better, but it is abundantly better, it is inexpreſſibly ſo; it cannot be well ſaid how much better it is, and therefore it is put by way of queſtion and admiration; ſee chap. iii. 13—15. and iv. 7. And to get underſtanding, rather to be choſen than ſilver? the ſame thing is deſigned as before, expreſſed in different words; a ſpiritual underſtanding of Chriſt and the goſpel, and an experience of the grace of God; though ſome, as Gerſom, think, that wiſdom is ſomething better than underſtanding, as gold, to which it is preferred, is better than ſilver. The Septuagint render it, "neſts of wiſ"dom, and neſts of underſtanding; and the Ara"bic verſion, "buds of wiſdom, and buds of un"derſtanding."

℣. 17. The high-way of the upright is to depart from evil, &c.] Upright perſons, ſuch who are upright in heart, and walk uprightly; theſe walk in the high-way of holineſs, in which men, though fools, ſhall not err; in the King's high-way, the high-way of the King of kings; in the plain, beaten path of God's commandments; and ſo ſhun the by-paths of ſin, and abſtain from all appearance of it: this is their common, conſtant courſe of life; they are ſtudiouſly concerned to walk herein, and take delight in ſo doing; whereby they eſcape many evils others fall into. He that keepeth his way, preſerveth his ſoul; that keeps on in his way, the way in which the upright walk; whoſe eyes look right on, and his eye-lids ſtraight before him; who ponders the path of his feet, and turns neither to the right hand nor the left; who walks circumſpectly and carefully; obſerves the road he is in, to keep in it, and not go out of it; ſuch a man preſerves his ſoul from many ſnares and temptations, troubles, dangers and evils, which he would be otherwiſe liable to. Here the Maſorites put the word חצי ſignifying, that this is the half or middle of the book.

℣. 18. Pride goeth before deſtruction, &c.] As it did in the angels that ſinned, who, through pride, fell into condemnation, not being able to bear the thought, that the human nature, in the perſon of the Son of God, ſhould be advanced above theirs; and as it did in our firſt parents, who, not content with their preſent ſtate and circumſtances, and ambitious of being as gods, knowing good and evil, ruined themſelves and all their poſterity; and as it has done in many of their ſons, as in Haman, Nebuchadnezzar, and others. And an haughty ſpirit before a fall; or, a high ſpirit, or height of ſpirit[1]; a man that carries his head high; looks upwards, and not to his goings, ſees not at what he may ſtumble, and ſo falls: moreover, the higher a perſon or thing is, the greater is the fall; and very often when a man has got to the height of his riches and honour, and is ſwelling with pride and vanity on account of it, he is on the precipice of ruin, and his fall is immediate; which was the caſe of Nebuchadnezzar, who, whilſt he was expreſſing himſelf in the haughtineſs of his ſpirit, being in the height of his glory, his kingdom departed from him, Dan. iv. 30, 31. and this will be the caſe of the man of ſin, or Antichriſt, Rev. xviii. 7, 8.

℣. 19. Better it is to be of an humble ſpirit with the lowly, &c.] The followers of the meek and lowly Jeſus, whoſe ſpirits are humbled under a ſenſe of ſin; have mean thoughts of themſelves and their own righteouſneſs, and ſubmit to the righteouſneſs of the Son of God, and wholly truſt in him for ſalvation; and aſcribe all they have and are to the free grace of God; humble themſelves under the mighty hand of God; are reſigned to his will, and patiently bear all afflictions without murmuring, and think better of others than themſelves: theſe are not in ſo much danger of falling as the proud and haughty, and are more grateful to men, and acceptable to God; with theſe he vouchſafes to dwell; to theſe he gives more grace, and they ſhall inherit the earth. Wherefore it is better to be of ſuch a ſpirit, and be ranked among and keep company with the meek and lowly, than to divide the ſpoil with the proud; the ſpoils of the poor, with proud oppreſſors; or ſpoils gotten in war, with proud and ambitious princes; or the ſpoils of kingdoms and ſtates with Antichriſt, divided by him among his proud followers: it is better to be the followers of Chriſt, and have but little, than to be his, and have ever ſo much.

℣. 20. He that handleth a matter wiſely, ſhall find good, &c.] That frames and compoſes his diſcourſe well on any ſubject he takes in hand; or manages his affairs prudently and diſcreetly, in which he is concerned; or that wiſely attends to the affair of humility, as Aben Ezra: or rather, to the word, that is, to the word of God; is not a careleſs, negligent, unconcerned hearer of the word, but a diligent and attentive one; whoſe heart is opened by the Spirit of God, to attend to what is ſpoken in it; who lays it up in his heart, and makes it the rule of his conduct in life: ſuch a man finds good things; things which are for his profit, edification and inſtruction; good truths, good doctrines, good counſel and advice, good directions and inſtructions; promiſes of good things, things for his preſent comfort and future happineſs. And whoſo truſteth in the Lord, happy is he; not to his own wiſdom; nor in his own ſtrength; nor in his riches, nor righteouſneſs; nor in the favour of men, no, not of princes; but in the Lord, and in his Word; he ſhall want no good thing, he is kept in perfect peace; he is in the utmoſt ſafety, is like mount Zion, that can never be removed, Jer. xvii. 7. Iſa. xxvi. 3. Pſal. lxxxiv. 11, 12. and cxxv. 1.

℣. 21. The wiſe in heart ſhall be called prudent, &c.] He that has true wiſdom in the inward part; who knows his heart, and the naughtineſs of it; who has the fear of God in it, which is the beginning of wiſdom; who is wiſe unto ſalvation, not only knows the ſcheme of it, but is experimentally acquainted with it; who has not head-knowledge and wiſdom only, but heart-knowledge and wiſdom, and behaves wiſely in his life and converſation; who is ſo wiſe and endued with knowledge, as out of a good converſation, to ſhew his works with meekneſs of wiſdom; ſuch a man is called, reckoned, accounted, and ſpoken well of, as a prudent man, among all wiſe and knowing perſons. And the ſweetneſs of the lips increaſeth learning; who, beſides a wiſe heart and a knowing head, have the gift of elocution; can deliver themſelves in a flowing, eaſy ſtile; can cloath their thoughts with proper words, and convey their ideas in clear expreſſions, in a very edifying and inſtructive manner: theſe communicate knowledge to others, and increaſe it in themſelves; for whilſt they are improving others, they improve themſelves and learning alſo, whether it be divine or human; theſe are ſuch who are apt to teach; and if they have proper hearers to attend them, they will increaſe in learning, as a juſt man does, chap. ix. 9.

℣. 22. Underſtanding is a well-ſpring of life unto him that hath it, &c.] The maſter or owner of it[k]. As he only is to whom an underſtanding is given; for whatever underſtanding men may have of natural and civil things, they have none of things ſpiritual and divine, unleſs it be given them by Chriſt. This is no other than the grace of the Spirit of God, who is a Spirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of Chriſt; and this is a well of living water, ſpringing up unto everlaſting life, and it iſſues in it; with the knowledge of Chriſt, and God in Chriſt, eternal life is connected, John iv. 14. and xvii. 3. and as this knowledge and underſtanding of things is communicated by wiſe and knowing men, they are the means and inſtruments of the ſpiritual life of thoſe to whom they miniſter, and are made uſeful. But the inſtruction of fools is folly; the beſt inſtruction they are capable of giving is downright folly, and iſſues in death.

℣. 23. The heart of the wiſe teacheth his mouth, &c.] That is, a man that is wiſe in heart, as in ℣. 21. his heart will teach his mouth what to ſay, when to ſay it, and before whom; it will prompt him to matter, that he ſhall not be at a loſs what to ſay, nor how to ſay; it will furniſh him with words and things; out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth ſpeaketh, Matt. xii. 34. And addeth learning to his lips; ſo that he does not deliver out mere words, but ſolid learning along with them, inſtructive to himſelf and others. The Targum is, "and by his lips he addeth doctrine;" or increaſes knowledge.

℣. 24. Pleaſant words are as an honey-comb, &c.] Jarchi interprets it of the words of the law; but it may be much better underſtood of the doctrines of the goſpel; ſuch as the doctrines of God's everlaſting love, eternal election, the covenant of grace, the perſon of Chriſt, as God-man; of peace and reconciliation by his blood; of remiſſion of ſins through his atoning ſacrifice; of juſtification by his righteouſneſs; of life and ſalvation by his obedience, ſufferings and death; all the doctrines of grace, which ſhew that ſalvation in all its parts is owing intirely to the free grace of God; theſe are all pleaſant to the ear of him that knows the joyful ſound, and to the taſte of every one that has taſted that the Lord is gracious. The precious promiſes of the goſpel may be meant; which are free and unconditional, irrevocable and immutable, never fail of accompliſhment; are yea and amen in Chriſt, and are ſuited to the various caſes of God's people; theſe are very pleaſant and delightful, when they are fitly ſpoken, and ſeaſonably applied. Moreover, the ſpeech of ſuch as are wiſe in heart, true believers in Chriſt; their words, whether expreſſed in prayer or in praiſe, are pleaſant to the Lord, and very grateful and acceptable to him: ſo their ſpeech one to another, when about ſpiritual things; when it is with grace, then it miniſters grace, and is very pleaſant. Now all theſe, and eſpecially the doctrines of the goſpel, are as an honey-comb; they are like unto it for the manner of its production; it is wrought and filled by the laborious bee, which goes from flower to flower and gathers honey, and brings it into the hive, and there diſpoſes of it: ſo laborious miniſters of the goſpel gather their doctrines from the ſacred ſcriptures, which they diligently ſearch, and go from one to another, and gather ſomething from each; and being richly laden with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt, bring it into the hive of the church, and there feed men with knowledge and underſtanding: and the doctrines of the goſpel are like unto the honey-comb, for the manner of its communication, by dropping freely, gradually and conſtantly; ſo goſpel-miniſters drop the pleaſant words of the goſpel, freely and without preſſing, having no other conſtraint, but love to Chriſt and the ſouls of men; they do it gradually, as men are able to bear; and conſtantly preach the word, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon: and as the honey which drops from the honey-comb, is the choiceſt honey, called life-honey; ſuch are the truths of the goſpel, they are excellent things, the moſt excellent. Likewiſe theſe are as the honey-comb for the honey in it; they are like the honey out of the rock the Iſraelites eat of; and like that out of the lion Samſon fed upon; and like that which Jonathan taſted, that enlightened his eyes. The goſpel flows from Chriſt, the rock; and is to be found in him, the lion of the tribe of Judah, and as ſlain, and has an enlightening virtue in it; and particularly theſe pleaſant words are ſaid to be as the honey-comb for its ſweetneſs and healthfulneſs, as follows: Sweet to the ſoul, and health to the bones; they are ſweet to the ſoul of him that underſtands them, and that has a ſpiritual taſte of them; not to a natural and unregenerate man, whoſe natural taſte remains in him, and is not changed; who calls evil good, and good evil; puts bitter for ſweet, and ſweet for bitter; to him the doctrines of the goſpel are inſipid, taſteleſs and diſagreeable things: nor are they ſweet to a carnal profeſſor; who, though he may expreſs ſome value for them, has no ſpiritual guſt and reliſh of them; but to them that believe, to whom Chriſt is precious, who have taſted that he is gracious; to theſe they are ſweet, even ſweeter than the honey or the honey-comb, Pſal. xix. 10. and cxix. 103. Cant. ii. 3. Ezek. 2. 3. And they are health to the bones; they are the wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus; they are the means of curing the diſeaſes of the mind; of healing wounded ſpirits, and broken hearts, and broken bones; they make the bones which were broken to rejoice; what heals the bones, ſtrengthens the whole man, a man's ſtrength lying much in his bones; theſe ſtrengthen the inward man, cauſe believers to go from ſtrength to ſtrength, and to hold on and perſevere to the end.

℣. 25. There is a way that ſeemeth right unto a man, &c.] The ſame is ſaid in chap. xiv. 12. and is here repeated becauſe of the excellence, importance, and uſefulneſs of the obſervation, and to excite an attention to it; that men may be more diligent to look into their ways, and be more cautious where and how they walk, and be more conſiderate and thoughtful of the iſſue of them.

℣. 26. He that laboureth laboureth for himſelf, &c.] Man is born for labour; it is a part of the curſe inflicted on him for ſin; and his condition and circumſtances are ſuch as make it neceſſary, for ſuch who will not work ought not to eat; and it is labouring for food and raiment which is here meant, and that is for a man's ſelf; for if he labours to be rich and lay up money, and purchaſe eſtates, theſe are more for others than himſelf, and indeed he knows not for whom he labours. It is indeed in the original, the ſoul of him that labours[l], labours for himſelf; and it may be underſtood of the labour of the ſoul for ſpiritual things, for ſpiritual food, for that meat which endures to everlaſting life; and may intend the various exerciſes of religion in which men employ themſelves, that they may have food for their ſouls and grow thereby; ſuch as praying, reading the ſcriptures, attending on the miniſtry of the word and ordinances: and this labouring is for themſelves; for the good and welfare of their immortal ſouls, for their ſpiritual proſperity, for the nouriſhing of them up unto everlaſting life. It may be applied to goſpel-miniſters, who labour in the Lord's vineyard, in the word and doctrine; and though in the firſt place they labour to promote the glory of God and the intereſt of Chriſt, and the good of ſouls, yet it alſo turns to their own account; and indeed they labour to be accepted of the Lord, and at laſt ſhall hear, Well done, good and faithful ſervant, enter into the joy of thy Lord. Some render the words, he that is troubleſome is troubleſome to himſelf[m], as ſuch an one is, not only to others but to himſelf alſo; he is the cauſe of great diſquietude to his own mind. For his mouth craveth it of him; that he ſhould labour in order to ſatisfy his appetite; for all the labour of man is for his mouth, to feed that and fill his belly, Eccl. vi. 7. or his mouth boweth unto him[n]; it is as it were a humble ſupplicant to him, intreating him to labour to get food for it, and ſatisfy its wants; or as a beaſt bows down to feed itſelf; or boweth upon him[o]; it obliges him, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, it compels him whether he will or no to work, its neceſſities are ſo preſſing: and this holds good in ſpiritual things; a man's mouth, or ſpiritual appetite, puts him upon the uſe of means of ſpiritual exerciſes, without which he muſt otherwiſe be in a ſtarving condition; and is true of the miniſters of the word, whoſe mouth obliges them as it were; they cannot but ſpeak the things they have heard and ſeen: or his mouth reflects upon him; upon the man that has been troubleſome to himſelf and others; the Targum is, "for from his "mouth humiliation ſhall come to him;" or his deſtruction, as the Syriac verſion.

℣. 27. An ungodly man diggeth up evil, &c.] Or a man of Belial[p], a worthleſs, unprofitable man; a man without a yoke, unſubjected to the law of God; ſuch a man digs for ſin as for a treaſure; nor need he go far for it, he has enough in his own heart, out of the evil treaſure of which he brings forth evil things; though he is more ſolicitous and diligent to ſearch into the ſins of others, and dig up them, which have long lain buried; as the Manichees raked up the ſins of Auſtin in his youth; and as the papiſts ſerved Beza: but perhaps the evil of miſchief is here rather intended, which a wicked man contrives and deviſes; a ditch he digs for others, though oftentimes he falls into it himſelf; and ſo the Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, digs evils for himſelf, not intentionally but eventually; ſee Pſal. vii. 15. And in his lips there is as a burning fire; his tongue is a fire, it is ſet on fire of hell, and it ſets on fire the courſe of nature; and with its lies, calumnies, and detractions, devours and conſumes the good names, characters, and credit of men; and deſerves no other than ſharp arrows of the almighty, and coals of juniper; even the everlaſting fire and flames of hell, James iii. 6. Pſal. lii. 2, 4. and cxx. 3, 4.

℣. 28. A froward man ſoweth ſtrife, &c.] Or a man of perverſeneſſes[q]; in whoſe heart is frowardneſs and perverſeneſs; and whoſe mouth ſpeaketh froward and perverſe things, contrary to reaſon, law, and goſpel; and who has a ſpirit of contradiction, and is contrary to all men in his principles and practices; ſuch a man ſows diſcord and ſtrife wherever he comes, in families, in neighbourhoods, in churches, in commonwealths, in civil and religious ſocieties; and he ſeldom fails of finding a ſoil fit for his purpoſe, or ground ſuſceptive of the ſeed he ſows, where it takes root and thrives; ſee chap. vi. 19. And a whiſperer ſeparateth chief friends; one that goes from place to place, from houſe to houſe, carrying tales, whiſpering into the ears of perſons things prejudicial to the characters of others, mere lies and falſhoods; ſuch a man by his conduct ſeparates one friend from another, even chief friends, that have been for a long time in the cloſeſt and moſt intimate friendſhip; he alienates their minds one from another, ſo that they will not come near one another, or keep up any correſpondence as before. The word for chief friends is in the ſingular number, and ſignifies a prince or leader; and ſuch men, according to the ſtation they are in, and the influence they have, ſeparate princes, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, from their ſubjects, and ſtir up the latter to rebel againſt them; at leaſt alienate their affections from them; and paſtors of churches from their flocks, and huſbands from their wives: and ſuch a man at laſt, when found out, ſeparates his beſt friends from himſelf, as well as from one another; who drop him as a worthleſs perſon, yea, as dangerous to converſe with; ſo ſin, that whiſperer and make-bate, ſeparates between God and men, Iſa. lix. 2.

℣. 29. A violent man enticeth his neighbour, &c.] As falſe teachers do, who are grievous wolves, not ſparing the flock, and who by good words and fair ſpeeches deceive the heart of the ſimple; and as the man of ſin that has ſhed the blood of the ſaints, and been drunk with the ſame, deceives with his miracles and ſorceries them that dwell on the earth. And leadeth him into the way that is not good; yea into one that is very bad; ſo far are falſe teachers from leading their neighbours into the good old way of truth and righteouſneſs, that they lead them into pernicious ways, by whom the way of truth is ſpoken evil of; they lead them into a ditch, and into deſtruction hereafter; as does the man of ſin and violence his followers.

℣. 30. He ſhutteth his eyes to deviſe froward things, &c.] Or perverſe or contrary things [r]; he ſhuts his eyes, that his thoughts might not be diſturbed and diſtracted by viſible objects, but might be more free and compoſed, and intent upon the things he is meditating and deviſing; or he ſhuts his eyes againſt light, againſt ſcripture-evidence, which he does not care to come to, leſt his principles and practices ſhould be reproved; he ſhuts his eyes and will not look into the ſcriptures, that he may form and deviſe ſchemes of doctrine and worſhip contrary to them. Some render it, he winks with his eyes, as in chap. vi. 13. ſo the Targum; he gives the hint thereby to his companions, when is the proper time to circumvent an innocent perſon, and to put in execution the ſcheme he had deviſed. Moving his lips he bringeth evil to paſs; either as perſons in deep thought uſed to do; or as a token to others to ſet about the evil deſigned and contrived; or rather as acting a deceitful part, as a falſe teacher; not ſpeaking out his mind freely, but muttering out his words, handling the word of God deceitfully, and not by manifeſtation of the truth commending himſelf to every man's conſcience in the ſight of God, as a faithful miniſter does; and by ſuch artful methods brings his evil deſigns to paſs. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, biting his lips; ſo a wicked man does through indignation at a good man, and through deſire of revenge; and when he plots againſt him, he gnaſhes at him with his teeth, Pſalm xxxvii. 12. The Targum is, "threatning with his lips;" he gives out menaces of evil things, and performs them; which is true of the man of ſin, Rev. xiii. 5—7.

℣. 31. The hoary head is a crown of glory, &c.] Grey hairs, white locks through age are very ornamental; look very beautiful, beſpeak gravity, wiſdom, and prudence, and command reverence and reſpect; with the ancient Romans [s], greater honour was paid to age than to family or wealth; and the elder were revered by the younger next to God, and in the ſtead of parents; ſee the note on Lev. xix. 32. If it be found in the way of righteouſneſs; that is, if ſuch who are old and ſtricken in years, are like Zacharias and Elizabeth, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameleſs; when they are found in Chriſt, having on his righteouſneſs; and when they live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly; when they walk in the ways of God, and true religion; keep up family-worſhip, and private devotion; as well as conſtantly attend the miniſtry of the word and ordinances; then are they very venerable and reſpectable; their old age is a good old age; and in a ſhort time they ſhall have the crown of glory which fadeth not away: but otherwiſe a ſinner a hundred years old ſhall be accurſed; an old man in the open ways of ſin and vice, laden with iniquity, is a very contemptible and ſhocking ſight.

℣. 32. He that is ſlow to anger is better than the mighty, &c.] Than a mighty warrior or conqueror; as Alexander who conquered his enemies, and even all the world, and yet in his wrath ſlew his beſt friends: a man that is ſlow to anger is eſteemed by the Lord, reſpected by men, and is happy in himſelf; and is preferable to the ſtrongeſt man that is not maſter of himſelf and of his paſſions. And he that ruleth his ſpirit, than he that taketh a city; one that has the command of his temper, that can govern himſelf, and not ſuffer his paſſions to exceed due bounds, is ſuperior in ſtrength to him that can ſtorm a caſtle or take a fortified city; it is eaſier to do the one than the other; courage of mind joined with wiſdom, and aſſiſted by a proper number of perſons, may do the one; but it requires the grace of God, and the aſſiſtance of his Spirit, thoroughly to do the other. Cicero ſays [t], "in all ages fewer men are found who conquer "their own luſts, than that overcome the armies of "enemies."

℣. 33. The lot is caſt into the lap, &c.] Of a man's garment, or into his boſom, or into a hat, cap, urn, or whatſoever he has in his lap, and from whence it is taken out; which uſed to be done in chooſing officers, civil or eccleſiaſtical; in dividing inheritances, and determining doubtful caſes; and making up differences, and putting an end to ſtrife and contentions, which otherwiſe could not be done: and this ought not to be uſed in trivial caſes, or to gratify curioſity, or for the ſake of gain, or raſhly and ſuperſtitiouſly; but ſeriouſly and religiouſly, with prayer, and in faith, and with a view to the divine direction, and ſubmiſſion to it; for a lot has the nature of an oath, and is an appeal to the omniſcient, omnipreſent, and omnipotent Being. The whole diſpoſing thereof is of the Lord; or the judgment [u] of it; the judgment that is to be made by it concerning perſons or things; it being ſo directed and ordered by him as to fall upon the perſon it ſhould; or to make known the thing in doubt and debate according to his will, in which all parties concerned ſhould acquieſce. This is to be aſcribed, not to blind chance and fortune, to the influence of the ſtars, or to any inviſible created being, angel or devil, but to the Lord only; there is no ſuch thing as chance, or events by chance; thoſe events which ſeem moſt fortuitous or contingent, are all diſpoſed, ordered, and governed by the ſovereign will of God.

CHAP. XVII.

℣. 1. BEtter is a dry morſel, and quietneſs therewith, &c.] A ſmall quantity of bread; a broken piece of bread, as the word [w] ſignifies; which has been long broken off, and become dry [x]; a dry a dry cruſt of bread; old bread, as the Arabic verſion; an old, mouldy, dry piece of bread; and the word uſed has the ſignification of deſtruction in it: bread that has loſt its taſte and virtue; or however, a mere piece of bread is meant, without any thing to eat with it, as Gerſom, butter, cheeſe, or fleſh: this with quietneſs and peace among thoſe that partake of it, peace in the family, in a man's own mind, eſpecially if he has the peace of God which paſſeth all underſtanding; this is better, Than a houſe full of ſacrifices, with ſtrife; than a houſe ever ſo well furniſhed with good cheer, or a table ever ſo richly ſpread; or where there is plenty of ſlain beaſts for food, or for ſacrifice, which were uſually the beſt, and part of which the people had to eat, and at which times feaſts uſed to be made; but the meaneſt food, with tranquillity and contentment, is preferable to the richeſt entertainment where there is nothing but ſtrife and contention among the gueſts; for where that is, there is confuſion and every evil work: peace and joy in the holy Ghoſt are better than meats and drinks. Mr Dod uſed to ſay, "brown bread and the goſpel are good fare;" ſee chap xv. 17.

℣. 2. A wiſe ſervant ſhall have rule over a ſon that cauſeth ſhame, &c.] That does wicked and ſhameful actions; that is ſlothful, and will not attend to inſtruction or buſineſs; that is prodigal, waſteful, and luxurious, and cauſes ſhame to his parents, who bluſh at his conduct. Now a ſervant that behaves well and wiſely in a family is obſerved and reſpected by his maſter, and he puts his wicked and extravagant ſon under him, makes him a tutor to him, and ſets him to watch over him, and obliges his ſon to obey his orders. Jarchi illuſtrates this in Nebuchadnezzar ruling over the children of Iſrael. And ſhall have part of the inheritance among the brethren; be appointed by his maſter's will to a ſhare in his eſtate among his children, for his faithful ſervice to him in life, and to encourage him to take care of his family, his children, and his affairs after his death; or through gifts in his life-time ſhall have what is equal to what his ſons have; or growing rich ſhall purchaſe a part of theirs, as Guſſetius[y]: or ſhall part the inheritance among the brethren[z]; being a wiſe man his maſter ſhall leave him executor of his will, to divide his ſubſtance among his children, and ſee that every one have their proper portion and equal ſhare; but it rather is to be underſtood of his being a co-heir with them. So the Gentiles, through the will of the Lord, become fellow-heirs of the ſame body, and partakers of his promiſe in Chriſt with the Jews, and ſhare in the ſame inheritance with Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, and their children; nay when the children of the kingdom ſhall be ſhut out; ſee Eph. iii. 6. Matt. viii. 11, 12. Jarchi gives an ancient expoſition of it thus, "a proſelyte of righteouſneſs "is better than a wicked native; and in time to "come he ſhall divide the ſpoil and the inherit"ance in the midſt of the children of Iſrael, as it "is ſaid in Ezek. xlvii. 23."

℣. 3. The fining-pot is for ſilver, and the furnace for gold, &c.] Refiners of ſilver have their fining pots, in which they purify the ſilver from the droſs; and goldſmiths have their crucibles to melt and purify their gold, by which aſſays of the worth and value of it may be made. But the Lord trieth the hearts; there is no veſſel, as Gerſom obſerves, in which they can be put and tried by creatures; a man does not know, nor can he thoroughly ſearch and try his own heart, and much leſs the hearts of others; God only knows and tries them, Jer. xvii. 9, 10. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Arabic verſions render it by way of ſimilitude, as the fining-pot is for ſilver, &c. as ſilver is refined in the pot, and gold in the furnace, ſo are the hearts of God's people, and their graces tried and purified by him in the furnace of affliction; the variety of troubles they are exerciſed with are made uſeful for the purging away of the droſs of ſin and corruption, and for the brightning of their graces, 1 Pet. i. 7.

℣. 4. A wicked doer giveth heed to falſe lips, &c.] A man of an ill ſpirit, of a miſchievous diſpoſition, that delights in doing wickedneſs; he carefully attends to ſuch as ſpeak falſhood; he liſtens to lies and calumnies, loves to hear ill reports of perſons, and takes pleaſure in ſpreading them to the hurt of their characters; and men of bad hearts and lives give heed to ſeducing ſpirits, to falſe teachers, to ſuch as ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, who ſooth and harden them in their wickedneſs. And a liar giveth ear to a naughty tongue; or to a tongue of deſtruction[a]; a calumniating, backbiting tongue, which deſtroys the good name and reputation of men; and he that is given to lying, is made up of lying, or is a lie itſelf, as the word ſignifies; who loves and makes a lie, as Antichriſt and his followers; ſuch an one hearkens diligently to every thing that may detract from the character of thoſe eſpecially he bears an ill-will to: or it may be better rendered, he that hearkens to a lie gives heed to a naughty tongue[b]; for a lying tongue is a naughty one, evil in itſelf, pernicious in its effects and conſequences.

℣. 5. Whoſo mocketh the poor, reproacheth his maker, &c.] He that mocks the poor for his poverty, upbraids him with his mean appearance, ſcoffs at the cloaths he wears or food he eats, ſuch an one reproaches his Creator; or as the Targum, "provokes his Creator to anger;" him who is his own Creator as well as the poor man's; him who made the poor man, both as a man and as a poor man; and who could have made him rich if he would, as well as the man that mocks at him; whoſe riches are not of himſelf, but of God; and who can take them away, and give them to the poor man if he pleaſes; and therefore rich men ſhould be careful how they mock the poor; for as Gerſom obſerves, he that derides a work, derides the workman. And he that is glad at calamities, ſhall not be unpuniſhed; or at calamity[c]; at the calamity of another, as the Vulgate Latin; and ſo Gerſom; for no man rejoices at his own calamity; at the calamity of the poor, as Aben Ezra; or of his neighbour or companion, as the Targum; or at the calamity of any of his fellow-creatures, as the Edomites rejoiced at the calamity of the Jews, but were in their turn deſtroyed; and as the Jews rejoiced when the Chriſtians were perſecuted by Nero, and at length were deſtroyed themſelves by the Romans; and as the papiſts will rejoice when the witneſſes are ſlain, and quickly after ſeven thouſand men of name will be ſlain of them, and the reſt affrighted, Rev. xi. 10, 13.

℣. 6. Childrens children are the crown of old men, &c.] Ancient parents. Grandfathers with the Jews are called old men, as Buxtorf[d] obſerves. A numerous progeny was reckoned a great bleſſing to a man; a man; to have his table ſurrounded with children, as olive-plants; to be incircled with a large family, was a crown of glory[e]; and to live to ſee childrens children, a large number of grandchildren, was ſtill a greater glory; and eſpecially, as Jarchi obſerves, when theſe children, or childrens children, were walking in a good way, in the good ways of religion and godlineſs, they trained them up in. Chriſt is the Ancient of days, the everlaſting Father, and it is his glory, as Mediator, to ſee his ſeed, to have a numerous offſpring; and which will endure for ever, as the days of heaven: miniſters of the goſpel are ſpiritual fathers; and thoſe who have been converted under their miniſtry, will be their joy and crown of rejoicing at the laſt day. And the glory of children are their fathers; who are wiſe, as Aben Ezra obſerves; and righteous, as Jarchi: if they are wiſe and good men, it is an honour to their children that they deſcend from them; nor are they aſhamed to own their relation to them, but glory in it, as the Jews did in Abraham, ſaying, We have Abraham for our father: but, on the contrary, if their fathers are fooliſh or wicked, their children are aſhamed of them, and do not care to acknowledge their deſcent from them; and ſuch parents, who are an honour to their children, their children ſhould be careful to tread in their ſteps, that they reflect no diſhonour on them; particularly as it is our great honour and glory to have God for our Father, to be his adopted ſons and daughters, we ſhould be followers of him as dear children, and be obedient ones.

℣. 7. Excellent ſpeech becometh not a fool, &c.] A wicked man. Eloquence, or a ſublime, grand way of ſpeaking, a copiouſneſs and fluency of expreſſion, become not ſuch; becauſe hereby he may be capable of doing more miſchief; or ſuch a ſtile is unſuitable to the ſubject of his diſcourſe, which is nothing but folly and wickedneſs. The goſpel is excellent ſpeech, ſound ſpeech, that cannot be condemned; it treats of excellent things; concerning the perſon, office and grace of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; and very unfit is a wicked man to take it into his mouth, talk of it, and declare it. Much leſs do lying lips a prince; they rather become a fool, as excellent ſpeech does a prince; who neither ſhould ſpeak lies himſelf, nor encourage, but abhor them in others. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, a juſt man; but the word more properly ſignifies a liberal man, as it is rendered in Iſa. xxxii. 8. where it ſtands oppoſed to a churl or covetous man: and ſome Jewiſh[f] writers think by the fool, is meant ſuch a one to whom a lip of abundance[g], as it may be rendered, is very unſuitable; or to talk of his abundance, when he makes no good uſe of what he has for himſelf or others; and ſo on the other hand, it is very diſagreeable to the character of an ingenuous and liberal man, to promiſe and not perform, and never intended it. It is true of ſuch who are made a willing people in the day of Chriſt's power, Pſal. cx. 3. where the ſame word is uſed as here; of his volunteers; that to ſpeak lies one to another very ill becomes them; or to receive, or to ſpeak, or profeſs falſe doctrines; for no lie is of the truth.

℣. 8. A gift is as a precious ſtone in the eyes of him that hath it, &c.] Or is a ſtone of grace[h], the note of ſimilitude being wanting. It is an ornament of grace, adorns the perſon that wears it, makes him look lovely and amiable; is very grateful and deſirable in itſelf, attracts and dazzles the eyes, and fills the mind with pleaſure; ſo is a gift in the eyes of him that has it, that is the owner of it; either that has it in his poſſeſſion to give, is the giver of it, as Aben Ezra; which, as it is valuable in his own eyes, he judges it to be ſo with others, and thinks he can do what he pleaſes with it, and engage perſons by it to do as he would have them: or that is the receiver of it, as the Targum; who having it given him, is maſter of it, and is ſo acceptable to him, and has ſuch an influence upon him, as to do any thing for it, the giver of it directs him to, as follows: Whitherſoever it turneth, it proſpereth; to whatſoever cauſe, or to whatſoever perſons, judge or jury, it is given and received; it ſucceeds far better than the moſt eloquent orations, or learned pleadings in law, or appeals to ſtatutes, and the production of them. Money anſwers all things; a gift blinds the eyes; it is like a diamond, ſo ſparkling and dazzling, ſo charming and attracting, that the perſon to whom it is offered cannot reſiſt it; and it draws him to do whatever is deſired of him; it carries the cauſe, it ſucceeds according to the wiſh of the giver: or, as the Arabic verſion renders it, "he ſhall find his buſineſs plain;" done as he would have it. Jarchi applies the proverb, thus; "when a man comes before the Lord, and bribes him with words, and returns unto him, it is a precious ſtone in his eyes; and in all that he aſks of him, he proſpers."

℣. 9. He that covereth a tranſgreſſion, ſeeketh love, &c.] He that hides the tranſgreſſion of another, or of his friend, committed againſt himſelf or againſt another, which he is privy to; but the matter being made up, and the offence forgiven, he forgets it, and no more ſpeaks of it to his friend, or upbraids him with it, nor ſpreads it among others: ſuch a man ſhews that he loves his friend, and is deſirous that love and friendſhip ſhould be continued; and this is the way to continue it; and a man that thus ſeeks it, finds it. Or it may be rendered, he covereth a tranſgreſſion who ſeeketh love[i]; for love covereth all things, chap. x. 12. But he that repeateth a matter; the matter of the tranſgreſſion, the thing that has given the offence; that rakes it up again, when it has been covered; upbraids his friend with it, when it has been paſt over and forgiven; will frequently hit him on the teeth with it, and talk of it wherever he comes, and ſpread the knowledge of it in all places: He ſeparateth very friends; he ſets the beſt of friends at variance one with another by ſuch a practice; for this purſued, friendſhip cannot ſubſiſt long among men: he ſeparates his beſt friend from himſelf, and himſelf from him. The word ſignifies a prince, leader, or governor; ſee the note on chap. xvi. 28. and Jarchi interprets it, thus; "he ſeparates from himſelf the governor of the world, the holy, bleſſed God."

℣. 10. A reproof entereth more into a wiſe man, &c.] A ſingle verbal reproof, gently, kindly and prudently given, not only enters the ear, but the heart of a wiſe and underſtanding man; it deſcends into him, as the word[k] ſignifies; it ſinks deep into his mind; it penetrates into his heart, and pierces his conſcience; brings him eaſily to humiliation, confeſſion and reformation. Or, reproof is more terror to a wiſe man; as Jarchi interprets it, and the Tigurine verſion; it awes and terrifies him more; a ſingle word has more effect upon him, entering more eaſily into him, than an hundred ſtripes into a fool; or, than ſmiting a fool a hundred times[l]: a word to a wiſe man is more than a hundred blows to a fool, will ſooner correct and amend him; a word will enter where a blow will not; ſtripes only reach the back, but not the heart of a fool; he is never the better for all the corrections given him; his heart is not affected, is not humbled, nor brought to a ſenſe of ſin, and acknowledgment of it; nor is he in the leaſt reformed: or a ſingle reproof to a wiſe man, is of more ſervice than a hundred reproofs to a fool; which are ſometimes expreſſed by ſmiting, let the righteous ſmite me, &c. Pſal. cxli. 5.

℣. 11. An evil man ſeeketh only rebellion, &c.] For he ſeeks nothing but what is evil; and all ſin is rebellion againſt God, a contempt of his laws, and a tranſgreſſion of them; a trampling upon his legiſlative power and authority; an act of hoſtility againſt him, and a caſting off allegiance to him. Or rather, the words may be rendered, rebellion, that is, the rebellious man, ſo the Targum, the abſtract for the concrete, verily or only ſeeketh evil[m]; a man that is rebellious againſt his prince, that is of a rebellious diſpoſition, is continually ſeeking to do miſchief in the commonwealth; he is continually plotting and contriving deſtructive ſchemes, and ſtirring up ſedition, and cauſing trouble: and ſo a rebel againſt God is always ſeeking that which is ſinful, which is evil in its own nature, and contrary to the law and will of God; and in the iſſue brings the evil of puniſhment on himſelf. Therefore a cruel meſſenger ſhall be ſent againſt him; if a rebel againſt his lawful ſovereign, a meſſenger ſhall be ſent by him to take him into cuſtody, who will ſhew him no mercy; or an executioner to diſpatch him, who will not ſpare to perform his orders: and if a rebel againſt God, ſome judgment of God ſhall fall upon him in a very ſevere manner; or his own conſcience ſhall accuſe him, and ſhall be filled with dreadful apprehenſions of divine vengeance; or Satan, the angel of death, ſhall be let looſe upon him, to terrify or deſtroy him; or death itſelf, which ſpares none. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions aſcribe this to God as his act, rendering it, the Lord ſhall ſend, &c. and ſo Aben Ezra; who alſo refers the former clauſe to him, and gives it as the ſenſe of it; that he ſhall ſeek to do the rebellious man evil, inflict on him the evil of puniſhment for the evil of ſin.

℣. 12. Let a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man, &c.] A bear is a very fierce and furious creature, eſpecially a ſhe-bear; and ſhe is ſtill more ſo when robbed of her whelps, which ſhe has juſt whelped, and been at great pains to lick into ſhape and form, by which her fondneſs to them is increaſed; and therefore being ſtripped of them, is full of rage; and ranging about in queſt of them, falls furiouſly upon the firſt ſhe meets with. Jerom[n] obſerves, that thoſe who have written of the nature of beaſts, ſay, that among all wild beaſts, there is none more fierce than a ſhe-bear, when ſhe has loſt her whelps, or wants food. And yet as terrible and as dangerous as it is, it is ſafer and more eligible of the two, to meet an enraged bear in thoſe circumſtances, than a fool in his folly; in the height of his folly, in a paroxyſm or fit of that; in the heat of his luſts, and the purſuit of them, in which there is no ſtopping him, or turning him from them; eſpecially in the heat of paſſion and anger, which exceeds that of the bear, and is not ſo eaſily avoided. Jarchi applies it to ſuch fools as ſeduce perſons to idolatry, whom to meet is very dangerous: ſuch are the followers of the man of ſin, who have no mercy on the ſouls of men they deceive, and whoſe damnation they are the cauſe of; and who are implacably cruel to thoſe who will not join with them in their idolatrous worſhip; the beaſt of Rome, his feet are as the feet of a bear, Rev. xiii. 2. and one had better meet a bear, than him and his followers.

℣. 13. Whoſo rewardeth evil for good, &c.] As the enemies of David and Chriſt rewarded them, Pſal. xxxv. 12. and cix. 5. this is baſe ingratitude, contrary to the law and light of nature; worſe than beaſtly, is really deviliſh. Evil ſhall not depart from his houſe; from him and his family; they ſhall be continually viſited with one diſeaſe and calamity or another; ſo hateful and offenſive is the ſin of ingratitude to God, and therefore ought to be carefully avoided. This might be illuſtrated by the judgments of God on the nation of the Jews, for their ingratitude to Chriſt.

℣. 14. The beginning of ſtrife is as when one letteth out water, &c.] As when a man makes a little hole in the bank of a river, or cuts a ſmall paſſage in it, to let the water into an adjoining field; by the force of the water, the paſſage is widened, and it flows in, in great abundance, to the overflow and prejudice of the field; nor is it eaſily ſtopped: ſo a ſingle word, ſpoken in anger, with ſome warmth, or in a way of contradiction, has been the beginning and occaſion of great ſtrife and contention. The words in the Hebrew text lie thus; he that letteth out water, is the beginning of ſtrife[o]; which ſome underſtand of letting out water into another man's field, which occaſions contentions, quarrels, and law-ſuits; but the former ſenſe is beſt: the Targum is, "he that ſheddeth blood as water, "ſtirreth up ſtrifes." Therefore leave off contention, before it be meddled with; ceaſe from it as ſoon as begun; leave it off before it is well entered: or before one mixeth himſelf[p] with it, or is implicated with it; got ſo far into it, that it will be difficult to get out of it: or before thou ſtriveſt with any openly; which ſenſe the word has in the Arabic language, as Schultens[q] obſerves; that is, before you come to open words and blows, put an end to the contention; do not ſuffer it to proceed ſo far; ſince it cannot be known what will be the conſequence of it: or rather, leave it off, as the ſame learned writer in his later thoughts, in his commentary on the place, by the help of Arabiſm, alſo renders it, before the teeth are made bare; or ſhewn, in quarrelling, brawling, reproaching, in wrath and anger.

℣. 15. He that juſtifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the juſt, &c.] That abſolves and clears the guilty, and pronounces him righteous in open court, where he ſtands arraigned, accuſed, and the fact proved; and that adjudges an innocent man to condemnation; or paſſes the ſentence of it upon him, when it is a clear caſe, he is not guilty. Even they both are abomination to the Lord; being contrary to law and juſtice, to the declared will of God, and the orders and inſtructions given by him to judges, Deut. xxv. 1. ſuch an abominable action were the Jews guilty of in deſiring Barabbas, a wicked man, to be releaſed, and Chriſt, the juſt one, to be condemned; and Pilate in complying with them. From this paſſage we learn, that the word juſtify is uſed in a forenſic ſenſe, for pronouncing perſons juſt in a court of judicature; and in which ſenſe it is uſed in the article of a ſinner's juſtification before God: by which act, though it is an ungodly perſon that is juſtified, yet it is through the perfect righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, and is quite agreeable to law and the juſtice of God; and not at all inconſiſtent with this paſſage, which repreſents the juſtification of a wicked man as an abomination: it is ſo, where there is no righteouſneſs, but not where there is; agreeable to which is the ſaying of an heathen[r] poet, "it is not righteous, neither raſhly to adjudge "bad men good, nor good men bad."

ỿ. 16. Wherefore is there a price in the hand of a fool to get wiſdom, &c.] Natural wiſdom and knowledge. By this price may be meant money, riches, worldly ſubſtance, of which a fooliſh man is poſſeſſed; by means of which he might purchaſe uſeful books for the improvement of his mind, and procure himſelf inſtructors that might be very uſeful to him; but inſtead of ſeeking after that which he moſt wants, and making uſe of his ſubſtance to furniſh him with it; he ſpends it on his back and belly, in fine cloaths and luxurious living; in rioting and drunkenneſs, in chambering and wantonneſs, at balls and plays, in taverns and brothel-houſes: or ſpiritual wiſdom and knowledge; the means of which are reading the word, hearing the goſpel, frequent opportunities of attendance on a goſpel-miniſtry, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, and converſation with goſpel-miniſters and other Chriſtians; but inſtead of making uſe of theſe, he neglects, ſlights, and deſpiſes them. And it is aſked, with ſome degree of indignation and admiration, why or to what purpoſe a fool is favoured with ſuch means, Seeing he hath no heart to it? to wiſdom; he does not deſire it, nor to make uſe of the price or means, in order to obtain it; all is loſt upon him; and it is hard to account for it, why he ſhould have this price, when he makes ſuch an ill uſe of it.

ỿ. 17. A friend loveth at all times, &c.] A true, hearty, faithful friend loves in times of adverſity, as well as in times of proſperity: there are many that are friends to perſons, whilſt they are in affluent circumſtances; but when there is a change in their condition, and they are ſtripped of all riches and ſubſtance, then their friends forſake them, and ſtand at a diſtance from them; as was the caſe of Job, chap. xix. 14. it is a very rare thing to find a friend that is a conſtant lover, ſuch an one as here deſcribed. And a brother is born for adverſity; for a time of adverſity, as Jarchi: he is born into the world for this purpoſe; to ſympathiſe with his brother in diſtreſs, to relieve him, comfort and ſupport him; and if he does not do this, when it is in his power to do it, he does not anſwer the end of his being born into the world. The Jewiſh writers underſtand this, as ſhewing the difference between a friend and a brother: a cordial friend loves at all times, proſperous and adverſe; but a brother loves when adverſity is born[s], or is, ſo Aben Ezra; he loves when he is forced to it; when the diſtreſs of his brother, who is his fleſh and bone, as Gerſom obſerves, obliges him to it: but this may be underſtood of the ſame perſon who is the friend; he is a brother, and acts the part of one in a time of adverſity, for which he is born and brought into the world; it being ſo ordered by divine providence, that a man ſhould have a friend born againſt the time he ſtands in need of him[t]. To no one perſon can all this be applied, with ſo much truth and exactneſs, as to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; he is a friend, not of angels only, but of men; more eſpecially of his church and people; of ſinful men, of publicans and ſinners; as appears by his calling them to repentance, by his receiving them, and by his coming into the world to ſave them: he loves them, and loves them conſtantly; he loved them before time; ſo early were they on his heart and in his book of life; ſo early was he the ſurety of them, and the covenant of grace made with him; and their perſons and grace put into his hands, which he took the care of: he loved them in time, and before time began with them; thus they were preſerved in him, when they fell in Adam; were redeemed by his precious blood, when as yet they were not in being, at leaſt many of them: he loves them as ſoon as time begins with them, as ſoon as born; though impure by their firſt birth, tranſgreſſors from the womb, enemies and enmity itſelf unto him; he waits to be gracious to them, and ſends his goſpel and his Spirit to find them out and call them: and he continues to love them after converſion; in times of backſliding; in times of deſertion; in times of temptation, and in times of affliction: he loves them indeed to the end of time, and to all eternity; nor is there a moment of time to be fixed upon, in which he does not love them. And he is a brother to his people; through his incarnation, he is a partaker of the ſame fleſh and blood with them; and through their adoption, they having one and the ſame Father; nor is he aſhamed to own the relation; and he has all the freedom, affection, compaſſion and condeſcenſion of a brother in him: and now he is a brother born; ſee Iſa. ix. 6. born of a woman, a virgin, at Bethlehem, in the fulneſs of time, for and on the behalf of his people; even for adverſity; to bear and endure adverſity himſelf; which he did, by coming into a ſtate of meanneſs and poverty; through the reproaches and perſecutions of men, the temptations of Satan, the ill uſage of his own diſciples, the deſertion of his Father, the ſtrokes of juſtice, and the ſufferings of death; alſo for the adverſity of his people, to ſympathiſe with them, bear them up under it, and deliver them out of it. The ancient Jews had a notion, that this ſcripture has ſome reſpect to the Meſſiah; for to ſhew that the Meſſiah, being God, would by his incarnation become a brother to men, they cite this paſſage of ſcripture as a teſtimony of it[u].

ỿ. 18. A man void of underſtanding ſtriketh hands, &c.] With his friend's creditor, and becomes ſurety for him; and thereby acts a very unwiſe part, and ſhews himſelf to want underſtanding, by taking ſuch a ſtep which may prove the ruin of himſelf and family: for though a man may and ſhould love his friend at all times; yet he is not obliged, under a notion of friendſhip, to injure himſelf and his family, or to run the riſk of it; if he does, it is a plain caſe he wants wiſdom and diſcretion; ſee chap. vi. 1. And becometh ſurety in the preſence of his friend; not the creditor, but the debtor; and to paſs his word for him, when he is preſent, ſhews that his own word will not be taken; and that he is either thought to be in bad circumſtances, and uncapable of payment at the proper time; or elſe that he is a bad man, of diſhoneſt principles, and will not; and in either caſe, it is not adviſable to become a ſurety for ſuch a man: and beſides, doing it in his preſence, may make him more careleſs and unconcerned about making good his payment or contract at the appointed time, when he knows his friend is engaged for him.

ỿ. 19. He loveth tranſgreſſion, that loveth ſtrife, &c.] For ſtrife is tranſgreſſion, when it flows from a malignant ſpirit, is with bad views, about things to no profit, and for contention-ſake; otherwiſe to contend earneſtly for the truth; to ſtrive together for the faith of the goſpel, for matters of moment and importance, and not mere words; to ſtrive lawfully in a cauſe that is juſt, and for truth and juſtice, is commendable and praiſe-worthy. And he that exalteth his gate, ſeeketh deſtruction; that opens the door of his lips, and ſpeaks proudly, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra interpret it; who compare it with Mic. vii. 5. who ſet their mouths againſt heaven, and God in it; and whoſe tongue walks through the earth, and ſpares none there, Pſalm lxxiii. 8, 9. as Antichriſt, who opens his mouth in blaſphemy againſt God and his tabernacle, and exalts himſelf above all that is called God; and ſuch, ſooner or later, bring deſtruction on themſelves, and find it as ſurely as if they ſought for it. Or this may be underſtood of proud, ambitious perſons, that build houſes more magnificent than their ſubſtance will allow of, the gate being put for the whole; by which means they bring themſelves to ruin. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions, have it in ỿ. 16. he that buildeth his houſe high; or who behaves proudly.

ỿ. 20. He that hath a froward heart, findeth no good, &c.] Who is of a perverſe ſpirit, meditates and deviſes evil things; is not ingenuous and ſincere, but falſe and deceitful to God and men: ſuch an one gets no good from either; he obtains not the favour of God, nor a good name, credit and reputation among men. And he that hath a perverſe tongue, falleth into miſchief; or that turns himſelf, or is turned in his tongue[w]; whoſe tongue is changeable, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions; who ſometimes ſays one thing, and ſometimes another, and is not conſiſtent with himſelf; as well as is contrary to all men: ſooner or later he falls into miſchief, into a pit, which he himſelf has dug for others; ſee James iii. 6, 8.

ỿ. 21. He that begetteth a fool, doth it to his ſorrow, &c.] As it proves in the iſſue; though it was joy to him when a man-child was born, and took delight in him whilſt in infancy and childhood, and promiſed himſelf much happineſs in him when at years of diſcretion; but inſtead of that, he departs from his education-principles, deſpiſes all parental counſels and advice, and goes into all the extravagance of ſin and folly; which is an heart-breaking to his godly and religious parents; for this is to be underſtood, not of an idiot, but of a wicked ſon, taking bad courſes. And the father of a fool hath no joy; in his ſon, but ſorrow, and has ſcarce any joy or pleaſure in any thing elſe in all his enjoyments; the trouble he is filled with on his account embitters all he has, that he can take no ſatisfaction, or have any comfort of life; the concern for his ſon is uppermoſt in his thoughts, and hinders him from taking that pleaſure which otherwiſe he might enjoy.

ỿ. 22. A merry heart doth good like a medicine, &c.] Does the body good, makes it healthful and vigorous. Chearfulneſs of ſpirit has a great influence upon the body, and much contributes to the health and welfare of it; ſee Eccl. ix. 7—9. and eſpecially a heart full of ſpiritual joy, peace of conſcience, flowing from the blood of Chriſt, joy in the holy Ghoſt, a rejoicing in Chriſt Jeſus and his righteouſneſs, and in hope of the glory of God, much affect even the outward man. Or, a merry heart makes a good medicine[x]; it is a good medicine of itſelf; raiſes the ſpirits, invigorates the body, and fits it for ſervice and buſineſs: or, does a medicine good[y]; makes that operate kindly, and to a good purpoſe: or, as Jarchi, makes the countenance ſhine well, makes a ſerene countenance; which Schultens approves, and, from the uſe of the word in the Arabic language, confirms. But a broken ſpirit drieth the bones; a ſpirit broken with ſorrow, whether on ſpiritual or temporal accounts; as it weakens the nerves, it dries up the marrow in the bones, and emaciates the body, and reduces it to a ſkeleton: the joy or grief of the mind, thoſe paſſions of the ſoul, have a very great influence upon the body, either for its good or hurt.

ỿ. 23. A wicked man taketh a gift out of the boſom, &c.] Of another; of a rich man, who takes it out from thence, and offers it to him as a bribe. This he takes in the moſt ſecret manner, that it might not be ſeen by others; though the Arabic verſion renders it, he that receives a gift in his own boſom, commits iniquity: it is true of both the giver and the receiver; the one gives out of his boſom, and the other takes it from thence, and puts it into his own, and both are wicked. And the words are by ſome rendered, though it ſeems contrary to the accents, a gift out of the boſom of the wicked he will take[z]; the unjuſt judge, who is bribed with it: To pervert the ways of judgment; to turn the courſe of juſtice, and hinder it from taking place; favouring a bad cauſe, and pronouncing a wrong ſentence, which is wreſting judgment.

ỿ. 24. Wiſdom is before him that hath underſtanding, &c.] Is near him to direct and aſſiſt him; it is before him as a rule to walk by, and it is the mark he aims at. A man of ſpiritual underſtanding has the book of wiſdom before him, the ſcriptures of truth, which are able to make a man wiſe to ſalvation; and he ſteers his courſe according to them; he ſets Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, always before him; and keeps his eye on the mark for the prize, all the while he is running his chriſtian race: or, in the face of an underſtanding man is wiſdom[a]; it is to be ſeen in his countenance, which is grave and compoſed. But the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth; where wiſdom is not to be found, it is far off from him; his mind is wandering after every object, is unſettled and unfixed to any thing; and which may be diſcerned in his eyes, which are rolling about and turning, firſt one way and then another; and which ſhews the levity and inconſtancy of his mind.

[a] את פני מבין חכמה in facie prudentis (lucet) ſapientia, V. L. ſo Vatablus, Mercerus, Gejerus, Piſcator, Noldius, p. 140. N° 665. in vultu intelligentis ſapientia, Schultens.

℣. 25. A fooliſh ſon is a grief to his father, &c.] Becauſe of his folly and wickedneſs, and the ruin he is bringing himſelf to. And bitterneſs to her that bare him; a cauſe of bitterneſs of ſoul to his mother, more diſtreſſing than the bitter pains with which ſhe brought him forth into the world. Jarchi, by the father, underſtands the bleſſed God; and by her that bare him, the congregation of Iſrael; to whom Jeroboam, the ſon of Nebat, was bitterneſs, who cauſed Iſrael to ſin; ſee chap. x. 1.

℣. 26. Alſo to puniſh the juſt is not good, &c.] It is evil, and an abomination to the Lord, ℣. 15. Evil doers indeed ſhould be puniſhed; but to puniſh the righteous alſo, as well as them, is far from being commendable. Nor to ſtrike princes for equity; to ſtrike princes, judges, civil magiſtrates, for doing the duty of their place and office, for doing that which is juſt and equitable among men, is very criminal, who ought to be encouraged and ſupported therein. Or it may be rendered, nor that princes ſhould ſtrike for that which is right[b]; or cauſe men to be ſtricken, ſcourged and whipped for doing well. The Targum is, "nor to ſmite the "righteous, who ſay right things;" and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, righteous ones: and the word ſignifies ingenuous, liberal perſons, good men, ſuch as princes are or ought to be; and who ſhould neither be ſtricken in the due diſcharge of their office, nor ſtrike others that do well.

℣. 27. He that hath knowledge, ſpareth his words, &c.] Or, he that knows knowledge[c]; one that is very knowing, has a fund of knowledge in him, ſpareth his words; is generally a man of few words, he thinks much and ſays little; and though he may be communicative of his knowledge to proper perſons, and at proper times, yet never ſpeaks of it in a boaſting and oſtentatious way: or, he reſtrains his words[d]; he puts a bridle on them; and ſuffers not himſelf to ſpeak haſtily and angrily, and in a reproachful manner, when he is provoked to it. And a man of underſtanding is of an excellent ſpirit; here is a various reading; the cetib is וקר of a cool ſpirit[e]; in oppoſition to a warm, fiery ſpirit; ſuch as was that of the apoſtles, who were for calling for fire from heaven on thoſe that ſlighted their Maſter, and, as he told them, knew not what ſpirits they were of; but a cool ſpirit is one that is not ſoon angry, calm, ſedate, and not eaſily provoked to wrath: the keri, or marginal reading, is יקר of an excellent or precious ſpirit[f]; and ſuch an one is a right ſpirit; a ſpirit of faith and love, and of a ſound mind; and of ſuch a ſpirit is a man of underſtanding, in things divine and ſpiritual; to have a ſpirit of prayer, and to be tenderhearted, and of a ſympathiſing and forgiving ſpirit, is to be of an excellent ſpirit. The Targum is, "humble in ſpirit;" and a meek and quiet ſpirit is in the ſight of God of great price; the Lord has a great regard to ſuch who are of an humble and contrite ſpirit; with theſe he dwells, to theſe he gives more grace; theſe are like to Chriſt, and have the fruits of his Spirit, and are very uſeful and ornamental. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, patient or long-ſuffering; and to be of a patient ſpirit, is to be of an excellent ſpirit: ſuch bear afflictions and reproaches quietly; wait God's own time for hearing and helping them, and live in the comfortable expectation of heaven and happineſs; and ſuch ſhew themſelves to be wiſe and underſtanding men.

℣. 28. Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wiſe, &c.] Not only one that is ſparing of his words, and is really a man of knowledge and underſtanding; but even a fool, if he is but ſilent, and does not betray his folly by his words, will be reckoned a wiſe man by thoſe that do not know him; and whatever fool he may be in other reſpects, yet in this he acts the wiſe part, that he holds his peace and ſays nothing. And he that ſhutteth his lips, is eſteemed a man of underſtanding; and keeps them ſhut, leſt he ſhould ſay any thing raſhly and haſtily; a man that has ſo much command of himſelf, as not to ſpeak unadviſedly, through the heat of his own paſſions, and through the provocations of others, will paſs for a man that underſtands himſelf, and knows how to behave well before others.

CHAP. XVIII.

℣. 1. THrough deſire a man having ſeparated himſelf, ſeeketh, &c.] Or, a ſeparated man ſeeketh deſire[g]; his own deſire, will and pleaſure. This is either to be underſtood in a good ſenſe, of one that has a real and hearty deſire after ſound wiſdom and knowledge, and ſeeks in the uſe of all proper means to attain it; and in order to which he ſeparates himſelf from the world and the buſineſs of it, and retires to his ſtudy, and gives up himſelf to reading, meditation and prayer; or goes abroad in ſearch of it, as Aben Ezra: or of a vain man that affects ſingularity; and who, through a deſire of gratifying that luſt, ſeparates himſelf, not only from God, as Jarchi interprets it, purſuing his evil imagination and the luſt of his heart; and from his friends, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions; but from all men, like the Jews, who pleaſe not God, and are contrary to all men; ſo ſuch a man ſets himſelf to deſpiſe and contradict the ſentiments and opinions of others, and to ſet up his own in oppoſition to them. This is true of the Phariſees among the Jews, who had their name from ſeparating themſelves from all others, having an high opinion of their own wiſdom and ſanctity; and alſo of the Gnoſtics among the Chriſtians, who boaſted of their knowledge, and ſeparated themſelves from the chriſtian aſſemblies; and were ſenſual, not having the Spirit, being vainly puffed up with their fleſhly mind. And intermeddleth with all wiſdom; the man who is deſirous of being truly wiſe and knowing, graſps at all wiſdom, every branch of uſeful knowledge; would gladly learn ſomething of every art and ſcience worthy of regard; and he makes uſe of all means of improving himſelf therein; and covets the company and converſation of men of wiſdom and knowledge, that he may attain to more; he intermingles himſelf with men of wiſdom, as Aben Ezra interprets it, and walks and converſes with them. Or if this is to be underſtood of a vain-glorious perſon, the ſenſe is, he intermeddles or mingles himſelf with all buſineſs[h], as it may be rendered; he thruſts himſelf into affairs that do not concern him, and will paſs his judgment on things he has nothing to do with; or he monopolizes all knowledge to himſelf, and will not allow any other to have any ſhare with him. Jarchi interprets this clauſe thus, "among wiſe men his reproach ſhall be made manifeſt;" and obſerves, that their Rabbins explain it of Lot, ſeparating from Abraham, following the deſires of his heart: but R. Saadiah Gaon better interprets it of an apoſtate from religion; that objects to every thing ſolid and ſubſtantial, in a wrangling and contentious manner; and ſhews his teeth[i] at it, as Schultens, from the uſe of the Arabic word, renders it.

[g] So the Targum.

℣. 2. A fool hath no delight in underſtanding, &c.] In natural underſtanding, and in the improvement of his mind in it; he delights not in books, nor in the converſation of men of learning and ſenſe: or in ſpiritual underſtanding, in the underſtanding of ſpiritual things; theſe are fooliſhneſs to a natural man; nor does he delight in reading the ſcriptures, nor in hearing the word, and attendance on it in the houſe of God, but is weary of ſuch exerciſes. But that his heart may diſcover itſelf; and the folly that is in it: ſuch men only deſire to have ſome knowledge and underſtanding, to make a ſhew of it, that they may be thought to be wiſe, and to be capable of talking of things as if they underſtood them, when it is only to the expoſing of themſelves and their ignorance; ſome perſons attain to no more learning and knowledge, than juſt to be capable to ſhew that they are fools. Or, but in the diſcovery of his heart[k]; he delights in diſcovering that; not the wiſdom, but the folly that is in it.

℣. 3. When the wicked cometh, then cometh alſo contempt, &c.] When he comes into the world, as Aben Ezra; as ſoon as he is born, he is liable to contempt, being born in ſin; but this is true of all: rather, as the Vulgate Latin, and with which the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions agree, when he cometh into the depth of ſin, or to the height of his wickedneſs; he commences a ſcoffer at, and contemner of all that is good: when he comes into the houſe of God, it may be ſaid, there comes contempt; for he comes not to hear the word, in order to receive any profit by it, but to contemn it, and the miniſters of it. And with ignominy, reproach; or, with the ignominious man reproach[l]: he that deſpiſes all that is good, and treats divine things in a ludicrous way, will not ſpare to reproach the beſt of men, and ſpeak evil of them falſely, for the ſake of religion. Or the meaning of the whole is, that wicked men, ſooner or later, come into contempt, ignominy and reproach themſelves; they that deſpiſe the Lord, are lightly eſteemed by him; and a vile perſon is contemned in the eyes of a good man: ſuch bring ſhame and diſgrace upon themſelves and families while they live; and when they die, they are laid in the grave with diſhonour; an infamy reſts upon their memories, and they will riſe to everlaſting ſhame and contempt.

℣. 4. The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, &c.] The words of a great and mighty man; of an excellent and valuable man, as Jarchi; or of a wiſe man, as Aben Ezra. The doctrines which ſuch a man has imbibed, and his heart is full of, and his mouth utters, are like to waters, pure, purifying and refreſhing; to deep waters, which make no noiſe, and cannot be eaſily fathomed: ſuch are the deep myſteries of grace, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, ſpoken among them that are perfect; of which a good man makes no boaſt, but humbly declares; out of the abundance of his heart, his mouth ſpeaks. And the well-ſpring of wiſdom as a flowing brook; there is a ſpring of ſpiritual wiſdom and knowledge in him; a well of living water, ſpringing up unto everlaſting life; and from thence it flows freely and conſtantly; communicating itſelf liberally unto others, and miniſtering grace to the hearers, for their edification.

℣. 5. It is not good to accept the perſon of the wicked, &c.] For a judge to have reſpect to a wicked man in a cauſe before him, and to favour him, becauſe he is a rich man, or a relation, or he has received ſome kindneſs from him; none of theſe things ſhould have any influence upon him, To overthrow the righteous in judgment; though he may be a poor man and a ſtranger, and to whom the judge is under no private and perſonal obligation; yet juſtice ought to be done without any reſpect to perſons; to do otherwiſe is not only not good, but very bad, very ſinful and criminal; it is contrary to law and juſtice; it is doing injury to men, and is repugnant to the will of God, and offenſive to him, Lev. xix. 15.

℣. 6. A fool's lips enter into contention, &c.] That is between others, when he has nothing to do with it; but he muſt be meddling, and make himſelf a party in the contention, which is an argument of his folly; he ſays things which occaſion diſputes, raiſe contentions among men, and provoke to wrath and anger. The Septuagint verſion is, the lips of a fool lead him to evils; for, as they lead him to contention and ſtrife, the iſſue of that is confuſion and every evil work. And his mouth calleth for ſtrokes; as he ſtirs up and encourages contention, ſo he proceeds to blows, and excites others to them; from words he goes to blows, and, by the ill and provoking language of his mouth, gets many a blow to himſelf. Jarchi ſeems to underſtand it of chaſtiſements from the hand of God; ſee chap. xxvi. 3.

℣. 7. A fool's mouth is his deſtruction, &c.] The cauſe of it; for his contentions, and quarrels, and evil-ſpeaking, law-ſuits are commenced againſt him, which bring ruin upon himſelf and his family now; as well as for his idle and wicked words he will be condemned hereafter, Matt. xii. 35. there is a world of iniquity in the mouth and tongue of a wicked man, which bring deſtruction upon himſelf and others, James iii. 6, 8. And his lips are the ſnare of his ſoul; from ſpeaking in his own defence, he ſays things which ſhould not be ſaid, and by which he is entangled yet more and more; he is catched by his own words, and condemned by them:

or his loquacity, in which he delights, is a ſnare unto him, to ſay things which neither become him, nor are for his advantage, but the contrary; ſee chap. xii. 13.

℣. 8. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, &c.] Or rather, they are wounds; they wound the credit and reputation of the perſon of whom the tale is told; they wound the perſon to whom it is told, and deſtroy his love and affection to his friend; and in the iſſue they wound, hurt and ruin the tale-bearer himſelf. Or, they are as of thoſe that are wounded[m]; they pretend to be affected with the caſe they tell, and to be grieved for the failings and infirmities of thoſe they are ſecretly expoſing, when at the ſame time they rejoice at them: or, they are ſecret, hidden ones, as Aben Ezra interprets it; they are ſpoken ſecretly, and wound ſecretly, in a backbiting way: or, they are ſmooth or flattering[n], as Kimchi; they are ſmoother than oil, and glide eaſily into the minds of others: rather, are greedily ſwallowed down[o], as the word in the Arabic language ſignifies; as Schultens has ſhewn, and ſo renders it. Hence it follows: And they go down into the innermoſt parts of the belly; go down pleaſantly, and ſink deep into the hearts of thoſe to whom they are told; where they have a place and remain, both to the injury of the perſons that receive them, and of them of whom they are told; and though pleaſing at firſt, they are as wounds in the inner parts, which are mortal.

℣. 9. He alſo that is ſlothful in his work, &c.] Remiſs in it; hangs down his hands, and does not care to make uſe of them, but neglects his buſineſs: Is brother to him that is a great waſter; a prodigal man, who ſpends his ſubſtance in riotous living: the ſluggard and the prodigal are brethren in iniquity; for though they take different courſes, they are both ſinful, and iſſue in the ſame manner; both bring to poverty and want. Or, brother to a maſter that waſtes[p]; a ſlothful ſervant and a waſteful maſter are near akin, and come into the ſame claſs and circumſtances. Jarchi interprets it, "he that "ſeparateth from the law, though a diſciple of a "wiſe man, is a brother to Satan;" whoſe name is Apollyon, the waſter and deſtroyer. A man that is ſlothful in ſpiritual things, though a profeſſor of religion, and has a place in the houſe of God, is brother to him that is a waſter and perſecutor of it; ſee Matt. xii. 30.

℣. 10. The name of the Lord is a ſtrong tower, &c.] By the name of the Lord may be meant, either the attributes and perfections of God, by which he is made known, and which are the ſtrength and ſecurity of his people; his goodneſs, grace and mercy, are their defence; his favour encompaſſes them about, as a ſhield; his juſtice protects them from all injuries and inſults; his truth and faithfulneſs preſerve them; they are kept by his power, as in a garriſon; and his unchangeableneſs is a reaſon why they are not conſumed: or elſe the Lord himſelf; his name is put for himſelf, Pſal. xx. 1. and may be well interpreted of the Meſſiah, as it is by the ancient Jews[q]; in and by whom God is manifeſted unto men, as the God of grace; in whom he proclaims his name, a God gracious and merciful; whoſe name is in him, and who has the ſame nature and perfections with him; his name is Jehovah, our righteouſneſs; Immanuel, God with us; the mighty God, and Prince of peace; and who is called Jeſus, becauſe he ſaves his people from their ſins, and ſo is their ſecurity from eternal deſtruction. What a ſtrong tower is to them that are within it, againſt an enemy without, that is the power, ſtrength, and might of Chriſt to his people: as a divine perſon, he is ſtrong and mighty, the moſt mighty, the almighty; as man, he is the man of God's right hand, made ſtrong for himſelf and us; as Mediator, he has all power in heaven and earth: in him is everlaſting ſtrength for his people; he is their Betzer, their fortified place, or city of refuge, to flee unto on all occaſions; he is the ſtrong-hold, whither priſoners of hope are directed to turn to; he is their place of defence, and the munition of rocks; a ſtrong tower, inexpugnable; ſo deeply founded, no pioneer can work under it, and ſpring a mine to blow it up; ſo highly built, no ſcaling ladders can reach it; ſo fortified, no cannon-balls can break through it, or demoliſh any of its walls and bulwarks, which are his ſalvation; the gates of hell cannot prevail againſt it; it is not to be taken by ſtorm, or by the moſt violent attack of the whole poſſe of men and devils. The righteous runneth into it; not ſelf-righteous perſons, they run from Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, not to him and that; but ſuch who ſee their own righteouſneſs will not juſtify them; who indeed are ſinners, know and acknowledge themſelves to be ſuch; as ſinners go to Chriſt, who, as ſuch, receives them; and theſe are righteous through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly: and it is the continual buſineſs or employment of their faith, to betake themſelves to Chriſt upon all occaſions; they are continually coming to him, and exerciſing faith upon him, as the Lord their righteouſneſs, which is meant by running to him; this ſuppoſes knowledge of him, as the ſtrong tower and city of refuge; of the way unto him, and of the reception by him, which may be expected; it ſuppoſes a principle of ſpiritual life, and ſome degree of ſpiritual ſtrength; a ſenſe of danger or of want in themſelves, and of ſafety and fulneſs in Chriſt; it is expreſſive of haſte, readineſs and chearfulneſs, and is owing to the drawings of efficacious grace. And ſuch an one that thus runs, is ſafe; from the avenging juſtice of God; from the curſe and condemnation of the law; from ſin, and all its dreadful conſequences; from Satan, and all ſpiritual enemies; from wrath to come, hell, and the ſecond death: or is ſet aloft[r]; is on high; for this tower, as it is a ſtrong one, it is an high one; a rock of refuge, higher than men, or angels, or heaven itſelf; and ſuch who are in it are out of the reach of all danger and every enemy.

℣. 11. The rich man's wealth is his ſtrong city, &c.] In which he dwells, over which he preſides; in which he places his truſt and confidence, and thinks himſelf ſafe from every enemy and from all trouble: as one[s] obſerves, "the abundance of "a rich man's wealth, he conceives to be as it were "the abundance of people in a city; the telling "of his money, he imagines to be the walking of ℣. 12. Before deſtruction the heart of man is haughty, &c.] Lifted up with his riches. Rich men are apt to be high-minded, and therefore are to be charged and cautioned againſt it; they are apt to look above their poor neighbours, and with contempt upon them; and very often this haughtineſs of theirs is a preſage of their ruin and deſtruction: and thoſe haughty airs are put on from the pride of their hearts, when a breach is near, as the word [u] ſignifies, or when they are ready to break; however, their haughty ſpirits are, ſooner or later, humbled by one diſtreſſing providence or another; ſee chap. xvi. 18. And before honour is humility; ſee the note on chap. xv. 33.

℣. 13. He that anſwereth a matter before he heareth it, &c.] Who is impatient and cannot wait to hear it out, but breaks in upon the ſpeaker before he has finiſhed what he has to ſay; or is raſh and precipitate, and returns an anſwer at once, without weighing and conſidering, and thoroughly underſtanding what is ſaid: It is folly and ſhame unto him; his anſwer muſt be a fooliſh one, and bring ſhame and confuſion upon him; men ſhould be ſwift to hear, and ſlow to ſpeak.

℣. 14. The ſpirit of a man will ſuſtain his infirmity, &c.] The ſpirit of a mighty man, as Jarchi; a man of ſpirit, that has a ſpirit of fortitude, even of natural fortitude, and eſpecially of chriſtian fortitude; that has a ſpirit of might upon him, of power, and of a ſound mind; a man of a chriſtian ſpirit, that is renewed in the ſpirit of his mind; who is a ſpiritual man, and has the Spirit of God in him, as well as a rational ſoul, an immaterial, immortal, and never-dying ſubſtance. Such a man will bear up under many trials and exerciſes of life; will ſupport under bodily infirmities; will take patiently the loſs of friends and of ſubſtance; endure reproach, and the loſs of a good name, credit and reputation, chearfully for righteouſneſs-ſake; and ſuffer perſecution for the ſake of Chriſt, and his goſpel, with an undaunted and unbroken ſpirit: the peace of conſcience he feels within; the preſence of God with him; the love of God ſhed abroad in his heart; ſeeing all his afflictions flowing from love, and working for his good; and having in view the glories of another world; he bears up under, and goes through all afflictions, with eaſe and pleaſure; his conſcience is clear, his heart is whole, his mind is eaſy; his wounds being healed, his ſins pardoned, and his ſoul ſaved in Chriſt. But a wounded ſpirit, who can bear? or a ſmitten [w] one, ſmitten by the Lord; by the word of the Lord, which he uſes as an hammer to break rocky hearts in pieces; by the law of God, which produces wrath, and a looking-for of fiery indignation; by the Spirit of God, awakening the conſcience, and convicting it of ſin, righteouſneſs and judgment; which ſmitings are very grievous, tho' they tend to bring to repentance; are in order to healing, and are in love. Or, a broken ſpirit [x], as in chap. xvii. 22. broken with a ſenſe of ſin, and with an exceſs of ſorrow for it; when a man becomes lifeleſs and hopeleſs, has no hope of life and ſalvation, and is in the utmoſt confuſion; all his meaſures and purpoſes are broken, as well as his heart; he knows not what to do, nor what way to take; he is diſconſolate, and refuſes to be comforted; and which for the preſent is intolerable: though the Lord has a regard to ſuch, is nigh unto them; has ſent his Son to bind up their broken hearts; yea, has himſelf been broken for them; and happy it is for them that they fall on him and are broken, and not he on them. Or, a wounded ſpirit; with a view of ſin, as committed againſt the omniſcient and omnipotent Being, a pure and holy God; a righteous one, whoſe nature is infinite; and ſo ſin committed againſt him, requires an infinite ſatisfaction, which a creature cannot give; and a God alſo, who is the author of their beings, and the Father of their mercies; all which makes ſin againſt him the more cutting and wounding: likewiſe they are wounded with a view of the evil nature of ſin, and the aggravated circumſtances that attend it; and with the terrors of the law, that are ſet in array againſt them. And ſuch a ſpirit, who can bear? not without the ſight of a wounded Saviour; or without a view of atonement by his ſacrifice; or without the diſcoveries and applications of pardoning grace; or without a ſenſe of peace, and reconciliation made by the blood of Chriſt; or without ſome hope of ſalvation by him; and, unleſs the good Samaritan pours in oil and wine into the wounds, and binds them up.

℣. 15. The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge, &c.] More knowledge; for he muſt have ſome, and a conſiderable ſhare, to be denominated prudent, whether in things natural, civil or ſpiritual: and ſuch will be heartily deſirous of more, and make uſe of all means to attain it, by which they do come at a large ſhare of it. And the ear of the wiſe ſeeketh knowledge; a wiſe man ſeeks to get it by hearing; he liſtens to what others ſay, and eſpecially ſuch that are wiſer and more knowing than himſelf: ſo ſuch as are wiſe to ſalvation, as they deſire to know more of Chriſt and of divine things, and make uſe of all means for that purpoſe, among the reſt, hearken to what Chriſtians, of a ſuperior claſs to themſelves, drop in private converſation; and particularly they conſtantly attend to the miniſtry of the word; and thus ſeeking it, they find an increaſe of it.

℣. 16. A man's gift maketh room for him, &c.] Or enlarges him [y]; brings him out of priſon, or out of ſtraits and difficulties with which he has been preſſed; or it makes way for him to a judge, and for a favourable hearing of his cauſe; or it enlarges his acquaintance, and gains him reſpect among men. And bringeth him before great men; it opens a way for him into the preſence and company of great men, being a fee to their ſervants; or with it he procures a place to wait on them. It is not neceſſary to underſtand it of a gift by way of bribe; but to introduce a perſon to another, and render him acceptable, and appeaſe anger; as in the caſes of Jacob, and Abigail, Gen. xxxii. 20. and xliii. 11. 1 Sam. xxv. 27.

℣. 17. He that is firſt in his own cauſe, ſeemeth juſt, &c.] As perhaps Tertullus did, before Paul made his defence; and as Ziba, Mephiboſheth's ſervant, before his maſter detected him: this often appears true in telling a tale, in private converſation, in law-ſuits before a judge and a court of judicature, and in theological controverſies. But his neighbour cometh, and ſearcheth him; his neighbour comes into the houſe, where he is telling his tale, and reports it in another manner, and ſhews the falſhood of his relation; or he comes into a court of judicature, and ſets the cauſe in quite another light; or he comes out into the world by public writing, and expoſes the errors of a man engaged in a wrong cauſe, and refutes his arguments. It is generally underſtood of judicial affairs, that the firſt that opens a cauſe is very apt to prejudice the judge and court in his favour, and they are ready to think at firſt hearing that he is in the right; but it is not proper to be haſty in forming a judgment till the other ſide is heard; for his antagoniſt comes and traverſes the point, unravels the whole affair, ſhews the weakneſs of his cauſe, the vanity of his pretences, and makes void all his allegations; and then he, the judge, ſo ſome interpret it, ſearcheth; inquires more narrowly into the caſe, in order to find out truth, and paſs a right judgment and ſentence.

℣. 18. The lot cauſeth contentions to ceaſe, &c.] When a caſe cannot be determined among parties at variance in a private way, nor in a court of judicature, the lot is caſt, and that puts an end to all ſtrife, and makes each party eaſy; they ſubmit to it, and acquieſce in it. And parteth between the mighty; the kings and princes of the earth; men of great power and authority, and of great riches and affluence; and ſo in a capacity of contending with each other, and of prolonging the contention, which may be attended with bad conſequences; and who are not eaſily diſſuaded from it: or it may intend ſuch who moſt vehemently diſagree; perſons of great ſpirits, who are obſtinate and ſtubborn, and will by no means yield, and there is no parting them by arguments or legal deciſions; theſe the lot parts, and cauſes them to ceaſe from their quarrels and contentions, and to reſt ſatisfied with the diſtributions the lot makes to them; as the children of Iſrael were with their portion of the land of Canaan, aſſigned them by lot.

℣. 19. A brother offended is harder to be won than a ſtrong city, &c.] A fortified city may ſooner be taken by an enemy, than one brother offended can be reconciled to another; their reſentments againſt each other, are keener than againſt another perſon that has offended them; and their love being turned into hatred, it is more bitter; and it is more difficult to compoſe differences between brethren than between enemies; wherefore ſuch ſhould take care that they fall not out by the way: this is true of brethren in a natural ſenſe; as the caſes of Abel and Cain, Jacob and Eſau, Joſeph and his brethren, Amnon and Abſalom, and others ſhew; and of brethren in a ſpiritual ſenſe, as Paul and Barnabas, Luther and Calvin, and others. And their contentions are like the bars of a caſtle; which cannot be eaſily broken or cut aſunder: ſo contentions, eſpecially thoſe among brethren, are with great difficulty made to ceaſe, and their differences compoſed; they will ſtand it out againſt one another, as long as a ſtrong city, or a barred caſtle, againſt an enemy.

℣. 20. A man's belly ſhall be ſatisfied with the fruit of his mouth, &c.] With his own words and diſcourſes, when they are prudent, pious, and ſavoury; when they are with grace, and miniſter it; they are ſatisfying to himſelf, to his own mind and conſcience, and to his family; to all within his houſe, which is as it were his belly; but if otherwiſe it will not be profitable nor ſatisfying to either; and therefore if a man would keep conſcience eaſy, and be uſeful to others, he ought to take care what he ſays; ſee chap. xii. 14. and xiii. 2. And with the increaſe of his lips ſhall he be filled; the ſame thing as before, expreſſed in different words, alluding to the ſowing of ſeed in the earth, and the increaſe of it; as a man ſows, he reaps, and enjoys the fruits of his labour; according to what a man ſows with his lips, ſuch is his harveſt he is afterwards a partaker of.

℣. 21. Death and life are in the power of the tongue, &c.] Of witneſſes, according to the teſtimony they bear; of judges, according to the ſentence they paſs; of teachers, according to the doctrine they preach; of all men, who by their well or ill ſpeaking bring death or life to themſelves and others. Some by their tongues, by the too free uſe of them, or falſhood they utter, are the cauſe of death to themſelves and others; and ſome by their ſilence, or by their prudent ſpeech and prevalent interceſſion, ſecure or obtain life for themſelves and others; yea judgment at the laſt day will proceed according to a man's words, By thy words thou ſhalt be juſtified, and by thy words thou ſhalt be condemned, Matt. xii. 37. the tongue is the inſtrument either of a great deal of good, or of a great deal of evil. And they that love it, ſhall eat the fruit thereof; that delight to be talkative; that love to uſe the tongue, whether in a good or in a bad way, ſhall accordingly be recompenſed; ſhall enjoy the advantages or diſadvantages ariſing from it.

℣. 22. Whoſo findeth a wife, &c.] A good one; ſo the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions ſupply it; and ſo the Targum, tho' it leaves out the word good in the laſt clauſe; and no other can be meant, even a good natured one, wiſe, prudent, careful and induſtrious; a proper help-meet, a virtuous woman, as in chap. xxxi. 10. whoſo ſeeks after ſuch an one, and finds one, eſpecially one that has the grace of God, which he ſhould ſeek after among his friends, and by their aſſiſtance, and by prayer to God. Findeth a good thing; that will be good for him, both upon a civil and ſpiritual account; the Septuagint verſion adds, "he that caſts out a good wife caſts out good things, but he that retains a whore is fooliſh and ungodly;" which is followed by the Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions, but is not in the Hebrew text. Jarchi interprets it of the law in a myſtic ſenſe, but according to the literal ſenſe of a good wife. And obtaineth favour of the Lord; it is from the Lord, and under his direction and guidance in ſeeking that he finds a good wife; and which he ought to eſteem as a favour from the Lord, and as an evidence of his favour to him, and may encourage himſelf to hope for others of him. Heſiod ſays[z], a man cannot obtain any thing better than a good wife.

℣. 23. The poor uſeth intreaties, &c.] Or ſupplications[a]; he is a humble ſupplicant to others for favours he aſks in a ſubmiſſive and lowly manner; he does not demand any thing, nor preſcribe what ſhall be done for him, but modeſtly tells his caſe, and ſubmits it; ſo ſuch who are poor in ſpirit, are humble ſupplicants at the throne of grace. But the rich anſwereth roughly; being proud and haughty, lifted up with their riches, and in fear of none; they anſwer others with hard and rough words, eſpecially their inferiors, and particularly the poor. This is not what ought to be, but what commonly is. This and the following verſe are not in the Arabic verſion.

℣. 24. A man that hath friends muſt ſhew himſelf friendly, &c.] Friendſhip ought to be mutual and reciprocal, as between David and Jonathan; a man that receives friendſhip ought to return it, or otherwiſe he is guilty of great ingratitude. This may be ſpiritually applied; a believer is a man of friends[b], as it may be rendered; he has many friends: God is his friend, as appears by his early love to him, his choice of him, and proviſions of grace for him; by ſending his Son to ſave him; by viſiting him, not only in a way of providence but of grace; by diſcloſing his ſecrets, ſhewing his covenant to him, and by making him his heir, and a joint-heir with Chriſt. Chriſt is his friend, as is evident from his viſiting him at his incarnation; and in a ſpiritual way, by the communication of his ſecrets to him; by his hearty counſel and faithful reproofs; by his undertaking and doing for him what he has; and eſpecially by ſuffering and dying in his room and ſtead. The holy Spirit is his friend, which he has ſhewn by diſcovering to him his woful eſtate by nature, and the way of ſalvation by Chriſt; by working all his works in him; by acting the part of a comforter to him; by revealing divine things to him, by helping him under all his infirmities; by making interceſſion for him according to the will of God; and by making him meet for eternal glory and happineſs: angels are his friends, as is plain by their well-pleaſedneſs with the incarnation of Chriſt for men; and which they expreſs at their converſion; by their miniſtring to them, their protection of them, and the good offices they do them both in life and at death; and ſaints are friends to one another: and ſuch ſhould ſhew themſelves friendly to God, their covenant-God and Father; by frequently viſiting him at the throne of grace; by truſting in him; by a carefulneſs not to offend, but pleaſe him; and by a cloſe and faithful adherence to his cauſe and intereſt: to Jeſus Chriſt their Redeemer, by a ready obedience to his commands; by owning and uſing him as their friend; by taking notice of his friends and ſhewing them reſpect, his miniſters and poor ſaints; by cleaving to him, and renouncing the friendſhip of his enemies: and likewiſe to the holy Spirit, by not grieving, quenching and deſpiſing him; but by making uſe of him, and giving up themſelves to his influence and direction; and by acknowledging him as the author of all their grace: alſo to angels, by ſpeaking well of them, owning their good offices, and reckoning it an honour that they are come and joined to ſuch a company; and to the ſaints, by chriſtian converſation with them, by ſympathizing with them in all conditions, by hearty counſel, faithful reproofs and admonitions, and by helping them in every diſtreſs inward and outward. And there is a friend that ſticketh cloſer than a brother; who is to a man as his own ſoul, Deut. xiii. 6. and ſo are of one heart and ſoul, as Jonathan and David, and the firſt chriſtians were; this is true of Chriſt, and may be expreſſive of the cloſe union between him and his people; and of his cloſe adherence to their cauſe and intereſt; and of his conſtancy and continuance as a friend at all times; and of his faithfulneſs and unchangeableneſs as ſuch; ſee chap. xvii. 17. The heathens had a deity which preſided over friendſhip, which they called Jupiter Philios[c]; the character beſt agrees with the true God, who is a friend to men himſelf, and loves friendſhip among them.

CHAP. XIX.

℣. 1. BEtter is the poor that walketh in his integrity, &c.] In the uprightneſs of his heart before God and men; who is ſincere in the worſhip of God, and in the profeſſion of his name, and walks in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameleſs; and is upright, harmleſs, and inoffenſive in his converſation with men; and ſtudies to exerciſe a conſcience void of offence to both, and continues herein. A man may be a poor man with reſpect to worldly things, and yet be rich towards God; may be a truly gracious good man, honeſt, ſincere, and upright in heart and life: and ſuch an one is better than he that is perverſe in his lips, and is a fool; that is, than a rich man, as the Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions ſupply it, and as the antitheſis requires; that is perverſe in his lips, or whoſe ways are perverſe, as the Syriac verſion; that acts the deceitful part both by words and actions towards thoſe that are about him, not being honeſt and plain-hearted as the poor man is; and who uſes thoſe beneath him very roughly; and concerning oppreſſion ſpeaks loftily, and lets his tongue run both againſt God in heaven and man on earth, by which he ſhews he is a fool; for his riches do not give him wiſdom, and his words and actions declare he wants it; men may be poor and yet wiſe, and a man may be rich and yet a fool: or is confident[d]; that is, truſts in his riches, and is oppoſed to a poor man, ſo R. Saadiah Gaon. This and the following verſe are not in the Septuagint and Arabic verſions.

℣. 2. Alſo, that the ſoul be without knowledge it is not good, &c.] Without knowledge of things natural and civil, eſpecially without the knowledge of God and Chriſt, and divine and ſpiritual things; to be without this is not good, yea very bad; for men without ſuch knowledge and underſtanding are like the beaſts that periſh, and for lack of it do. Jarchi interprets it without the law. Or to be without the knowledge of the ſoul is not good[e]; ſo the Targum, Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions, "he "that knoweth not his ſoul, it is not good for "him;"

[e] So Vatablus; or without care of it, Schultens.

“ him;” that does not know he has a ſoul, or however takes no more care of it than if he had none; who knows not the worth and value of it, its ſtate and condition, and the danger it is in, and the only way of attaining the ſalvation of it. And he that haſteth with his feet ſinneth; who engages in any thing ignorantly and raſhly, he miſſes the mark, and fails in the performance of it, for want of due conſideration and care. The Targum is, “ he that is ſwift with his feet to evil, is a ſinner;” whoſe feet run to evil, to commit robbery, as Aben Ezra; or to ſhed blood; ſee chap. i. 16.

℣. 3. The fooliſhneſs of man perverteth his way, &c.] The ſinfulneſs of his heart and nature; the folly which is bound up in it, cauſes him to go aſtray out of the way in which he ſhould go, or makes things go croſs with him; ſo that the ways he takes do not proſper, nor his ſchemes ſucceed; but every thing goes againſt him, and he is brought into ſtraits and difficulties. And his heart fretteth againſt the Lord; laying all the blame on him; and aſcribing his ill ſucceſs, not to his own ſin and folly, but to divine providence which works againſt him; and therefore frets and murmurs at him; and, inſtead of charging his own ways with folly, charges the ways of God with inequality; ſee Ezek. xviii. 25. Jude 16.

℣. 4. Wealth maketh many friends, &c.] Or adds[f]; it increaſes the number of them: ſo the poet[g], donec eris felix, multos numerabis amicos; and to this agrees what the wiſe man ſays, chap. xiv. 20. But the poor is ſeparated from his neighbour; or friend[h]: he will not viſit him as he did in his proſperity, nor ſuffer him to come into his houſe or company, or come near him; he is ſeparated from his affection, friendſhip, and preſence: ſo another poet[i], “ If thou art rich, thou wilt have many friends; but “ if poor, few.”

℣. 5. A falſe witneſs ſhall not be unpuniſhed, &c.] He that bears falſe witneſs againſt his neighbour in an open court of judicature; though he may not be detected by men, and ſo eſcape the puniſhment due to ſuch offenders by the laws of God and men; yet God, who knows all hearts and actions, will not ſuffer him to go with impunity; if not puniſhed in this world, he ſhall be in the world to come; for bearing falſe witneſs, or perjury, is a grievous offence to God. And he that ſpeaketh lies, ſhall not eſcape; even he that uſeth himſelf to lying in private converſation, ſhall not eſcape the reproach of men; for nothing is more ſcandalous than lying; nor the wrath of God, ſuch ſhall have their portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimſtone, Rev. xxi. 8.

℣. 6. Many will intreat the favour of the prince, &c.] Or of the liberal and bountiful man; as kings and princes generally are, Luke xxii. 25. ſuch have many to wait upon them, and are humble petitioners to them. Aben Ezra and Gerſom interpret the many, of great and honourable men, who are courtiers to kings and princes; who wait upon them, aſk favours of them, and ſeek for places under them. The Targum is, “ there are many that “ miniſter before a prince;” he has many ſervants, and ſome of them nobles. And every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts; or, to a man of gift[k]: who has it in his power to give, and has a heart to it; who is both a rich man and a liberal man; who is both able and willing to communicate to the neceſſities of others: ſuch a man not only has the poor his friends, but others will ſpeak well of him, and will make application to him on account of the poor; and for the ſake of doing good to them, will court his friendſhip and acquaintance. Bayne interprets this man of gift, of Chriſt, who aſcended on high, and received gifts for men, and gives them to men.

℣. 7. All the brethren of the poor do hate him, &c.] They deſpiſe him on account of his poverty; they neglect him, and do not take care of him; they reckon him a reproach unto them, and do not chooſe to own him; all which may be interpreted an hatred of him. How much more do his friends go far from him? or his friend, every one of his friends; or his neighbour[l]: for if his brethren, who are his own fleſh and blood, ſhew ſo much diſreſpect unto him; much more will thoſe who are only his neighbours, or were in friendſhip with him whilſt in proſperity; theſe will ſtand at a diſtance from him, and not come near him, now he is poor and in diſtreſs; ſee Job xix. 13, 14. He purſueth them with words, yet they are wanting to him; or, they are not[m]; he preſſes them with earneſt intreaties to relieve him; he urges their own words and promiſes, and fetches arguments from them, and uſes them as far as they will go; but all ſignifies nothing; his own words and petitions are to no purpoſe; and their words and promiſes are all ſmoke and vapour, vain and empty Some underſtand this, as Gerſom, not of the poor man that follows vain words[n] and empty promiſes, and buoys himſelf up with them; that ſuch an one and ſuch an one has promiſed to be his friend, of which nothing comes; but of the friend that ſeparates from the poor man, and purſues him with words of accuſation, charging it on him as his own fault that he is poor; which accuſations are not true. This is one of the fifteen places obſerved by the Maſoretes, in which it is written לא not, and read לו to him; both may be retained, and read, they are not to him[o]; not profitable to him; either his own words, his petitions; or the words of others, their promiſes.

℣. 8. He that getteth wiſdom, loveth his own ſoul, &c.] Wiſdom and knowledge in things natural and civil; and eſpecially in things divine, ſpiritual and evangelical; particularly he that gets Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and a ſaving knowledge of him; ſee chap. iii. 13. Or, he that getteth an heart[p]; a good heart, as the Targum explains it; which is a new heart, and a new ſpirit; a clean heart, and a right ſpirit; an heart of fleſh, a ſoft, tender and contrite one, in oppoſition to a hard heart, a heart of ſtone: a wiſe and underſtanding heart, ſuch an one as Solomon had; an heart to know the Lord, and to fear him; in which his laws are written, the graces of his Spirit are implanted; and in which, God, Chriſt, and the holy Spirit dwell: he who is deſirous of ſuch an heart, ſeeks after it, prays for it, and uſes all means to obtain it; and who, through the grace of God, does poſſeſs it, as the word ſignifies; he by all this ſhews, that he has a regard to the good and welfare of his immortal ſoul; when ſuch who indulge to ignorance and a wicked heart, wrong and hate their own ſouls; ſee chap. xxix. 24. He that keepeth underſtanding, ſhall find good; retains the wiſdom he has got; holds faſt inſtruction, and keeps it, which is committed to him; abides by the doctrines of the goſpel, and does not depart from them; keeps the ordinances of it, which it is his wiſdom and underſtanding to do; ſee Deut. iv. 6. he finds his account in all this; he finds that which is good, good for him now and hereafter; he finds Chriſt, and life in him; peace, joy and comfort in this world; and in the world to come, glory, honour and happineſs.

℣. 9. A falſe witneſs ſhall not be unpuniſhed, &c.] See the note on ℣. 5. And he that ſpeaketh lies, ſhall periſh; or be loſt, ſhall be undone for ever; he ſhall not enter into the holy city, but have his part in the lake of fire: they that ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, doctrinal ones, and are given up to believe and profeſs them, ſuch ſhall be damned, 2 Theſſ. ii. 11, 12.

℣. 10. Delight is not ſeemly for a fool, &c.] Such an one as Nabal, whoſe name and nature were alike; and whoſe proſperity ill became him, and the mirth and delight he had in it, 1 Sam. xxv. 25, 36. for, as the wiſe man elſewhere ſays, the proſperity of fools ſhall deſtroy them, chap. i. 26. they do not know how to make a right uſe of their proſperity; nor to moderate their enjoyments, pleaſures, and delights. Some underſtand this of ſpiritual delight in the Lord; in his ways and ordinances, which wicked men are ſtrangers to: and a very uncomely thing it is for ſuch perſons to talk of ſpiritual joy and delight, and of their communion with God, when they live in ſin. Much leſs for a ſervant to have rule over princes; this was a ſight which Solomon had ſeen, but was very diſagreeable to him; and was one of the four things the earth cannot bear; the inſolence of a ſervant, when he becomes maſter over his ſuperiors, is intolerable; ſee chap. xxx. 22. Eccl. x. 7. It may be ſpiritually applied to ſuch who are ſervants of ſin; to whoſe ſenſual appetites and carnal affections, the more noble and princely powers of the ſoul, the underſtanding and mind, become ſubject; which is very improper and unſeemly.

℣. 11. The diſcretion of a man deferreth his anger, &c.] That he does not ſhew it immediately; but takes time to conſider of the offence given him, and makes uſe of a proper time to reſent what is fit ſhould be reſented; he is a wiſe and diſcreet man that is ſlow to anger, chap. xiv. 29. and xvi. 32. He is moſt like to God, who is long ſuffering, abundant in goodneſs and truth; and it is to the honour of his name, that he defers his anger, and refrains from cutting off thoſe that offend him, Exod. xxxiv. 6. Iſa. xlviii. 9. And it is his glory to paſs over a tranſgreſſion; to forgive an offence committed; it is the duty and intereſt of a man to do ſo, and it is to his honour; as the contrary greatly reflects diſhonour on him, and tends to his diſgrace and reproach, if not to his ruin; ſee Matt. xviii. 32—35.

℣. 12. The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion, &c.] Which is very terrible when hungry, and is after its prey, and has got it. Kings, eſpecially tyrannical ones, are compared to lions; as Nebuchadnezzar by Jeremiah, Jer. iv. 17. and l. 17. and Nero by the apoſtle Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 7. and the rage of ſuch is very dreadful, as Ahaſuerus's was to Haman. Jarchi interprets the king, of the holy bleſſed God. It may be applied to Jeſus Chriſt, the lion of the tribe of Judah; who is ſaid to cry with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth; and whoſe wrath is terrible to wicked men, and even to the kings of the earth, Rev. v. 5. and x. 3. and vi. 15—17. But his favour is as dew upon the graſs; which refreſhes and revives it, and cauſes it to grow and flouriſh: and ſo the favour and good-will of a king to his ſubjects delights them, and cauſes joy and chearfulneſs in them; and ſuch an effect has the love of God and Chriſt on the children of men, Hoſ. xiv. 6.

℣. 13. A fooliſh ſon is the calamity of his father, &c.] Or, the calamities of his father [q]; he brings them to him. A very great affliction he is, and which has many diſtreſſes and ſorrows in it; as loſs of reputation and credit in his family, which is ſunk by his behaviour, inſtead of being ſupported and increaſed; loſs of ſubſtance, through extravagance and riotous living, and the ruin of his ſoul and body by his wicked practices; ſee chap. x. 1. And the contentions of a wife are a continual dropping; or like the dropping of rain, in a rainy day, into an houſe out of repair, and which is very uncomfortable to the inhabitants of it; ſee chap. xxvii. 15. Such are the contentions of a peeviſh, ill-natured, and brawling wife, who is always ſcolding; and which is a continual vexation to a man, and renders him very uneaſy in life: ſuch a continual dropping was Xantippe to Socrates, who teazed him night and day with her brawls and contentions [r]. A great unhappineſs each of theſe muſt be!

℣. 14. Houſes and riches are the inheritance of fathers, &c.] Which they are careful to provide and leave to their children. This they may and often do, build or purchaſe houſes, and procure great riches, and put their children into the poſſeſſion of them. And, or but, a prudent wife is from the Lord; one that behaves well to her huſband, manages the affairs of her houſe with wiſdom, and brings up her children in an orderly manner: ſuch a wife no man has from the care and proviſion of his parents; nor ſo much from his own good choice and induſtry, as from the kind providence of God, to which he ſhould aſcribe it; his parents may give him houſes and lands, but it is God that gives him a wiſe and diſcreet woman to be an helpmeet to him; ſee chap. xviii. 22.

℣. 15. Slothfulneſs caſteth into a deep ſleep, &c.] Slothful perſons are generally ſleepy, and are very deſirous of ſleep, and indulge themſelves in it; they ſpend their time, day and night, in ſleep and drowſineſs; and are quite careleſs and unconcerned about either their temporal or eternal good; ſee chap. vi. 9—11. And an idle ſoul ſhall ſuffer hunger; and periſh with it, both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe: an idle perſon, that will not work, ought not to eat; and an idle ſoul, or one that is unconcerned about his ſoul, and the ſpiritual food of it, ſhall periſh for want of it.

℣. 16. He that keepeth the commandment, &c.] Either of parents, as children ought to do; or of maſters, as ſervants ſhould; or of kings and princes, as is the duty of ſubjects in all things lawful: or rather of God; every command of his, whether of a moral or poſitive nature, which, though they cannot be perfectly kept, yet ſhould as much as in man lies, in faith, from a principle of love, and to the glory of God: and ſuch a man keepeth his own ſoul, or obſerves [s] it; he ſhews that he has a concern for its welfare and peace; for though peace does not ariſe from keeping the commandments of God, yet ſuch have great peace of ſoul, who do love and keep the law of God; though there is no reward for, yet there is a reward in keeping the divine commands; though ſalvation is not hereby, yet bleſſed are they that do his commands; by which it appears, they have a right to enter into the city, into eternal happineſs, Pſalm cxix. 165. and xix. 11. Rev. xxii. 14. But he that deſpiſeth his ways; which are fit and proper for him to walk in, as Aben Ezra obſerves; or who is negligent of his ways, does not care in what ways he walks, or what is the iſſue of them; he walks in the ways of his own heart, and in the ſight of his eyes; has his converſation according to the courſe of this world; walks with a multitude, with a croud, to do evil, in the broad road which leads to deſtruction, and yet is quite careleſs about it: or that deſpiſes the ways of the commandment or word of God, which that directs to; for that is a lamp and a light, which men would do well to take heed to, as it ſhews them the ways in which they ſhould walk; but theſe they neglect and contemn: or he that deſpiſes the ways of God, the ways he himſelf takes in the ſalvation of men, all whoſe ways are mercy and truth; that deſpiſes the ways of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt: he ſhall die; he is dead in ſins already, and he ſhall die the ſecond death, that neglects and deſpiſes ſo great ſalvation, and all the ways of the Lord, Heb. ii. 3. and x 26—29. There is a keri, or marginal reading, which we follow; but the cetib, or written text, is, he ſhall be killed, or put to death; and ſo the Syriac verſion; immediately, by the hand of heaven, by the Lord himſelf, before his time; or by the judges and civil magiſtrates; his ſins being openly known, as Aben Ezra.

℣. 17. He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord, &c.] A man, whoſe heart is full of compaſſion to the poor, and whoſe hands diſtribute to their neceſſities, from a true principle of love and charity to men, and with a view to the glory of God, and not from any ſelfiſh principle, and with a mercenary end; ſuch a man's gift to the poor is a loan to the Lord; it is not caſt away upon the creature, but is a depoſitum in the hands of God, and ſhall be returned with advantage. And that which he hath given, will he pay him again; either in this life, in things temporal and ſpiritual, increaſing his worldly ſubſtance, bleſſing his poſterity, granting him larger meaſures of grace, indulging him with his gracious preſence, and giving him peace of mind which paſſeth all underſtanding; or in the world to come; not as a reward of debt, but of grace; ſee Eccl. xi. 1, 2. Matt. x. 42. and xxv. 35.

℣. 18. Chaſten thy ſon while there is hope, &c.] Of guiding and keeping him in the right way, as long as corrections are or can be hoped to be of uſe; whilſt in a ſtate of infancy, childhood, and youth; whilſt under parental government; and before habits in ſin are grown ſtrong, and the caſe become deſperate, and he is hardened, and proof againſt all inſtruction and diſcipline. And let not thy ſoul ſpare for his crying; the noiſe he makes, the tears he ſheds, the intreaties he uſes to keep off the rod; let not a fooliſh pity and tenderneſs prevail to lay it aſide on that account, the conſequence of which may be bad to parent and child; ſee chap. xiii. 24. and xxiii. 13, 14. The Targum is, "but "unto his death, do not lift up thy ſoul;" or to the ſlaying of him [t], as the Vulgate Latin verſion; and this ſenſe Jarchi gives into: and then the meaning is, that though parents ſhould be careful to give due correction to their children, ſo long as there is hope of doing them good, yet not in a brutal and barbarous manner, to the endangering of their lives; as ſome parents are too indolent, mild and gentle, as Eli was; others are too wrathful and furious, and uſe no moderation in their corrections, but unmercifully beat their children; ſuch extremes ought to be avoided. Gerſom interprets the word of crying, as we do.

℣. 19. A man of great wrath ſhall ſuffer puniſhment, &c.] Either a child that is of a wrathful diſpoſition, and provokes his parent to wrath; or a parent that chaſtiſes his child in wrath, each ſhall ſuffer for it; or any man that gives way to wrath and anger, and is continually quarrelling, he involves himſelf in trouble; and is puniſhed, as his offence requires, according to law, either in his perſon or eſtate. For if thou deliver him, yet thou muſt do it again; if he is got out of one broil, he will get into another quickly; if he is clear of one law-ſuit, another will be commenced againſt him in a ſhort time; if he is diſcharged and freed from a penalty he is juſtly ſubject to, it muſt be done again and again; he will fall into the ſame evil, and there is no end of appearing for him and ſerving him; a wrathful man brings himſelf into great trouble, as may be ſeen in Shimei, 2 Sam. xvi. 7. 1 Kings ii. 46.

℣. 20. Hear counſel, and receive inſtruction, &c.] Of parents, maſters, and miniſters; eſpecially the counſel and inſtruction of wiſdom, of Jeſus Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, the wonderful Counſellor; and of his goſpel and of the ſcriptures, which are able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation. That thou mayeſt be wiſe in thy latter end; in the latter end of life, at death; that then it may appear, a man has been ſo wiſe as to be concerned for a future ſtate, for the good of his ſoul in another world; by liſtening to the counſel and inſtruction of Chriſt, in his word; by looking to him, and believing in him, for life and ſalvation; by leaning and living upon him; and committing the affairs of his ſoul, and the ſalvation of it, to him.

℣. 21. There are many devices in a man's heart, &c.] Some about civil things; to get wealth and riches; to obtain honour and glory among men; to attain to a long life, and to perpetuate their memories after death: ſome about ſinful things; to gratify their carnal luſts and ſenſual appetites; and to do miſchief to others, particularly the people of God, and the cauſe and intereſt of Chriſt: ſome about religious things; coining new doctrines, deviſing new ordinances and modes of worſhip; contriving other methods of ſalvation than by Chriſt; as by the light of nature; by the law of Moſes; by mere morality, civility, and external juſtice between man and man; by keeping to the religion they were born and brought up in; and by a mere outward profeſſion of religion, and ſubmiſſion to ordinances, and performance of duties, and a multitude more of the like kind. Nevertheleſs the counſel of the Lord, that ſhall ſtand; and can never be fruſtrated by the devices of man's heart, though they are many, and that but one; ſee Pſal. xxxiii. 10, 11. Iſa. xlvi. 10. This may be applied to the goſpel, and the ſcheme of ſalvation in it, called the whole counſel of God, Acts xx. 27. it being the fruit of infinite wiſdom, and the effect of a divine council between the eternal Three, and full of the beſt advice and inſtructions to the ſons of men; and which has ſtood, and ſhall ſtand, notwithſtanding the perſecutions of wicked men, the craft of falſe teachers, and the ridicule of a profane world; it will continue till all the elect are gathered in, even to the end of the world; and ſo will the ordinances of it, which are alſo called the counſel of God, Luke vii. 30. and which will continue till the ſecond coming of Chriſt. Moreover, the purpoſes of God, his counſels of old, or his eternal decrees, may be here meant; which are wiſely formed in his own breaſt, and are infruſtrable; and, according to which counſel of his will, all things are done in nature, providence and grace; all things in this world are ordered as he pleaſes, and all things are done as he has ordered them; all his purpoſes are or will be fulfilled; his deſigns will be accompliſhed in the world and in his church, maugre all the ſchemes, contrivances, and oppoſition of men and devils.

℣. 22. The deſire of a man is his kindneſs, &c.] Either the grace and kindneſs of God, which is deſirable by every ſenſible man, as being moſt excellent, and better than life and any thing in it; or it is his deſire to ſhew kindneſs. A good man is deſirous of riches, that he might have it in the power of his hands to do good to others; and a beneficent man, who has it in his power, is deſirous of an opportunity of ſhewing kindneſs to his fellow-creatures and friends: and ſuch a diſpoſition and conduct render a man very deſirable and amiable; it is the beauty of a man, as Ben Melech; yea, a man that is not able to do a kindneſs to another, yet has a deſire to do it, his good-will is his kindneſs, and the will is taken for the deed. Gerſom takes the word in the ſenſe of reproach, as it is ſometimes uſed; and underſtands it of the ſinful deſires of the heart, the imaginations of the thoughts of the heart, which are evil continually, and ſo matter of reproach. And a poor man is better than a liar; who is a rich man, as the Septuagint and Syriac verſions add; who denies that he has ability to relieve the poor, when he has; or promiſes to do it, and does it not; ſuch men of high degree are a lie indeed! and the poor man, whom he ſhould relieve, is a better man than he; or that would relieve another, but it is not in his power to do it.

℣. 23. The fear of the Lord tendeth to life, &c.] Godlineſs, of which the fear of the Lord is a principal part, has the promiſe of this life and that to come: the fear of God is the beginning of a ſpiritual life; and it leads to eternal life, as Gerſom obſerves, and is connected with it. And he that hath it ſhall abide ſatisfied; with his lot and portion in this life; with the good things of it he has, being content therewith; and godlineſs with contentment is great gain: ſuch a man has enough; he has all things in a ſpiritual ſenſe; he is full of the bleſſings of goodneſs; he is bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings; his mouth is ſatisfied, and his mind is filled with good things; and ſo he reſts and abides night after night, and day after day. He ſhall not be viſited with evil; nothing ſhall hurt him; all his afflictions, his worſt things, his evil ones, work together for his good; and they ſhall never ſeparate from the love of God, nor any thing that befals him in this life, Rom. viii. 28, 38, 39. ſee Pſal. xci. 10.

℣. 24. A ſlothful man hideth his hand in his boſom, &c.] In cold weather to keep it warm, and at other times, as unwilling to uſe it in labour; it is the proper poſture and juſt attitude of a ſlothful man. The word for boſom, is ſometimes uſed for a pot or platter[u]; and then the ſenſe is, that he puts his hands under a pot over a fire to warm them; or in one removed at ſome diſtance from the fire, as Jarchi; or rather, it may ſignify his putting his hand into a plate of food, and yet ſo ſlothful, as it follows, And will not ſo much as bring it to his mouth again; ſo ſluggiſh, that he will rather ſtarve than be at the pains to feed himſelf; he will not take his hand out of his boſom, to take food out of the diſh to feed himſelf with; and even when his hand is in the diſh, he will not take it from thence again, and lift it to his mouth; an hyperbolical expreſſion. Guſſetius[w] thinks, it may have reſpect to ſuch ſlothful men, who are careleſs and negligent of their ſouls; who, though they have the holy ſcriptures in their hands, like a veſſel full of wholſome food for the ſoul, yet will not make uſe of the leaſt mite out of them, that they may receive eternal life.

℣. 25. Smite a ſcorner, and the ſimple will beware, &c.] That is, give reproof to a man that ſcoffs at religion, and makes a jeſt of all that is good; for though it may be of no uſe to him who will deſpiſe it; yet it may be obſerved, and be uſeful to another that hears it; who, though void of underſtanding, yet not hardened in impiety as the other, but open to conviction, will become cunning[x], as it may be rendered; or learns wiſdom, and becomes hereby a knowing and underſtanding man; he hears another reproved, and fears, and becomes a wiſe man; ſo that though reproof may be loſt on one, it ſucceeds in another, which is an encouragement to give it. And reprove one that hath underſtanding, and he will underſtand knowledge; he will grow wiſer and wiſer; he will improve in the knowledge of things; ſee chap. ix. 8.

℣. 26. He that waſteth his father, &c.] His father's ſubſtance, which he gave him firſt as his portion, and afterwards by paying his debts, and getting him out of priſon and out of broils; and that waſtes his ſpirits and his health, and brings his grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave. And chaſeth away his mother; alienates her affections from him, who once had too great a fondneſs for him; cauſes her to quit her houſe, not being able to bear the ſight of him and of his actions: Is a ſon that cauſeth ſhame, and bringeth reproach; cauſes ſhame to his parents, as well as to himſelf; and a reproach upon them, as well as on his own character. It may be read thus, "a ſon that cauſeth ſhame and bringeth "reproach, waſteth his father, and chaſeth away his "mother[y]."

℣. 27. Ceaſe, my ſon, to hear the inſtruction, &c.] The counſel of bad men, or the doctrine of falſe teachers. The words are ſpoken, either by Solomon to his ſon; or by wiſdom, that is, Chriſt, to every one of his children, to beware of falſe prophets, and take heed what they hear; ſee Matth. vii. 15. Mark iv. 24. ſuch as the doctrines of the church of Rome; concerning the ſcriptures, forbidding the people to read them; ſetting unwritten traditions upon a level with them, and making the pope an infallible interpreter of them; concerning merit, works of ſupererogation, indulgences, pardons, penance, purgatory, &c. ſuch as the inſtruction of the Arians, Sabellians, Socinians, Pelagians and Arminians, concerning the Trinity, the deity of Chriſt, his ſatisfaction, imputed righteouſneſs, the power and purity of human nature, and man's free-will. That cauſeth to err from the words of knowledge; the words of the living God, the ſcriptures of truth; which communicate knowledge, and are profitable for inſtruction in righteouſneſs; are the means of the true knowledge of God; that there is one, and that he is poſſeſſed of all perfections; particularly that he is gracious and merciful, and pardons all manner of ſin; that he is in Chriſt, the God of all grace; that he is the God and Father of Chriſt, and the covenant-God and Father of all his people in him; they give knowledge of his mind and will concerning the ſalvation of men, and of his ways and worſhip. The wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus, the ſalutary doctrines of the goſpel, may be here meant; thoſe words of grace, wiſdom and knowledge, which come from him, and give knowledge of his perſon, offices, relations, incarnation, and bleſſings of grace by him; from whence they are called the word of peace and reconciliation, the word of righteouſneſs, the word of life, and the word of ſalvation. Now theſe are all words of knowledge; and are the means of a ſpiritual, experimental, and fiducial knowledge of Chriſt, which is preferable to all other knowledge, and even to every thing in the world; and therefore care ſhould be taken, and every thing avoided, that tends to cauſe to err from theſe words and doctrines, which convey, promote, and improve this knowledge. Jarchi and Aben Ezra tranſpoſe the words, thus; "Ceaſe, my ſon, to err from the words of knowledge, to or that thou mayeſt hear inſtruction;" and the latter makes mention of ſuch an interpretation, "ceaſe, my ſon, from the words of knowledge, if thou wouldeſt hear inſtruction, and after that err;" that is, better never hear and know at all, than to turn from thoſe doctrines and inſtructions; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21.

℣. 28. An ungodly witneſs ſcorneth judgment, &c.] Or, a witneſs of Belial [z]. A falſe witneſs is not awed by the place of judgment where he is; nor by the judge before whom he is; nor by the law, the rule of judgment, nor by the puniſhment of perjury; he ſcorns all theſe, and ſcoffs at them, and proceeds in bearing a falſe teſtimony: or he covers that which is right and juſt, and eludes judgment by ſpecious and ſophiſtic arguments and pretences. Or this may be underſtood of a falſe teacher, that ſcorns the rule of judgment, or colours over things, to make them plauſible, and ſeem to be agreeable to it. And the mouth of the wicked devoureth iniquity; greedily, and with pleaſure commits it; as a hungry man takes in his food; or a thirſty man drinks down water: and in like manner are falſe doctrines imbibed by men of perverſe minds.

℣. 29. Judgments are prepared for ſcorners, &c.] Either by the civil magiſtrate, or by the Lord, and indeed by both; and if they miſs the one, they will certainly meet the other; though they mock at preſent puniſhment and a future judgment, yet everlaſting fire is prepared for them, Matt. xxv. 41. And ſtripes for the back of fools; as ſcorners are; which ſhall be inflicted on them ſooner or later; if they are not ſtricken with the ſtripes of men, they ſhall endure the ſtrokes of divine juſtice and vengeance hereafter.

CHAP. XX.

℣. 1. WINE is a mocker, ſtrong drink is raging, &c.] Wine deceives a man; it not only overcomes him before he is aware, but it promiſes him a pleaſure which it does not give; but, on the contrary, exceſſive drinking gives him pain, and ſo mocks him; yea, it expoſes him to reproach and diſgrace, and to the mockery and deriſion of others; as well as it ſets him to ſcoff at his companions, and even to mock at religion, and all that is good and ſerious; ſee Hoſea vii. 5. and ſtrong drink not only diſturbs the brain, and puts the ſpirits in a ferment, ſo that a man rages within, but it ſets him a raving and quarrelling with his company, and every body he meets with; ſuch generally get into broils and contentions, and get wo, ſorrow and wounds, chap. xxiii. 29, 30. Aben Ezra gives this as the ſenſe of the words, "a man of wine," (i. e. one that is given to wine, a wine-bibber) ſo Ben Melech, "is a mocker, and he cries out for ſtrong drink, that it may be given him;" which is no bad ſenſe of the words. And whoſoever is deceived thereby, is not wiſe; whoſoever gives himſelf to it, is not on his guard againſt it, but is overcome by it, does not act a wiſe but an unwiſe part; wine beſots as well as deceives men. This may be applied to the wine of fornication, or to the falſe doctrine and ſuperſtition of the church of Rome; with which the nations of the earth are deceived and made drunk, and which puts them upon blaſpheming God, deriding his people, and uſing cruelty to them, Rev. xvii. 2, 3, 6. and xviii. 3, 23.

℣. 2. The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion, &c.] The wrath and diſpleaſure of a king, which cauſes fear; ſee chap. xix. 12. kings ſhould be terrors to evil works and workers, though not to good ones, Rom. xiii. 3. This is true of the King of kings, who one day will be terrible to the drunkards, the mockers, and murderers of his people, before ſpoken of. Whoſo provoketh him to anger, ſinneth againſt his own ſoul; he expoſes his life to danger: the Targum ſupplies it as we do. It may be rendered, his ſoul ſinneth [a]; he is guilty of ſin, as well as is in danger of puniſhment; ſee chap. viii. 36.

℣. 3. It is an honour for a man to ceaſe from ſtrife, &c.] As Abraham did, Gen. xiii. 7, 8. when engaged in a quarrel with his neighbour, or in a law-ſuit, or in a religious controverſy, eſpecially when he finds he is in the wrong; and indeed if he is in the right, when he perceives it is like to iſſue in no good, and is only about words to no profit, it is an honour to drop it. But every fool will be meddling; with things he has no concern in, or is not equal to; yet will carry on the debate, though it is to his diſgrace; ſee chap. xvii. 14.

℣. 4. The ſluggard will not plow by reaſon of the cold, &c.] Or, in the cold; in the time of cold, as Aben Ezra; in the time of autumn, which is the time of plowing, when it begins to be cold weather, and winter is drawing on: and this is diſcouraging to the ſluggard, who does not care to take his hands out of his boſom to feed himſelf, and much leſs to plow; ſee chap. xix. 24. Therefore ſhall be beg in harveſt, and have nothing; he ſhall aſk of thoſe who have plowed and ſowed, and are now reaping and gathering in their increaſe at harveſt-time; but they ſhall give him nothing; for ſuch as will not work, ſhould not eat; and if a man will not plow and ſow, he cannot expect to reap, nor ſhould he be encouraged in begging. This holds good in ſpiritual things; ſuch who have been ſlothful and ſluggiſh about their ſpiritual affairs, unconcerned for the grace of God, and indolent in the uſe of means or performance of duty, will aſk when too late, or of wrong perſons, and ſhall not have it; as the fooliſh virgins aſk oil of the wiſe, when the bridegroom is come; and the rich man water of Abraham, when in hell, Matt. xxv. 8. Luke xvi. 24.

[z] עד בליעל teſtis Belijahal, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Baynus.

℣. 5. Counſel in the heart of man is like deep water, &c.] Pure and undiſturbed, but ſecret, hidden, and hard to be come at: ſuch are the things of the ſpirit of a man, the thoughts of his mind, the devices of his heart; which, though eaſily known by the ſearcher of hearts, are not eaſily penetrated into by men; or it is not eaſily got out of them what is in them, eſpecially in ſome men, who are very cloſe and reſerved. This is true of wicked men, who ſeek deep to hide their counſel; and of good men, eſpecially ſtudious men, who have got a great deal of wiſdom and knowledge in them, but not very communicative, being ſlow of ſpeech, and ſilent in converſation. But a man of underſtanding will draw it out; he will find ways and means to diſcover the ſecret deſigns of wicked men, whether againſt church or ſtate; and by aſking proper queſtions, an underſtanding man will get out uſeful things from men of knowledge, the moſt reſerved: ſome men muſt be pumped, and a good deal of pains muſt be taken with them, to get out any thing of them, as in getting water out of a deep well, and which when got is very good; and ſo is that wiſdom and knowledge which is gotten by an inquiſitive man from another of ſuperior knowledge, but not very diffuſive of it.

℣. 6. Moſt men will proclaim every one his own goodneſs, &c.] As the Phariſee did, in Luke xviii. 11, 12. and as the Phariſees in common did; who did all their works to be ſeen of men, and made clean the outſide of the cup and platter; and were very careful to appear outwardly righteous to men, Matt. xxiii. 5, 25, 28. And indeed this is the general caſt of men; every one is proclaiming his goodneſs to others, and would be thought to be good men; and cannot be eaſy with doing a good action, unleſs it is known, and particularly acts of beneficence and alms-deeds; and are like the Phariſees, who on ſuch occaſions ſounded a trumpet before them, Matt. vi. 2. And the word may be rendered, his mercy[b], or his kindneſs to the poor: the Targum renders it, "many of the children of men "are called merciful men;" and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion; and they like to be ſo called and accounted, whether they are ſo or no. But a faithful man, who can find? who anſwers to the character he gives of himſelf, or others upon his own repreſentation give him; who is as good as his word, and, having promiſed aſſiſtance and relief, gives it; and who, having boaſted that he has done a kindneſs to ſuch an one and ſuch an one, does the ſame likewiſe to another when applied to; or who ſticks to his friend, and does not forſake him in his adverſity, but ſupports and ſupplies him whom he knew in proſperity; it is hard and rare to find ſuch a man; ſee Pſal. xii. 1. Or, though every man is talking of his good works, and boaſting of his goodneſs, it is difficult to find an Iſraelite indeed, in whom the true grace of God is.

℣. 7. The juſt man walketh in his integrity, &c.] This is the faithful and upright man, who is made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt; and walks by faith in him, and according to the truth of the goſpel. His children are bleſſed after him; with temporal bleſſings; and walking in the ſame integrity as he does, they are bleſſed with ſpiritual bleſſings here, and eternal bleſſedneſs hereafter; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 26. It is an obſervation of an heathen poet[c], that good things befal the children of the godly, but not the children of the ungodly.

℣. 8. A king that ſitteth in the throne of judgment, &c.] That executes judgment himſelf, as David and Solomon did; who aſcends the throne, and ſits perſonally there, and hears and tries cauſes himſelf, and not by his ſervants: Scattereth away all evil with his eyes; all evil men, as the Targum; every one that is evil, as Aben Ezra: he will eaſily and quickly diſcern who is evil, or who is in a bad cauſe before him, and will paſs ſentence on him, and drive him away from him with ſhame and diſgrace, and to receive deſerved puniſhment; or he will terrify perſons from coming before him with falſe witneſs againſt their neighbour, or with a wrong cauſe. This may be applied to Chriſt, the King of kings, and Judge of all; whoſe eyes are as a flame of fire; who will clearly ſee into all hearts and actions, when he ſhall ſit on his throne of judgment; and ſhall paſs the righteous and definitive ſentence, and ſhall drive the wicked into hell, into everlaſting puniſhment.

℣. 9. Who can ſay, I have made my heart clean? &c.] The heart of man is naturally unclean, the mind, conſcience, underſtanding, will and affections; there is no part clean, all are defiled with ſin; and though there is ſuch a thing as a pure or clean heart, yet not as made ſo by men; it is God that has made the heart, that can only make it clean, or create a clean heart in men; it is not to be done by themſelves, or by any thing that they can do; it is done only by the grace of God, and blood of Chriſt: God has promiſed to do it, and he does it; and to him, and to him only, is it to be aſcribed. I am pure from my ſin? the ſin of nature or of action: ſuch indeed who are waſhed from their ſins in the blood of Chriſt; whoſe ſins are all pardoned for his ſake, and who are juſtified from all things by his righteouſneſs; they are pure from ſin, none is to be ſeen in them, or found upon them in a law-ſenſe: they are all fair and comely, and without fault in the ſight of God; their iniquities are cauſed to paſs from them; and they are cloathed with fine linen, clean and white, the righteouſneſs of the ſaints: but then none are pure from indwelling ſin, nor from the commiſſion of ſin; no man can ſay this, any more than the former; if he does, he is an ignorant man, and does not know the plague of his heart; and he is a vain, phariſaical man; yea, a man that does not ſpeak the truth, nor is the truth in him, 1 John i. 8.

℣. 10. Divers weights, and divers meaſures, &c.] Or, a ſtone and a ſtone, and an ephah and an ephah[d]. Stones being in old time uſed in weighing, and an ephah was a common meaſure among the Jews; and theſe ought not to be different; one ſtone or weight for buying, and another for ſelling; and one meaſure to buy goods in with, and another to ſell out with; the one too heavy, the other too light; the one too large, and the other too ſcanty; whereby juſtice is not done between man and man; whereas they ought to be juſt and equal, Lev. xix. 35, 36. Both of them are alike abomination to the Lord; who loves righteouſneſs and hates iniquity, and requires of men to do juſtly; and abhors every act of injuſtice, and whatever is detrimental to mens properties; ſee chap. xi. 1. and xvi. 11.

[d] So Montanus, Schultens.

℣. 11. Even a child is known by his doings, &c.] As well as a man; ye ſhall know them by their fruits, Matt. 7. 16. profeſſors and profane. So a child ſoon diſcovers its genius by its actions; it ſoon ſhews its inclination and diſpoſition; and ſome ſhrewd gueſſes may be made how it will turn out, a wiſe man or a fool, a virtuous or a vicious man; tho' this does not always hold good, yet ſomething may be obſerved, which may be a direction to parents in the education of their children, and placing them out to what is proper and ſuitable for them. Some obſerve, that the word has a quite contrary meaning, that a child carries himſelf a ſtranger by his doings[e]; ſo that he is not known by them: he ſo conceals and diſguiſes himſelf, he acts ſo fraudulently and deceitfully, and plays the hypocrite, and puts the cheat on men, that they cannot tell what he is, nor what he will be; and if children can thus diſſemble, as not to be known by their actions, then much more grown perſons. Whether his work be pure, and whether it be right; not what his preſent work is, or actions are, but what his after-life and converſation will be; which in ſome meaſure may be judged of, though not with certainty and exactneſs; ſee chap. xxii. 6. eſpecially when he acts a covert and deceitful part.

℣. 12. The bearing ear, and the ſeeing eye, &c.] There may be an ear that hears not, and an eye that ſeeth not, and which men may make; the painter can paint an ear and an eye, and a carver can carve both; but they are ears that hear not, and eyes that ſee not, Pſal. cxv. 5, 6. but ſuch as can hear and ſee are of the Lord's own make. The Lord hath made even both of them; they are the effects of his wiſdom, power, and goodneſs; ſee Exod. iv. 11. Pſal. xciv. 7, 8. they are both ſenſes of excellent uſe and ſervice; great mercies and bleſſings of life, for which men ſhould be abundantly thankful, and pray for the continuance of, and make uſe of to the beſt purpoſes; they are means of conveying much knowledge to the mind, and by which it may be cultivated and improved in it. The words may be conſidered in a figurative as well as a literal ſenſe. Some by the ſeeing eye, underſtand the civil magiſtrate, who is that to the body politic as the eyes are to the natural body, eminent in it, overlook it, watch and provide for its good, and againſt its hurt; ſee Numb. x. 31. Job xxix. 14—16. and by the bearing ear, the obedient ſubject, that hearkens to the laws and directions of his governors, and chearfully obeys them, and both theſe are of the Lord's making; civil magiſtracy is his ordinance, and civil magiſtrates are ordained by him; and from him they have their qualifications fitting them for their office; and it is owing to the overruling providence of God on the hearts of men that they are inclined to yield ſubjection to them. Others think that by the ſeeing eye, are meant the miniſters of the word, who are ſet in the higheſt place in the church; whoſe buſineſs it is to inſpect, take the overſight of, and watch the ſouls of men; to pry and ſearch into the truths of the goſpel, and ſhew them to others: and by the bearing ear, the hearers of the word, that receive it readily in the love of it, and heartily obey it. I am rather of opinion that one and the ſame ſort of perſons are intended; converted ones, who have the bearing ear, who try what they hear by the word of God; underſtand what they hear, know it experimentally; can diſtinguiſh truth from error, approve and love the goſpel, receive it with all gladneſs and readineſs, with eagerneſs and pleaſure; keep it when they have it, and practiſe what they hear, and bring forth fruit to the glory of God: this they have not of themſelves, being naturally averſe to and dull of hearing, and even ſtop their ears to the truth; but it comes by the word, and is the Lord's work, and owing to his mighty power, who opens their ears, gives them new ears, which they have in regeneration; when they hear ſpiritually, profitably, pleaſantly, comfortably, and to their great aſtoniſhment: theſe alſo have the ſeeing eye, a ſight of themſelves, their ſinful and loſt eſtate; of the plague of their own hearts, their want of righteouſneſs, and impotence to do any thing that is good; a ſight of Chriſt, of the lovelineſs of his perſon, of the fulneſs of his grace, of their need of him, and of his ſuitableneſs as a Saviour and Redeemer; and this is not of themſelves, who are dark and darkneſs itſelf, but they are made light in the Lord; he opens their eyes by his Spirit and by means of his word, which is a work of almighty power.

℣. 13. Love not ſleep, leſt thou come to poverty, &c.] Sleep is a very great natural bleſſing; it is a gift of God, what nature requires, and is deſirable; it is to be loved, though not immoderately; it is ſweet to a man, and what he ſhould be thankful for; yet ſhould not indulge himſelf in to the neglect of the proper buſineſs of life; nor to be uſed but at the proper time for it; for the eye is made for ſight and not for ſleep only, as Aben Ezra obſerves, connecting the words with the preceding; and therefore ſhould not be kept ſhut and inattentive to buſineſs, which muſt neceſſarily end in poverty and want; ſee chap. vi. 9—11. and ſo ſpiritual ſleep and ſlothfulneſs bring on a ſpiritual poverty in the ſouls of men, both as to the exerciſe of grace and the performance of duty. Open thine eyes, and thou ſhalt be ſatisfied with bread; that is, open thine eyes from ſleep, awake and keep ſo, and be ſedulous and induſtrious in the buſineſs of thy calling, ſo ſhalt thou have a ſufficiency of food for thyſelf and family; ſee chap. xii. 11. It may be applied to awaking out of ſleep in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and to a diligent attendance to duty and the uſe of means, whereby the ſouls of men come to be ſatisfied with the goodneſs of the Lord, and the fatneſs of his houſe; ſee Eph. v. 14. Pſal. lxv. 4.

℣. 14. It is naught, it is naught, ſaith the buyer, &c.] When he comes to the ſhop of the ſeller, or to market to buy goods, he undervalues them, ſays they are not ſo good as they ſhould be, nor ſo cheap as he can buy them at. But when he is gone his way, then he boaſteth; after he has brought the ſeller to as low a price as he can, and has bought the goods, and gone away with them, and got home among his friends; then he boaſts what a bargain he has bought, how good the commodity is, how he has been too many for the ſeller, and has outwitted him; and ſo glories in his frauds and tricks, and rejoices in his boaſting, and all ſuch rejoicing is evil, James iv. 16. Jarchi applies this to a man that is a hard ſtudent in the law, and through much difficulty gets the knowledge of it, when he is ready to pronounce himſelf unhappy; but when he is got full fraught with wiſdom, then he rejoices at it and glories in it.

℣. 15. There is gold, and a multitude of rubies, &c.] A man may have a large quantity of either, or of both of them, as ſome men have; for there is much of them in the world, not only in mines and quarries, but in the houſes and cabinets of men. But the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel; knowledge even of things natural, and a gift of elocution to expreſs it by, are a rare jewel, and much more precious than gold and rubies, than a multitude of them; theſe are not to be mentioned with it, it is not equalled by them, it is greatly ſuperior to them; ſee Job xxviii. 12—19. and much more ſpiritual knowledge, and a capacity of expreſſing that to the edification of others; and eſpecially Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and the knowledge of him, who is more precious than rubies, and all deſirable things; in compariſon of which all things are loſs and dung, chap. iii. 14, 15. Phil. iii. 8.

℣. 16. Take his garment that is ſurety for a ſtranger, &c.] Which a man is cautioned againſt, chap. vi. 1. but if a man will be ſo weak and fooliſh, others ought to take care of him, and be cautious how they truſt him; for he is in danger of being ruined by his ſuretiſhip, and therefore nothing ſhould be lent him without a pledge, without a proper ſecurity; for though it was not lawful to take the garment of a poor man for a pledge, at leaſt it was not to be kept after ſun-ſet, Exod. xxii. 26. yet it was right to take ſuch a man's garment who had or would be thought to have ſuch an abundance as to be ſurety for a ſtranger. Some think theſe words are to be taken as a prophecy of what would be the caſe of ſuch a man that is a ſurety for a ſtranger; in the iſſue he will be ſtripped of all he has, and have not a coat to put on. It has been applied to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who became a ſurety for ſuch who were foreigners and ſtrangers, and aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael; and who had the garment of his human nature taken from him, and which was a pledge and ranſom for the ſins of his people. And take a pledge of him for a ſtrange woman; an harlot; ſuch as have to do with lewd women are not to be truſted; for they are in a fair way for ruin, and therefore ſhould not be intruſted with any thing without a pledge; all in connection with ſuch creatures loſe their credit; it is dangerous having any concern with them in trade, for they are liable to be brought to a piece of bread; and therefore perſons ſhould be cautious how they trade with them, and ſhould obſerve to ſecure themſelves.

℣. 17. Bread of deceit is ſweet to a man, &c.] Which may be underſtood of ſin in general, which is bread to the ſinner, he eats it; it is called the bread of wickedneſs, chap. iv. 17. but it is but poor bread, no other than aſhes, Iſa. xliv. 20. it is bread of deceit; there is a deceitfulneſs in all ſin; it is in appearance fair and pleaſant to the eye, like the fruit our firſt parents eat of; or like the apples of Sodom, of which it is reported, that they are very beautiful to look at, but when touched drop into aſhes; ſin promiſes pleaſure, profit, honour, liberty, peace, and impunity, yet gives neither; but the reverſe, pain, loſs, ſhame, ſervitude, diſtreſs and deſtruction; and yet it is ſweet to an unregenerate man, one of a vicious taſte, or whoſe taſte remains unchanged; it is natural to him, and he takes as much delight in it as in eating and drinking; and eſpecially ſuch ſins as are called conſtitution-ones, which he is not eaſily prevailed upon to part with; wickedneſs is ſweet in his mouth, he rolls it and keeps it as a ſweet morſel under his tongue, and forſakes it not, Job xx. 12—14. It may be applied to particular ſins, as to adultery, as it is by Jarchi, and with which may be compared chap. ix. 17. and to riches unlawfully gotten; ſee Job xx. 15, 16. and to the cruel uſage and perſecution of the people of God, called the bread of wickedneſs and wine of violence, which wicked men take as much delight in as in eating and drinking, chap. iv. 17. Pſal. xiv. 4 particularly the cruelty of the church of Rome, who has made herſelf drunk with the blood of the ſaints, in which ſhe delights, and will be bitter to her in the end, Rev. xvii. 6. and xvi. 6. and xviii. 7, 8. It may be interpreted of falſe doctrine; ſo the doctrine of the Phariſees and Sadducees is ſignified by leavened bread, Matt. xvi. 6, 12 this is not true bread, does not ſtrengthen, nouriſh, and refreſh, as the goſpel does, but eats as a canker; it is not ſolid and ſubſtantial, but mere chaff, it is bread of falſhood and lying; falſe teachers lie in wait to deceive, their doctrines are lies in hypocriſy, and yet theſe are ſweet unto, and taken down greedily by carnal perſons; particularly the doctrine of juſtification by works: this is the bread ſome men live on, but it is only huſks which ſwine eat; it is feeding on wind, and filling the belly with eaſt wind, which ſwells and vainly puffs up the fleſhly mind; it is contrary to the goſpel, and is not of the truth, and will deceive perſons that truſt to it; and yet it is ſweet to a natural man; his own righteouſneſs, and to truſt to it is natural to him; it is his own, and what he has laboured for and is fond of; it affords room for boaſting, and he does not care to part with it. But afterwards his mouth ſhall be filled with gravel; with that which will be ungrateful, uncomfortable, and diſtreſſing to him; the conſcience of a ſinner, who has been taking his fill of ſin and pleaſure in it, ſhall be filled with remorſe and diſtreſs; and with bitter reflections upon himſelf; with a dreadful ſenſe of divine wrath, and fearful apprehenſions of it now; and deſtruction and damnation will be his portion hereafter; and this will be the conſequence of all falſe doctrine, and of a man's truſting to his own righteouſneſs and deſpiſing Chriſt's; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 1. Matt. xxii. 12, 13.

℣. 18. Every purpoſe is eſtabliſhed by counſel, &c.] Or the thoughts[f] of a man, every one of them, what he has thought to do, formed a ſcheme of in his mind, and reſolved upon, by taking advice of his friends, and eſpecially by aſking counſel of God, who gives wiſdom liberally, and upbraids not; he is confirmed in his good deſigns; and he chearfully purſues them, and they are ordered and directed to the glory of God, his own good, and the good of others; for this can only be underſtood of wiſe and good thoughts and purpoſes. And with good advice make war; this ſhould not be entered upon raſhly, without firſt conſidering whether there is a juſt and lawful cauſe of it; and without conſulting the neceſſary charge and expence of it; whether there is a ſufficiency of men and money to carry it on; and what may probably be the iſſue of it. It is right in a king to adviſe with his privy council, or with the chief council of the nation; but above all, both he and his people ſhould ſeek advice of the Lord on ſuch an occaſion; ſee Luke xiv. 31, 32. This may be applied to our ſpiritual warfare with ſin, Satan, and the world; not that it ſhould be any doubt with us whether we ſhould engage in ſuch a war; but we ſhould adviſe with experienced ſoldiers, and eſpecially with God and his word, what weapons to take, and how to uſe them; and conſider in whoſe name and ſtrength we are to fight; and enquire and learn the force, methods, and deſigns of the enemy, and where to guard againſt them or attack them. Jarchi interprets it of making war with Satan by repentance, prayer, and faſting.

℣. 19. He that goeth about as a tale-bearer revealeth ſecrets, &c.] Or he that revealeth ſecrets goeth about as a tale-bearer; a man that has really got the ſecrets of others out of them reſpecting themſelves and families, and the affairs of them, or however pretends he is maſter of them; goes about telling his tales from houſe to houſe to the great prejudice of thoſe whoſe ſecrets he is intruſted with, or pretends to be; and to the great prejudice of thoſe to whom he tells them, as well as to his own; this is contrary to the law of Moſes, and the rules of chriſtianity, Lev. xix. 16. 1 Tim. v. 13. Therefore meddle not with him that flattereth with his lips; or mingle not with him [g]; do not aſſociate with him, do not keep him company, have nothing to ſay to him or do with him; for when he flatters you, and highly praiſes and extols you, he has a deſign upon you to get what he can out of you, in order to expoſe you elſewhere; therefore ſuſpect him, be upon your guard, ſhun him and avoid him. It may be applied to falſe teachers, and their deceptions with good words and fair ſpeeches; the word uſed ſignifies to deceive with the lips; ſee Rom. xvi. 18. and well agrees with the paraſites of Rome, Rev. xviii. 23.

℣. 20. Whoſo curſeth his father or his mother, &c.] This is dreadful indeed! a perſon muſt be got to a great pitch of wickedneſs to do this; to curſe his parents, one or other of them, that have been the inſtruments of his being, and by whom he has been brought up and put out into the world; to ſlight them, deſpiſe them, and mock at them, is highly baſe and criminal, but to curſe them is ſhocking! what can ſuch expect but the curſe of God upon them? His lamp ſhall be put out in obſcure darkneſs; he ſhall be deprived of his natural ſight; ſee chap. xxx. 17. or the very light of nature ſhall be extinct in him; and indeed ſuch an one acts as if not guided by it, nor under its influence; or whatſoever favour from the Lord he has enjoyed, it ſhall be taken from him; his lamp or candle of outward felicity ſhall be quenched, and burn no longer; ſee Job xviii. 5. and xxii. 17. or his ſoul, the candle of the Lord, in him, ℣. 27. ſhall be removed; or he ſhall die, not only a corporal but an eternal death; ſee Exod. xxi. 17. blackneſs of darkneſs [h], as the words may be rendered, are reſerved for him in the world to come, and which will be his portion, Jude 13.

℣. 21. An inheritance may be gotten haſtily at the beginning, &c.] Of a man's ſetting out in the world in trade and buſineſs; and which ſometimes is got lawfully, and this muſt be excepted from this proverb; but generally what is got haſtily and in a ſhort time is got unlawfully, and ſo does not proſper. Some Jewiſh interpreters, as Gerſom, underſtand it of an inheritance which comes to perſons from their friends, without any labour or induſtry of theirs; and which they are not careful to keep, but as it lightly comes, it lightly goes: here is a various reading; our verſion follows the marginal reading, and which is followed by the Targum, Jarchi and Gerſom, and by the Septuagint, Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions; but the written text is, an inheritance loathſome or abominable; an ill gotten one, ſo the word is uſed in Zech. xi. 8. Schultens, from the uſe of the word in the Arabic language, which ſignifies to be covetous, renders it covetouſly got or poſſeſſed [i]; and ſo the Arabic verſion is, an inheritance greedily deſired, obtained through covetouſneſs and illicit practices; but in his late commentary on this book he renders the paſſage by the help of Arabiſm, an inheritance ſmitten with the curſe of ſordidneſs, as being ſordidly got and enjoyed. But the end thereof ſhall not be bleſſed; it will not continue, it will be taken away from them, and put into ſome other hands. Jarchi illuſtrates it by the tribes of Gad and Reuben making haſte to take their part on the other ſide Jordan before their brethren, and were the firſt that were carried captive.

℣. 22. Say not thou, I will recompenſe evil, &c.] With evil; do an injury to one that has done one to you; private revenge is not to be taken, but ſhould be left to God, to whom vengeance belongs, Deut. xxxii. 35, 41. But wait on the Lord, and he ſhall ſave thee; commit thyſelf and cauſe to God; leave it with him to avenge thy wrongs; wait upon him in the way of thy duty, and wait his own time to do thee juſtice; he will at the proper ſeaſon, and in his own way, ſave thee from thine enemy, and make a righteous retribution to him.

℣. 23. Divers weights are an abomination unto the Lord, &c.] As in ℣. 10. ſee the note there; which is here repeated for the farther confirmation of it, and that it might be taken notice of and avoided; and perhaps this ſin of uſing falſe weights and meaſures was common with the Jews. And a falſe balance is not good; in the ſight of God; but an abomination, as in chap. xi. 1. nor is it good for men in the iſſue; for though they may gain by it at preſent, it will prove a loſs to them in the end, ſince it will bring a curſe on all they get.

℣. 24. Man's goings are of the Lord, &c.] In a natural and literal ſenſe, the inſtruments of going are of the Lord; the act of motion from place to place is not without the concourſe of his providence; as in him we live, and move, and have our being, ſo in and by him we move; he preſerves our going out and coming in; and as the preſervation, ſo the ſucceſs and proſperity of journeying are owing to his providence, and the whole is under his care and direction: and ſo likewiſe in a civil ſenſe, all the civil concerns, buſineſs, and actions of life are guided by his providence; there is a time for every purpoſe under heaven, and the ſucceſs of all depends on a divine bleſſing; and things are with every man in civil life according to the providence of God, and as it is his pleaſure they ſhould be; and it is by him they are directed to take this and the other ſtep, the iſſue of which is according to his will: and this may be applied to mens goings in a ſpiritual and religious ſenſe; faith, which is properly a man's going to Chriſt as a periſhing ſinner for pardon and cleanſing, for righteouſneſs and life, for food and reſt, and for eternal ſalvation, is not of a man's ſelf, it is of God; it is his gift, and of his operation; no man can go to Chriſt in this way unleſs it be given him of God, or he is drawn by his grace, John vi. 35, 37, 44, 65. and all ſpiritual actions which flow from hence are by the grace of God, and under his influence and direction; as walking in the path of truth, it is the Lord that teaches it, cauſes to chooſe it, leads into it, and preſerves there; walking in the ſtatutes and ordinances of the Lord, and in the ways of righteouſneſs and holineſs, is of him, and owing to his Spirit he puts within his people; and indeed all good works done by them, which may be called their goings, he has fore-ordained that they ſhould walk in them; it is by the grace of God, and in the ſtrength of Chriſt, and with the aſſiſtance of the bleſſed Spirit, they walk on in them; and their perſeverance in faith and holineſs, or their going from ſtrength to ſtrength, is all of the Lord. How can a man then underſtand his own way? even of a journey in a literal ſenſe, what will be the iſſue and event of it, when or whether ever he ſhall return to his own houſe again, ſince all is under the direction and providence of God; and alſo of his civil affairs, he knows his beginning, and how he goes on for the preſent, but what will be the end he knows not; and a natural and unregenerate man knows not what way he is in, where he is going, and what his laſt end will be; being in darkneſs, in which he was born, brought up, and continues, he does not rightly underſtand what is his duty, what he ſhould do, what is the good and perfect will of God, what the way is in which he ſhould go, and which is for his good; nor the way everlaſting, which leads to eternal life, few find this way. Or it may be underſtood of the way of the Lord, how can a man then underſtand his way? the Lord's way, not man's; the way of the Lord in providence, which is as the deep, and unſearchable; and the way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt, which is of the Lord's deviſing and reſolving on; this way of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life, is not known by the natural man; and when it is externally revealed in the word, and by the outward miniſtry of it; it is not underſtood ſo as to be approved of, but is deſpiſed, unleſs God gives an heart to know it, or a ſpiritual and experimental underſtanding of it.

℣. 25. It is a ſnare to the man who devoureth that which is holy, &c.] Which is ſeparated to ſacred uſes, is devoted to the Lord, as firſt-fruits, tithes, offerings, &c. which if a man converts to his own uſe is ſacrilege, and this is a ſin and a ſnare, and brings ruin on him; ſee Mal. iii. 8, 9. And after voweth to make enquiry; that is a ſin and a ſnare alſo; a man ſhould firſt enquire before he vows, whether it is right for him to make a vow, and whether he is able to keep it; it is too late after the vow is made to enquire about the lawfulneſs or expedience of it, and how to find out ways and means to diſſolve it and be clear of it; for it is better not to vow, than to vow and not pay, Eccl. v. 4, 5. when a thing is in a man's own hands, he may do what he will; but when he has devoted it to another uſe, it is no longer in his power; as the caſe of Ananias and Sapphira ſhews, Acts v. 1—4.

℣. 26. A wiſe king ſcattereth the wicked, &c.] Or fans them away[i]; ſeparates them from his good counſellors, courtiers, and ſubjects; ſcatters them from his preſence and court, and breaks their counſels and confederacies one with another; he diſcovers, diſcountenances, and diſcourages them; ſee the note on ℣. 8. And bringeth the wheel over them; alluding to the cuſtom of the eaſtern nations turning a cart-wheel over the grain in threſhing it out, and agreeable to the metaphor in the preceding clauſe; ſee Iſa. xxviii. 27, 28. Though ſome think it refers to a ſort of puniſhment inflicted on malefactors in thoſe times and countries, by putting them under harrows drawn on wheels, as breaking upon the wheel has been ſince uſed; ſee 2 Sam. xii. 31. The Arabic verſion underſtands it of exile. Jarchi interprets the wiſe king of the Lord, and the wicked of Pharaoh and his hoſt, on whom he brought the wheel, or gave meaſure for meaſure, and puniſhed in a way of retaliation; and to this ſenſe it is by ſome[k] interpreted, "as the "wheel turns over, juſt in the ſame place, ſo as "the wicked hath done, it ſhall be done to them." It may be applied to Chriſt, the wiſe king, who ſcatters all his and our enemies; whoſe fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, Matt. iii. 12.

℣. 27. The ſpirit of man is the candle of the Lord, &c.] The rational ſoul of man is a light ſet up in him; this is what is commonly called the light of nature; it was a bright and burning light at firſt, but through ſin is become a very feeble one; by which men have only a glimmering view of divine things, of God and his worſhip, and of what he would have done, or not done; by this light men do but grope after him, if happily they may find him and know his will; it is but like a candle-light at beſt, in compariſon of divine revelation, or the goſpel of the grace of God, which has ſhone out like the ſun in its meridian glory; and eſpecially in compariſon of the ſun of righteouſneſs, Chriſt Jeſus, and the light of the divine Spirit; yet this is a light ſet up by the Lord, a candle of his; it comes from the Father of lights, he is the author and maintainer of it; it is a ſpirit and underſtanding which is by the inſpiration of the almighty; ſee Gen. ii. 7. Job xxxii. 8. Zech. xii. 1. Searching all the inward parts of the belly; or heart; the thoughts, intents, and purpoſes of it; which are the things of a man that only the ſpirit of man knows; by this candle, or light, he can look into his own heart, the inmoſt receſſes of it, and reflect upon his thoughts and ſchemes, and judge in ſome meaſure whether right or wrong; there is a conſcience in man, which, unleſs ſeared, paſſes ſentence on what is in man, or done by him, and either excuſes or accuſes; ſee 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. Rom. ii. 14, 15.

℣. 28. Mercy and truth preſerve the king, &c.] Which are two good qualifications in a prince; not ruling his ſubjects with rigour and cruelty, but with tenderneſs and clemency; eaſing them as much as he can of burdens and preſſures; ſhewing compaſſion to the diſtreſſed, and pardoning delinquents when the caſe will admit of it; as alſo being faithful to his word, promiſes, and engagements; inviolably adhering to the laws and conſtitution of the nation, and ſteady in his adminiſtrations of juſtice; theſe preſerve him in the affections of his people, and make him ſafe and ſecure on his throne; and becauſe of theſe the Lord preſerves him from his enemies. It may be rendered, grace grace and truth[l], and applied to Chriſt, who is full of both, and which are ſaid to preſerve him, Pſal. xl. 11. And his throne is upholden by mercy; this explains what is meant by the preſervation of him, and what is the ſecurity of his throne and kingdom, which is clemency and goodneſs to his ſubjects.

ỳ. 29. The glory of young men is their ſtrength, &c.] That is the excellent thing in them, and it is to their honour when it is employed in the ſervice of their king and country, and eſpecially in the ſervice of God and religion; though it does not become them to glory in it, Jer. ix. 23. And the beauty of old men is the gray head; an index of wiſdom and prudence; ſee Job xii. 12. The deſign of the proverb is to ſhew that both have their excellencies and uſefulneſs, young men and old men, and ſhould not deſpiſe one another; nor either of them be deſpiſed in a commonwealth, both being uſeful in it, the one for ſtrength, the other for counſel; and ſo in the church of Chriſt; ſee 1 John ii. 13, 14.

ỳ. 30. The blueneſs of a wound cleanſeth away evil, &c.] Rubs it off and ſcours it away, as the word[m] ſignifies, or is a clearing and rubbing it off; ſome men muſt be beaten black and blue, or muſt have very ſore correction before they can be reclaimed and reformed from their evil ways; ſo ſome interpret it of the evil man[n]: ſanctified afflictions to God's people are the means of purging away their iniquities, their droſs, and their ſin; but there is nothing ſo effectually cleanſes from ſin as the blood of Jeſus, or heals or cures of it as his blue wounds and ſtripes; ſee Iſa. xxvii. 9. and liii. 5. So do ſtripes the inward part of the belly; or heart and conſcience; by means of corrections and chaſtiſement men are brought to an inward ſenſe of ſin; they are ſhewn their tranſgreſſions wherein they have exceeded, and are commanded to return from iniquity, Job xxxvi. 9, 10. they lament and mourn over ſin, confeſs it and forſake it; and then may the inwards of the belly, the mind and conſcience, defiled with them, be ſaid to be cleanſed from them; eſpecially when led by theſe ſtripes and corrections to the ſtripes, wounds, and blood of Chriſt, which being applied, cleanſe from all ſin inwardly and outwardly.

ỳ. 1. THE king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water, &c.] The heart of every king, and all that is in it, his thoughts, counſels, purpoſes and deſigns; the hearts of bad kings, as Pharaoh, whom the Lord hardened and ſoftened at pleaſure; the antichriſtian kings, into whoſe hearts he put it to give their kingdoms to the beaſt, Rev. xvii. 17. the hearts of good kings, as David, Solomon, Cyrus, and others: and if the hearts of kings are in the hands of the Lord, which are full of things of the greateſt importance with reſpect to the government of the world; and which are generally more untractable and unmanageable; and who are more reſolute and poſitive, and will have their own wills and ways, eſpecially arbitrary princes; then much more the hearts of other perſons. And which are as rivers of water; for ſo the words may be rendered, as rivers of water is the heart of a king, which is in the hand of the Lord; unſtable, fluid and fluctuating; and yet the Lord can ſtay and ſettle, and fix them, and keep them ſteady and within bounds: or which, like a torrent of water, comes with force and impetus; and ſo the Septuagint render it, the force of waters; and bears all before it, as do the wills of deſpotic kings; and yet theſe the Lord can ſtop and bound, and rule and overrule: or like rivers of water, reviving and refreſhing, ſo is the heart of a good king, full of wiſdom and prudence, of integrity and faithfulneſs, of clemency and goodneſs; the ſtreams of whoſe bounty and kindneſs flow among his ſubjects, to their great pleaſure and profit; ſo Chriſt, the King of kings, is ſaid to be as rivers of water, Iſa. xxxii. 2. The alluſion is to gardeners, that make channels for the water to run in, to water their gardens; or to huſbandmen, that cut aqueducts from rivers, to water their fields; or to the turning of the courſe of rivers, as Euphrates was by Cyrus, when he took Babylon. The heart of a king is as much at the diſpoſe of the Lord, and can be turned by him as eaſily as ſuch canals may be made, or the courſe of a river turned; for it follows: He turneth it whitherſoever he will; contrary to their firſt deſigns, and to anſwer another purpoſe; oftentimes towards his people, and for the good of his cauſe and intereſt, which they never deſigned; and to bring about ſuch things as were out of their view. And ſo in converſion, the Lord can turn the hearts of men as he pleaſes; their underſtanding, will and affections, are in his hands: he can make the underſtanding light, which was darkneſs, and ſo turn it from darkneſs to light; he can take off the ſtiffneſs of the will, and turn it from its bias and bent, and make it willing to that which is good in the day of his power: he can turn the channel and courſe of the affection, from ſinful luſts and pleaſures, to himſelf, his Son, his truths, word, worſhip, ordinances, and people; he can take out of the heart what he pleaſes, its ignorance, hardneſs, enmity, unbelief, pride and vanity; and he can put in what he pleaſes, his fear, his laws, his Spirit, and the gifts and graces of it; he can change and turn it juſt as he will; he that made the heart, can operate upon it, and do with it as ſeems good in his ſight. The heathens very wrongly call one of their deities Verticordia[o], from the power of turning the heart they aſcribe to it; however this ſhews their ſenſe, that to turn the heart is the property of deity.

ỳ. 2. Every way of a man is right in his own eyes, &c.] This is repeated, from chap. xvi. 2, 25. for the confirmation of it; and that it might be obſerved and taken notice of, and men be brought under a conviction of it; which is not eaſily done, it being what affects all men: every man is conceited of himſelf and his own way, and is not eaſily perſuaded off of it; his ſinful ways are agreeable to him, promiſing him pleaſure, profit or honour; and his ſelf-righteous ways ſuit with the vain opinion he has of himſelf, whereby he promiſes himſelf eternal life and happineſs. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it to this ſenſe, “every man ſeems righteous to himſelf.” But the Lord pondereth the hearts; weighs them in the balance of righteouſneſs and truth; conſiders them, having a perfect knowledge of them, and all the ſprings of action in them; and knows that every way of man is not right, though they may ſeem ſo to him.

℣. 3. To do juſtice and judgment, &c.] The moral duties of religion, what is holy, juſt and good, which the law requires; what is agreeable to both tables, piety towards God, and juſtice to men; that which is juſt and right between man and man; which eſpecially, if done from right principles and with right views, is more acceptable to the Lord than ſacrifice; not than any ſacrifice; than the ſacrifice of a broken heart, or the ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving, or of acts of goodneſs and beneficence, or of a man's whole ſelf to the Lord; but than ceremonial ſacrifices; which, though of divine inſtitution, and typical of Chriſt, and when offered up in the faith of him, were acceptable to God, whilſt in force; yet not when done without faith and in hypocriſy, and eſpecially when done to cover and countenance immoral actions; and even when compared with moral duties, the latter were preferable to them; ſee 1 Sam. xv. 22. Mark xii. 33.

℣. 4. An high look, and a proud heart, &c.] The former is a ſign of the latter, and commonly go together, and are both abominable to the Lord; ſee Pſal. ci. 5. Prov. vi. 16, 17. A man that looks above others, and with diſdain upon them, ſhews that pride reigns in him, and ſwells his mind with a vain opinion of himſelf; this may be obſerved in every ſelf-righteous man; the parable of the phariſee and publican is a comment upon it: ſometimes there may be a proud heart under a diſguiſe of humility; but the pride of the heart is often diſcovered by the look of the eyes. It may be rendered, the elevation of the eyes, and the enlargement of the heart[p]; but not to be underſtood in a good ſenſe, of the lifting up of the eyes in prayer to God, with faith and fear; nor of the enlargement of the heart with ſolid knowledge and wiſdom, ſuch as Solomon had; but in a bad ſenſe, of the lofty looks and haughtineſs of man towards his fellow-creatures, and of his unbounded deſires after filthy lucre or ſinful luſts: the Targum renders it, “the ſwelling of the heart,” with pride and vanity. And the plowing of the wicked is ſin; taken literally; not that it is ſo in itſelf; for it is a moſt uſeful invention, and exceeding beneficial to mankind, and is to be aſcribed to God himſelf; and of this the heathens are ſo ſenſible, that they have a deity to whom they attribute it, and whom they call Ceres[q], from חרש to plow; it only denotes that all the civil actions of a wicked man, one being put for all, are attended with ſin; he ſins in all he does. Or, metaphorically, for his ſchemes, contrivances and projects, which are the plowing of his mind; theſe are all ſinful, or tend to that which is ſo. Some underſtand this particularly of his high look and proud heart, which are his plowing and his ſin; ſo Ben Melech; and others, of his plowing, or perſecuting and oppreſſing the poor. The word is ſometimes uſed for a lamp or light, and is ſo rendered here by ſome, the light of the wicked is ſin[r]; their outward happineſs and proſperity leads them into ſin, involves them in guilt, and ſo brings them to ruin and deſtruction: and this way go the Targum, Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions.

℣. 5. The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteouſneſs, &c.] A man that is thoughtful and ſtudious, and wiſely forms ſchemes in his mind, and diligently purſues them; the iſſue of it is, generally ſpeaking, proſperity and plenty: ſuch a man is uſually thriving and flouriſhing; and this holds good in things ſpiritual, as well as in things temporal, Matt. xxv. 29. But of every one that is haſty, only to want; that is in haſte to be rich, and is reſolved to be ſo, right or wrong, he comes at laſt to poverty and want: or he who is raſh and precipitate in acting, who never thinks before he acts, but raſhly engages in an affair; or, however, does not give himſelf time enough to think it over, but as ſoon as ever it has entered his thoughts, he immediately attempts to put it in execution; a man ſo thoughtleſs and inconſiderate, ſo raſh and haſty, brings himſelf and family to poverty; ſee chap. xx. 21.

℣. 6. The getting of treaſures by a lying tongue, &c.] By telling lies in trade; by bearing falſe witneſs in a court of judicature; or by preaching falſe doctrines in the church of God; is a vanity toſſed to and fro of them that ſeek death: ſuch treaſures, though ever ſo great, are like any light thing, ſmoke or vapour, ſtraw, ſtubble, chaff or a feather, toſſed about by the wind; which is expreſſive of the inſtability and uncertainty of riches ill gotten; they do not laſt long, but are taken away and carried off by one providence or another; and they are likewiſe hurtful and pernicious; they iſſue in death: and thoſe that ſeek after them, and obtain them in a bad way, are ſaid to ſeek death; not intentionally, but eventually; this they certainly find, if grace prevent not; ſee chap. viii. 36. Jarchi reads it, they are the ſnares of death to him; and ſo the Septuagint verſion.

℣. 7. The robbery of the wicked ſhall deſtroy them, &c.] Or cut them, ſo Ben Melech: diſſecate or ſaw[s] them; cut them to the heart; that is, when the ſins they have been guilty of, in robbing God of his due, or doing injury to men in their properties, cheating them or ſtealing from them, are ſet home on their conſciences, they are in the utmoſt agonies and diſtreſs; it is as if a ſaw was drawn to and fro over them, and will be their caſe for ever without true repentance: this is the worm that never dies, and the fire that is never quenched; this is everlaſting deſtruction from the preſence of the Lord, and is very juſt and righteous. Becauſe they refuſe to do judgment; to do that which is juſt between man and man, to let every one enjoy his own property: as it is true of private robbers, ſo of men in public offices, whoſe buſineſs it is to defend men in the quiet poſſeſſion of property; which, if they refuſe to do, as it is a refuſal to do judgment, it is in effect a robbery of them; and will be charged on their conſciences at one time or another.

℣. 8. The way of man is froward and ſtrange, &c.] Not the way of any and every man; not the way of righteous and good men, of believers in Chriſt; who know him, the way, and walk in him and after him, and being led by him; who have his Spirit to be their guide, and do walk in his ways, and find pleaſure in them; the way of ſuch is not froward or perverſe, but upright and even, and is not ſtrange, for the Lord knows and approves of it: but the way of wicked and impure men, as may be learned from the oppoſition in the next clauſe; the way of unregenerate men, who are gone out of the good way, and turned to their own way, which is according to the courſe of the world, and after the prince of it, and according to the fleſh and dictates of corrupt nature, which is the common and broad road that leads to deſtruction. This is a froward or perverſe way, a way contrary to reaſon and truth; contrary to the word of God, and the directions of it; it is a crooked, diſtorted path; it is not according to rule; it is a deviation from the way of God's commandment, and is a ſtrange one; the ſcriptures know nothing of it, and do not point and direct unto it; it eſtranges a man from God, and carries him further and further off from him. It may be rendered, perverſe is the way of a man, even of a ſtranger[t]; of one that is a ſtranger to God and godlineſs; to Chriſt and his goſpel; to the Spirit, and the operations of his grace on the heart; to his own heart, and his ſtate and condition by nature; and to all good men, and all that is good. But as for the pure, his work is right; God is pure, purity itſelf, in compariſon of whom nothing is pure; and his work in creation, providence and grace, is right; there is no unrighteouſneſs in him; and this ſenſe is favoured by the Septuagint and Arabic verſions: or rather, every good man, who, through the pure righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, and through his precious blood being ſprinkled on him; or rather, through being waſhed in it, and through the grace of God beſtowed on him, is pure, wholly cleanſed from ſin; has a pure heart, ſpeaks a pure language, and holds the myſtery of faith in a pure conſcience or converſation: and his work, or the work of God upon him, is right and good; or his work of faith, which he exerciſes on God, is hearty and genuine: and even his works, as the Targum, Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, have it in the plural number; all his good works are right; being done from love, in faith, in the name and ſtrength of Chriſt, and to the glory of God.

℣. 9. It is better to dwell in a corner of the houſe-top, &c.] The roofs of houſes in Judea were flat, encompaſſed with battlements, whither perſons might retire for ſolitude, and ſit in ſafety: and it is better to be in a corner of ſuch a roof alone, and be expoſed to ſcorching heat, to bluſtering winds, to thunder-ſtorms and ſhowers of rain, than with a brawling woman in a wide houſe; large and ſpacious, full of rooms, fit for a numerous family: or, an houſe of ſociety[u]; where many families might dwell and live ſociably with each other; or an houſe where a man, his wife and family, might dwell together, and have communion with each other; it is oppoſed to the corner of the houſe-top, and the ſolitarineſs of it; as the ſcolding of the brawling woman, or a woman of contentions[w]; who is always noiſy and quarrelſome, her violent paſſions, her ſtorming language, and thundering voice, are to the inclemencies of the heavens, to which a man on the houſe-top is expoſed; and yet theſe are more eligible than the other; ſee ℣. 19. and xvii. 1. and xix. 13.

℣. 10. The ſoul of the wicked deſireth evil, &c.] The evil of ſin, it being natural to him; he chooſes it, delights in it, craves after it, under a notion of pleaſure or profit: or the evil of miſchief; it is a ſport and paſtime to him to do injury to others; ſee chap. x. 23. he deſires both the one and the other with all his ſoul; his heart is in it, he is ſet upon it, which ſhews him to be a wicked man. His neighbour findeth no favour in his eyes; not only he delights to do miſchief to an enemy or a ſtranger, but even to a neighbour and friend; he will do him no kindneſs, though he aſks it of him; he will ſhew him no mercy, though an object of it; he will ſpare him not, but do him an injury, if he attempts to hinder or diſſuade him from doing miſchief, or reproves him for it.

℣. 11. When the ſcorner is puniſhed, &c.] Either by the immediate hand of God, or by the civil magiſtrate; he who ſcoffs at deity, blaſphemes the moſt High, mocks at all religion, deſpiſes dominion, and ſpeaks evil of dignities: The ſimple is made wiſe; who is weak and fooliſh, eaſily perſuaded and drawn into ſin, yet not hardened in it, but open to reproof and conviction; he takes notice of the puniſhment of ſcorners, and takes warning from it, and behaves more wiſely and cautiouſly for the future; ſee chap. xix. 25. And when the wiſe is inſtructed; by others, ſuperior to him in wiſdom; by the miniſters of the goſpel, by reading and hearing the word of God, and the writings of good men; or by corrections and chaſtiſements: He receiveth knowledge; the wiſe man receives it, he attends to the inſtruction given him, and improves in knowledge: or rather, the ſimple man gains knowledge by the inſtructions given to wiſe men; he learns by them, as well as by what he is taught himſelf. It is by ſome rendered, when the wiſe proſpers, he receiveth knowledge[x]; the ſimple man learns much both from the adverſity and proſperity of others; and to this ſenſe is the note of Gerſom, "when he ſees how the ways of a wiſe man "proſper, then he ſtudies to get knowledge."

℣. 12. The righteous man wiſely conſidereth the houſe of the wicked, &c.] Not ſo much the ſtately palace he lives in, and the furniture of it, as the glory, ſplendor, riches, and largeneſs of his family; the flouriſhing condition he and they are in: he conſiders how they came into it, the ſhort continuance of it, and what the end will be, which in a ſhort time will be ruin and deſtruction; and therefore he does not envy their preſent happineſs, or fret at it. Gerſom renders it, "the righteous maketh "the houſe of the wicked to proſper;" as Joſeph did Potiphar's, and Jacob, Laban's; or rather, the Lord made them to proſper for their ſakes. Jarchi interprets the righteous, of God himſelf; who gives his heart, or has it in his heart to cut off the houſe of the wicked, as follows. But God overthroweth the wicked for their wickedneſs; or removes them into evil, as the Targum; into the evil of puniſhment, for the evil of ſin. Aben Ezra ſupplies the word God, as we do; and underſtands it of God's deſtroying wicked men for their ſins, though they have flouriſhed for a while in this world: but ſome interpret it of the righteous man, even of a righteous magiſtrate, who is prudent and diligent in his office; who looks into the houſes of wicked men, and inquires who they are that are in them, and how they live; and what they have in their houſes, whether ſtolen goods, the properties of others; or arms, either for treaſonable practices or for robberies; and takes them and puniſhes them according to the laws of God and men.

℣. 13. Whoſo ſtoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, &c.] For want of bread: or, of the weak, as the Septuagint and other verſions; for want of help and protection, when in the greateſt diſtreſs; and, with the moſt preſſing importunity, intreats his aſſiſtance, and yet refuſes to hear him out; or if he does, will not relieve him, which is all one as if he heard him not, or denied him a hearing. He alſo ſhall cry himſelf; the Targum and Syriac verſion add, unto God. The ſenſe is, that even ſuch an one ſhall be brought into the like diſtreſſed circumſtances; when he ſhall make application to God, and to his fellow-creatures, for relief and aſſiſtance: But ſhall not be heard; a deaf ear will be turned to him by both: the ſame meaſure he has meaſured, ſhall be meaſured to him again; no mercy ſhall be ſhewn to an unmerciful man, either by God or man; ſee James ii. 13.

℣. 14. A gift in ſecret pacifieth anger, &c.] Appeaſes an angry man; humbles and brings his anger down[y], as Aben Ezra and Gerſom obſerve the word ſignifies; which before roſe very high, and ſhewed itſelf in big words and diſdainful looks, as proud wrath does: or extinguiſhes it, as the Targum and Vulgate Latin verſion render it, and very fitly. Anger is a fire in the breaſt; and a reſtraining or cauſing it to ceaſe, is properly expreſſed by an extinguiſhing of it: this a gift or preſent does, as it did in Eſau from Jacob, in David from Abigail; but then it muſt be ſecretly given, otherwiſe it may more provoke; ſince it may ſhew vanity in the giver, and covetouſneſs in the receiver; and the former may have more honour than the latter. Some underſtand this of a gift for a bribe to a judge, to abate the ſeverity of the ſentence; and others, of alms-deeds to the poor, to pacify the anger of God[z]: Jarchi interprets it of alms; and the Jews write this ſentence upon the poor's box, underſtanding it in this ſenſe; but the firſt ſenſe is beſt. And a reward in the boſom, ſtrong wrath; the ſame thing in different words: the meaning is, that a reward or gift, ſecretly conveyed into the boſom of an angry man, pacifies his wrath, when at the greateſt height. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, underſtand it in a quite different ſenſe, of a gift retained in the boſom, and not given, and render it thus, he that ſpareth gifts, ſtirreth up ſtrong wrath.

℣. 15. It is joy to the juſt to do judgment, &c.] It is with pleaſure he does it; he delights in the law of God, after the inward man, and finds much peace of mind and joy in the holy Ghoſt, in keeping it and obſerving its commands, which are holy, juſt and good; yea, it gives him pleaſure to ſee juſtice done by others; both by private perſons in their dealings with one another; and eſpecially by judges putting the laws in execution, as their office requires; whereby much good comes to a nation in general, and to particular perſons. But deſtruction ſhall be to the workers of iniquity; that make a trade of ſinning; whoſe whole life is a continued ſeries of ſin and iniquity; who take much pains in committing ſin, and are conſtant at it; everlaſting deſtruction is in their ways, and they lead unto it: or, terror[a] ſhall be to them; terror of mind now at times, in oppoſition to the joy and peace a good man finds; and dreadful horror at death and to all eternity: or, as it is joy to a juſt man, to ſee public juſtice done, and good laws put in execution, it is a terror to evil doers, Rom. xiii. 3.

℣. 16. The man that wandereth out of the way of underſtanding, &c.] The way of getting underſtanding, the good ways and word of God; that wanders from the houſe of God, the aſſembly of the ſaints, where the goſpel is preached, and the ordinances are adminiſtered; that inſtead of attending on them, where he might gain the underſtanding of divine and ſpiritual things, wanders about in the fields, gets into bad company, walks with them in their ways, and turns to his own, as a ſheep that goes aſtray: He ſhall remain in the congregation of the dead; among thoſe that are ſpiritually dead, dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; ſuch an one he himſelf is, and ſuch he is like to continue, and not be written among the living in Jeruſalem; or among thoſe who die the ſecond and eternal death, among the damned in hell; ſo Jarchi interprets it of the congregation of hell; and a large congregation that will be, but dreadful to have an abode with them. The words are rendered by the Septuagint, and the verſions that follow that, ſhall reſt in the congregation of the giants; which ſome interpret of devils, and others of the giants of the old world[b], damned ſpirits: reſting with them, does not deſign peace and quietneſs, for there will be none there; but a fixed, ſettled abode, in oppoſition to wandering in the preceding clauſe.

℣. 17. He that loveth pleaſure, ſhall be a poor man, &c.] Or ſport[c] and paſtime, muſic and dancing, cards and dice, hunting and hawking, and other ſenſual gratifications; a man that indulges himſelf in theſe things, and ſpends his time and his money in ſuch a way, is very likely to be a poor man, and generally is ſo in the iſſue. He that loveth wine and oil, ſhall not be rich; that is, that loves them immoderately; otherwiſe in moderation they may be both loved and uſed: wine and oil are put for high living, luxurious feaſts, coſtly entertainments; which being ſo, and continually made, will not ſuffer a man to be rich. The ſenſe is, that an epicure, one that makes a god of his belly, that is both a wine-bibber and a glutton, that indulges to rich eating and drinking, in courſe leſſens his ſubſtance, and leaves little for his heir: and this holds good with reſpect to ſpiritual as to temporal things; ſuch perſons are poor, and not rich in ſpiritual things, that indulge to carnal pleaſure, and the gratification of their ſenſual appetite.

℣. 18. The wicked ſhall be a ranſom for the righteous, &c.] Not to make ſatisfaction for them, as Chriſt is a ranſom for his people; but as a ranſom is in the room of another, ſo the wicked cometh in the ſtead of the righteous, and into the trouble he is delivered from; as Haman for Mordecai, which inſtance Jarchi mentions; ſee chap. xi. 8. or when a body of people are threatened with divine vengeance; and this falls upon the wicked, whoſe ſins cauſed it, and the righteous are delivered from it; as in the caſe of Achan, and the ſeven ſons of Saul, Joſh. vii. 26. 2 Sam. xxi. 1—6. And ſometimes God turns the wrath of the princes of the earth from his own people, and cauſes it to fall upon the wicked, and ſo they are a ranſom for them; as Sennacherib intended the deſtruction of the Jews, but but was called off in providence to fall upon the Egyptians, Ethiopians and Sabeans, and therefore they are ſaid to be a ranſom for them; ſee Iſa. xliii. 3. and ſometimes wicked men are the means of a ranſom or deliverance of the righteous, as Cyrus was of the Jews: and it may be conſidered, as the word uſed ſignifies a cover[d], whether it will not bear this ſenſe, that the wicked are a cover for the righteous, and oftentimes protect and defend them; ſo the earth helped the woman, Rev. xii. 16. And the tranſgreſſor for the upright; which are but different characters of the ſame perſons, bad and good men; and the ſenſe is the ſame as before.

℣. 19. It is better to dwell in the wilderneſs, &c.] Where perſons live without ſhelter, and are not only expoſed to ſtorms and tempeſts, but to beaſts of prey; where is want of the neceſſaries of life, and no ſociety; where no ſpeech is, as the word[e] for wilderneſs may ſignify; yet it is better to dwell in ſuch a place, where no human voice is heard, than with a contentious and an angry woman; that is always brawling and ſcolding, ever in a quarrelſome and angry diſpoſition, and provoking to anger all about her; ſee the note on ℣. 9. In a myſtical ſenſe, it is better to be with the church in the wilderneſs, Rev. xii. 14. than with the furious, blood-thirſty and perſecuting church of Rome, in all its worldly glory and ſplendor.

℣. 20. There is a treaſure to be deſired, &c.] Gold, ſilver, jewels, and precious ſtones; all ſorts of food, as Aben Ezra explains it, and rich and coſtly raiment; all which may be lawfully deſired and ſought after, and, when obtained, laid up for future uſe; which may be ſpared for their own ſervice and that of poſterity: but there are riches of grace, a pearl of great price and treaſure in heaven, more deſirable than theſe, Matt. vi. 19, 20. And oil in the dwelling of the wiſe; which is particularly mentioned, becauſe a principal bleſſing of the land of Canaan; much uſed for food, and was for delight and refreſhment: and ſomething of this was in the houſe of every wiſe, provident and induſtrious man, for the uſe of him and his family; even though he lived but in a cottage, as the word[f] ſignifies: this is an emblem of the grace of God, which is ſometimes compared to oil; which a wiſe man is chiefly concerned, that it may be in his heart, in his houſe, and in his family. But a fooliſh man ſpendeth it up; the oil; he ſwallows it up at once, as ſoon as he has got it, and waſtes and laviſhes away, what his wiſe father had provided for him. This may refer not to oil only, but to the deſired treaſure, wealth, riches, ſubſtance of every ſort, he is heir to and becomes poſſeſſed of; and which, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, may be applied to a fooliſh, wicked man, who miſpends his time, neglects the means of grace, and all opportunities, by which men grow rich and wiſe in ſpiritual things; ſee Matt. xxv. 1—10.

℣. 21. He that followeth after righteouſneſs and mercy, &c.] Is eager, diligent and fervent in his purſuit of theſe things: after righteouſneſs; not a legal righteouſneſs, ſuch as the Jews followed after, but did not attain to; becauſe they ſought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law, Rom. ix. 31, 32. by which there is no righteouſneſs or juſtification before God; but an evangelical righteouſneſs, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; ſee Iſa. li. 1. To follow after it, is to ſeek, deſire, and thirſt after it, Matt. v. 6. and vi. 33. which ſuppoſes a want of righteouſneſs, a ſenſe of that want; a view of a righteouſneſs without them, even in Chriſt; a love and liking of it, and therefore follow after it; it being pure, perfect, agreeable to the law and juſtice of God, which juſtifies now, and will anſwer for them in a time to come. And ſuch follow after mercy or grace[g]; ſeeing themſelves miſerable by ſin, and having no merit of their own, apply to God for pardoning grace and mercy; and ſeek for righteouſneſs in a way of grace, as a free gift; and for the whole of ſalvation in the ſame way, as well as for all grace and freſh ſupplies of it: it may be underſtood, in conſequence of the former, of a diligent and eager performance of works of righteouſneſs and mercy, and an earneſt deſire after both. And ſuch a man findeth life, righteouſneſs and honour; which is more than he is ſaid to follow after: life ſpiritual, which he has from Chriſt by his Spirit, and which is owing to the grace and mercy of God; and eternal life, through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, in whom it is only to be found, and from whom all the bleſſings of life come; who has it in his hands to give, and does give it to all his people: righteouſneſs alſo he finds, not in himſelf, nor by the works of the law, but in Chriſt; being directed to him by the Spirit and word of God; and an excellent finding this is; a robe of righteouſneſs, which he lays hold upon, puts on and rejoices in: and likewiſe honour, through relation to God and Chriſt; through grace received from them; by enjoying the preſence of them, and being made a king and prieſt to God; and hereafter will be placed at Chriſt's right hand, inherit the kingdom of glory, ſit on the ſame throne with Chriſt, and wear the crown of life and righteouſneſs.

℣. 22. A wiſe man ſcaleth the city of the mighty, &c.] Which makes good what is elſewhere ſaid, that wiſdom is better than ſtrength, Eccl. ix. 16. and ſometimes more is done by prudence and wiſdom, by art and cunning, by ſchemes and ſtratagems, than by power and force; eſpecially in military affairs, and particularly in beſieging and taking fortified cities; when one wiſe man, by his wiſdom, may ſo order and manage things as to be able, with a few under his command, to mount the walls of a city and take it, though defended by a mighty garriſon in it. This may be applied to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, entering into the city of a man's heart, poſſeſſed by the ſtrong man armed; overcoming him, taking from him his armour, and dividing his ſpoil, Luke xi. 21, 22. compare with this Eccl. ix. 14, 15. And caſteth down the ſtrength of the confidence thereof; the ſtrong walls, bulwarks and ſuch fortifications, in which the mighty in the city placed their confidence: and the like does Chriſt, when he enters into the heart of a ſinner by his word and Spirit; he deſtroys all its former ſtrong confidences, and brings it into ſubjection to himſelf, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5.

℣. 23. Whoſo keepeth his mouth and his tongue, &c.] Guards the one and bridles the other; is careful of what he ſays, that it is truth and without diſſimulation and guile; and is not injurious to the characters of men, and is not offenſive and provoking; who abſtains from ill and wrathful language, and which tends to ſtir up wrath and contention. Aben Ezra diſtinguiſhes between the mouth and tongue, and interprets it, that keeps his mouth from eating, that is, immoderately and intemperately; and his tongue from ſpeaking evil: but it is beſt to underſtand both of the ſame thing, of ſpeech or language, which when a man is careful of, he keepeth his ſoul from troubles; his conſcience clear of guilt and diſtreſs, and his perſon from being concerned in quarrels, contentions and law-ſuits, which ſuch who give their tongues too much liberty are involved in.

[g] חסד gratiam,

℣. 24. Proud and haughty ſcorner is his name, &c.] He ſhall be called a proud fool, a haughty fellow, a ſcornful blockhead; he ſhall get himſelf an ill name, and be treated with contempt. Who dealeth in proud wrath; whoſe pride ſhews itſelf in wrathful expreſſions and actions; who is proud and paſſionate in all his dealings with men, and who as it were makes a trade of pride and paſſion: to none is this character more applicable than to Antichriſt, the man of ſin, that ſits in the ſeat of the ſcornful; exalts himſelf above all that is called God, has a mouth ſpeaking blaſphemies, and a look more ſtout than his fellows, and deals in proud wrath againſt the ſaints of the moſt High.

℣. 25. The deſire of the ſlothful killeth him, &c.] His deſire after food, and raiment and riches; for becauſe he cannot have what he deſires, being unwilling to work for them, it frets and vexes him to death, or puts him upon unlawful methods to obtain them, which bring him to a ſhameful death; ſee chap. xiii. 4. For his hands refuſe to labour; when he is ordered by his ſuperiors, or his wants are ſuch as call for labour; and he ſeems to be willing and deſirous of it, neceſſity obliging to it, yet he cannot bring his hands to it; theſe do in effect ſay, as Aben Ezra obſerves, thou ſhalt not do it. Maimonides ſays this is to be underſtood of ſloth in ſeeking wiſdom [h].

℣. 26. He coveteth greedily all the day long, &c.] The ſlothful man does, as he has nothing to do to employ his time and his thoughts with; he is always craving ſomething to eat and drink, or wiſhing he had ſuch an eſtate, or ſo much wealth and riches, that he might live as ſuch and ſuch perſons do; and this is what his head runs upon all the day long. But the righteous giveth and ſpareth not; not gives to the ſlothful, which does not reſtrain his deſire, as Aben Ezra interprets it; but to the poor and neceſſitous, to proper objects; a good man will work with his hands that he may have a ſufficiency for himſelf and his family, and may have ſomething to give to others that are in want; and he ſpares not, or withholds not his hands, neither from working nor from giving.

℣. 27. The ſacrifice of the wicked is abomination, &c.] That is, to the Lord, as in chap. xv. 8. and as it is here added in the Septuagint and Arabic verſions. How much more, when he bringeth it with a wicked mind? the Arabic verſion is, with a mind alien from the law; or when it is not brought according to law; when it is a corrupt thing, that which is torn, lame, or ſick, or robbery for burnt ſacrifice; when it is done with an evil intention, to cover ſin, to atone for it without repenting of it or forſaking it; that they may go on in ſin with impunity, and be allowed to commit it; for which cauſe Balak and Balaam offered ſacrifices, which is the inſtance Jarchi produces; and indeed every religious action not done in faith, and love, and ſincerity, and with a view to the glory of God, but in hypocriſy and with ſelfiſh views, in order to procure acceptance with God and juſtification in his ſight; ſetting aſide the righteouſneſs, ſacrifice and ſatisfaction of the Son of God, is done with a wicked mind, and is an abomination to the Lord. Some render it, even though he brings it diligently, or with great art and ſkill [i]; is conſtant at his devotion, and carries it ſo artfully, and with ſuch a ſhew of religion, as to deceive men, yet he cannot deceive the Lord.

℣. 28. A falſe witneſs ſhall periſh, &c.] As a witneſs he ſhall periſh in his reputation, no credit ſhall be given him, he ſhall not be admitted an evidence, or a witneſs in any cauſe, being found a falſe one; and as a man, he ſhall be puniſhed in body or eſtate by the civil magiſtrate, and his ſoul ſhall periſh eternally, unleſs he has true repentance for his ſin: or, a witneſs of lies ſhall periſh [k]; it may be applied to any teacher of falſe doctrine; and to the man of ſin, and his followers, that ſpeak lies in hypocriſy; every one that loves and makes a lie ſhall die the ſecond death, and be excluded from eternal happineſs, Rev. xxi. 8, 27. But the man that heareth; before he ſpeaks, and ſpeaks what he hears, and does not deviſe things himſelf; but witneſſes the truth, and nothing elſe, to the beſt of his knowledge: Speaketh conſtantly; invariably and conſiſtently, what is all of a piece, and by which he abides; or continually, as Jarchi; or forever; he is made uſe of as a witneſs as long as he lives, whenever there is occaſion for him; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, he ſpeaks victory; his teſtimony being true and valid carries the cauſe: it may be applied to a faithful teacher, who hearkens to the word of God, and ſpeaks according to that; ſuch an one ſpeaks out the doctrine of the word conſtantly, boldly, with certainty, without any heſitation or ſtaggering.

℣. 29. A wicked man hardeneth his face, &c.] Againſt all corrections and reproofs of parents, maſters, miniſters, and others; he bluſhes not at ſins committed, and is not aſhamed of them, but glories in them: or, he ſtrengthens with his face [l]; he puts an impudent face upon his words, and confirms them by his impudence; if he tells the moſt notorious lies, and ſays things the moſt ſhameful and ſcandalous, his countenance does not alter, by which he would be thought to have ſpoken what is right and true. But as for the upright, he directeth his way; or his ways [m]; according to the various reading; the man that is upright in heart, and walks uprightly, he directs his way according to the word of God; and if he does amiſs, when ſenſible, he is aſhamed of it and amends.

℣. 30. There is no wiſdom, nor underſtanding, nor counſel againſt the Lord.] No human ſchemes whatever, formed with the greateſt wiſdom and prudence, can ever prevail againſt God, or ſet aſide or hinder the execution of any deſign of his; nothing that is pointed againſt his church, his cauſe, and intereſt, his truths and ordinances, in the iſſue ſhall ſucceed; all that are found fighters againſt him ſhall not proſper, let them be men of ever ſo much ſagacity and wiſdom; though there may be ever ſo many devices in a man's heart, and theſe ever ſo well planned, they ſhall never defeat the counſel of the Lord; ſee chap. xix. 21. The Targum is, "there is no wiſdom, &c. as God's;" and ſo the Syriac verſion, as the Lord's; there is none like his, there is none to be compared with his; there is none of any value and worth but his; all is folly in compariſon of that: or there is none before fore the Lord [n]; no wiſdom of the creature can ſtand before him, it preſently vaniſhes and diſappears.

℣. 31. The horſe is prepared againſt the day of battle, &c.] The horſe is a warlike creature, and was much uſed formerly, as now, in war; theſe are prepared againſt the day of battle, to mount the cavalry with; and men are apt to put too great confidence in them: this is mentioned inſtead of all other military preparations and inſtruments of war. But ſafety is of the Lord; a horſe is a vain thing for ſafety, Pſal. xxxiii. 17. victory is only of the Lord; ſalvation depends upon him; it is he that covers mens heads in the day of battle, and gives them victory over their enemies: or ſalvation is of the Lord [o]; this is true of ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation, as well as of temporal ſalvation; it is of the Lord, Father, Son and Spirit; and ſo is the ſafety of the ſaints; and their final perſeverance to eternal glory, which is owing to the love of God, covenant-intereſt, ſecurity in Chriſt, the grace of the Spirit, and the power of God; ſee Hoſea xiv. 3.

CHAP. XXII.

℣. 1. A Good name is rather to be choſen than great riches, &c.] The word good is not in the text, but is rightly ſupplied, as it is by the Targum, Septuagint, and Vulgate Latin verſions; for it is not any name that is more eligible than riches; nor is it a good name among any ſort of perſons; for to have a good name with ſome turns to a man's reproach rather than to his credit; but a good name among good men, a name in the houſe of God, which is better than ſons and daughters; a new name, the name of the children of God, which no man knoweth but he that receiveth it; this is to be preferred to a multitude of riches; it is not to be procured by them, and is where they are not, or are loſt, but this continues; ſee Eccl. vii. 1. And loving favour rather than ſilver and gold; favour with God and man, eſpecially with God, whoſe loving-kindneſs is better than life, and all the enjoyments of it: or as it may be rendered, grace is better than ſilver and gold [p]; the grace of God through Chriſt, the grace of Chriſt in whom all fulneſs of it dwells, the grace of the Spirit of Chriſt; faith is more precious than gold that periſheth; and if a man would give all the ſubſtance of his houſe for love it would be contemned; the Spirit and his grace are not to be purchaſed with money.

℣. 2. The rich and poor meet together, &c.] In an hoſtile way, as ſome; they ruſh upon one another; the rich deſpiſe the poor, and the poor envy the rich; they cannot ſpeak well one of another, as the Arabic verſion; or they are dependent on one another, they cannot do without each other; as in the natural body, one member cannot ſay to another, I have no need of thee; ſo in the body politic, the rich and the poor cannot ſay, they have no need of one another; the rich ſtand in need of the poor to till their land, to plow and ſow, and do all other ſervile works for them; and the poor have need of the rich to employ them; have need of their money as their wages for their work, to ſupport themſelves and families with: or they ſometimes change conditions, and ſo meet; the poor grow rich, and the rich become poor; the one goes up-hill, and the other down-hill, and ſo meet in their paſſage. They meet together in all places of the earth, go where you will, there are rich and poor. The godly rich and poor meet together in one place to worſhip God; they meet together in a goſpel-church-ſtate, enjoying the ſame privileges and ordinances; and will all meet the Lord, and all meet together at his judgment-ſeat; and they will meet in heaven, and be together to all eternity, where the diſtinction will ceaſe: and the wicked rich and poor meet together to commit ſin; and they meet together in the grave [q], where there is no difference; and they will meet at the bar of God at the laſt day, and in hell, where they will be together for evermore. The Lord is the maker of them all; not only as men, but as rich men and poor men; God gives riches to whom he pleaſes, and poverty to whom he pleaſes; riches and poverty are according to the order of divine providence; and he can and does change ſcenes at his pleaſure; wherefore the rich ſhould conſider themſelves as dependent on him, and not deſpiſe and cruſh the poor; and the poor ſhould be content with their ſtate, as being allotted to them by the Lord, who can alter it when he thinks fit.

℣. 3. A prudent man foreſeeth the evil, and hideth himſelf, &c.] A wiſe man, whoſe eyes are in his head, who looks about him and before him, and is cautious and careful of his conduct and behaviour; he foreſees the evil of ſin, he is liable to be drawn into by ſuch and ſuch company, ſnares and temptations; and therefore he keeps from them, and abſtains from all appearance of evil, or what would lead him to it; and he foreſees the evil of puniſhment, or the judgments of God that are coming on for ſin; and he betakes himſelf to the Lord, to thoſe hiding-places and chambers of retreat and protection he has provided for his people, till the indignation be overpaſt; ſee Iſa. xxvi. 20. But the ſimple paſs on, and are puniſhed; fooliſh perſons, devoid of the grace of God and the fear of him, go on careleſs and unconcerned in their ſinful courſe of life, tranſgreſſing the law of God; they proceed from evil to evil, from leſſer to greater ſins; they go on in the broad road to deſtruction, and are puniſhed with temporal judgments here, and with everlaſting deſtruction hereafter.

℣. 4. By humility and the fear of the Lord, &c.] Some render it, the reward of humility, which is the fear of the Lord [r]; ſo the Targum; a humble man is bleſſed with it. Jarchi's note is, "becauſe of "humility, the fear of the Lord comes;" humility leads on to the fear of the Lord; he that behaves humbly towards man, comes at length to fear the Lord, and be truly religious: though theſe are rather to be conſidered as the graces of the Spirit of God, which go together; where there is one, there is the other; he that is humbled under a ſenſe of ſin, and his own unworthineſs, fears the Lord; and he that fears the Lord, and his goodneſs, will walk humbly before him; they both flow from the grace of God, are very ornamental, and attended with the following happy conſequences. Are riches and honour and life; ſpiritual riches, the riches of grace and glory; honour with God and men now, and everlaſting life in the world to come.

℣. 5. Thorns and ſnares are in the way of the froward, &c.] Who walks contrary to the will and law of God; ſuch a man meets with troubles, which are as thorns, grieving and diſtreſſing to him; and is taken in ſnares, and brought into difficulties, out of which he is not eaſily extricated; the thorns of affliction, and the ſnares of Satan: by the one his way is hedged up, and in the other his feet are taken. He that doth keep his ſoul ſhall be far from them; he that is concerned for the good of his ſoul, is careful for the welfare of that, and takes heed to his ways where and how he walks; will be far both from the way of the froward, and from the thorns and ſnares which are in his way.

℣. 6. Train up a child in the way he ſhould go, &c.] As Abraham trained up his children, and thoſe born in his houſe, in the way of the Lord, in the paths of juſtice and judgment; which are the ways in which they ſhould go, and which will be to their profit and advantage; ſee Gen. xiv. 14. and xviii. 19. and which is the duty of parents and maſters in all ages, and under the preſent goſpel-diſpenſation, even to bring up ſuch who are under their care in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, Eph. vi. 4. by praying with them and for them, by bringing them under the means of grace the miniſtry of the word, by inſtructing them in the principles of religion, teaching them their duty to God and man, and ſetting them good examples of a holy life and converſation; and this is to be done according to their capacity, and as they are able to underſtand and receive the inſtructions given them: according to the mouth of his way[s], as it may be literally rendered; as ſoon as he is able to ſpeak or go, even from his infancy; or as children are fed by little bits, or a little at a time, as their mouths can receive it. And when he is old, he will not depart from it; not eaſily, nor ordinarily; there are exceptions to this obſervation; but generally where there is a good education, the impreſſions of it do not eaſily wear off, nor do men ordinarily forſake a good way they have been brought up in[t]; and however when, being come to years of maturity and underſtanding, their hearts are ſeaſoned with the grace of God, they are then enabled to put that in practice which before they had only in theory, and ſo continue in the paths of truth and holineſs.

℣. 7. The rich ruleth over the poor, &c.] Uſurps a dominion over them, and exerciſes it in a rigorous, oppreſſive, and tyrannical manner; otherwiſe they are generally the rich that rule, and if they rule well, in a lawful, gentle, and righteous manner, it is commendable. And the borrower is ſervant to the lender; being under obligation to him, he is forced to be ſubject to him, and comply with his humours, and do and ſay as he would have him; it was an happineſs promiſed to the Iſraelites that they ſhould lend to many nations, but not borrow, Deut. xv. 6. compare with this Nehemiah v. 4, 5.

℣. 8. He that ſoweth iniquity[u], ſhall reap vanity, &c.] He that practices ſin, and is frequent in the commiſſion of it; indulges to it in a profuſe way, as the ſower plentifully ſcatters his ſeed; ſuch ſhall reap or poſſeſs nothing but ſin and wickedneſs; for what a man ſows, that ſhall he reap; he ſhall eat the fruit of his doings, and have the reward of his works; ſee Job iv. 8. Gal. vi. 7, 8. or nothing[w], mere emptineſs; it ſhall not anſwer; he ſhall have in the end neither pleaſure nor profit, but the contrary; ſhall reap evil things, as the Septuagint, Arabic and Vulgate Latin verſions render it. And the rod of his anger ſhall fail; with which he has ruled and ſmitten others in an angry and cruel manner; this ſhall be taken from him; his authority ſhall fail, and he ſhall become ſubject to others, and be uſed in like manner; ſee Iſa. xiv. 4—6. R. Joſeph Kimchi interprets it of the rod of the increaſe of the earth, or the rod or flail with which the fruits of the earth are threſhed or beaten out, which ſhould fail before they were reaped; and Schultens[x] has reference to the ſame, and gives the ſenſe that a wicked man that ſows iniquity, when he thinks his harveſt is ripe, ſhall be beaten with the flail, by which he ſhall be conſumed; and he that threſhed others ſhall be threſhed himſelf.

℣. 9. He that hath a bountiful eye ſhall be bleſſed, &c.] Or a good eye[y]; who looks about him for proper objects to do good unto; looks pleaſantly on them, and deals out chearfully and bountifully to them; he ſhall be bleſſed with an increaſe of temporal good things, with ſpiritual bleſſings, and with eternal glory and happineſs; when he does what he does from principles of grace, with a view to the glory of God, not depending on what he does, but upon the grace of God, and the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. For he giveth of his bread to the poor; what is his own, and a part of it; not all, for he reſerves ſome, as he ought, for himſelf and his; but he does not eat his morſel alone, he gives of it to the neceſſitous; his beneficent hand is a proof of his bountiful eye and liberal heart.

℣. 10. Caſt out the ſcorner, &c.] That makes a mock at ſin, a jeſt at religion, and ſcoffs at all good men, and every thing ſerious and ſpiritual; caſt ſuch an one out of all company and converſation; out of the family, as mocking Iſhmael was caſt out of Abraham's family; and out of the church, and all religious ſocieties. Jarchi interprets it of the evil imagination or corruption of nature; but this will continue with a man as long as he lives, and though it may be weakened and ſubdued, it is not caſt out. And contention ſhall go out; yea, ſtrife and reproach ſhall ceaſe; which are cauſed by the ſcorner, who ſtirs up contention and ſtrife in all company where he is, in families, and churches; and is continually caſting reproach on good men and things; but when he is caſt out, every thing of this nature ceaſes, and peace and love take place.

℣. 11. He that loveth pureneſs of heart, &c.] Though man's heart is naturally impure, and all that is in it, the thoughts, affections, mind, conſcience, underſtanding and will; yet there is ſuch a thing as pureneſs of heart; as where the grace of God is; where there is pure love to God, Chriſt, and to holy and heavenly things and perſons; where there is pure and unfeigned faith in Chriſt, and a purifying hope of eternal life by him; where the holy Spirit dwells as a ſanctifier, and Chriſt dwells by faith; where there is ſincerity and integrity; and where the heart is ſprinkled by the blood of Chriſt from an evil conſcience: and though none are intirely free from impurity of fleſh and ſpirit; yet every good man hates the impurity that is in him, and loves purity, and is deſirous of it, and makes uſe of all means for it; and he loves a man of a pure heart, as Aben Ezra interprets it; he loves pureneſs of heart in himſelf and others. Some verſions underſtand this of God: the Septuagint and Arabic verſions are, God loveth holy hearts; and ſo the Targum, "God loveth the pure in heart:" the Syriac verſion differs, "he loves God that is "pure in heart;" but all wrong; the ſenſe is as before given. For the grace of his lips; or, grace is in his lips; or, his lips are grace[z], or gracious; as the lips of Chriſt, though in a greater meaſure and degree, Pſal. xlv. 2. as is a man's heart, ſo are his lips. A man of a pure heart will ſpeak a pure language; a good man will talk of good things; a wiſe man of wiſdom, and a gracious man of the grace of God; of the doctrines of grace he has received; of the bleſſings of grace beſtowed on him; of the promiſes of grace applied unto him; of the experiences of grace he has been favoured with; of things grateful and acceptable to others, which miniſter grace, and are to the uſe of edifying. The king ſhall be his friend; carry himſelf friendly to him, admit him to familiarity with him, take him into his court, and make him of his privy-council; this is what a king ſhould do, and what a wiſe and good king will do, and it is his intereſt ſo to do: a man of an upright heart, and of a graceful ſpeech, is or ſhould be regarded by princes; as Huſhai the Archite by David; and Daniel, even by Nebuchadnezzar, an heathen king. Jarchi's note is, "the holy, bleſſed God loves and embraces "him;" and this ſenſe may very well be received: the Lord loves purity of heart; he is good to them that are of a clean heart; he loves graceful lips, or lips ſpeaking grace, in prayer, praiſe, or chriſtian converſation: he is a friend to ſuch; to the pure, he ſhews himſelf pure; the pure in heart ſhall ſee him, and ever dwell with him: Chriſt, who is King of kings and Lord of lords, loves purity and righteouſneſs, and hates iniquity; the lips of his people are pleaſing to him, they are like a thread of ſcarlet; he loves to hear their voice, eſpecially ſpeaking of his own grace; he is a friend unto them, one that loves at all times, and ſticks cloſer than a brother.

℣. 12. The eyes of the Lord preſerve knowledge, &c.] That is, the providence of God, whoſe eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth; theſe preſerve the knowledge of himſelf, even among the heathens in ſome meaſure; for what may be known of God is manifeſt in them, and ſhewed to them: more particularly his providence has preſerved the ſcriptures, the means of knowledge, which men would have deſtroyed; and preſerves men of knowledge, as Aben Ezra interprets it, the miniſters of the word, the ſtars he holds in his right hand; and he preſerves ſpiritual and experimental knowledge in the hearts of his people, and cauſes it to increaſe; and continues his goſpel, and a goſpel-miniſtry in the world, till they all come to the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God. Or his eyes obſerve, look unto with delight and pleaſure knowledge, and men of knowledge, that know him, and do his will. And he overthroweth the words of the tranſgreſſor; the perfidious, treacherous man; the falſe teacher, that corrupts the word of God, and handles it deceitfully: the doctrines of ſuch he overthrows, and confutes, and brings to nothing, by his Spirit in his faithful miniſters; and cauſes truth to prevail, and all iniquity to ſtop its mouth: particularly the words and doctrines of the great tranſgreſſor, the lawleſs and wicked one, the man of ſin, Antichriſt; theſe have been expoſed and overthrown already, and will be more and more ſo in God's due time.

℣. 13. The ſlothful man ſaith, There is a lion without, &c.] Or, in the ſtreet. This he ſays within himſelf; or to thoſe who call him out, and put him on doing the buſineſs of his proper calling, whether in the field or elſewhere, which, through his ſlothfulneſs, he has a diſinclination to; and therefore frames excuſes, and ſuggeſts this and that difficulty or danger in the way, expreſſed by a lion without; and which ſhews the folly and weakneſs of his excuſes, ſince lions do not uſually walk in cities, towns and villages, and in the ſtreets of them, but in woods and mountains. I ſhall be ſlain in the ſtreets; by the lion there; or I ſhall never be able to get over the difficulties, and through the dangers, which attending to buſineſs will expoſe me to. Some apply this to the difficulties that ſlothful perſons imagine in the learning of languages, arts and ſciences; as Jarchi applies it to the learning of the law.

℣. 14. The mouth of ſtrange women is a deep pit, &c.] The mouth of harlots; the kiſſes of their mouth, their fair ſpeech and flattering words, their amorous talk, and laſcivious and wanton language, enſnare and draw unwary perſons to commit lewdneſs with them, which bring them into a pit of ruin and deſtruction; a filthy one, and very deep, out of which it is not eaſy nor uſual to be extricated; the alluſion is to beaſts taken in a pit dug for them; and theſe are as natural brute beaſts, made to be taken and deſtroyed. He that is abhorred of the Lord, ſhall fall therein; who has been guilty of other ſins, and ſuch as has cauſed the Lord to abhor him, and therefore leaves him to fall into this: one ſin not only leads on to another, but is the puniſhment of another; men are ſeldom guilty of this ſin of whoredom, but who have been firſt abandoned to other vices very provoking to God; ſee Eccl. vii. 26. Jarchi interprets all this of idolatry; and it may be very well applied to the whore of Rome, and the harlots ſhe is mother of; who, by her fair words and falſe doctrines, by her mouth ſpeaking blaſphemies and lies in hypocriſy, by her golden cup in her hand full of abomination and filthineſs of fornication, and by her ſorceries, have deceived many, and brought them into the pit of perdition and ruin: and theſe are ſuch whoſe names are not written in the Lamb's book of life; but are rejected of God, and given up to believe a lie, that they might be damned, Rev. xvii. 4, 5, 8. 2 Theſſ. ii. 11, 12.

℣. 15. Fooliſhneſs is bound in the heart of a child, &c.] That is, ſin, the greateſt of all folly; this is naturally in the heart of man; it is in the heart of a child, it is in him from his infancy; it is bound in his heart, it is rooted and riveted in him, being conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity; it is what cleaves cloſe to him, and he has a ſtrong affection for and deſire after: the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth, Gen. viii. 21. ſo that he is not eaſily brought off of ſin, or becomes wiſe. But the rod of correction ſhall drive it far from him; the rod uſed by parents, for the correction of ſin and folly, is a means of making children wiſe, and of reſtraining the folly that is bound up in them; and of reclaiming them from thoſe ſinful ways, which the folly of their hearts leads them to, and ſo in ſome meaſure of driving it far from them.

[z] חן שפתיו gratia ſunt labia ejus, De Dieu, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens; cujus labia ſunt grata, i. e. gratioſa, Mercerus; gratia in labiis ejus eſt, ſome in Vatablus.

℣. 16. He that oppreſſeth the poor to increaſe his riches, &c.] By taking away from them the little they have; by keeping back their hire, defrauding them of the juſt wages of their labours; or by uſury and extortion, or any other unjuſt method, whereby they diſtreſs the poor, and enrich themſelves. And he that giveth to the rich, ſhall ſurely come to want; that gives to thoſe that are richer than he; or that are in greater power and authority, that they may protect him in the poſſeſſion of his ill-gotten riches; yet, after all, it ſhall not thrive and proſper with him, it will all iſſue in poverty and want: or, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, he ſhall give to one more rich, and ſhall want; he ſhall be forced to give it to another richer than he, and of greater power, and ſo ſhall get nothing by his oppreſſion of the poor; but as he has ſerved the poor, ſo ſhall he be ſerved himſelf, and be brought to beggary and want; ſee chap. xxi. 13.

℣. 17. Bow down thine ear, and hear the words of the wiſe, &c.] Here begins a new part or diviſion of this book. According ſo ſome, the third; the firſt ending with the ninth chapter, the ſecond at the preceding verſe, and a third, beginning here, and ending with the twenty fourth chapter. It is certain, that what follows from hence to the end of that, is written in another ſtile, by way of exhortation, caution and inſtruction, and is directed to particular perſons: as here an exhortation is made to Solomon's ſon, or to thoſe that attended his inſtruction; or rather to the children of wiſdom, that is, Chriſt; to liſten attentively to the words of the wiſe; of Solomon, and other wiſe men before him, or cotemporary with him; or rather of wiſdom and her maidens, Chriſt, and the wiſe men ſent by him; who are made wiſe to ſalvation, and furniſhed for every good work by him, from whom the words of the wiſe come; and who ſpeak the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; and whoſe doctrines are to be heard and received, not as the word of men, but as the word of God. And apply thine heart unto my knowledge; the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things, Chriſt inſtructs in, and the knowledge of himſelf; which is preferable to all other knowledge, and to thouſands of gold and ſilver; and in compariſon of which all things are but loſs and dung; and therefore ſhould be applied unto with intenſeneſs of mind, and cordially received.

℣. 18. For it is a pleaſant thing, if thou keep them within thee, &c.] Or, in thy belly [a]. That is, in thine heart, in the inmoſt receſſes of it; where the words or doctrines of the wiſe ſhould be received in the love of them, and carefully laid up and retained; which will upon reflection yield much pleaſure, like Ezekiel's roll, which was in his belly as honey for ſweetneſs; and which alſo is very profitable as an antidote againſt ſin, Pſal. cxix. 11. They ſhall withal be fitted in thy lips; become them, and be ſuitable and graceful to them: or, ſhall be ordered and diſpoſed in or by thy lips [b]; being received into the heart, and digeſted there, they ſhall eaſily and freely go off the tongue, which ſhall be as the pen of a ready writer; they ſhall be delivered in a regular manner, with great liberty and facility; by a good digeſtion of goſpel-truths, and a comfortable experience of them, perſons become apt to teach others.

℣. 19. That thy truſt may be in the Lord, &c.] By means of the words of the wiſe, or doctrines of the goſpel, faith in Chriſt is firſt had; men are directed and encouraged hereby to believe in him; and by the ſame means faith is increaſed, confirmed and eſtabliſhed. This is the end of penning the ſcriptures, and of the goſpel-miniſtry, as follows: I have made known to thee this day, even to thee; the ſaid words and doctrines in the miniſtry of the word, by the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of them; giving not only a notional, but a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of them. The Lord has particular perſons to whom he will make known theſe things in a ſaving way; it is to thee, even to thee; and to every one whom God has choſen, and Chriſt has redeemed: and he has particular times and ſeaſons for it, this day; which is a time of life and love; when darkneſs is removed, and the light of grace ſhines, and makes it day; and may reſpect the whole goſpel-diſpenſation, which is the accepted time and day of ſalvation.

℣. 20. Have not I written to thee excellent things, &c.] In the ſcriptures. Some render it, three things [c]; and think that Solomon refers to the three diviſions of the ſcriptures among the Jews, the Law, the Prophets, and holy Writings; ſo Jarchi; but ſome of thoſe writings then were not: or to the three books wrote by him; the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and Song of Songs. Others render it, in a threefold way [d], as the Targum and ſeveral verſions; that is, in various ways, in different forms and ſtiles, in order the better to inform and inſtruct. But it is beſt, with Kimchi, Gerſom and Ben Melech, to render it, excellent things, as we do; ſuch are the truths of the goſpel; they are more excellent than thoſe that are only known by the light of nature, or by the law of Moſes: ſuch as reſpect the love and grace of God; the perſon and offices of Chriſt; peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, atonement, life and ſalvation by him. And theſe are ſaid to lie in counſels and knowledge; in diſcloſing the counſels of God, according to which they are; in giving the beſt of counſels to men; to periſhing ſinners, to look to Chriſt for ſalvation; to naked ones, to buy of him white raiment, or the robe of his righteouſneſs; to guilty and filthy ones, to apply to his blood for pardon and cleanſing; to hungry and thirſty ones, to come unto him for food, the bread of life, and water of life; and to weary ones, to him for reſt; and all to do their duty both to God and men: and they alſo reſpect knowledge; the knowledge of divine and heavenly things; the knowledge of God in Chriſt, and of his perfections, as diſplayed in his ſalvation; the knowledge of Chriſt, what he is in himſelf, what he has done for his people, and is unto them; and eſpecially the knowledge of ſalvation by him; all which the goſpel is a means of.

℣. 21. That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth, &c.] Such are the doctrines of the goſpel; they are the words of truth, are written in the ſcriptures of truth; come from the God of truth; the ſubject-matter of which is Chriſt, who is the truth, and which the Spirit of truth leads into: there is a certainty in theſe; they are in the ſure word of prophecy; are contained in the inſpired and infallible word of God, and are no other than the goſpel of God; nothing is more ſure than that Jeſus is the Chriſt, the Son of the living God, and truly and properly God; and that ſalvation is alone by him; and that whoever believes in him ſhall be ſaved; with many other things, which miniſters of the word ſhould affirm with boldneſs and aſſurance; and which others may come to a certain knowledge of, even to the riches of a full aſſurance of underſtanding; and which is the end of their being written in the word, and made known in the miniſtry of it. That thou mighteſt anſwer the words of truth to them that ſend unto thee; or, return[e] them to thoſe that ſend to know what are the words of truth; that enquire concerning them with meekneſs and fear, and to whom a reaſon of the hope is to be given; as ſuch are capable of, who have had the certainty of theſe words made known unto them, or who have been aſſured of the truth of them: and ſo Jarchi interprets it, to them that aſk of thee inſtruction; as if it was written, as Lyra ſays it ſhould, לשואליך to them that enquire of thee. It may be rendered, to them that ſend thee[f]; to ſearch for thoſe things, and get the knowledge of them, in order to communicate them, which, when obtained, may be done. Unleſs God, Father, Son and Spirit, ſhould be intended, who are concerned in the ſending of miniſters to preach the goſpel to men; to whom they are to return an account of the words of truth, and of their diſpenſation of them to the ſouls of men; which, when faithfully done, and with ſucceſs, they give up their account with joy, and not with grief.

℣. 22. Rob not the poor, becauſe he is poor, &c.] And cannot help himſelf; cannot go to law with him that has injured him, and defend his own cauſe; which the other knowing, is the more emboldened to ſpoil and defraud him, which is an aggravation of his ſin: or, for he is poor[g]; to rob any man, is an evil and an injurious thing; but to rob the poor is cruel and barbarous; rather ſomething ſhould be given them, and not any thing taken from them: or, though he is poor[h]; let not that be an inducement to injure him, but the contrary. Neither oppreſs the afflicted in the gate; or the poor[i]; the ſame as before, only a different word uſed: when he comes into a court of judicature, which was uſually held in the gates of a city, Ruth iv. 1, 2. and applies for redreſs of any grievance, do not cruſh him in the gate, or oppreſs him in judgment; nor wreſt his cauſe, and do him wrong; but let him have juſtice done him, though poor. Some underſtand this of uſing the poor ill, when they come to their gates to beg; which ſenſe is favoured by the Septuagint verſion; but the former is beſt. One might have expected, after ſuch a preface or introduction as in the preceding verſes, that ſomething of more importance, ſomething more ſpiritual and evangelical, would have followed: this ſhews the great regard the Lord has to the poor, and how much they are on his mind, and how near they lie to his heart; eſpecially the poor of the flock, worried and ſpoiled by Antichriſt; ſee Zech. xi. 7, 11.

℣. 23. For the Lord will plead their cauſe, &c.] If counſellors at the bar will not, he will; if judges on the bench will not do them juſtice, he will; he will judge the poor of the people; he will plead their cauſe, and plead it thoroughly, till he has brought forth judgment unto victory: wo to the man againſt whom Jehovah pleads; happy the poor on whoſe ſide he is; for their Redeemer is mighty, the Lord of hoſts is his name, Pſal. lxxii. 4. Jer. l. 34. And ſpoil the ſoul of thoſe that ſpoiled them; they could only ſpoil the poor of their goods, but the Lord can and will ſpoil and deſtroy the ſouls of the ſpoilers in hell: or, ſpoil them that ſpoiled their ſoul or life[k]; that is, who ſpoiled them of their goods, and took away that ſmall pittance they had, which was their life or livelihood; they ſhall be ſpoiled themſelves that ſpoil others; the ſame meaſure they have meted out, ſhall be meaſured out to them again; God will deſtroy them that deſtroy the earth, even Antichriſt and his followers, the oppreſſors of Chriſt's poor on earth, Rev. xi. 18.

℣. 24. Make no friendſhip with an angry man, &c.] Do not aſſociate with him; contract not a familiarity with him; make him not a companion; take him not into an intimacy, or uſe him as a particular friend and acquaintance: a man ſhould be courteous, and carry it civilly to all men; but he ſhould take care whom he admits as his boſom-friend; he ſhould be cautious in his choice of a familiar friend, and not receive any; and among the reſt, avoid an angry and paſſionate man, one who is much given to paſſion himſelf, and ſtirs it up in others; for there can be no laſting peace and pleaſure in ſuch a man's company and converſation. And with a furious man thou ſhalt not go; not take a walk with him, much leſs a journey; or ſhalt not be frequently together. It may be rendered, unto a man of wraths, or of great wrath and fury, thou ſhalt not come; not enter into his houſe, nor ſeek his company, and court his converſation, which rather ſhould be ſhunned.

℣. 25. Leſt thou learn his ways, &c.] And be as wrathful and furious, as quarrelſome and contentious as he is. Evil works and ways are ſoon learned; men are more ready to imitate what is evil than what is good: Joſeph learned to ſwear in Pharaoh's court; and the Iſraelites learned the works of the heathen, among whom they were mingled; evil communications corrupt good manners. Many men, naturally mild and gentle, tender-hearted and compaſſionate, by being brought up among or converſing with blood-thirſty Papiſts, and imbibing their cruel notions and ſentiments, have become fierce, and as furious perſecutors of others. And get a ſnare to thy ſoul; be drawn into ſin, by ſpeaking paſſionate words, or doing raſh actions, which will bring on puniſhment, either in this world, or in that to come, or in both; which may affect the ſoul or life here; the taking of it away, or the eternal damnation of the ſoul hereafter.

℣. 26. Be not thou one of them that ſtrike hands, &c.] Or among them[m], of the number of them, that do as they do, give their hand or their bond for others; be ſurety for them, as it is explained in the following clauſe; ſee chap. vi. 1. and xvii. 18. Or of them that are ſureties for debts; contracted by others; that engage for the payment of them, in caſe the principal fails: and it is much, if perſons, that keep indifferent company, angry and furious men, who are often in broils and quarrels, and ſpend their time and ſubſtance in ſtrife and contention, are not drawn into engagements of this kind.

℣. 27. If thou haſt nothing to pay, &c.] When the debtor fails, and the creditor demands the debt of the ſurety: it is weakneſs in a man to be a ſurety for another, when he knows he is not able to pay the debt he is bound for, ſince it may be an injury to himſelf and family; but it is a piece of wickedneſs to engage for the payment of a debt, in caſe of inſolvency, which he knows he is not able to anſwer; for this is deceiving and impoſing upon the creditor; and therefore it is no wonder, being provoked by ſuch ill uſage, if he goes to extremity, as follows: Why ſhould he take away thy bed from under thee? as in all likelihood he will, being irritated by ſuch a conduct; and as he might, notwithſtanding the law in Exod. xxii. 26, 27. for that reſpects a pledge, and not a debt; and raiment pledged, the covering of a man when in bed, and not the bed itſelf; for even wife and children might be taken for debt, 2 Kings iv. 1. Matt. viii. 25. This is ſaid to deter from ſuretiſhip, eſpecially in ſuch circumſtances; ſince a man may bring himſelf into ſuch a condition, as not to have a bed to lie on; yea, to have it taken from under him when upon it; and be turned out from houſe and home, naked and deſtitute.

℣. 28. Remove not the ancient land-mark which thy fathers have ſet.] Or, the ancient border or boundary[n]; by which lands, eſtates and inheritances, were marked, bounded and diſtinguiſhed; ſet by anceſtors in agreement with their neighbours; which to remove was contrary to a law, and a curſe is denounced upon thoſe that did it, Deut. xix. 14. and xxvii. 17. and was always reckoned a very heinous crime in early times; ſee the note on Job xxiv. 2. This was ſo ſacred a thing among the Romans, that they had a deity which preſided over thoſe bounds, and had its name from them. Some apply this, in a political ſenſe, to laws of long ſtanding, and cuſtoms of long preſcription; and others interpret it, in a theological ſenſe, of doctrines and practices, ſettled by the fathers of the church; which, if underſtood of Chriſt and his apoſtles only, will be allowed; but if of the ancient fathers of the church that followed them, it ſhould not be received; ſince they were but fallible men, and guilty of many errors and miſtakes, both in doctrine and practice.

℣. 29. Seeſt thou a man diligent in his buſineſs? &c.] In the buſineſs of his calling, be it what it will, whether for himſelf or his maſter; conſtant in it, ſwift, ready and expeditious at it; who induſtriouſly purſues it, chearfully attends it, makes quick diſpatch of it; does it off of hand, at once, and is not ſlothful in it, nor weary of it; when you have obſerved and taken notice of ſuch a man, which is not very common, you may, without a ſpirit of prophecy, foreſee that ſuch a man will riſe in the world. He ſhall ſtand before kings; he ſhall not ſtand before mean men; or obſcure perſons[o]: he ſhall not continue in the ſervice of ignoble perſons, or keep company with them; but he ſhall be taken into the ſervice of princes and noble men, and be admitted into their preſence, and receive favours from them; as Joſeph, who was induſtrious and diligent in his buſineſs in Potiphar's houſe, was in proceſs of time advanced, and ſtood before Pharaoh king of Egypt, Gen. xxxix. 4. and xli. 46. This may be ſpiritually applied. Every good man has a work or buſineſs to do in a religious way; ſome in a higher ſphere, as officers of churches, miniſters and deacons; the work of the one lies in reading, ſtudy, meditation and prayer, in the miniſtration of the word and ordinances, and other duties of their office; and the buſineſs of the others in taking care of the poor, and the ſecular affairs of the churches; others in a lower way, and common to all Chriſtians, which lies in the exerciſe of grace, and performance of all good works, relative to themſelves, their families, and the church of God. Now miniſters that are diligent in teaching and ruling; and deacons that do their office well; and private Chriſtians, who are ſtedfaſt and immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; are ready to every good work, heartily engaged in it, and conſtantly at it; ſhall not be company for the ſons of darkneſs, unregenerate men, who are in the dark, and darkneſs itſelf; what communion has light with darkneſs, with works of darkneſs, they ſhould be not workers of? or have any fellowſhip with the prince of darkneſs, from whoſe power they are delivered; but ſhall have ſociety with the ſaints, who are made kings and prieſts unto God; ſhall be admitted into the preſence of the King of kings now, and have communion with him; and ſhall ſtand before him at the great day with confidence, and not be aſhamed; ſhall ſtand at his right hand, and ſhall be for ever with him. So the Jews[p] interpret this place, he ſhall not ſtand before dark ones, in hell; he ſhall ſtand before kings, in the garden of Eden, in paradiſe; that is, in heaven.

CHAP. XXIII.

℣. 1. WHEN thou ſitteſt to eat with a ruler, &c.] Either a ſupreme ruler, a king, or a ſubordinate ruler, a nobleman, a judge, a civil magiſtrate, a perſon of honour, dignity and authority; and to ſit at table with ſuch is ſometimes allowed, and is always reckoned an honour; this particularly diligent and induſtrious perſons are admitted to, who not only are brought to ſtand before kings and great perſons, but to ſit at table with them, and eat food with them. And now the wiſe man adviſes ſuch how to behave themſelves when this is the caſe: Conſider diligently what is before thee; or, conſidering conſider[q]: take ſpecial notice of the food and drink ſet upon the table, and conſider well which may be moſt proper and ſafe to eat and drink of; for though a man may lawfully eat of whatſoever is ſet before him; every creature of God being good, if it be received with thankſgiving, and ſanctified by the word of God and prayer; yet it is a piece of wiſdom to make uſe of that which is moſt conducive to health, and leſs enſnaring; and to obſerve moderation in all, and not indulge to gluttony and drunkenneſs: and he ſhould conſider alſo who is before him, which ſenſe the words will bear; the ruler that has invited him, and ſits at the table with him, and take care that he ſays or does nothing that may give him offence; and alſo the noble perſonages that are gueſts with him, and behave towards them ſuitable to their rank and dignity; obſerve their words and conduct, and imitate the ſame; yea, even he ſhould conſider the ſervants and waiters that attend, leſt, behaving in an indecent and diſorderly manner, they ſhould report it to his diſadvantage to their ruler or others. But how much greater an honour is it to ſit at table with the King of kings, and with his princes, and ſup with him! when it becomes the ſaints, who have this honour, to conſider what is ſet before them; the richeſt dainties, a feaſt of fat things, the body and blood of Chriſt, which ſhould be ſpiritually diſcerned by faith; and not the elements of bread and wine only: likewiſe the perſons before whom they are, ſhould be conſidered; Chriſt, who ſits at his table, and the princes of his people with him; and therefore ſhould not feed without fear, and in a diſorderly and indecent manner, as the Corinthians are charged, but with all reverence and humility.

[q] בין תבין conſiderando conſidera, Pagninus, Vatablus, Piſcator, Mercerus, Gejerus.

℣. 2. And put a knife to thy throat, &c.] Refrain from too much talk at the table; give not too much looſe to thy tongue, but bridle it, conſidering in whoſe preſence thou art; do not uſe too much freedom, either with the ruler or fellow-gueſts; which, when perſons have eat and drank well, they are too apt to do, and ſometimes ſay things offenſive to one or the other; it is good for a man to be upon his guard; ſee Eccl. v. 2. Or reſtrain thine appetite; deny thyſelf of ſome things agreeable, that would lead thee to what might be hurtful, at leaſt if indulged to exceſs: put as it were a knife unto thine appetite, and mortify it; which is the ſame as cutting off a right hand, or plucking out a right eye, Matt. v. 29, 30. Or whilſt thou art at ſuch a table, at ſuch a ſumptuous entertainment, conſider thyſelf as in danger, as if thou hadſt a knife at thy throat; and ſhouldeſt thou be too free with the food or liquor, it would be as it were cutting thine own throat. If thou be a man given to appetite; there is then the more danger; and therefore ſuch a perſon ſhould be doubly on his guard, ſince he is in the way of temptation to that he is naturally inclined to. Or, if thou art maſter of appetite[r]: ſo the Targum, “if thou art maſter of thy “ſoul;” if thou haſt power over it, and the command of it, and canſt reſtrain it with eaſe; to which agrees the Vulgate Latin verſion: but the former ſenſe is more agreeable to the Hebrew idiom.

℣. 3. Be not deſirous of his dainties, &c.] His ſavoury food, which is very grateful to the taſte, his rich proviſions and royal dainties; do not luſt after them, as the word[s] ſignifies, in an immoderate way, as the Iſraelites luſted after the fleſh-pots in Egypt: theſe may be lawfully deſired, but not ſinfully luſted after; and in feeding on them nature may be ſatisfied, and not the ſenſual luſts gratified in ſuch a manner they crave, which would be criminal. For they are deceitful meat; or, bread of lies[t]: through the pleaſant and agreeable taſte of them, they lead on to luxury and exceſs before a man is aware, and ſo deceive him; they promiſe him a great deal of pleaſure, but, being too much indulged to, they produce ſickneſs and nauſeouſneſs. Some think they are called ſo, from the intention and iſſue of them; being deſigned to draw out ſecrets, which men are very apt to divulge, when they have eat and drank freely. Some apply this to falſe doctrines, which are framed ſometimes in a very plauſible manner, and deceive the ſimple; are bread of lies, lies in hypocriſy, and are very pernicious; ſuch words eat, as do a canker, inſtead of yielding ſolid nouriſhment.

℣. 4. Labour not to be rich, &c.] In an immoderate over anxious way and manner, to a wearineſs, as the word[u] ſignifies, and even as to gape for breath; men ought to labour that they may have wherewith to ſupport themſelves and families, and give to others; and if they can, lay up for their children; but then perſons ſhould not toil and weary themſelves to heap up riches when they know not who ſhall gather them; and much leſs make uſe of indirect and illicit methods to obtain them; reſolving to be rich at any rate: rather men ſhould labour for durable riches, lay up treaſure in heaven, ſeek thoſe things which are above, and labour to be accepted of God both here and hereafter; which only is in Chriſt. The Targum is, “do “not draw nigh to a rich man;” and ſo the Syriac verſion; to which agree the Septuagint and Arabic verſions. Ceaſe from thine own wiſdom; worldly wiſdom in getting riches, as if this was the higheſt point of wiſdom; do not be always laying ſchemes, forming projects, inventing new things in order to get money; or do not depend upon thine own wiſdom and underſtanding, and expect to be rich by means thereof; for bread is not always to the wiſe, nor riches to men of underſtanding, Eccl. ix. 11. The Targum is, “but by thine underſtanding depart from him;” the rich man; and to the ſame purpoſe the Syriac and Arabic verſions.

℣. 5. Wilt thou ſet thine eyes upon that which is not? &c.] The Vulgate Latin verſion is, “do “not lift up thine eyes to riches which thou canſt “not have;” riches no doubt are intended, and which may be ſaid to be not; they are not the true riches, have only the ſhadow and appearance of riches; they are not laſting and durable; in a little time they will not be; they are periſhing things, they have no ſubſtance or ſolidity in them; they are not ſatisfying; they do not make them happy; they are rather non-entities than realities; and therefore the eyes of the mind, and the affections of the heart, ſhould not be ſet on them: it may be rendered, wilt thou cauſe thine eyes to fly upon that which is not[w]? denoting the intenſeneſs of the mind, and the eagerneſs of the affections, and with what rapidity and force they move towards them. The Targum is, “if thou fixeſt thine eyes on him, “he ſhall not appear to thee;” meaning, the rich man: and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions. Ben Melech makes mention of other ſenſes very different; according to R. Judah, the word ſignifies darkneſs, wilt thou make thine eyes dark; according to others, it ſignifies light, wilt thou make thine eyes to ſhine; and according to Jarchi, wilt thou double, or ſhut thine eyes. For riches certainly make themſelves wings; or, it in making makes itſelf wings[x]; even that which is not, on which men cauſe their eyes to fly; no ſooner are their eyes upon that, but that flies away from them like a bird with wings; ſee Hoſ. ix. 11. Either men are taken from that, or that from them, and ſometimes very ſwiftly and ſuddenly. They fly away as an eagle towards heaven; the eagle flies very ſwiftly, none more ſwiftly; it flies towards heaven, out of ſight, and out of reach, and out of call; ſo riches flee away to God, the original giver of them, from whence they came, and who is the ſole diſpoſer of them; they own him as the proprietor and diſtributer of them; and they flee to heaven as it were for freſh orders where they ſhould be, and into whoſe hands they ſhould come next; they flee away, ſo as not to be ſeen any more, and be recovered by thoſe who have formerly enjoyed them.

℣. 6. Eat thou not the bread of him that hath an evil eye, &c.] A ſordid, covetous man, that grudges every bit that is eaten, in oppoſition to a man of a good eye, or a bountiful one, that is liberal and generous, chap. xxii. 9. if he invites to a meal, do not accept of it, ſit not down at his table to eat with him; neither deſire thou his dainty meats, or ſavory food, ſo as to luſt after it; ſee the note on ℣. 3.

℣. 7. For as he thinketh in his heart, ſo is he, &c.] He is not the man his mouth ſpeaks or declares him to be, but what his heart thinks; which is diſcovered by his looks and actions, and by which he is to be judged of, and not by his words. Eat and drink, ſaith he to thee, but his heart is not with thee; he bids you eat and drink, but he does not deſire you ſhould, at leaſt but very ſparingly; it is only a mere compliment, not a hearty welcome.

℣. 8. The morſel which thou haſt eaten ſhalt thou vomit up, &c.] It ſhall turn in thy ſtomach, thou ſhalt not be able to keep it, when thou underſtandeſt thou art not welcome; or thou wilt wiſh thou hadſt never eaten a bit, or that thou couldſt vomit up what thou haſt; ſo diſagreeable is the thought of being unwelcome, or when this appears to be the caſe. And loſe thy ſweet words; expreſſed in thankfulneſs to the maſter of the feaſt, in praiſe of his food, in pleaſantry with him and the other gueſts at table; all which are repented of when a man finds he is not welcome.

℣. 9. Speak not in the ears of a fool, &c.] For it is only beating the air, and ſpeaking to the wind; it is caſting pearls before ſwine, and that which is holy to dogs. By the fool is meant a wicked man, one abandoned to ſin and hardened in it; that ſcoffs at all admonitions and reproofs, that derides the word, and the preachers of it, and makes a mock at all good men and every thing they ſay; and therefore what is ſerious and ſacred ſhould not be ſaid to them, ſince it only becomes the object of their banter and ridicule. For he will deſpiſe the wiſdom of thy words; not only the words of doctrine, reproof, and correction, but the wiſdom of them; or let them be ever ſo wiſely ſpoken; for if the wiſdom of God and his words, the truths of the goſpel, are fooliſhneſs with ſuch, and deſpiſed by them, then much more the wiſdom even of the beſt of men, and the wiſeſt things they ſay; yea, when they deliver the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, the hidden wiſdom, the goſpel of Chriſt, which therefore ſhould be ſpoken among them that are perfect, 1 Cor. i. 24, 25. and ii. 6, 7.

℣. 10. Remove not the old land-mark, &c.] See the note on chap. xxii. 28. And enter not into the fields of the fatherleſs; to carry off the increaſe of them, to reap their wheat, or mow their graſs, or turn in cattle to eat it; or to incroach upon them, take in any part of them, or join the whole to their own; for if there is a wo to them that lay field ro field, much more to them that enter into and take the fields of the fatherleſs and join them to their own, Iſa. v. 8.

℣. 11. For their redeemer is mighty, &c.] As he muſt needs be, ſince the Lord of hoſts is his name; who ſympathizes with them, has mercy on them, is their father and their friend; ſee Jer. l. 34. Hoſea xiv. 3. Pſal. lxviii. 5. He ſhall plead their cauſe with thee; or againſt thee, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; and will certainly carry it for them and againſt thee; for when he undertakes a cauſe, he pleads it thoroughly.

℣. 12. Apply thine heart unto inſtruction, &c.] To the inſtruction of parents, and to the inſtruction of miniſters of the word; to the ſcriptures, which are profitable to inſtruction in righteouſneſs; to the inſtruction of wiſdom, or to the goſpel of Chriſt, which inſtructs in things relating to him, and to ſalvation by him! or bring in thine heart to inſtruction[y]; not only bring thy body to the place of inſtruction, the houſe of God, but bring thine heart thither alſo. And thine ears to the words of knowledge; the doctrines of the goſpel, which are the means of the knowledge of God and Chriſt, and of all divine, ſpiritual, and heavenly things; and of a growth in the knowledge of them; and therefore ſhould be diligently hearkened and cordially attended to.

℣. 13. Withhold not correction from the child, &c.] When he has committed a fault, and correction is neceſſary; for to ſpare it, is the ruin of the child, and no proof of true affection in the parent, but the reverſe; ſee chap. xiii. 24. and xix. 18. For, if thou beateſt him with the rod, he ſhall not die; if he be beaten moderately, there is no danger of his dying under the rod, or with the ſtripes given him; beſides ſuch moderate and proper corrections may be a means of preſerving him from ſuch crimes as would bring him to a ſhameful and untimely death, and ſo he ſhall not die ſuch a death; and by ſuch means, through the grace of God, he may eſcape the ſecond or eternal death.

℣. 14. Thou ſhalt beat him with the rod, &c.] Or correct him with the ſtripes of the children of men, in a moderate and ſuitable manner, proportionable to the fault committed; and as he is able to bear it, both as to body and mind. And ſhalt deliver his ſoul from hell; be a means of preventing thoſe ſins which would bring to hell and deſtruction; and of bringing to repentance for thoſe committed; and ſo of ſaving his ſoul, which ſhould be the chief thing parents ſhould have in view in chaſtiſing their children; the ſalvation of whoſe ſouls ſhould be dear unto them, as it is to all truly gracious and thoughtful ones.

℣. 15. My ſon, if thine heart be wiſe, &c.] To that which is good; ſo as from it to underſtand in a ſpiritual and experimental manner things divine and heavenly; he may be ſaid to have a wiſe heart who knows in ſome meaſure what his heart is, the wickedneſs, the original depravity and corruption of it; the plague of his own heart; the weakneſs and inability of it to do that which is good; the inſufficiency of his own righteouſneſs to juſtify him before God; the poverty of his ſpirit, and the folly of his mind: and who alſo is wiſe unto ſalvation; that knows the way of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by Chriſt; and who applies to him for the ſame; builds on him the foundation; prizes and values him; rejoices in him, and gives him the glory of his ſalvation; receives his doctrines, and obeys his commands; takes up and makes a profeſſion of him on right principles, and walks wiſely, becoming his character and profeſſion. My heart ſhall rejoice, even mine; it ſhall certainly and greatly rejoice; theſe words are ſpoken either by Solomon, who had a wiſe heart himſelf, and that either to his ſon, for whom he deſired the ſame, nothing being more rejoicing to pious parents than to ſee their children become wiſe, eſpecially in ſpiritual things; or elſe to thoſe that attended on him for inſtruction, who was a preacher in Jeruſalem; and what is the joy and crown of rejoicing of miniſters but their converts, and to ſee them walking in the truth? 1 Theſ. ii, 19, 20. 2 John 4. 3 John 4. or theſe words are ſpoken by wiſdom, that is, by Chriſt, to his children; who rejoices when he has found them, or when they are converted, and become wiſe in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and walk worthy, whereby wiſdom is juſtified of her children, Luke xv. 5, 6. Matt. xi. 19. yea there is joy in heaven, joy among the angels there, and even in the Father of Chriſt, and of his people, Luke xv. 7, 10, 23, 24.

℣. 16. Yea, my reins ſhall rejoice, &c.] Which is only another phraſe expreſſive of the ſame thing, and confirming the greatneſs of joy on the above occaſion; not only his heart rejoiced, which was affectionately concerned for his ſon, near which he lay, the deſires of which were frequently drawn out for his good, but his reins alſo; the ſeat of the affections rejoiced at it; ſhewing how vehement, ſincere and hearty the joy was. When thy lips ſpeak right things; as they will, when the heart is wiſe; things agreeable to right reaſon, to the ſcriptures of truth, the oracles of God; to the law and to the teſtimony; to the goſpel of Chriſt, and the doctrines of it; and ſuch things as are ſavoury, pleaſant, and profitable, and miniſter grace to the hearers. The Targum is, "when my lips ſpeak "right things;" ſee chap. viii. 6.

℣. 17. Let not thine heart envy ſinners, &c.] Their preſent proſperity and happineſs, the pleaſure, profit, and honour they ſeem to enjoy; all which is but a ſhadow, fading and temporary; and yet good men are apt to envy it in their hearts, if they do not expreſs it with their lips; and are ready to murmur and think it hard that they ſhould be in ſtraitened circumſtances whilſt the wicked are in flouriſhing ones; and inwardly fret and are uneaſy at it, which they ſhould not, Pſalm xxxvii. 1, 7. and lxxiii. 2. or do not emulate or imitate[z] them, or do as they do, thinking thereby to enjoy the ſame proſperity and happineſs; chooſe not their ways, nor deſire to be with them, to have their company, or be ranked among them, chap. iii. 31. and xxiv. 1. But be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long; let the fear of God be always before thine eyes and in thine heart; be continually in the exerciſe of fear, which is attended with faith and truſt in the Lord; with love and affection to him, and joy and delight in him; be conſtantly employed in the duties of religion, private and public, which the fear of God includes; and this will be a preſervative from envying, murmuring, and fretting at the outward happineſs of wicked men; and from joining with them in their evil ways. Aben Ezra, and who is followed by ſome others, render it, but emulate or imitate the men that fear the Lord all the day long[a]; be followers of them, and do as they do; let their conſtant piety and devotion ſtir up an holy emulation in thee to copy after them and exceed them; but the former ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 18. For ſurely there is an end, &c.] Both of the proſperity of the wicked, which is but for a ſhort time; and of the afflictions of the righteous, which are but as it were for a moment; and therefore there is no reaſon to envy the one, nor to be fretful under the other; the end to a good man will be peace and proſperity for ever: there is a reward[b], as ſome render it here, for the righteous, though not of debt but of grace; upon which account they have ground to expect much here and hereafter. And thine expectation ſhall not be cut off; or hope[c]; as an hypocrite's is; for the hope of a ſaint is well founded upon the perſon and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and is an anchor ſure and ſtedfaſt; his expectation of grace, and every needful ſupply of it, whilſt in this life, and of eternal glory and happineſs in the world to come, ſhall not periſh; but he ſhall enjoy what he is hoping, expecting, and waiting for.

℣. 19. Hear thou, my ſon, and be wiſe, &c.] Hear the inſtruction of a father, of the word of wiſdom, of the miniſters of the goſpel, which is the way to be wiſe unto ſalvation; faith comes by hearing; ſpiritual wiſdom, and an increaſe of it; the Spirit of God, and his gifts and graces. And guide thine heart in the way; in the way of the Lord, in the way of wiſdom and underſtanding, in the way of truth and faith, in the way of religious worſhip, in the way of the commandments and ordinances of the Lord; in all which the heart ſhould be guided and directed, or otherwiſe it will be of no avail.

℣. 20. Be not amongſt wine-bibbers, &c.] Who drink to exceſs, otherwiſe wine may be drank, provided moderation is uſed; but it is not good to be in company with exceſſive drinkers of it, leſt a habit of exceſſive drinking ſhould be acquired. Among riotous eaters of fleſh; fleſh may be lawfully eat, but not in a riotous manner, ſo as to indulge to gluttony and ſurfeiting; nor ſhould ſuch perſons be kept company with that do ſo, leſt their ways ſhould be learned and imitated.

℣. 21. For the drunkard and the glutton ſhall come to poverty, &c.] They conſuming their ſubſtance upon their bellies, in eating and drinking; ſee chap. xxi. 17. And drowſineſs ſhall clothe a man with rags; exceſſive eating and drinking brings drowſineſs on men, unfits them for buſineſs, and makes them idle and ſlothful; and ſpending all on their bellies, they have nothing for their backs, and are clothed in rags; ſee chap. xxiv. 33, 34.

℣. 22. Hearken unto thy father that begat thee, &c.] And who has a true and hearty affection for thee, and whatever he ſays is for thy good and welfare, which he ſtudies and has at heart; and who therefore alſo has an authority over thee, and what he enjoins ought to be ſtrictly regarded; and having lived longer in the world, muſt be thought to have a larger experience and knowledge of things, and therefore ſhould be hearkened unto. And deſpiſe not thy mother when ſhe is old; deſpiſe not her counſels, inſtructions, and advice, though ſhe is old; and becauſe ſhe is ſo, do not reject them as old wives fables, or as the ſilly talk of an old woman, as young men are too apt to do.

℣. 23. Buy the truth, and ſell it not, &c.] Evangelical truth, the word of truth, the goſpel of ſalvation, which comes from the God of truth; has Chriſt, who is the truth, for the ſum and ſubſtance of it; men are directed and led into it by the Spirit of truth; the whole matter of it is truth; truth, in oppoſition to the law that was typical and ſhadowy; to the errors of falſe teachers, to every thing that is fictitious, or another goſpel; and to that which is a lie, for no lie is of the truth: there are ſeveral particular doctrines of the goſpel which are ſo called; thoſe which reſpect the knowledge of one God, and three perſons in the godhead; the deity and ſonſhip of Chriſt, his incarnation and meſſiahſhip, ſalvation alone by him, a ſinner's juſtification by his righteouſneſs, and the reſurrection of the dead; the whole of which is truth, and is an anſwer to Pilate's queſtion, John xviii. 38. and this men ſhould buy, not books only, as Aben Ezra interprets it, ſuch as explain and confirm truth, though theſe ſhould be bought; and eſpecially the Bible, the ſcriptures of truth; yet this does not reach the ſenſe of the text: nor is it merely to be underſtood of perſons ſupporting the goſpel-miniſtry with their purſes, by which means truth is preſerved, propagated, and continued: no price is ſet upon it, as being above all; it ſhould be bought or had at any rate, let the expence be what it will: buying it ſuppoſes a perſon to have ſome knowledge of it, of the excellency, uſefulneſs, and importance of it; and ſhews that he ſets a value upon it, and has an high eſteem for it: it is to be underſtood of his uſing all means and taking great pains to acquire it; ſuch as reading the word, meditating upon it, attending on the public miniſtry, and fervent and frequent prayer for it, and a greater degree of knowledge of it; yea it ſignifies a perſon's parting with every thing for it that is required; as with his former errors he has been brought up in, or has imbibed; with his good name and reputation, being willing to be accounted a fool or a madman, and an enthuſiaſt, or any thing for the ſake of it, and even with life itſelf, when called for; and ſuch a man will ſtrive and contend for it, ſtand faſt in it, and hold it faſt, and not let it go, which is meant by ſelling it; truth is not to be ſold upon any account, or for any thing whatever; it is not to be ſlighted and neglected; it ſhould not be parted with, neither for the riches, and honours, and pleaſures of this life, nor for the ſake of a good name among men, nor for the ſake of peace, nor for the avoiding of perſecution; it ſhould be abode by, and not departed from, though the greater number is againſt it, and they the rich, the wiſe, and learned; and though it may be traduced as novel, irrational, and licentious, and be attended with affliction. Alſo wiſdom, and inſtruction, and underſtanding; that is, buy theſe alſo, and ſell them not; wiſdom is to be prized above every thing; it is the principal thing and ſhould be got; all means ſhould be uſed to obtain it; it may be bought without money; it ſhould be aſked of God, who gives it liberally, and being had ſhould be held faſt: the inſtruction the ſcriptures give, the inſtruction of the goſpel, the inſtruction of wiſdom, ſhould be valued above gold and ſilver, and diligently ſought after; ſhould be laid faſt hold on and not parted with: underſtanding of divine and ſpiritual things is to be gotten; happy is the man that gets it; and above all gettings this ſhould be got, and all means made uſe of to improve and increaſe it. The Targum, Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions connect theſe with the word ſell only, thus, buy the truth, and ſell not wiſdom, and inſtruction, and underſtanding; but as buying and ſelling both refer to truth, ſo likewiſe to theſe alſo. The whole verſe is wanting in the Septuagint and Arabic verſions.

℣. 24. The father of the righteous ſhall greatly rejoice, &c.] Or in rejoicing ſhall rejoice [d], in his ſon; not that he is rich, but righteous, truly righteous, internally and externally; having the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, and righteouſneſs and true holineſs wrought in him, and ſo lives ſoberly, righteouſly and godly: this muſt be underſtood of a father who is himſelf righteous; for otherwiſe wicked men, if their ſons do but thrive in the world, they are unconcerned about their character as righteous, or their ſtate and condition God-ward. And he that begetteth a wiſe child ſhall have joy of him; eſpecially if he is wiſe in the beſt things; if he is wiſe unto ſalvation; he may be wiſe and knowing in things natural, have a good ſhare of wit and ſenſe, and be wiſe in worldly things, which may yield a pleaſure to a natural man his parent; but if he is a good man, he will have greater joy of his ſon, if he is wiſe in the firſt ſenſe. The mother and grandmother of Timothy had no doubt great joy of him, who from a child knew the holy ſcriptures; and ſo had the elect lady of her children, who were walking in the truth; and ſo has our heavenly Father of his children, who are righteous and wiſe through his grace.

℣. 25. Thy father and thy mother ſhall be glad, &c.] That is, when thou art righteous and wiſe; ſee chap. x. 1. or let thy father and thy mother be glad [e]; do every thing that may make their hearts glad, and their lives eaſy and comfortable in their old age; by miniſtring to their neceſſities, if in any; by treading in their ſteps and following their examples; by living ſoberly and righteouſly, and behaving wiſely; by not only honouring them, but by ſeeking the honour and glory of God; ſhewing a regard to religion, and ſupporting it to the utmoſt of their power; theſe are things which make the hearts of pious parents glad. And ſhe that bare thee ſhall rejoice; thy mother particularly, who bore and brought thee forth with ſo much pain, and brought thee up with ſo much care and trouble, will think it an over-recompence for all, if thou art truly wiſe and religious. Some accommodate this to God our heavenly Father, and to the church, the Jeruſalem above, the mother of us all.

℣. 26. My ſon, give me thine heart, &c.] Theſe words are not the words of Solomon to his ſon, for a greater than Solomon is here; beſides, the claim and poſſeſſion of the heart do not belong to a creature but to God; but they are the words of wiſdom, or Chriſt, to every one of his ſons, the children the Father has given him in covenant; who are adopted through him, regenerated by his Spirit and grace, begotten by his word and miniſters as inſtruments, and born and brought up in his church, and to whom he ſtands in the relation of the everlaſting Father. The heart of a wicked man is little worth, and not worth having; Satan has the poſſeſſion of it, and fills it, and influences and draws it at his pleaſure; the world is ſet in it, and there is no room for any other; ſenſual luſts and pleaſures, whoredom, wine, and new wine take away the heart, Hoſea iv. 11. and it is to thoſe this exhortation is oppoſed, as appears from the following verſes; and the ſenſe is, give not thine heart to women, nor to wine, but to me. Chriſt ſhould have the hearts and affections of his people, and he only; he is to be loved with the whole heart, ſincerely and above all things elſe; and it is a good man's heart he deſires; a broken and a contrite heart is not deſpiſed by him, he binds it up; a heart purified by faith in his blood, a new heart, and a new ſpirit, in which his laws are put and written; a heart to know him, fear him, love him, and believe in him: and as he requires the heart in the exerciſe of every grace, as faith, fear and love; ſo in the performance of every duty, which, without the heart is of no avail; as in prayer, ſinging of praiſe, and hearing the word, and other religious ſervices. And it is but reaſonable ſervice, that Chriſt ſhould have the hearts of his children, ſince he ſtands in ſuch near relations to them; as father, huſband, friend and brother; is all in all unto them; is ſo lovely a perſon himſelf, and has ſo loved them, and given himſelf, his life, his blood, his all for them. And let thine eyes obſerve my ways; the ways which wiſdom, or Chriſt, took in eternity and time, in order to bring about the ſalvation of his people; his ſteps in the covenant of grace, as their ſurety; his coming down from heaven to earth, to do the will of his Father; his going away from hence, by ſubmitting to the accurſed death of the croſs, thereby making peace and reconciliation for ſin; his aſcenſion to heaven, and ſeſſion at the right hand of God, where he ever lives to intercede for us; the various methods of his grace, in calling and viſiting his people, ſupplying their wants, protecting their perſons, and preſerving them ſafe to his kingdom and glory: theſe ſhould be obſerved, with attention and wonder, to the encouragement of faith, and for the magnifying of the riches of grace: alſo the ways which he preſcribes and directs his children to walk in; as himſelf, who is the way to the Father, the way of life and ſalvation; the way of faith in him, the way of truth concerning him; the way of holineſs and righteouſneſs he leads in; the ways of his commandments; the ways in which he himſelf walked; all which ſhould be obſerved by the enlightened eyes of the underſtanding, and be imitated, and copied after, and walked in; reſpect ſhould be had unto them all; they ſhould be obſerved and kept, as they are directed to, and in faith and love, without depending on them. Some render the words, let thine eyes run through my ways [f]; take a thorough and exact view of them. There is a letter tranſpoſed in the word rendered obſerve, which occaſions a different reading; as is a man's heart, ſo are his eyes; if his heart is to Chriſt, his eyes will be in his ways; and where Chriſt's ways are not obſerved, the heart is not given to him.

℣. 27. For an whore is a deep ditch, &c.] Or, as a deep ditch, ſo Aben Ezra; to which ſhe may be compared for the filthineſs of her whoredoms, and for her inſatiable luſt, as well as for her being never ſatisfied with what ſhe receives from her lovers. Plautus compares [g] her to the ſea, which devours whatever you give, and yet nothing appears; and another [h] calls a whore Charybdis, from her ſwallowing up and devouring all a man has. She is as a ditch that has no bottom, into which thoſe that fall are ever ſinking deeper and deeper, till they get into the bottomleſs pit; for there is ſeldom any recovery from this dreadful evil. And a ſtrange woman is a narrow pit; or well [i]; into which when men fall, they bruiſe themſelves in a terrible manner, by beating from ſide to ſide; and out of which they cannot extricate themſelves; at leaſt not eaſily, but with great difficulty, if ever. This may very well be applied to the whore of Rome, and the filthineſs of her fornications; and the dreadful ſtate of thoſe who are drawn in to commit fornication with her.

℣. 28. She alſo lieth in wait as for a prey, &c.] At the door of her houſe, in the corner of the ſtreets, in the dark of the night; laying her ſnares, and ſpreading her nets for unwary perſons, to make a prey of their virtue and of their money. Or, as a man of prey [k]; a thief and robber, ſo Gerſom; thus ſhe watches and takes all opportunities to ſeize on perſons, and rob them of their ſubſtance, health and credit: or rather, as a beaſt of prey; ravenous, devouring and inſatiable; ſo the Targum, "as a "beaſt ravening, ſhe lies in wait with her eyes." And increaſeth the tranſgreſſors among men; there is none that occaſions more ſin, or makes more ſinners, than a whoriſh woman; ſwearing, lying, drunkenneſs, thieving, ſtealing, houſe-breaking, robbing on the highway, &c. are the ſins ſhe leads into. Or, increaſeth treacherous [l] perſons; to God, to their king, to their wives, to their maſters; and all that they may conſume, what they can get by perfidious practices, upon them, or, "perfidious "perſons among men, ſhe adds to herſelf [m];" ſhe gets a parcel of abandoned wretches about her, whom ſhe employs as her panders for her luſt, or as bullies to ſpoil her gallants of their ſubſtance, or murder them for the ſake of it.

℣. 29. Who hath wo? &c.] In this world and in the other, in body and ſoul; diſeaſes of body, diſtreſs of mind, waſte of ſubſtance, and all manner of evils and calamities; if any man has theſe, the drunkard has: from whoredom, the holy Ghoſt proceeds to drunkenneſs, which generally go together; and diſſuades from it, by obſerving the miſchiefs that come by it. Who hath ſorrow? through pains of body, with the head-ach, &c. or through the agonies of the mind, and tortures of conſcience, for ſin committed; or through poverty and want, ſo Aben Ezra derives the word from one that ſignifies poor; and ſo it may be rendered, who hath poverty?

poverty [n]? the drunkard; ſee ℣. 21. Who hath contentions? quarrels and law-ſuits, which often come of drunken bouts. Who hath babbling? or loquacity [o]? which drunkards are ſubject to; much vain babbling, fooliſh talk, ſcurrilous language, ſcoffs, jeers, eſpecially at religion and religious men; and ſometimes ſuch men are full of talk about religion itſelf, and make great pretenſions to it, and the knowledge of it in their cups, when out of them they think and talk nothing about it. Who hath wounds without cauſe? from words oftentimes drunkards go to blows upon the moſt frivolous accounts; fight with one another for no reaſon at all, and get themſelves beaten and bruiſed for nothing. Who hath redneſs of eyes? the drunkard has, inflamed with wine or ſtrong drink; which drank frequently and to exceſs, is the cauſe of ſore eyes, as well as of weakening the ſight; or, however, leaves a redneſs there, and in other parts of the face, whereby thoſe ſons of Bacchus may be known: ſo it is obſerved [p] of Vitellius the emperor, that his face was commonly red through drunkenneſs. Hillerus renders it, blackneſs of eyes; ſuch as comes from blows received; taking the word to be of the ſame ſignification with the Arabic word כחל which ſo ſignifies: this agrees with the preceding clauſe; and is countenanced by the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions.

℣. 30. They that tarry long at the wine, &c.] At drinking it. Do not care to ſtir from it when at it; ſpend whole days and nights in it, and are overcome by it, and ſo bring upon them all the above evils. They that go to ſeek mixed wine; not wine mixed with water, as uſed commonly by temperate people in hot countries; but either mixed with ſpices to make it more palatable, or with different ſorts of wine, ſome very ſtrong, and more heady and intoxicating; or mere wine is meant; wine poured out, as the word [q] ſignifies, where there is plenty of it; and ſuch as are given to wine, go and ſeek out ſuch places, and where the beſt is to be had. So the Targum, "they go and ſeek the "houſe of mixture, or mixed wine; or, as the Syriac verſion, "the houſe of feaſting;" and ſo the Arabic: "where there are junketing and drinking-"bouts," as the Septuagint.

℣. 31. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, &c.] Or, becauſe it is red [r]; or ſhews itſelf red. Which was the only wine uſed in the land of Canaan, or however, the moſt eſteemed of, and that moſt of all which had the beſt colour; when it had a good, bright, red colour, or ſparkled, and looked bright and beautiful, ſo the word ſignifies; and then it ſhould not be looked upon: not that it is unlawful to look upon the colour of wine, and thereby judge of its goodneſs; but it ſhould not be looked upon with a greedy eye, ſo as vehemently to deſire it, which will lead to an intemperate uſe of it; juſt as looking upon a woman, ſo as to luſt after her, is forbidden, Matt. v. 28. When it giveth his colour in the cup; or, its eye in the cup [s]; ſuch a bright, briſk and beautiful colour, as is like a bright and ſparkling eye. Here is a various reading; it is written in the text, in the purſe [t]; it is read in the margin, in the cup; and Jarchi's note takes in both, "he that drinks wine, ſets his eye "on the cup; and the vintner ſets his on his "purſe." When it moveth itſelf aright; ſparkles in the glaſs, or goes down the throat pleaſantly; or rather, looks well to the eye, and appears right and good, and promiſes a great deal of ſatisfaction and delight.

℣. 32. At the laſt it biteth like a ſerpent, &c.] Though it goes down ſweetly, yet it leaves a ſting behind it intemperately drank; a nauſea in the ſtomach, a ſtink in the breath, pains and giddineſs in the head, weakneſs in the eyes, trembling in the members of the body, palſy, gout, and other diſtempers, very painful and grievous to be bore; and, what is worſe, if the conſcience is awakened, ſharp and cutting reflections there; and, without true repentance, torments intolerable in the world to come. And ſtingeth like an adder; or ſpreads [u], or ſeparates and ſcatters; that is, its poiſon. So the Vulgate Latin verſion, diffuſeth poiſons as a baſiliſk or cockatrice: the Targum and Syriac verſion, "as a "ſerpent which flies;" it ſignifies the ſame as before.

℣. 33. Thine eyes ſhall behold ſtrange women, &c.] Being inflamed with wine, ſhall look upon women, other mens wives, and luſt after them; or harlots, whom ſeeking after or meeting with, when in their cups, are drawn into their embraces; exceſs of wine leads to whoredom [w]. So Aben Ezra ſupplies the word women, and Jarchi interprets it to this ſenſe; but the Targum renders it, ſtrange things; and ſo many others: a drunken man, through the fumes and vapours that aſcend into his brain, fancies he ſees ſtrange ſights; he ſees things double; imagines that he ſees trees walk, and many ſuch like abſurd and monſtrous things. And thine heart ſhall utter perverſe things; or the mouth, from the abundance of the heart and imagination of it, ſhall utter things contrary to ſenſe and reaſon, contrary to truth and righteouſneſs, contrary to chaſtity and good manners, contrary to their own honour and credit, contrary to God and men; the mouth then utters all that is in the heart, which it at other times conceals. It may have a particular reſpect to the unchaſte, filthy and obſcene words, uttered to ſtrange women, into whoſe company men fall when in liquor.

℣. 34. Yea, thou ſhalt be as he that lieth down in the midſt of the ſea, &c.] Not in the open ſea, and the waves of it, there fluctuating and toſſed about; nor in an iſland encompaſſed by ſea; but in a ſhip at ſea: a drunken man reels and tumbles about, juſt as a ſhip does at ſea; hence the motions and agitations of it, and of the men in it, are compared to the reeling and ſtaggering of a drunken man, Pſal. cvii. 26, 27. Or as he that lieth upon the top of a maſt; where the motion is the greateſt. Or all this may be expreſſive of the dangers which a drunkard is expoſed unto, and of his ſtupidity and inſenſibility; for though he is in as great danger as one in the circumſtances deſcribed, in a ſtorm at ſea, yet is not ſenſible of it; which agrees with what follows.

℣. 35. They have ſtricken me, ſhalt thou ſay, and I was not ſick, &c.] Or grieved not [x]; or was not wounded or ſkin-broken [y]; ſee Jer. v. 3. The drunken man is here repreſented as ſaying, that though his companions, with whom he quarrelled and fought in his drunken frolicks, beat him very much, yet he was not ſenſible of the pain and ſmart; and it had left no ſickneſs, nor diſorder upon him; he did not find himſelf much the worſe for it. They have beaten me; as with hammers [z]; battered and bruiſed him terribly, laying very hard and heavy ſtrokes upon him; and I felt it not; or knew it not [a]; did not perceive it, was not ſenſible of it, when the blows were given, or who gave them; and thus feeling no more, and coming off ſo well, as he thinks, he is ſo far from being reclaimed from this vice, that he is more ſtrengthened in it, and deſirous of it. When ſhall I awake? I will ſeek it yet again; that is, the wine and his boon companions, though he has been ſo uſed. So the Vulgate Latin verſion, when ſhall I awake, and again find wines? being heavy with ſleep through intemperance, and yet thirſty, is deſirous of ſhaking off his ſleep, that he may get to drinking again, and add drunkenneſs to thirſt, Deut. xxix. 19. ſo the Septuagint verſion, "when will it be morn-"ing, that going I may ſeek with whom I may "meet?"

CHAP. XXIV.

℣. 1. BE not thou envious againſt evil men, &c.] Or, men of evil [b]. Such who are addicted to evil, and given up to it, whoſe principles and practices are bad; ſuch as are before deſcribed in the preceding chapter; gluttons and drunkards, men given to women and wine: envy not their preſent proſperity, or ſeeming pleaſure they have in the gratification of their ſenſual appetites; ſince wo and ſorrow, wounds and ſtrife now attend them, and poverty and want will follow them; as well as everlaſting ruin and deſtruction will be their portion hereafter; ſee the note on chap. xxiii. 17. and compare with this ℣. 21, 27, 29, 32. Neither deſire to be with them; to be in their company; to have any converſation and fellowſhip with them, which is very infectious, dangerous and pernicious; nor even to be in the ſame ſtate, condition, and circumſtances they are in; much leſs to do as they do, and imitate them in their ſinful courſes; as you would not chooſe to be with them in hell hereafter, do not deſire to be with them here.

℣. 2. For their heart ſtudieth deſtruction, &c.] To others; to good men, that ſeparate from them, and reprove them, or are in their way; or any ways hinder them in the proſecution of their wicked deſigns; as Haman's heart ſtudied the deſtruction of the Jews: or their hearts ſtudy to draw men into their deſtructive methods of living, and therefore ſhould be ſhunned and avoided. Moreover, their hearts ſtudy deſtruction to themſelves; they ſtudy what they ſhall eat and drink, which they purſue to intemperance; and how they ſhall compaſs their lewd deſigns, and which iſſue in their ruin; deſtruction and miſery are in all the ways they deviſe and walk in. And their lips talk of miſchief; which they ſtudy in their hearts againſt others; as are their hearts, ſo are their lips; out of the abundance of the wickedneſs of their hearts, their mouths ſpeak miſchievous things; and which, though they deſign for others, oftentimes fall upon themſelves.

℣. 3. Through wiſdom is an houſe builded, &c.] A family is built up, furniſhed and ſupplied with the neceſſaries and conveniencies of life, and brought into flouriſhing and proſperous circumſtances, by wiſe and prudent management, by diligence and induſtry, through the bleſſing of God upon them, without taking ſuch methods as evil men do. The houſe of God, the church of the living God, is built by wiſdom, that is, by Chriſt; on a good foundation, a rock, upon himſelf, againſt which the gates of hell can never prevail; ſee chap. ix. 1. Every good man's houſe, himſelf, his ſoul, and the eternal ſalvation of it, are built on the ſame; and he is a wiſe man that builds his houſe through wiſdom; that builds on the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, the one and only foundation which God has laid, which is Jeſus Chriſt. And by underſtanding it is eſtabliſhed; the proſperity of a man's family is continued and ſecured by his prudent conduct. The church of God is eſtabliſhed by Chriſt, who is underſtanding as well as wiſdom; ſee chap. viii. 14. Pſal. lxxxvii. 5. and every true believer is eſtabliſhed in Chriſt, and in the faith of him; and that as he has more and more an underſtanding of him and of divine things.

℣. 4. And by knowledge ſhall the chambers be filled with all precious and pleaſant riches.] That are both of worth, value and uſefulneſs, and for ornament and delight; the more private and retired parts of a man's dwelling-houſe, as well as his ſhops, warehouſes, out-houſes and granaries, ſhall be filled with all kind of valuable ſubſtance, through his knowledge in improving trade or huſbandry, in which he is concerned. This may be underſtood ſpiritually, of the fulneſs which the church has from Chriſt, and of thoſe unſearchable riches of his ſhe receives from him; and of thoſe treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, which the chambers of the ſoul of a believer are filled with by him; and of all the riches put into them, which are both precious and pleaſant; ſuch as precious promiſes, pleaſant doctrines, the valuable truths of the goſpel, and bleſſings of grace.

℣. 5. A wiſe man is ſtrong, &c.] He can do that ſometimes by his wiſdom, and which requires ſtrength and courage too, which another cannot do by his ſtrength; ſee chap. xxi. 22. Eccl. ix. 15, 16. This may be underſtood of one that is ſpiritually wiſe, wiſe unto ſalvation, wiſe for another world, is made to know true wiſdom in the hidden part. The Stoic philoſophers ſay much of their wiſe man; that he is happy, and rich, and mighty, and even a king; all which may be ſaid more truly of a good man; he is ſtrong, not abſolutely, but comparatively, in compariſon of what he himſelf was; and wicked men are without ſtrength, and do not ſeek for any elſewhere; nor do they, nor can they do, that which is ſpiritually good, and are ignorant of their weakneſs: but ſo is not a wiſe man; he has ſome ſpiritual ſtrength; he ſeeks to Chriſt for more, and, through Chriſt ſtrengthening him, does all things; and is ſenſible of his own weakneſs, and finds that when he is weak he is ſtrong: one eminently wiſe is ſtrong, in compariſon of leſs knowing and more feeble ſaints; ſome are children in knowledge, weak in faith and in conduct, more eaſily drawn into ſin and temptation than others; and in compariſon of theſe, ſome are ſtrong, who are to bear with and ſupport the weak, and reſtore them. A wiſe man is ſtrong, not in and of himſelf; he cannot think a good thought, nor do a good action, nor preſerve himſelf from ſin and Satan; but he is ſtrong in Chriſt, and in the power of his might, and in his grace; and through ſpiritual ſtrength communicated to him, his heart is ſtrengthened, and the work of grace in his heart; he is ſtrengthened to exerciſe grace more ſtrongly, to perform the duties of religion, to bear the croſs of Chriſt, to withſtand temptations, and to oppoſe his own corruptions. It may be rendered, a wiſe man is in ſtrength [c]; he is in Chriſt the ſtrong-hold, whither, as a priſoner of hope, he has fled and turned into; he is in the ſtrong tower, into which he has run and is ſafe; he is ſurrounded with the might and power of God on all ſides, by which he is kept. Yea, a man of knowledge increaſeth ſtrength; a ſpiritual man, a man endued with ſpiritual knowledge, with the knowledge of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; as he has a degree of ſpiritual ſtrength, he increaſes therein; he grows ſtronger and ſtronger, he goes from ſtrength to ſtrength; the more he knows of Chriſt, the more ſtrongly he truſts in him, and loves him, and the more able he is to reſiſt Satan's temptations; and is a better match for falſe teachers, who deceive the hearts of the ſimple: ſpiritual ſtrength is increaſed by means of the word of God, by the promiſes of the goſpel, and by the ordinances of it.

℣. 6. For by wiſe counſel thou ſhalt make thy war, &c.] Counſel, as well as ſtrength, is neceſſary for war: kings and ſtates, before they enter on a war, ſhould not only well conſider the juſtneſs of their cauſe, but ſhould conſult whether they have a ſufficiency of men and money to carry it on; and ſhould concert the wiſeſt methods to attack the enemy, or defend themſelves; and, above all, ſhould aſk counſel of God; ſee 2 Kings xviii. 20. Luke xiv. 31, 32. And this is true of our ſpiritual warfare with ſin, Satan, the world, and falſe teachers; which requires not only ſtrength to wage war with them, but wiſe counſel, that we may be able to underſtand and guard againſt their cunning, wiles and ſtratagems: and this is principally to be aſked of God, who is wonderful in counſel; and of good and experienced men, ſkilled in thoſe matters. And in the multitude of counſellors there is ſafety; to take the advice of wiſe counſellors, and many of them, even among men, is ſafe for princes and ſtates, in the above caſe and in all others; and eſpecially to aſk and take counſel of God, who gives wiſdom liberally to them that aſk it; and of Chriſt, the wonderful Counſellor; and from the ſcriptures, whom David made his counſellors; and from old, experienced Chriſtians, and miniſters of the word, with whom are wiſdom, counſel and underſtanding; ſee the note on chap. xi. 14.

℣. 7. Wiſdom is too high for a fool, &c.] It is out of his reach, he cannot attain it; natural wiſdom, or the knowledge of many things in nature; at leaſt it ſeems ſo to himſelf, and therefore will not take any pains, or make uſe of any means to obtain it; as the knowledge of human laws; of medicine, of philoſophy, of languages, or of any of the liberal arts and ſciences; or he has not really a capacity for it. This is more eſpecially true of ſpiritual wiſdom, or of the knowledge of divine things in a ſpiritual way; or of the things of the Spirit of God, which a natural man cannot know, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned; it is God only makes men to know this kind of wiſdom in the hidden part, 1 Cor. ii. 14. Pſal. li. 6. for as a fool, here denotes a wicked man, let his natural parts be what they will; ſo wiſdom, ſpiritual knowledge and experience of divine things, which is too high for an unregenerate man to reach; ſee a like phraſe in Pſal. cxxxix. 6. He openeth not his mouth in the gate; he is not qualified for it; and if he has any knowledge of himſelf, he will not venture to ſpeak in a public aſſembly, in the houſe of parliament, in a court of judicature, or in the company of men of knowledge and ſenſe; and indeed it is his higheſt wiſdom to keep ſilence, and not betray his ignorance: and ſo with regard to ſpiritual things; a man, that wiſdom is too high for, and he has no ſhare of it, ſhall not or ought not to open his mouth where wiſdom cries; even in the gates of the cities, or in the public aſſemblies of the ſaints, chap. i. 21. and viii. 3.

℣. 8. He that deviſeth to do evil, ſhall be called a miſchievous perſon.] To do evil is natural to men, all are prone to it; being conceived and born in ſin, and from the womb, more or leſs commit it: but for a man to ſit down and contrive evil, as ſome men are inventers of evil things; contrive new ſins, or at leaſt new methods of ſinning, ſuch as new oaths, new games, new ways of tricking and deceiving men; and are always ſtudying and deviſing ways and means of committing ſin, and doing that which is evil in the ſight of God and men. Such a man, with great propriety, may be called, and will be called by thoſe that know him, a miſchievous man, a very pernicious one, and to be ſhunned and avoided as ſuch; men will reckon him, and call him a maſter or author [d] of evil devices, as it may be rendered; a name agreeable to his character.

℣. 9. The thoughts of fooliſhneſs is ſin, &c.] The thought of ſin is ſin [e], before it comes into action; the motions of ſin in the mind, the workings of corrupt nature in the heart, the ſinful deſires of the fleſh and of the mind: theſe are forbidden and condemned by the law of God as ſin, which ſays, Thou ſhalt not covet, and ſtand in need of pardoning grace and mercy; ſee Rom. vii. 5, 7. Acts viii. 22. Or, the thoughts of a fooliſh man are ſin [f]; that is, of a wicked man; in all whoſe thoughts God is not, but ſin is; the imagination of the thoughts of his heart is evil, and that continually; he thinks of nothing elſe but ſin, Gen. vi. 5. And the ſcorner is an abomination to men; who not only thinks ill of divine things, and deſpiſes them in his heart, which is only known to God; but ſcoffs at them with his lips, makes a jeſt of all that is good, derides religion and religious men; and to ſuch he is an abomination: and indeed one that is proud and haughty, ſcorner is his name, and that deals in proud wrath, and ſcorns all around him, in whatſoever company he comes, and that ridicules every perſon, and every thing that is ſaid in converſation, is uſually hated and abhorred by all ſorts of men.

℣. 10. If thou faint in the day of adverſity, &c.] When under bodily afflictions, ſtripping providences, reduced to great ſtraits and wants; or under the violent perſecutions of men, which is ſometimes the caſe of the people of God; whoſe times are in his hands, times of adverſity, as well as proſperity; and which are appointed by him, when they ſhall come, and how long they ſhall laſt; which is but for a ſhort time, it is but a day, and yet they are apt to faint under them, through the number and continuance of their afflictions; and eſpecially when they apprehend them to be in wrath; when they have a ſenſe of their ſins at ſuch a time, and no view of pardon; when they are under the hidings of God's face, their prayers do not ſeem to be heard, and ſalvation and deliverance do not come ſo ſoon as they expected; which, notwithſtanding, ſhews the truth of what is next obſerved. Thy ſtrength is ſmall; ſuch who are truly gracious, are not indeed at ſuch times wholly without ſtrength; they are in ſome meaſure helped to bear up; but yet their ſinkings and faintings ſhew, that they have but little ſtrength: they have ſome faith that does not entirely fail, Chriſt praying for it; yet they are but of little faith; they have but a ſmall degree of chriſtian fortitude and courage; there is a want of manlineſs in them; they act the part of children and babes in Chriſt; they do not quit themſelves like men, and much leſs endure hardneſs, as good ſoldiers of Chriſt, as they ſhould; they are Ephraim-like, without a heart, a courageous one, Hoſ. vii. 11. Some think the words have reference to what goes before, and the ſenſe to be this, if thou art remiſs[g]; that is, if thou art careleſs and negligent, in time of health and proſperity, in getting wiſdom, as thinking it too high for thee, ℣. 7. in the day of adverſity, thy ſtrength will be ſmall; thou wilt not have that to ſupport thee, which otherwiſe thou wouldſt have had. Aben Ezra connects the ſenſe with the following, if thou art remiſs, in helping and delivering thy friend in affliction, ℣. 11, 12. in the day of adverſity or of ſtraitneſs, thy ſtrength ſhall be ſtrait; thou ſhalt be left in thy diſtreſs and difficulties, and have none to help thee.

℣. 11. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, &c.] Or taken for or unto death[h], in a violent way; who are taken by thieves and robbers, and uſed in a barbarous manner, as the man in the parable, whom the prieſt and Levite took no notice of, and was helped by the good Samaritan; or who are unjuſtly ſentenced and appointed to death by the civil magiſtrate; if any know their innocency it becomes them to do all they can to ſave their lives, by bearing a teſtimony for them; for a true witneſs delivereth ſouls, chap. xiv. 25. or by interceding for them, and giving counſel and advice concerning them, or by any lawful way they can; as Reuben delivered Joſeph, Jonathan interceded for David, and Abikam and Ebed-melech for Jeremiah. Life is valuable, and all means ſhould be taken to ſave it, and to prevent the ſhedding of innocent blood; and a man ſhould not forbear or ſpare any coſt, or pains, or time, to ſuch ſervice: likewiſe ſuch as are drawn into ſnares and temptations, into immorality or hereſy, which tend to the ruin of the ſouls of men, and bring them to eternal death; all proper methods ſhould be taken to reſtore ſuch perſons, to recover them out of the ſnare of the devil, which is ſaving ſouls from death, and covering a multitude of ſins; ſee 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. James v. 19, 20. And thoſe that are ready to be ſlain; or bending to ſlaughter[i]; are within a little of being executed, or put to death upon a falſe accuſation; for about others that ſuffer righteouſly, there need not be that concern here preſſed, or whoſe works and ways incline to deſtruction and lead to it, of which they ſeem not very far off.

℣. 12. If thou ſayeſt, Behold, we knew it not, &c.] The danger the perſon was in; or the innocency of his cauſe; or what method to take to deliver him; or that it was in our power to do any thing for him; ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, if thou ſayeſt, ſtrength is not ſufficient: or we knew him not[k], who he was or what he was; had no knowledge of him, or acquaintance with him, and ſo did not think ourſelves under any obligation to regard his caſe; ſuch excuſes will not do. Doth not he that pondereth the heart conſider it? he that ſearches the heart and tries it, and weighs every thought of it, and excuſe it makes; conſiders and underſtands whether it is a mere excuſe or no; though ſuch excuſes may appear plauſible to men, yet to God that knows the heart they are of no avail; for he knows it to be a mere ſhift, and that it was unwillingneſs to help the diſtreſſed, and a neglect of their caſe; and that all that is ſaid on their own behalf is a vain pretence. And he that keepeth thy ſoul, doth not he know it? he that upholds it in life, and whoſe viſitation preſerves it, and therefore ſhould be careful of the life of another; and if not, may juſtly fear the Lord will withdraw his care and preſervation of them; he knows perfectly well what regard a man has to the welfare of another, or to the preſervation of another man's life when in danger; and whether what he ſays on his own behalf is well founded: or he that obſerveth thy ſoul[l]; all the inward motions of it, the thoughts, affections, purpoſes, and inclinations; he knows whether what is ſaid is true or no. And ſhall not he render to every man according to his works? and behave towards him according to the law of retaliation; the ſame meaſure he meaſures to others, he will meaſure to him again; and who having ſhewn no mercy in ſaving the lives of others, when he could have done it, ſhall have judgment executed on him without mercy, when he is in diſtreſs.

℣. 13. My ſon, eat thou honey, becauſe it is good, &c.] It is good for food; there was plenty of it in Paleſtine, and it was eaten for food, not only by children but grown perſons; and was very nouriſhing, ſtrengthening, and refreſhing to them, as Samſon, Jonathan, John Baptiſt, and others; and is good for medicine, is healthful and ſalutary, and uſeful in many diſeaſes: it is ſaid[m] to conduce much to prolong life and preſerve from diſeaſes; it has been obſerved that thoſe who have much uſed it have lived to a great age. And the honey-comb, which is ſweet to thy taſte; becauſe it is ſo, as all honey is, and eſpecially that which is immediately ſqueezed or drops from the honey-comb; this is ſaid not ſo much on account of honey, and the eating of that, as for what follows concerning the knowledge of wiſdom, which is comparable to it for pleaſure and profit; ſee chap. xvi. 24. Pſalm xix. 11. and cxix. 103[n].

℣. 14. So ſhall the knowledge of wiſdom be unto thy ſoul, &c.] Or let it be taken in as greedily and with as good an appetite; as pleaſant, uſeful, delightful, and profitable; even the knowledge of Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, which is preferable to all things elſe, and more deſirable than the moſt pleaſant and profitable things in the world; and of the goſpel of Chriſt, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, than which nothing is more ſweet and comfortable to a truly gracious ſoul; it is like Ezekiel's roll which was in his mouth as honey for ſweetneſs. When thou haſt found it, then there ſhall be a reward; for though there may be ſome difficulty and trouble to attain it, in the uſe of means, by reading, hearing, prayer, and meditation, yet being enjoyed, it carries its own reward with it; a man is abundantly recompenſed for all his pains in the purſuit of it, by the pleaſure and profit it yields him now and hereafter; for it is the beginning of life eternal, and will iſſue in it, John xvii. 3. ſee chap. ii. 3—5. and iii. 13. And thy expectation ſhall not be cut off; or hope[o]; as the hope of the hypocrite will, Job viii. 14. the hope of eternal life, as founded on Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, where ſuch that know wiſdom place their hope; and this hope will not make them aſhamed; they will not be diſappointed, their expectation ſhall not periſh, they will have what they are waiting and hoping for, and what is promiſed unto them; ſee chap. xxiii. 18. and the note there. The Targum is, "which if thou findeſt, the laſt ſhall come better than the firſt, and thy hope ſhall not be conſumed."

℣. 15. Lay not wait, O wicked man, againſt the dwelling of the righteous, &c.] The church of God, which is the righteous man's dwelling place, and where he deſires and delights to dwell; or his own dwelling houſe; it may be rendered, at the dwelling of the righteous[p]; lay not wait at his door to obſerve who goes in and out, and what is done there; and to watch for his halting, and take notice of his infirmities, ſlips, and falls, and improve them to his diſadvantage; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, and lay not wait and ſeek ungodlineſs in the houſe of the righteous; or lay not wait there for him, as Saul ſet men to watch the houſe of David to kill him, 1 Sam. xix. 11. or to take an opportunity and get into it and plunder it, as follows. Spoil not his reſting-place; by pulling it down, or ſtripping it of its furniture; by robbing him of the ſubſtance in it, and thus diſturbing his reſt, and deſtroying the place of it; or the place where he lies down as a ſheep in its fold, or as the ſhepherd in his cottage, of which the words in the text are uſed; and ſo denote that as the righteous man is like a ſheep, harmleſs and innocent, and thoſe that lay in wait for him and ſpoil him, are no other than wolves.

℣. 16. For a juſt man falleth ſeven times, and riſeth up again, &c.] This is to be underſtood of a truly juſt man; not of one that is only outwardly and ſeemingly ſo, or of temporary believers, and nominal profeſſors; but of ſuch who are thoroughly convinced of their own unrighteouſneſs, and believe in Chriſt for righteouſneſs, and have it applied and imputed to them; as well as have principles of grace and righteouſneſs implanted in them, and live righteouſly in this evil world; theſe often fall either into troubles or into ſins, and indeed into both, and the one is the cauſe of the other; and both ſenſes may be retained: the former ſeems more agreeable to the context, and runs thus, lay not wait to a juſt man's dwelling to do him any hurt; for though he ſhould be enſnared, and ſtumble, and fall into diſtreſs and calamity, yet he will riſe again out of it, and ſo all attempts upon him are vain and fruitleſs; many are the righteous man's afflictions he falls into, but the Lord delivers out of all; he delivers him in ſix troubles and even in ſeven, Pſal. xxxiv. 19. Job v. 19. or in many, one after another; he riſes out of them all; he comes out of great tribulations, and at laſt ſafely enters the kingdom of heaven; and therefore it is to no purpoſe to lie in wait for him: and this ſenſe is ſtrengthened by the words following, rejoice not when thine enemy falleth; but the latter ſenſe of falling into ſin has been anciently received, and not to be rejected; and which generally precedes and is the cauſe of falling into trouble. A juſt man, tho' he does not fall from his righteouſneſs, which is an everlaſting one, nor from the grace of God; yet he may fall into temptation, and by it he may fall into ſin, as every juſt man does; for there is not a juſt man upon earth that doeth good and ſinneth not, Eccl. vii. 20. and that frequently, even every day; and therefore ſtands every day in need of freſh application of pardoning grace, for which he is directed to pray daily; and he may be left to fall foully, into very groſs ſins, as David, Peter, and others; but not totally and finally, ſo as to periſh; being on the heart of God, in the hands of Chriſt, on him the foundation, united to him, and kept by the power of God, he ſhall and does riſe again ſooner or later; not by his own power and ſtrength, but by the ſtrength of the Lord; he riſes by renewed repentance, and under the freſh diſcoveries of pardoning grace and mercy to heal his backſlidings. But the wicked ſhall fall into miſchief; or evil[q]; into the evil of ſin, and there lie and wallow in it, as the ſwine in the mire, and never riſe out of it; and into the evil of puniſhment, into hell itſelf, from whence there will be no deliverance; and oftentimes they fall into miſchief in this world, into trouble and diſtreſs, into poverty and want, in which they live and die, and never recover out of it; to which agrees what follows.

℣. 17. Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, &c.] Theſe words are ſpoken not to the wicked man, ℣. 15. but to the juſt man, or Solomon's ſon, or the children of wiſdom; for by the enemy is meant ſuch who are at enmity with the people of God, as the ſeed of the ſerpent, and thoſe after the fleſh are: and when theſe fall, ſaints ſhould not rejoice; as when they fall into ſin; for ſo to do, would be to act as wicked men who delight in ſin, and take pleaſure in them that do it; and is contrary to the grace of God, to that charity which rejoiceth not in iniquity: or rather when they fall into calamity and diſtreſs; for this is alſo the part which wicked men act towards the people of God, and ſhould not be imitated in; ſee Obad. 12. Micah vii. 8. Rev. xi. 10. Joy may be expreſſed at the fall of the public enemies of God and his people, as was by the Iſraelites at the deſtruction of Pharaoh and his hoſt, Exod. xv. 1. and as will be by the church at the deſtruction of Antichriſt, and which they are called upon to do, Rev. xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2. partly on account of their own deliverance and ſafety, and chiefly becauſe of the glory of God, and of his juſtice diſplayed therein; ſee Pſal. lviii. 10. but as private revenge is not to be ſought, nor acted, ſo joy at the calamity and ruin of a private enemy, or a man's own enemy, ſhould not be expreſſed; but rather he is to be pitied and helped; ſee chap. xxv. 21, 22. for to love an enemy, and ſhew regard to him, is the doctrine both of the Old and of the New Teſtament. And let not thine heart be glad when he ſtumbleth; even ſecret joy ſhould not be indulged, gladneſs in the heart, though it does not appear in the countenance, and is not expreſſed in words; no not at the leaſt appearance of miſchief, when he only ſtumbles and is ready to fall; and much leſs ſhould there be exultation and rejoicings made in an open manner at the utter ruin of him.

℣. 18. Leſt the Lord ſee it, and it diſpleaſe him, &c.] Who ſees all things, not only external actions but the heart, and the inward motions of it; and though men may hide the pleaſure they feel at the miſery of an enemy from others, they cannot hide it from the Lord; nor is this ſaid by way of doubt, but as a certain thing; and which the Lord not barely ſees, but takes notice of, and to ſuch a degree as to reſent it, and ſhew his diſpleaſure at it by taking the following ſtep. And he turn away his wrath from him; remove the effects of it, raiſe him out of his fallen and diſtreſſed condition, and reſtore him to his former proſperous one; and not only ſo, but turn it upon thee, as Gerſom ſupplies the words, and not amiſs; ſo that there is a ſtrange and ſudden change of circumſtances; thou that wert pleaſing thyſelf with the diſtreſs of thine enemy art fallen into the ſame, and he is delivered out of it; which muſt be a double affliction to ſuch a man; ſo that by rejoicing at an enemy, he is doing his enemy good and himſelf hurt; ſee chap. xvii. 5.

℣. 19. Fret not thyſelf becauſe of evil men, &c.] Becauſe of their outward proſperity and worldly happineſs, any more than rejoice at their adverſity; neither do the one nor the other; where the one prevails, the other does alſo; by the frequent repetition of this advice, it looks as if this evil is what good men are prone to, and which was very common in Solomon's time, and in the time of his father David, from whom he ſeems to have borrowed theſe words, Pſal. xxxvii. 1, 7. ſee chap. xxiii 17. and xxiv. 1. Neither be thou envious at the wicked; though they may ſtand when thou falleſt, or be in proſperity when thou art in adverſity; the reaſons follow.

℣. 20. For there ſhall be no reward to the evil man, &c.] No reward of good things, ſuch as is for the righteous in a way of grace; but he ſhall have a reward of evil things, a juſt recompence of reward for his ſins: or no end [r]; there will be an end of his life in this world, and there will be an end of his proſperity; but, as the Targum is, there will be no good end to him; his end will not be like that of the perfect and upright man, for it will be cut off, Pſalm xxxvii. 37, 38. or as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, the wicked have no hope of future things; no good hope of everlaſting happineſs; they have their good things now, and their evil things hereafter; and therefore are not to be fretted at and envied. Aben Ezra interprets it, they ſhall have no offſpring or iſſue, ſon or nephew; the word is ſometimes uſed for poſterity. The candle of the wicked ſhall be put out; meaning not the dim light of nature in them, nor the light of life before their time, ſo Aben Ezra; but their proſperity, riches, ſplendor, and glory, which candle is often put out while they live, and always at death; after which they have no more light, honour, and happineſs; even not ſo much as the light of a candle; to which their proſperity in this life is compared, it being at beſt but ſmall and of a ſhort continuance; ſee Job xviii. 5, 6. and xxi. 17. and therefore ſhould not be the object of the envy of good men, who are in a more happy and ſtable condition than they.

℣. 21. My ſon, fear thou the Lord, and the king; &c.] Firſt the Lord and then the king; and ſuch as fear the Lord are generally loyal to their king; the fear of God includes love to him, reverence of him, faith in him, ſubmiſſion to him, and the whole worſhip of him, inward and outward, attended with holineſs of life and converſation: and the king, who is under God, is to be feared alſo, with a fear ſuitable to him; he is to be loved and reverenced, to be truſted in and ſubmitted to, in every thing conſiſtent with the fear of God and obedience to him; in whatever is not contrary to his laws, commands and ordinances; ſee 1 Pet. ii. 13—17. And meddle not with them that are given to change; in political things; that are for new laws, new forms of government, a new miniſtry, and a new king; never eaſy with the government under which they are, but are continually entering into plots, conſpiracies, and rebellions; who, inſtead of fearing God and the king, change the laws and commandments of God and the king, and therefore to be ſhunned. Some render it with rebels; the Targum and Syriac verſion with fools; as all ſuch perſons are, and ſhould be avoided as ſcandalous and dangerous: mix not with them, as the word [s] ſignifies; keep no company, and have no converſation with them, leſt you be brought into danger and miſchief by them. Or who are given to change in religious things; make innovations in doctrine and practice, always love to hear or ſay ſome new thing; turn with every wind, and ſhift as that does; are toſſed about with every wind of doctrine, fickle and inconſtant, carried about like meteors in the air, with divers and ſtrange doctrines; ſuch as diſagree with the perfections of God, the doctrines of Chriſt and his apoſtles, the ſcriptures of truth, the analogy of faith, and form of ſound words; and ſo the word here uſed ſignifies divers, and is ſo rendered Eſther iii. 8. and may deſign ſuch who hold doctrines and give into practices divers and different from the faith once delivered to the ſaints, and from the inſtitutions and appointments of Chriſt; innovations in doctrine and worſhip ought not to be admitted of; and ſuch who are for introducing them ſhould not be meddled or mixed with; they ſhould not be countenanced and incouraged; they ſhould not be attended upon or given heed unto; have no fellowſhip, and join not in communion with them. This is interpreted by ſome of ſuch who repeat [t] their ſins after repentance, or who return a ſecond time to their wickedneſs after they have repented, as Ben Melech obſerves.

℣. 22. For their calamity ſhall riſe ſuddenly, &c.] And come upon thoſe that fear not God, and rebel againſt the king and the ſtate, and innovate in matters of religion; and eſpecially that bring in damnable hereſies, and while they cry peace, peace, and are pleaſing themſelves with their new ſchemes and proſperous ſucceſs, ſwift and ſudden deſtruction comes upon them, 2 Pet. ii. 1. 1 Theſſ. v. 3. And who knoweth the ruin of them both? of thoſe that fear not the Lord, nor the king; or of thoſe who are given to change, and innovate in things civil and religious; and of thoſe who meddle with them and join themſelves to them: the ruin of themſelves and families in a civil ſenſe, is great and inexpreſſible, who rebel againſt their prince, and endeavour to change and ſubvert the preſent government; and the ruin of the ſouls of men, both of the deceivers and the deceived, is beyond all conception and expreſſion.

℣. 23. Theſe things alſo belong to the wiſe, &c.] Both what is ſaid before concerning fearing God and the king; theſe belong to the wiſe and unwiſe, rich and poor, great and ſmall; particularly judges and civil magiſtrates, and all ſubordinate governors, who have, or ought to have, a competency of wiſdom; theſe ought to fear God and the king, as well as private ſubjects; and alſo what follows after, eſpecially in this and the three next verſes. Some render the words, theſe things alſo are the ſayings of wiſe men[u]; not of Solomon, but of other wiſe men in his time, or who lived after him, and before the men of Hezekiah copied out the proverbs in the following chapters; ſee chap. xxv. 1. but it ſeems more than probable that what follows to the end of the chapter are the words of Solomon, as the two laſt verſes moſt clearly are, compared with chap. vi. 10, 11. It is not good to have reſpect of perſons in judgement; in trying cauſes in a court of judicature, no regard ſhould be had to the perſons of men by the judge on the bench, as the rich more than to the poor; or to a relation, a friend, an intimate acquaintance, more than to a ſtranger; but the juſtice of the cauſe ought to be attended to, and ſentence given according to it, let it fall as it will: God does not accept perſons, nor regard the rich more than the poor; nor ſhould they that ſtand in his ſtead, and who in ſome ſenſe repreſent him, Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17. Job xxxiv. 19. nor ſhould chriſtians in their communities act ſuch a partial part, James ii. 1—3.

℣. 24. He that ſaith unto the wicked, Thou art righteous, &c.] Not in a private way, or as giving his opinion or character of a man that is wicked, whom either through ignorance or flattery another may call righteous; which may be done and not reſented by people and nations; but in an open court of judicature pronounced by the judge, juſtifying the wicked for reward, and condemning the juſt, which is an abomination unto the Lord; ſee chap. xvii. 15. Iſa. v. 23. nor ſhould the miniſters of the goſpel flatter the wicked, and call them righteous and good men, and ſtrengthen their hands in their wickedneſs, promiſing them life though they continue in their evil ways; for though God juſtifies the ungodly, man ſhould not; nor does he juſtify them in but from their ungodlineſs; ſee Ezek. xiii. 22. Him ſhall the people curſe, nations ſhall abhor him; the people of the land ſhall curſe him as an unjuſt judge, as a patron of wickedneſs and wicked men; as an enemy to juſtice, and a diſcourager of truth and honeſty, and all good men; and even nations that have not ſo immediate a concern in the affair, yet hearing of it ſhall expreſs their indignation at him and abhorrence of him.

℣. 25. But to them that rebuke him ſhall be delight, &c.] That is, ſuch that rebuke in the gate, or openly, in a court of judicature; that reprove delinquents, ſuch as are found guilty of male-practices, and puniſh them as they ought to be, according to the laws of God and man; they ſhall have delight in themſelves, peace and pleaſure in their own minds; or the people ſhall delight in them, and ſpeak well of them, and think themſelves happy under ſuch a juſt adminiſtration; or the Lord ſhall delight in them, the beauty or ſweetneſs of the Lord ſhall come unto them, as Aben Ezra explains it; the Lord ſhall be ſweet and delightful to them, and they ſhall have pleaſure in him. And a good bleſſing ſhall come upon them; or a bleſſing of good[w]; a bleſſing of good things, temporal and ſpiritual, here and hereafter; the bleſſing of a good God, and a bleſſing from him; and a bleſſing of good men, as oppoſed to the curſe of the people in the preceding verſe.

℣. 26. Every man ſhall kiſs his lips that giveth a right anſwer.] Either as a witneſs to a queſtion put to him in court, to which he anſwers aptly and uprightly; or rather as a judge, who having heard a cauſe, anſwers and gives his opinion of it faithfully, and pronounces a righteous ſentence; every one will love and reſpect him, and hearken to him and obey him; both affection and obedience are ſignified by a kiſs; ſee Pſal. ii. 12. Cant. viii. 1.

℣. 27. Prepare thy work without, &c.] As Solomon did for the building of the temple; timber and ſtones were prepared, hewed, ſquared and fitted for the building before brought thither, 1 Kings v. 18. and vi. 7. or diligently attend to thy buſineſs without doors, whatever it is, that thou mayeſt provide for thyſelf and family the neceſſaries and conveniencies of life, which are in the firſt place to be ſought after. And make it fit for thyſelf in the field; let nothing be wanting in managing the affairs of huſbandry, in tilling the land, in ploughing and ſowing, and reaping and gathering in the increaſe, that there may be a ſufficiency for the ſupport of the family. And afterwards build thine houſe; when, through the bleſſing of God upon thy diligence and induſtry, thou art become rich, or however haſt ſuch a competent ſubſtance as to be able to build a good houſe, and furniſh it in an handſome manner, then do it; but firſt take care of the main point, that you have a ſufficiency to finiſh it; ſee the advice of Chriſt, Luke xiv. 28, 29. neceſſaries are firſt to be ſought after, before things ornamental and ſuperfluous; firſt take care to live, and then, if you can, build a fine houſe. Jarchi interprets this of a man's firſt getting fields, vineyards, and cattle, ſomething beforehand in the world, and then take a wife, when he is able to maintain her, whereby his houſe may be built up; ſee Ruth iv. 11.

℣. 28. Be not a witneſs againſt thy neighbour without cauſe, &c.] Unleſs forced unto it, except there is ſome urgent reaſon for it; not upon any trivial account, or in any frivolous matter; never appear forward and eager to bear witneſs againſt him, and whenever obliged to it, be not a falſe witneſs, but ſpeak truth, whether thy neighbour be a friend or a foe. And deceive not with thy lips; by bearing a falſe teſtimony, the judge, thy neighbour and thyſelf; for though men may be deceived, God cannot: or ſhouldeſt thou do ſo, thou wouldſt break break and cut him to pieces with thy lips[x]; which is the ſenſe of the words according to R. Judah, as Ben Melech relates.

℣. 29. Say not, I will do ſo to him as he hath done to me, &c.] He has falſly accuſed and reproached me, and bore a falſe teſtimony, or ſuborned falſe witneſſes againſt me, and I will do the ſame to him now an opportunity ſerves; but as private revenge itſelf is ſinful, ſo eſpecially when it is purſued in a wicked way. I will render to the man according to his work; this ſhould be left to the Lord whoſe prerogative it is; ſee ℣. 12. Rom. xii. 19.

℣. 30. I went by the field of the ſlothful, &c.] This very probably was a real matter of fact; king Solomon's way lay at a certain time by the field of a ſlothful man, who never went into it himſelf, there being a lion in the way; and which he took no care of to manure and till, to plow and ſow, but let it lie waſte and uncultivated; an emblem of a carnal and worldly profeſſor, and eſpecially an unregenerate man, neglecting the affairs of his ſoul, his heart remaining like the fallow field unopened and unbroken, hard, obdurate, and impenitent; nothing ſown in it, no ſeed of grace; nor has the ſeed of the word any place in it, but falling on it lies like ſeed by the way-ſide, catched up by every bird. And by the vineyard of the man void of underſtanding; as the ſlothful man, is that takes no care to plant and dreſs it, that it may bring forth fruit to his own profit and advantage; and as every unregenerate man is, who is unconcerned about his ſoul, and the welfare of it; whatever underſtanding he may have of things natural and civil, he has no knowledge of ſpiritual things, of God in Chriſt, of himſelf, his ſtate and condition; of Chriſt, and the way of peace, life, and ſalvation by him; of the Spirit, and his work of grace upon the heart; and of the goſpel, and the myſteries of it; and ſo has no regard to the vineyard of his ſoul, and the plantation and fruitfulneſs of it; ſee Cant. i. 6.

℣. 31. And lo, it was all grown over with thorns, &c.] Or thiſtles[y]; which grow up of themſelves, are the fruit of the curſe, and the effect of ſlothfulneſs. And nettles had covered the face thereof; ſo that nothing was to be ſeen but thorns and thiſtles, nettles and weeds; and ſuch is the caſe of the ſouls of men when neglected, and no concern is had for them; ſo it is with carnal and worldly profeſſors, who are overrun with the cares of this world, the deceitfulneſs of riches, and the luſts of other things, comparable to thorns and nettles for their piercing and ſtinging nature, and the unfruitfulneſs and unprofitableneſs of them; ſuch are the thorny-ground hearers, Matt. xiii. 22. and ſuch is the caſe of all unregenerate perſons, whoſe ſouls are like an uncultivated field, and a neglected vineyard; in which grow naturally the weeds of ſin and corruption, comparable to thorns and nettles for their ſpontaneous production, for the number of them, for their unfruitfulneſs, and for the pain and diſtreſs they bring when conſcience is awakened; and becauſe as ſuch ground that bears thorns and nettles, is nigh to curſing, and its end to be burned, which is their caſe; ſee Heb. vi. 8. And the ſtone-wall thereof was broken down; the fence about the fields, the wall about the vineyard, to keep out men and beaſts; ſee Iſa. v. 2. which thro' ſlothfulneſs and want of repair and keeping up, fell to decay, Eccleſ. x. 18. and thus carnal profeſſors and unregenerate men, having no guard upon themſelves, are open and expoſed to every ſin, ſnare, and temptation; Satan has free egreſs and regreſs; the evil ſpirit can go out and come in when he pleaſes, and bring ſeven evil ſpirits more wicked than himſelf: indeed ſuch is the evil heart of man that it needs no tempter; he is drawn aſide of his own luſt and enticed; he is liable to every ſin, and to fall into the utmoſt ruin; he has nothing to protect and defend him; not the Spirit, nor grace, nor power of God.

℣. 32. Then I ſaw, and conſidered it well, &c.] Or when I ſaw, I conſidered it well; or ſet my heart upon it[z]; when he ſaw as he paſſed along the field and the vineyard, he conſidered who was the owner and proprietor of them; what a ſluggiſh and fooliſh man he was, and what a ruinous condition his field and vineyard were in. I looked upon it, and received inſtruction; looked at it again, and took a thorough view of it, and learned ſomething from it; ſo great and wiſe a man as Solomon received inſtruction from the field and vineyard of the ſlothful and fooliſh man; he learned to be wiſer, and to be more diligent in cultivating his own field, and dreſſing his own vineyard: ſo from the view and conſideration of the ſlothfulneſs and folly of an unregenerate man, and of the ſtate and condition of his ſoul, many leſſons of inſtruction may be learned; as that there is no free-will and wiſdom in men with reſpect to that which is good; the ruinous ſtate and condition of men, as being all overſpread with ſin and corruption, in all the powers and faculties of their ſouls; and that there is nothing in them agreeable to God, but all the reverſe; alſo the neceſſity of divine grace to put them into a good ſtate, and make them fruitful; moreover the diſtinguiſhing grace of God which makes others to differ from them; and likewiſe it is teaching and inſtructive to good men to uſe more diligence themſelves in things relating to their ſpiritual good, and to the glory of God.

℣. 33. Yet a little ſleep, a little ſlumber, &c.] The ſight of the field and vineyard of the ſlothful put Solomon in mind of an obſervation he had made before, which fitly deſcribes the diſpoſition and geſture of the ſluggard, by which means his field and vineyard came to ruin; whilſt he ſhould be up and tilling his field and planting his vineyard, he is in his bed; and awaking, inſtead of riſing, craves for and indulges himſelf in another little doze, and which he repeats again and again. A little folding of the hands to ſleep; which ought to have been employed another way; ſee the note on chap. vi. 10.

℣. 34. So ſhall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, &c.] Swiftly and ſuddenly, both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe. And thy want as an armed man; irreſiſtibly. Here ends according to ſome the ſecond, according to others the third part of this book of Proverbs, another beginning with the following chapter.

CHAP. XXV.

℣. 1. THESE are alſo proverbs of Solomon, &c.] Theſe that follow to the end of the book, as well as thoſe which go before. Here begins a third, ſome ſay a fourth part of this book. The Targum and Syriac verſion read, "theſe are alſo the "deep proverbs of Solomon;" and the Arabic verſion adds, "the expoſition of which is difficult." Which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out; out of the writings of Solomon; out of his three thouſand proverbs, it may be; or out of the public records, which contained an account of his words and deeds. Who theſe men were, is not certain; perhaps his miniſters of ſtate, Eliakim, Shebna and Joah; or the prophets of his time, Iſaiah, Micah and Hoſea: the Targum and Syriac verſion call them his friends. Whoever they were, no doubt they were employed by Hezekiah; and which is recorded to his honour, that he was ſo careful to preſerve ſuch uſeful ſayings, and annex them to thoſe that were already collected and put together as above. This verſe, it is likely, was wrote by one of the copiers. The proverbs begin in the next verſe.

℣. 2. It is the glory of God to conceal a thing, &c.] Secret things belong unto him, and they are kept ſo by him: many things which he does reveal, yet the modus or manner of them remains hidden; as what relates to his own being, and manner of ſubſiſting; the Trinity of perſons in the Godhead; the filiation of the Son, and the proceſſion of the Spirit; the incarnation of Chriſt, and the like: the predeſtination of men to life and death, though that there is ſuch a thing is certain, yet who they are is not known; the purpoſes and decrees of God, all that he determines to do, or ſhall be done, are known unto him from eternity; but then the times and ſeaſons in which they will be accompliſhed are kept in his own power; the day and hour of the laſt judgment none knows but himſelf: his judgments, and ways in providence, are unſearchable and paſt finding out; there are many things in it unaccountable to men; nor does he give an account of them to the ſons of men; theſe are at preſent ſecrets in his own breaſt, his judgments will be made manifeſt. Now it is his glory to conceal them; they are all known to him, and the reaſons of them; he is the omniſcient, all-wiſe God, and ſtands in no need of the advice of creatures; nor are they taken into his privy council. Some apply this to his pardoning ſin, which is ſometimes expreſſed by covering it; and in which the glory of his grace and mercy is greatly diſplayed. Jarchi interprets it of the hiſtory of the work of creation, and Ezekiel's viſion of the wheels, the underſtanding of which is very difficult; and which the Jews forbid the reading of, as alſo Solomon's Song, until men are come to ripeneſs of years. But the honour of kings is to ſearch out a matter; to inveſtigate every thing relating to civil government, and that may be of uſe to them in the exerciſe of it; particularly to ſearch into the word of God, and obſerve the laws in it, and rule according to them; or make ſuch laws as are agreeable to it, and execute them: and to enquire diligently into all cauſes that are brought before them, that they may find out the truth of things, and paſs judgment accordingly; and be able to give reaſons for what they do in the public affairs of government, and make it appear that they are according to the rules of truth and juſtice; and to do ſo will gain them immortal honour! ſee Job xxix. 16.

℣. 3. The heaven for height, and the earth for depth, &c.] Theſe are eminent for what are aſcribed to them; nothing is higher than the heavens, nor any thing deeper than the earth; the height of the heavens cannot be reached, and the center of the earth cannot eaſily be got unto; the heavens above cannot be meaſured, and the foundation of the earth cannot be ſearched beneath; at leaſt not by common perſons, whatever may be done in their way by aſtronomers and geometricians. And thus as the heavens and the earth are immeaſurable, Jer. xxxi. 37. ſo the heart of kings is unſearchable; eſpecially ſuch an one as Solomon was, who had largeneſs of heart as the ſand on the ſea-ſhore: and this muſt be underſtood of ſuch who have the art of governing; for ſome are ſo weak in their conduct, and ſo much expoſe themſelves, that it is eaſy to ſee what is in their hearts, and what are the ſprings of their actions. Wiſe princes lay their ſchemes deep, and conceal their deſigns, and keep their reaſons of ſtate ſecret, ſo that it is not an eaſy thing to penetrate into their councils and views: for this does not ſo much reſpect the multitude of buſineſs they have upon their hearts and hands, as Jarchi and others underſtand it; as the privacy and ſecrecy in which they are managed, and the reaſons of which are kept from common perſons, who therefore are not proper judges of them; and who yet will often take upon them to cenſure and condemn, when they are ignorant of the true cauſe of ſuch conduct.

℣. 4. Take away the droſs from the ſilver, &c.] By putting it into the furnace, and purging it from it: And there ſhall come forth a veſſel for the finer; not out of the furnace, a veſſel, formed and ſhaped, but pure ſilver, ſhall come out of it for the finer; of which a veſſel may be made, very honourable, beautiful, and fit for uſe: the application of it is in the following verſe.

℣. 5. Take away the wicked from before the king, &c.] Wicked miniſters and counſellors; they are the droſs, worthleſs and uſeleſs; yea, hurtful and pernicious. The king is the finer, for whom the veſſel is; the kingdom is the ſilver veſſel refined; and which becomes much the better, when wicked men are removed from the court and cabinet council of kings; as well as the king is the happier, and his throne more firm and ſecure, as follows: And his throne ſhall be eſtabliſhed in righteouſneſs; which he ſhall execute, wicked miniſters being removed from him, who adviſed him to take unrighteous meaſures; and others being put in their room, who counſel him to do acts of juſtice; whereby his throne is ſecured, and he ſits firm upon it, which before was tottering and ſhaking, and he in great danger of being removed from it.

℣. 6. Put not forth thyſelf in the preſence of the king, &c.] Intrude not thyſelf into his preſence; or ruſh not into it in a rude and irreverent way; or be not ambitious to be a courtier: or do not appear glorious, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; or honour thyſelf[a], as the word ſignifies; do not appear too gay at court, or make too ſplendid an appearance, pearance, above thy fortune and ſtation; and which may ſeem to vie with and outdo the king himſelf, which will not be well taken; princes love not to be equalled, and much leſs excelled. And ſtand not in the place of great men; where the king's family or his nobles ſhould ſtand, his miniſters and counſellors of ſtate, and thoſe that wait upon him.

ỳ. 7. For better it is that it be ſaid unto thee, Come up hither, &c.] It is much more to thine honour and credit to ſeat thyſelf in a place rather beneath than above thee; which being obſerved by ſome of the officers at court, or by him whoſe buſineſs it is to look after ſuch things, he will becken or call to thee to come up to a higher and more honourable place: Than that thou ſhouldeſt be put lower, in the preſence of the prince whom thine eyes have ſeen; than that thou ſhouldeſt be thruſt away with a ſevere rebuke for thy boldneſs and arrogance, in approaching too near the king's perſon, and taking the place of ſome great man, which did not become thee, and be forced down to a lower place, to thy great mortification; and the more, as this will be in the preſence of the prince thou hadſt the curioſity of ſeeing, and the ambition of making thyſelf acceptable to, by a gay and ſplendid appearance; and now with great diſgrace turned out of his preſence, or at leaſt driven to a great diſtance from him. Our Lord ſeems to refer to this paſſage, in Luke xiv. 8—10.

ỳ. 8. Go not forth haſtily to ſtrive, &c.] To go to law with a neighbour; think well of it beforehand; conſider the nature of the cauſe, whether right or wrong; or whether it is a matter of ſuch moment as to go to law about; whether it will not be deemed a frivolous and vexatious ſuit; whether able to bear the expences of it, and what may probably be the ſucceſs of it. Leſt thou know not what to do in the end thereof; for a livelihood, having ſpent all thy ſubſtance in the law-ſuit, and ſo reduced to poverty, as not to know how to live, or how and where to ſhew thy face, through the diſgrace that ſhall fall upon thee by loſing the cauſe. When thy neighbour hath put thee to ſhame; in open court, and proved himſelf to be in the right, and that thou art in the wrong; himſelf an honeſt man, and thee a litigious perſon.

ỳ. 9. Debate thy cauſe with thy neighbour himſelf, &c.] Between thee and him alone; lay the matter before him, and hear what he has to ſay for himſelf, by which you will better judge of the nature of the cauſe; try to compromiſe things, and make up the difference between you, which is much better than to commence a law-ſuit; at leaſt ſuch a ſtep ſhould be taken firſt; ſee Matt. v. 25. And diſcover not a ſecret to another; if the thing in controverſy is a ſecret, do not acquaint another perſon with it, keep it among yourſelves; if the affair can be made up without bringing it into a court of judicature; beſides, by communicating it to others, you may have bad counſel given, and be led to take indirect methods: or, the ſecret of another, or another ſecret do not diſcover [b]; if you know any thing ſcandalous and reproachful of your neighbour and his family, you are contending with, which does not concern the cauſe in hand, do not divulge it, as perſons from a ſpirit of revenge are apt to do, when they are quarrelling or litigating a point with each other.

ỳ. 10. Leſt he that heareth it, put thee to ſhame, &c.] Or reproach thee [c] with treachery and deceit. Either the perſon of whom it is told, or the perſon to whom it is told; who may make thee aſhamed, either by fixing the odious character of a defamer, a whiſperer and backbiter, on thee; or by making a retaliation, and in his turn make known ſome ſecret things concerning thyſelf, which before were not known, and, now publiſhed, will be to thy diſgrace. And thine infamy turn not away; it ſhall ſtick ſo cloſe to thee, that thou ſhalt never get clear of it as long as thou liveſt, or ever retrieve thy credit; the brand of infamy ſhall ever be upon thee.

ỳ. 11. A word fitly ſpoken, &c.] Or, a word ſpoken on its wheels [d]: that proceeds aright, keeps due order, is well circumſtanced as to matter, method, time, place and perſons; a diſcourſe well put together, properly pronounced, roundly, eaſily and fluently delivered to proper perſons, and adapted to their circumſtances; and ſeaſonably ſpoken, as the Targum and many verſions render it: is like apples of gold in pictures of ſilver; either like apples made of gold, and ſo valuable and precious; or as apples, called golden from their colour, as golden pippins and golden rennets; or oranges, which are ſometimes called golden apples: either of theſe in ſilver caſes and incloſures, as Aben Ezra and Gerſom interpret the word; or in a ſilver cup, as the Syriac verſion; or in ſilver lattices, as Maimonides, through which they may be ſeen, look very pleaſant and delightful. The words may deſign, as ſome think, ſilver baſkets of net-work [e]; into which, golden apples or oranges being put, and placed on a table, look very beautiful; and to ſuch, a word fitly ſpoken is compared. This may be applied to the word of the goſpel, as ſpoken by Chriſt, the great Prophet of the church; who has the tongue of the learned, to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to weary ſouls, Iſa. l. 4. and by his miniſters, who publiſh the goſpel, that faithful ſaying and worthy of all acceptation: this being the word of ſalvation, is fitly ſpoken to all ſenſible ſinners, and muſt be exceeding agreeable to them; ſince it is of ſalvation from all ſin, and for the chief of ſinners, and intirely of free grace; includes all bleſſings in it, and is for ever; and ſince it is a proclamation of pardon of all ſorts of ſins and ſinners, and of all their ſins, and according to the riches of grace; and is alſo the word of reconciliation, and publiſhes peace to rebels, who could not make their own peace with God; and yet this is done by the blood of Chriſt, as the goſpel declares: and ſeeing it is likewiſe the word of righteouſneſs, which reveals the righteouſneſs of Chriſt as juſtifying, when a man's own righteouſneſs will not acquit him; and invites weary ſouls to Chriſt for reſt, and therefore muſt be grateful to all ſuch perſons, and be eſteemed as valuable as balls or apples of gold; and as pleaſant and delightful to ſee and hear of, as thoſe ſet in ſilver baſkets of net-work; and be as refreſhing and comfortable, and as grateful to the taſte, as real apples of the beſt kind; ſee Cant. ii. 2, 5. It may alſo be applied to the promiſes of grace, ſeaſonably ſpoken and ſuitably applied by the Spirit of God; who takes the promiſes which are in Chriſt, and ſhews and opens them to ſouls in diſtreſs, at the moſt proper and ſeaſonable time; and which are exceeding great and precious, yield abundance of pleaſure and delight, and are very comfortable. Yea, this may be applied to the words of good men in private converſation, either by way of counſel, or comfort, or admonition; and to every word that is with grace, and miniſters grace to the hearer, and is for the uſe of edifying, when time, place, perſons and circumſtances are obſerved. Maimonides[f] thinks, the external ſenſe of the word is meant by the ſilver, and the internal ſenſe by the gold; which latter is ſeen through, and is much better than the former.

ỷ. 12. As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, &c.] As a golden ear-ring, when firſt put on, gives pain and uneaſineſs; but being well hung and fixed, is very ornamental, being of fine gold, and eſpecially when any jewels are upon it; which may be meant by the ornament, as the word is rendered, Cant. vii. 1. So is a wiſe reprover upon an obedient ear; ſuch is the reproof of a wiſe man, which is ſeaſonably given, in a fit and proper manner; and which appears to proceed from love, and is deſigned for good, and done in great affection and faithfulneſs: this, though it may be a little grating to the ear at firſt, yet, when well conſidered and received, inſtead of leaving any infamy or reproach on the perſon reproved, it is an ornament to him, as well as reflects honour upon the reprover. It may be rendered, ſo is he that reproveth a wiſe man, upon or with an obedient ear[g]; a wiſe man that has an obedient or hearing ear, who is ſo wiſe as to attend to reproofs given him, and which he takes kindly, and receives profit and advantage from them; ſee chap. ix. 8. and xv. 31.

ỷ. 13. As the cold of ſnow in the time of harveſt, &c.] As water as cold as ſnow; or as a breeze of air, ſuch as in a time of ſnow; and ſo Jarchi, "as "the cold of the days of ſnow, which a man de-"ſires in ſummer, and not ſnow ſimply, for ſnow "itſelf is not good in the time of harveſt;" ſee chap. xxvi. 1. Or rather, as a ſhield or covering of ſnow[h], as the word ſignifies: perhaps, as Guſſetius[i] thinks, a veſſel in ſuch a form, in which ſnow was kept in ſummer, is meant; and the ſame word, the two firſt radical letters being doubled, is uſed for the pot or urn in which the manna was kept, Exod. xvi. 33. As ſnow, that in thoſe hot countries, uſed to be kept in veſſels, in places under ground, to cool their drink with in ſummer-time; juſt as ice is kept with us, in like places, for the ſame purpoſe; and then the ſenſe is, As drink cooled with ſnow is very agreeable, and exceeding refreſhing to thoſe that labour in the field in the time of harveſt; ſo is a faithful meſſenger to them that ſend him; for he refreſheth the ſoul of his maſters: ſuch an one that is ſent with a meſſage, and faithfully executes it, whilſt he is gone, the mind of his maſter is very thoughtful about the iſſue and ſucceſs of it; but when he returns and gives him an account of it, and eſpecially when he ſucceeds to his wiſh; it reſtores and ſettles his mind, as the word[k] ſignifies; and gives him a great deal of pleaſure and ſatisfaction, and renders the meſſenger dear and valuable to him. Chriſt is the meſſenger, one of a thouſand, ſent by his divine Father on a meſſage of grace and ſalvation, in which he has ſucceeded, being faithful to him that appointed him; and ſo is exceeding acceptable to him, his ſervant, his elect, in whom his ſoul delighteth! Goſpel-miniſters are meſſengers, and faithful ones, whoſe feet are beautiful, and their words acceptable to ſouls, to whom they are ſent, and are a ſweet ſavour to him that ſent them; and who will commend them as good and faithful ſervants, and appoint them rulers over many cities, and introduce them into his joy.

ỷ. 14. Whoſo boaſteth himſelf of a falſe gift, &c.] Of his charity and alms-deeds; bragging of great things he does this way, when he does nothing; or who is very vain in making large promiſes of what he will give, when he does not perform; either not having it in his heart, or in the power of his hands, to give what he promiſes; Satan-like, who offered to give all the kingdoms of this world to Chriſt, if he would worſhip him, when nothing of it belonged unto him, or was in his power to give: and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, a glorious man; that is, a vain-glorious man, and not fulfilling promiſes. It may very well be applied to falſe teachers, who boaſt of their gifts and ſpiritual knowledge, when they have none; ſpeaking great ſwelling words of vanity, when they are empty of all that is good, and are as follow: Like clouds and wind without rain; which make a ſhew and appearance of rain, promiſe much, but produce none; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 17, 18. Jude 12.

ỷ. 15. By long forbearing is a prince perſuaded, &c.] To come into meaſures and do that which his council and miniſtry adviſe him to, and to which he may ſeem at firſt very averſe; but by a mild and gentle repreſentation of things, by a humble ſubmiſſion of them to him, and by frequent remonſtrances, and patient waiting, his mind is ſoftened, bent and inclined to take their advice, and purſue the meaſures ſuggeſted to him; which, had they been preſſed with heat, haughtineſs and haſte, would have been rejected. And a ſoft tongue breaketh the bone; or hardneſs, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; ſoft words, or words delivered in ſoft language, remove hardneſs and roughneſs from the minds of men; and work upon, influence and bend men, whoſe wills are obſtinate and ſtubborn, and make them pliable and tractable: ſo David, with a ſoft tongue, wrought upon Saul, his enemy; and Abigail, by her ſoft language, turned the mind of David, who was bent upon the deſtruction of Nabal, 1 Sam. xxiv. 16. and xxv. 32. ſee chap. xv. 1. Jarchi interprets this ſoft tongue of prayer and ſupplication, by which ſevere things againſt ſinners are removed from them; and ſo he underſtands the former clauſe, of the forbearance of God, which gives encouragement to ſinners, to perſuade him in their favour by repentance and prayer; ſee Matt. xviii. 26, 27.

ỷ. 16. Haſt thou found honey? &c.] Of which there was great plenty in Judea; and was to be found in fields and woods, 1 Sam. xiv. 25, 26. Eat ſo much as is ſufficient for thee; to ſatisfy appetite, without overcharging the ſtomach; what may be conducive to health, and no more. Leſt thou be filled therewith, and vomit it; that is, overfilled; filled to a loathing of it, ſo as to cauſe a caſting of it up. This is not merely to be underſtood ſtood in a literal ſenſe; ſomething more is intended, as in chap. xxiv. 13. and according to the ſenſe there, that which Maimonides [l] gives of this ſeems agreeable; that it reſpects the getting of wiſdom and knowledge, which, like honey, is ſweet, and deſirable, and excellent, and nouriſhing, moderately uſed: but then perſons ſhould take care to keep within due bounds, and not ſeek to be over wiſe; or to exerciſe themſelves in things too high for them, and aim at that which is above their capacity; but ſhould content themſelves with what is within their reach and compaſs: and ſo Gerſom underſtands it. Some think that moderation in the uſe of worldly things and lawful pleaſures is here recommended: and others, that the words refer to what follow; that when a man has got a pleaſant and delightful friend, he ſhould not viſit him too often; leſt too much familiarity bringing contempt, he ſhould loſe his friend: ſo Jarchi connects the words.

℣. 17. Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour's houſe, &c.] Not but that it is commendable to be neighbourly and friendly, or for one neighbour to viſit another; but then it ſhould not be very frequent; a man ſhould not be always or often at his neighbour's houſe. So the words may be rendered, make thy foot precious or rare at thy neighbour's houſe [m]; be ſeldom there. Leſt he be weary of thee, and ſo hate thee; or, leſt he be ſated with thee [n]; filled with thy company to a loathing of it, as the ſtomach with eating too much honey, and ſo his friendſhip be turned into hatred.

℣. 18. A man that beareth falſe witneſs againſt his neighbour, &c.] In whoſe houſe he has often been, and whom he has frequently viſited; and, obſerving what was done there, not only diſcovers and tells abroad the ſecrets of his family, but even things which are falſe; yea, in a court of judicature, appears a witneſs againſt him, and ſwears falſely to his hurt and prejudice. Such a man is a maul, and a ſword, and a ſharp arrow; that is, to his neighbour, againſt whom he bears falſe witneſs; and by ſo doing, he mauls his fame, his credit, character and reputation; and as with a ſword, takes away his life; and againſt whom there is no more guarding, than againſt a ſharp arrow, that comes from afar, ſuddenly and ſwiftly.

℣. 19. Confidence in an unfaithful man in time of trouble, &c.] It is not good to put confidence in any man, not in princes, nor in the beſt of men; much leſs in an unfaithful, prevaricating and treacherous man; and eſpecially in a time of diſtreſs and trouble, depending on his help and aſſiſtance, which is leaning on a broken reed, and truſting to a broken ſtaff. Or, the confidence of an unfaithful man in time of trouble [o]; that which he puts confidence in; who truſts in his riches, or in his righteouſneſs, or in his own heart, all which are vain and deceitful: is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint; which are ſo far from being of any uſe, the one in eating food, and the other in walking, that they are both an hindrance to thoſe actions, and cauſe pain and uneaſineſs: or, a bad tooth, ſo the Targum and Syriac verſion; a rotten one.

℣. 20. As be that taketh away a garment in cold weather, &c.] Either takes it off of himſelf, or another perſon, when it would be rather more proper to put another garment on, and ſo is expoſed to the injury of cold weather. And as vinegar upon nitre; nitre was found in Egypt, beyond Memphis, as Strabo ſays [p]; there were two mines of nitre, which produced much, and thence it was called the Nitriotic Nome: others ſay, nitre has its name from Nitria, a town in Egypt [q], which gives name to the Nitrian deſert, where there is a lake called Latron; from the bottom of which, that ſort of nitre, called Natron, ariſes to the top, as is apprehended, and there, by the heat of the ſun, condenſes into this kind of ſubſtance [r], which will ferment with an acid; and ſo vinegar poured upon it, will irritate and diſturb it, cauſe it to ferment, and make a noiſe and a hiſſing. This muſt be underſtood only of this ſort of nitre, of the nitre of the ancients; not of the moderns, which is no other than ſalt-petre; for though this will ferment with vinegar, ſalt-petre will not [s]: nitre is diſſolved by a liquid, but not any, only that which is cold, as Ariſtotle obſerves [t], as is vinegar; and therefore, with great propriety, this is joined to what goes before. So is be that ſingeth ſongs to an heavy heart; rather diſtreſſes and afflicts him the more; as he cannot ſing himſelf, he cannot bear to hear others ſing; ſuch rather ſhould be condoled and wept with, than to have ſongs ſung to them. Some underſtand the words in a ſenſe the reverſe; the word rendered taketh away, in the firſt clauſe, has the ſignification of adorning with a garment; hence they render it, as be that putteth on a garment [u] for ornament in cold weather, and as vinegar to nitre, ſo is be that ſingeth ſongs to an heavy heart; that is, as an additional garment drives away cold, and vinegar diſſolves nitre, ſo ſinging ſongs to an heavy-hearted man drives away ſorrow; as in the caſe of Saul, ſuch an effect had muſic on him, 1 Sam. xvi. 24. or rather, to put on a thin garment for ornament in cold weather, is as abſurd and unſeaſonable as to put vinegar to nitre, or to a wound, as Schultens, and to ſing ſongs to a heavy heart; all abſurd.

℣. 21. If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat, &c.] Which includes all manner of food; whatever perſons may have in their houſes, that they ſhould bring out and feed the hungry with, even though an enemy. And if be be thirſty, give him water to drink; which was what was uſually and in common drank in thoſe countries. Theſe two, bread and water, take in all the neceſſaries of life; and giving them is expreſſive of all acts of beneficence and humanity to be performed to enemies; ſee 2 Kings vi. 20. or drink to him, ſo Pagninus and Montanus; which is ſtill more expreſſive of reſpect and kindneſs.

℣. 22. For thou ſhalt heap coals of fire upon his head, &c.] Not to increaſe his puniſhment and damnation, the more aggravated by kindneſs ſhewn him; but to bring him by ſuch means to a ſenſe of former injuries, and to ſhame for them, repentance of them, and love of the perſon injured, and carefulneſs for the future of doing him any further wrong. And the Lord ſhall reward thee; with good things, for all the good done to thine enemy, whether it has the deſired effect on him or not; or whether he rewards thee or no; ſee Rom. xii. 20, 21.

℣. 23. The north-wind driveth away rain, &c.] So the geographer[w] ſays, the ſwift north-wind drives away the moiſt clouds; which uſually come from the oppoſite quarter, the ſouth. The word uſed has the ſignification of conceiving, and begetting, and bringing forth; hence ſome[x] render it to a different ſenſe, and ſo the Targum, "the north "wind bringeth forth rain;" and in this ſenſe Gerſom interprets it, and ſays, "the north-wind pro-"duceth rain in Jeruſalem, becauſe it brings there "the vapours that aſcend from the ſea, which lies "north unto it:" and the philoſopher[y] ſays, that in the northern parts of the world, the ſouth-wind produces rain; and in the ſouthern parts, the north wind produces it, as in Judea. But in Job xxxvii. 22. fair, fine, golden, ſerene weather, is ſaid to come out of the north; agreeable to which, the north wind is by Homer[z] called αιθρηγενετης, the producer of ſerene weather; and by Virgil[a], clarus aquilo, i. e. what makes ſerene. The Arabic verſion reads it, the ſouth-wind; and that does bring rain, and, as that verſion has it, excites the clouds. But the firſt reading and ſenſe of the words ſeem beſt[b], and agree with what follows: So doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue; drives it away, diſcourages and ſilences it. When a man puts on a ſtern countenance, a frowning and angry look, on ſuch who bring him ſlanderous reports and idle tales of their neighbours, and reproach and backbite them, it checks them, and puts a ſtop to their practices; whereas liſtening to them, and eſpecially with an air of pleaſure, encourages them in them; were there not ſo many that take pleaſure in hearing thoſe talebearers and backbiters; were they more roughly dealt with, as the bluſtering north-wind does with the rain, there would not be ſo much of this evil practiſed.

℣. 24. It is better to dwell in a corner of the houſe-top, &c.] The ſame is obſerved in chap. xxi. 9. ſee the note there.

℣. 25. As cold waters to a thirſty ſoul, &c.] Water is naturally cold; and is by claſſic writers expreſſed by cold itſelf[c], and is very refreſhing to one athirſt through heat: or, to a weary ſoul[d]; to one wearied with labour; or to a traveller weary with travelling, eſpecially in hot countries, as in the deſerts of Arabia, or in places where it is rare to meet with a brook, ſtream, or fountain of water; which, when he does, it is exceeding pleaſant and agreeable to him. So is good news from a far country; ſo acceptable is it to hear from a friend in a diſtant part of the world, and particularly to hear good news of him. Such is the goſpel; it is good news, and glad tidings of good things; it brings the good news of the grace, and favour, and good-will of God to men; of his appointment and proviſion of a Saviour for them; of the incarnation of Chriſt; of ſalvation being wrought out by him for the chief of ſinners, which is free, full, and for ever; and of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life through him. And this comes from a far country; from heaven, the better country than Canaan, which was a type of it, or any country in this world, and which is afar from hence; the goſpel comes from God in heaven, and it is a report concerning that; it is good news to ſaints, of an eſtate they have there, an inheritance, an houſe, a city and kingdom prepared for them there: this news is brought by the prophets of the Old Teſtament, who diligently enquired of ſalvation by Chriſt; by the angels at Chriſt's incarnation; by John the Baptiſt, the forerunner of Chriſt; by Chriſt himſelf, who was anointed to preach good tidings to the meek; and by his apoſtles, and all the faithful miniſters of the word: and the meſſage they bring is good news; not to carnal and ſelf-righteous perſons, but to ſenſible ſinners; and to them it is as cold waters to a weary or thirſty ſoul; it aſſuages the heat of the law, and the wrath that works in the conſcience; it quenches the thirſt of carnal things, and after a man's own righteouſneſs; it revives and refreſhes his weary, drooping ſpirits, and fills him with a joy unſpeakable and full of glory; as Jacob's ſpirits were revived on hearing the good news of Joſeph, Gen. xlv. 26—28.

℣. 26. A righteous man falling down before the wicked, &c.] Either falling into calamity and diſtreſs by means of the wicked man, through his malice and cunning, and which he ſeeing, rejoices at; or crouching unto him, bowing before him, yielding to him, not daring to oppoſe or reprove him; or falling into ſin in his preſence, which he ever after reproaches him for, and openly expoſes him, ſo that his uſefulneſs is loſt; and eſpecially if he joins with the wicked man in his courſe of living; and particularly if a civil magiſtrate, and acts unrighteouſly in his office: He is as a troubled fountain, and a corrupt ſpring; like a ſpring or fountain, bemuddled with the feet of men or beaſts; ſo that he who was before as a clear ſpring of flowing water, a fountain of juſtice to his neighbours, from whom good doctrine and wholſome advice flowed; is now of no uſe by inſtruction or example, but the contrary.

℣. 27. It is not good to eat much honey, &c.] That is, too much, otherwiſe it is good to eat, chap. xxiv. 13. but too much is hurtful, it ſurfeits the ſtomach, increaſes choler[e], and creates loathing; and indeed too much of any thing is bad[f]. So for men to ſearch their own glory is not glory; to ſet forth their own excellencies, to ſound forth their own praiſes, to ſeek honour of men, to uſe all methods to gain popular applauſe; this is not glorious and praiſe-worthy, but diſhonourable; or it may be rendered, as it literally lies in the original, but to ſearch out, or the ſearching out of their glory is glory[g]; either the glory of righteous men, as Aben Ezra interprets it, ſuch as ſtand and do not fall before the wicked; to ſearch out their excellencies and virtues, and follow their example, is glorious and honourable: or to ſearch the glory of the knowledge of divine things, comparable to honey, is commendable and glorious; for though a man may eat too much honey, yet he cannot have too much knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things, or be ſatiated and overfilled with them; to which the Septuagint verſion agrees, but we ought to honour glorious words; the glorious truths of the word of God ought to be had in great eſteem, and to ſearch out the glory of them is honourable; our Lord directs to a ſearch of the ſcriptures, becauſe they teſtify of him, John v. 39. and we can never know too much of him, or of the precious doctrines of the goſpel; unleſs this is to be underſtood of ſuch things as ſhould not be curiouſly enquired into; men ſhould not be wiſe above what is written, nor ſearch into thoſe things which God has concealed; as his own nature and perfections, the mode of ſubſiſting of the three perſons in the godhead, his ſecret purpoſes and decrees, and unſearchable judgments. To which ſenſe agrees the Vulgate Latin verſion, "ſo he who is the ſearcher of majeſty, "ſhall be oppreſſed by glory;" he ſhall be bore down by it, and not be able to bear the glory of it: and the Targum is, "to eat much honey is not "good, nor to ſearch glorious words." Jarchi takes the words in this ſenſe; and illuſtrates them by the work of creation, Ezekiel's viſion of the wheels, the decrees of God, and the reaſons of them.

℣. 28. He that hath no rule over his own ſpirit, &c.] His affections and paſſions, puts no reſtraint unto them, as the word ſignifies; no guard againſt them, no fence about them, to curb his curioſity, to check his pride and vanity, to reſtrain his wrath and anger and revenge, and keep within due bounds his ambition and itch of vain-glory. Is like a city that is broken down and without walls; into which the enemy may go with pleaſure, and which is expoſed to the rapine and violence of every one; and ſo a man that has no command of himſelf and paſſions, but gives the reins to them, is expoſed to the enemy of ſouls, Satan; and is liable to every ſin, ſnare, and temptation.

CHAP. XXVI.

℣. 1. AS ſnow in ſummer, and as rain in harveſt, &c.] Which were very undeſirable and unſeaſonable, yea very hurtful to the fruits of the earth; and a great obſtruction to the labourers in the harveſt, and an hindrance to the gathering of it in; and were very rare and uncommon in Judea; it was even a miracle for thunder and rain to be in wheat-harveſt, 1 Sam. xii. 17. So honour is not ſeemly for a fool; for a wicked man; ſuch ſhould not be favoured by kings, and ſet in high places of honour and truſt; folly ſet in great dignity, or fooliſh and bad men ſet in honourable places, are as unſuitable and inconvenient as ſnow and rain in ſummer and harveſt, and ſhould be as rare as they; and they are as hurtful and pernicious, ſince they diſcourage virtue and encourage vice, and hinder the proſperity of the commonwealth; ſuch vile perſons are contemned in the eyes of good men, and are diſregarded of God; he will not give them glory here, nor hereafter; the wiſe ſhall inherit it, but ſhame ſhall be the promotion of fools, chap. iii. 35. ſee Eccl. x. 6.

℣. 2. As the bird by wandering, as the ſwallow by flying, &c.] As a bird, particularly the ſparrow, as the word [h] is ſometimes rendered, leaves its neſt and wanders from it, and flies here and there, and ſettles no where; and as the ſwallow flies to the place from whence it came; or the wild pigeon, as ſome [i] think, is meant, which flies away very ſwiftly; the ſwallow has its name in Hebrew from liberty, becauſe it flies about boldly and freely, and makes its neſt in houſes, to which it goes and comes without fear. So the curſe cauſleſs ſhall not come; the mouths of fools or wicked men are full of curſing and bitterneſs, and eſpecially ſuch who are advanced above others, and are ſet in high places; who think they have a right to ſwear at and curſe thoſe below them, and by this means to ſupport their authority and power; but what ſignify their curſes, which are without a cauſe? they are vain and fruitleſs, like Shimei's curſing David; they fly away, as the above birds are ſaid to do, and fly over the heads of thoſe on whom they are deſigned to light; yea return and fall upon the heads of thoſe that curſe, as the ſwallow goes to the place from whence it came; it being a bird of paſſage, Jer. viii. 7. in the winter it flies away and betakes itſelf to ſome iſlands or rocks, called from thence chelidonian [k]. According to the keri, or marginal reading, for here is a double reading, it may be rendered, ſo the curſe cauſleſs ſhall come to him [l]; that gives it without any reaſon. The Septuagint takes in both, "ſo a vain curſe ſhall not come upon any;" what are all the anathemas of the church of Rome? who can curſe whom God has not curſed? yea ſuch ſhall be curſed themſelves; ſee Pſalm cix. 17.

℣. 3. A whip for the horſe, &c.] One that is dull of going, or refractory and wants breaking. A bridle for the aſs; not to curb and reſtrain it from going too faſt, aſſes being generally dull; but to direct its way and turn it when neceſſary, it being ſtiff-necked and obſtinate; though the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions render it a ſpear or goad, ſomething to prick with, and excite it to motion; and ſo the Targum; or otherwiſe one would have thought the whip was fitter for the aſs and the bridle for the horſe. And a rod for the fool's back; ſuggeſting that the fool, or wicked man, is like the horſe or the mule; though not without underſtanding of things natural, yet of things divine and moral; and as ſtupid as the aſs, however wiſe he may conceit himſelf to be, being born like a wild aſſes colt; and inſtead of honour being given him, ſtripes ſhould be laid upon him; he ſhould be reproved ſharply and corrected for his wickedneſs, eſpecially the cauſleſs curſer, chap. xix. 29.

℣. 4. Anſwer not a fool according to his folly, &c.] Sometimes a fool, or wicked man, is not to be anſwered at all; as the miniſters of Hezekiah anſwered not a word to Rabſhakeh; nor Jeremiah the prophet to Hananiah; nor Chriſt to the ſcribes and Phariſees; and when an anſwer is returned, it ſhould not be in his fooliſh way and manner, rendering evil for evil, and railing for railing, in the ſame virulent, lying, calumniating, and reproachful language. Leſt thou alſo be like unto him; leſt thou alſo, who art a man of underſtanding and ſenſe, and haſt paſſed for one among men, come under the ſame imputation, and be reckoned a fool like him.

℣. 5. Anſwer a fool according to his folly, &c.] The Targum is, "but ſpeak with a fool in thy wiſdom;" and the Syriac verſion, "yea ſpeak with a fool according to thy wiſdom;" which would at once remove the ſeeming contradiction in theſe words to the former, but then they are not a true verſion; indeed it is right, and muſt be the ſenſe, that when a fool is anſwered, as it is ſometimes neceſſary he ſhould, that it be done in wiſdom, and ſo as to expoſe his folly; he is to be anſwered and not anſwered according to different times, places, and circumſtances, and manner of anſwering; he is to be anſwered when there is any hope of doing him good, or of doing good to others; or of preventing ill impreſſions being made upon others by what he has ſaid; when the glory of God, the good of the church, and the cauſe of truth require it; and when he would otherwiſe glory and triumph, as if his words or works were unanſwerable, as follow. Leſt he be wiſe in his own conceit; which fools are apt to be, and the rather when no anſwer is given them; imagining it ariſes from the ſtrength of their arguments, and their nervous way of reaſoning, when it is rather from a neglect and contempt of them.

ỳ. 6. He that ſendeth a meſſage by the hand of a fool, &c.] Who knows not know to deliver it in a proper manner, and is incapable of taking the anſwer, and reporting it as he ſhould; or unfaithful in it, and brings a bad or falſe report, as the ſpies did upon the good land. Cutteth off the feet; he may as well cut off his feet before he ſends him, or ſend a man without feet, as ſuch an one; for prudence, diligence, and faithfulneſs in doing a meſſage, and bringing back the anſwer, are as neceſſary to a meſſenger as his feet are. And drinketh damage; to himſelf; his meſſage not being rightly performed, and buſineſs not done well; which is a loſs to the ſender, as well as to his credit and reputation with the perſon to whom he ſends him; he hereby concluding that he muſt be a man of no great judgment and ſenſe to ſend ſuch a fool on his errand. Such are the unſkilful ambaſſadors of princes; and ſuch are unfaithful miniſters, the meſſengers of the churches; ſee chap. x. 26. The words in the original are three ſentences, without a copulative, and ſtand in this order, he that cutteth off feet; he that drinketh damage; he that ſendeth a meſſage by the hand of a fool; that is, they are alike.

ỳ. 7. The legs of the lame are not equal, &c.] Or as the lifting up the legs by one that is lame[m]; to dance to a pipe or violin, is very unſeemly, and does but the more expoſe his infirmity, and can give no pleaſure to others, but cauſes deriſion and contempt. So is a parable in the mouth of fools; an apothegm, or ſententious expreſſion of his own, which he delivers out as a wiſe ſaying, but is lame and halts; it is not conſiſtent with itſelf, but like the legs of a lame man, one higher than the other: or one of the proverbs of this book; or rather any paſſage of ſcripture in the mouth of a wicked man; or any religious diſcourſe of his is very unſuitable, ſince his life and converſation do not agree with it; it is as diſagreeable to hear ſuch a man talk of religious affairs, as it is to ſee a lame man dance; or whoſe legs imitate buckets at a well, where one goes up and another down, as Guſſetius[n] interprets the word.

ỳ. 8. As he that bindeth a ſtone in a ſling, &c.] That ſo faſtens it to it that it cannot be ſlung out of it, it becomes uſeleſs and does not anſwer the end for which it is put there; or that places it there that it may be caſt out, and is caſt out, and ſo is thrown away, and of no more uſe; or that puts a precious ſtone, ſo ſome interpret it, in a heap of common ſtones, even in ſuch a heap as is uſed at the ſtoning of malefactors; or increaſes the heap of ſtones on ſuch, which the more expoſes them, and the greater reproach they are loaded with; ſo the more a fool is praiſed, it does but bring to mind his folly, and iſſues in his greater diſgrace, ſo Guſſetius[o]: or rather it has reſpect to a precious ſtone put in ſuch a heap of ſtones, as Luther; or elſe according to Schultens, to ſuch an one put into an heap of ſepulchral ſtones; or as Aben Ezra, that binds up a ſtone, a common ſtone in purple, which to do is ridiculous, ſo R. Joſeph Kimchi; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, "as he that caſts a ſtone "to Mercury's heap;" an heathen deity, called by the eaſtern people Mertholin and Margenah[p], which laſt is near the ſame with the Hebrew word here uſed; whoſe ſtatue was ſet up where two or more ways met, to direct travellers; and who therefore out of reſpect to the deity, and to ſhew gratitude to him, uſed to caſt a ſtone to the heap for the ſupport of it; and which ſtones, ſet up in ſuch doubtful places, were dedicated to him, and were called after his name[q]; and not only travellers did this in honour of the deity, and to make his ſtatue more manifeſt[r], but alſo for profit, to clear the way from ſtones; and this cuſtom obtained with the Indians, Arabs, Saracens, and now does with the Mahometans[s]: and ſuch heaps of ſtones were alſo placed in cities, and at the doors of houſes, in honour of Mercury, and were called from him Hermæ[t]; theſe ſtones were alſo erected for borders of countries[u]. But it is not probable that this cuſtom obtained in Solomon's time; and yet ſome Jewiſh writers interpret it to this ſenſe, as if he that gives honour to a fool is like him that caſts a ſtone to Mercury; and Jarchi on the text obſerves it as the ſenſe of ſome of their Rabbins, "that he that teacheth the law to a diſci- "ple that is not fit, is as he that caſts a ſtone to "Mercury;" and to caſt a ſtone to Mercury is with them the ſame as to commit idolatry[w]; but either of the former ſenſes is beſt. So is he that giveth honour to a fool; it is all thrown away and loſt, as a ſtone out of a ſling; or as unſeemly as to put a precious ſtone among a heap of ſtones, or a common ſtone in purple; ſee the note on ỳ. 1.

ỳ. 9. As a thorn goeth up into the hand of a drunkard, &c.] And he perceives it not; or being in his hand he makes an ill uſe of it, and hurts himſelf and others with it. So is a parable in the mouth of fools; a proverbial ſentence reſpecting religious matters; or a paſſage of holy ſcripture which either he underſtands not, and has no ſpiritual perception of, any more than the drunkard has of the thorn in his hand; or which being uſed as a pun, or by way of jeſt, as it is the manner of ſome to pun upon, or jeſt with the ſcripture, hurts himſelf and others, wounds his own conſcience, and ruins the ſouls of others; for it is dangerous meddling with edge tools, and hard to kick againſt the pricks; ſo to do is like a drunken man's handling thorns, which he does without judgment, and to his own prejudice and others. Guſſetius[x] underſtands this of a fiſh-hook coming up into the hand of a drunkard empty, without taking any thing by it, and ſo alike uſeleſs is what is ſaid by a fool.

[w] Miſn. Sanhedrin, c. 7. ſ. 6. & Maimon. in Ib.

[x] Ebr. Comment. p. 244.

℣. 10. The great God that formed all things, &c.] That made the heavens, earth, and ſea, and all that are in them; who is great in the perfections of his nature, and in the works of his hands, and greatly to be praiſed. Both rewardeth the fool, and rewardeth tranſgreſſors; according to their works; every tranſgreſſion of the law receiving its juſt recompence of reward, whether a man tranſgreſſes it ignorantly or wilfully; as his tranſgreſſions are, whether through error or preſumption, ſo ſhall his puniſhment be; though ſome underſtand this, as Kimchi, of the Lord's doing good in a providential way to the wiſe and unwiſe, the righteous and the wicked: the words are by ſome rendered to another ſenſe, a great one grieveth all, and he hireth the fool, and he hireth the tranſgreſſors[y]; that is, a great man, a tyrannical prince, grieves all his good ſubjects; or as Hottinger[z] from the uſe of the word in the Arabic tongue, changes all things, inverts their order, or adminiſters all at his will, that is, wrongly; when he hires fools and wicked men to do thoſe bad things for him which others would not, to the great detriment of the commonwealth; and rewards them for it, putting them into poſts of honour and truſt, to the great grief and trouble of all his beſt ſubjects.

℣. 11. As a dog returneth to his vomit, &c.] Who being ſick with what he has eaten caſts it up again, and afterwards returns unto it and licks it up. So a fool returneth to his folly; or repeats[a] it, time after time, many times, as Ben Melech; or a wicked man turns to his wickedneſs, who having had ſome qualms upon his conſcience for ſin, for a while forſakes it; but that fit being over, and he forgetting all his former horror and uneaſineſs, returns to his old courſe of life: a wicked man is here compared to a dog, as he is elſewhere, for his impudence and voracious̄neſs in ſinning; and the filthineſs of ſin is expreſſed by the vomit of a dog, than which nothing is more nauſeous and loathſome; and the apoſtaſy of the ſinner from an external courſe of righteouſneſs into open profaneneſs, is ſignified by the return of this creature to it. This is ſaid to be a true proverb, 2 Peter ii. 22. where it is quoted and applied.

℣. 12. Seeſt thou a man wiſe in his own conceit, &c.] Or in his own eyes[b]; as multitudes may be ſeen by looking round; man is a creature but of ſmall knowledge in things natural, civil, mechanical, philoſophical, moral or divine; yet greatly conceited for the moſt part of his knowledge and wiſdom. As by a fool in this book is generally underſtood a wicked profane man, ſo by a wiſe man is meant a good and righteous man, and may be ſo underſtood here; and many there are who are good and righteous only in their own conceit and eſteem, not truly ſo; they place their righteouſneſs in outward things, in the obſervance of external duties; and though there may be ſome little imperfection in them, yet they think, as they mean well, God will accept the will for the deed: and ſome have imagined they have arrived to perfection; and ſuch are generally conceited, proud and haughty, and deſpiſe others; all which flows from ignorance; for though they fancy themſelves to be wiſe, they are very ignorant of themſelves; of the plague of their own hearts; of the law of God, and the ſpirituality of it, and the extenſiveneſs of its demands; of the ſtrict juſtice and righteouſneſs of God, which will not admit of an imperfect righteouſneſs in the room of a perfect one; and alſo of the righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt, the nature and neceſſity of that to juſtify: and this being their caſe, they are in very dangerous circumſtances; they are building on a ſand; they are liable to fall into a ditch; they cannot be juſtified nor ſaved by their own works; they oppoſe themſelves to God's way of juſtifying and ſaving ſinners; and he ſets himſelf againſt them, he reſiſteth the proud. Wherefore there is more hope of a fool than of him; of a profane ſinner than of a ſelf-righteous perſon; for Chriſt came to ſave ſinners, to call them to repentance, and he receives them as ſuch; but not ſelf-righteous perſons; and, humanly ſpeaking, there is a greater likelihood and greater hopes of convincing ſinners, and bringing them to repentance and to forſake their ſins, than there is of convincing a ſelf-righteous man of the inſufficiency of his righteouſneſs, and the folly of truſting to it, and of bringing him to repent of ſuch a confidence, and to forſake it; for it is moſt natural to him, it is his own, and the effect of great labour and pains; and encourages vanity and boaſting, which would be excluded, ſhould he part with it; ſee Matt. xxi. 31, 32.

℣. 13. The ſlothful man ſaith, &c.] Within himſelf; or to ſuch that excite him to diligence and induſtry, to go about the buſineſs of his calling, to till his field, and dreſs his vineyard. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions add, being ſent into the way; ordered by his maſter to go out to work, when he makes the following excuſe: There is a lion in the way, a lion is in the ſtreets; in the way to his field or vineyard, and in the ſtreets, where his buſineſs lies or leads unto it: a very idle excuſe this; ſince lions are uſually in woods, foreſts and deſert places, and not in public roads, and much leſs in ſtreets of cities; ſee chap. xxii. 13. This may be applied to a man ſlothful in the duties of religion; the way and ſtreets may denote public ordinances, which are the ways of God's appointing, preſcribing, and directing to; and in which good men walk, and find pleaſure and profit; and are the ſtreets where wiſdom cries, or Chriſt is preached, and where he is ſought for and found: but many are the excuſes ſome men make not to attend them; ſee Luke xiv. 17—20. though they are vain, frivolous, and fooliſh as this here; for in theſe ways and ſtreets may be ſeen the feet of the meſſengers of peace; here the turtle's voice, the joyful ſound of ſalvation by Chriſt, may be heard; here the Lamb of God is directed to, to be looked at, as taking away the ſins of men, having been ſlain, and having ſhed his blood for the redemption of them: and though the terrible voice of the law may be ſometimes heard, which is neceſſary to arouſe and awaken ſleepy ſinners, and unhinge ſelf-righteous perſons from a dependence on the works of the law; yet afterwards comes the ſtill, ſmall voice of the goſpel, proclaiming freedom from the curſe and condemnation of the law by Chriſt. Indeed, in ſome ages, there have been violent perſecutors, comparable to lions; and informers have been in the way and in the ſtreets, to terrify ſaints from their duty; but none of theſe could move them from it, nor ſeparate truly gracious ſouls from their love to Chriſt: though carnal, ſlothful profeſſors are offended, when tribulation or perſecution ariſe becauſe of the word, theſe are lions to them; and in times of peace and liberty, they can paint lions, very terrible to themſelves, and raiſe ſuch difficulties as are inſuperable to them; a ſlight diſorder of body, a ſmall inclemency of the weather, little danger of catching cold, and the like, ſhall be a lion to them: not conſidering they have a devouring lion nearer them, in their houſes, chambers, and on their beds with them; even Satan, in whoſe clutches they are, who keeps their goods in peace, by whom they are led captive, and to whom they fall a prey: nor fearing the wrath of the King of kings, which is as the roaring of a lion; the wrath of God, and of the Lamb, who is alſo the lion of the tribe of Judah, and whoſe day of wrath will be ſuch as none will be able to bear.

℣. 14. As the door turneth upon his hinges, &c.] And moves this way and that way, and opens and ſhuts, and yet hangs where it did, is not moved from its place: So doth the ſlothful upon his bed; he turns himſelf from ſide to ſide, but is ſtill on his bed, and does not move out of it, and go about his buſineſs. Aben Ezra makes mention of another reading and ſenſe, the door turneth upon his hinges, and is opened to let men out, one and another, to his work; but yet the ſlothful man is upon his bed; though one and another riſe and go about buſineſs, and he hears the door open again and again, he ſtirs not, but keeps his bed. So profane ſinners lie on the bed of ſinful luſts and ſenſual pleaſures, indulge themſelves in chambering and wantonneſs, and do not care to riſe from hence, and walk honeſtly as in the day-time; and though their conſciences are ſometimes jogged by inward pricks, and they are moved a little by the reproofs of their friends, or awakened by the judgments of God; yet theſe are quickly over, and they give themſelves a turn and go to ſleep again: ſometimes there are ſome motions in them, ſome thoughts and reſolutions of amendment, ſome purpoſes to do good works; but alas! their ſlothfulneſs is ſo great, and the habits and cuſtoms of ſin ſo ſtrong, that they cannot break through them, ſhake off their ſloth, and come out, but remain as they were: and ſo it is with carnal profeſſors, reſting in their own works, and in a round of duties; and after ten, twenty, thirty years profeſſion, or more, they are juſt where they were; have no ſpiritual knowledge, judgment and experience.

℣. 15. The ſlothful hideth his hand in his boſom, &c.] To keep it warm; Jarchi's note is, "he puts "his hand in a hot baſon, becauſe of the cold." The word [c] for boſom does ſometimes ſignify a pot or baſon. Or he hides it under his arm-holes, as ſome render it, not caring to make uſe of it for labour; or covers it out of ſight in his boſom, pretending ſome weakneſs or ailment in it, which hinders him from working; ſee chap. xix. 24. It grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth; from under his arm-holes, or out of his boſom, or even out of the platter, where his food is; an hyperbolical expreſſion, ſetting forth his exceſſive ſloth; and ſuch an one ought not to eat, but ſtarve indeed. It may be rendered, he is weary; it is a wearineſs [d] to him; it is even a labour too much for him to feed himſelf, ſo great is his ſloth: and ſuch is the ſloth of carnal men; it is a wearineſs to them to hear the word, and attend on ordinances, and to lift up their hands in prayer to God; or to make uſe of any means, that they may have food for their ſouls; praying, hearing and reading, are a burden to them; and therefore it is but juſt with God to ſend them a famine of the word, and take away the whole ſtay and ſtaff of bread and water.

℣. 16. The ſluggard is wiſer in his own conceit, &c.] It is a ſort of a ſoleciſm, a kind of a contradiction in terms, for a ſluggard to be wiſe, who is ſo ſlothful as to make no uſe of the means of getting wiſdom and knowledge. And it muſt be a mere conceit in him that he is wiſe, and eſpecially that he is wiſer than ſeven men that can render a reaſon; not alluding to the number of a king's counſellors, who return him an anſwer to what he enquires of them, as Aben Ezra thinks; ſuch as were the ſeven princes of the king of Perſia, Eſther i. 14. ſince to have ſuch an exact number, might not obtain in Solomon's time, either in Perſia, or in his own court, or elſewhere: but it ſignifies a large number, many wiſe men, as Gerſom obſerves, that render a reaſon to every one that aſks it of them; who, having been diligent and induſtrious, have got ſuch a competency of knowledge, that they are able to give a proper reaſon of what they ſay, believe, or do: and ſuch are they who, by the bleſſing of grace in the uſe of means, are wiſe in a ſpiritual ſenſe; know themſelves, and Chriſt Jeſus, and the way of ſalvation by him; have an underſtanding of the ſcriptures, and of the doctrines of the goſpel; have their ſpiritual ſenſes exerciſed, to diſcern between truth and error; are of eſtabliſhed judgments, and capable of teaching others good judgment and knowledge; and of giving a reaſon of their faith, hope and practice; ſee 1 Pet. iii. 15. Now ſuch is the conceit of an ignorant ſluggard, that he is wiſer than ten thouſand or ever ſo many of theſe; he thinks himſelf the wiſeſt man, inaſmuch as he enjoys eaſe and quiet in his ſtupid, ſottiſh way, whilſt they are toiling and labouring, and taking a great deal of pains to get knowledge; and that he ſleeps in a whole ſkin, and eſcapes the cenſure and reproaches of men, which they endure for being preciſe in religious duties, and conſtant in the performance of them; and fancies he can get to heaven in an eaſier way, without all this care, and toil and trouble, only by ſaying, Lord, have mercy on me, at laſt.

℣. 17. He that paſſeth by, and meddleth with ſtrife belonging not to him, &c.] One that going along the ſtreets, and paſſing by the door, where two or more perſons are quarrelling, and he thruſts himſelf in and intermeddles in the affair he has no concern in; and intereſts himſelf in the cauſe of the quarrel he has nothing to do with, on account of acquaintance, relation, or office; and eſpecially, when inſtead of being a mediator and peace-maker, he takes on one ſide, and acts the angry part, as Aben Ezra interprets the word rendered meddleth; blows things up into a greater flame, and enrages the one againſt the other. Such a man is like one that taketh a dog by the ears; which are ſhort, and difficult to be held, and tender; and therefore cannot bear to be held by them, eſpecially to be pulled and lugged by them, and which is very provoking; and as ſuch a man has work enough to do to hold him, ſo he is in danger of being bitten by him, at leaſt when he is forced to let go his hold: and ſo it is with a man that interferes in a quarrel in a furious manner; it is much if one or other of the contending parties do not fall upon him and abuſe him. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions render it, as he that holdeth the tail of a dog.

℣. 18. As a mad man, who caſteth firebrands, arrows and death.] Or the inſtruments of death, as Aben Ezra; or the ſharp arrows of death, as the Targum and Syriac verſion; who caſts firebrands into the houſes and barns of his neighbours to conſume them; or arrows at their perſons and cattle to deſtroy them; or any other inſtruments of death, which none but a mad man, or one wickedly mad would do. Or, as one that makes himſelf mad[e]; that feigns himſelf mad, and, under colour of this, does miſchief to his neighbour's perſon and property: or, as one that hides himſelf[f]; that caſts firebrands, arrows, and other deadly things, in a private way, ſo as not to be ſeen, and that it may not be known from whence they come: or, as one that wearies himſelf[g], ſo Jarchi; in doing miſchief in ſuch a way. The word in the Arabic language ſignifies to play and be in ſport; and ſo it means one that does theſe things in ſport, as it is a ſport to a fool to do miſchief; which ſenſe agrees with what follows.

℣. 19. So is the man that deceiveth his neighbour, &c.] By telling him a lie; or by reporting falſe things concerning him; or by cheating him in trade and commerce; or by taking his goods privately from him; and when catched in either of theſe, ſaith, Am not I in ſport? do not be angry, I deſigned no hurt; it is all in jeſt, a mere joke: but had he not been apprehended, it would have been in earneſt, as he was. This is only an excuſe, and as abſurd an one, as if a man ſhould ſet fire to his neighbour's houſe and barns, or throw arrows at him, or ſtrike him with any inſtrument of death, as the ſword, &c. and then ſay, he was only in jeſt, or pretend madneſs.

℣. 20. Where no wood is, there the fire goeth out, &c.] Or woods[h]; where there is a large quantity of wood or fuel, the fire is kept up; but where there is little, ſcarce any or none at all, it goes out of courſe. So where there is no tale bearer, the ſtrife ceaſeth; or is ſilent[i]: men ceaſe to quarrel one with another; they hold their peace and are ſilent, when there are none to bring tales from one to another, or any whiſperer or backbiter to ſuggeſt evil things of each other; or when ſuch are diſcouraged on both ſides, and their tales are not liſtened to; or when they are detected and thruſt out of doors, as they deſerve, then ſtrife ſubſides, and peace enſues. Contention is like a fire, the flame of which is blown up by tale-bearers and whiſperers, who are as incendiaries, and as ſuch are to be treated.

℣. 21. As coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire, &c.] As brands, wood half-burnt, or dead coals put to live and burning ones, ſoon take fire and become like them, are fit and proper fuel for them, and add to their heat: So is a contentious man to kindle ſtrife; or a man of contentions[k]; who is given to it, is full of it; it is agreeable to his natural temper and diſpoſition; he is in his element when at it: ſuch a man is as fuel to the fire, as a dead coal to a living one, which increaſes the heat of it; ſo does he, he kindles and ſpreads the flame of contention and ſtrife.

℣. 22. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, &c.] Theſe expreſſions are the ſame with thoſe in chap. xviii. 8. ſee the note there; and are here repeated, as being found along with others by the men of Hezekiah, chap. xxv. 1. as ſome others likewiſe are; and alſo becauſe of the importance of them; and to impreſs the minds of men with a ſenſe of the evil of ſuch a practice, that they may ſhun it, and avoid thoſe that are given to it.

℣. 23. Burning lips, and a wicked heart, &c.] Either burning with wrath and malice; breathing out threatnings and ſlaughter; purſuing men with reproaches and ſlanders, ariſing from a wicked heart: or rather, burning with profeſſion of love to God, and affection to good men; with great pretenſions of kindneſs, and promiſes of good things, when their hearts are wicked, and they deſign nothing leſs; ſay one thing with their lips, with the greateſt ſhew of affection and ſincerity, and mean another in their hearts. Theſe are like a potſherd covered with ſilver droſs; which at a diſtance, or to leſs diſcerning perſons, looks like ſilver, and is taken for it; when the covering is only droſs, and what is within is only a potſherd, or a piece of an earthen veſſel, good for nothing: ſuch are the ſpecious profeſſions and deceitful words, which flow from a wicked heart.

℣. 24. He that hateth, diſſembleth with his lips, &c.] He that bears a grudge in his mind, and retains hatred in his heart againſt any perſon, hides it all he can, till he has an opportunity of ſhewing it as he would; he pretends a great deal of friendſhip with his lips, that his hatred might not be known; he would be thought to be a friend, when he is really an enemy; he does not chooſe as yet to make himſelf known what he is. Some render it to a ſenſe the reverſe, the enemy, or he that hateth, is known by his lips[l]; ſo the Targum, Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions: if you carefully watch him, mark his words, and obſerve what he ſays, you will find out the hatred that lies in his heart; he cannot forbear ſaying ſomething at one time or another, which betrays the malignity of his mind. And layeth up deceit within him; or, though[m] he layeth up, &c. hides it as much as he can, yet it will ſhew itſelf in ſome way or another.

℣. 25. When he ſpeaketh fair, believe him not, &c.] Gives good words, flatters with his lips, pretends great kindneſs and favour, expreſſes himſelf in a very gracious and amiable manner, in order to gain attention and reſpect; or when he delivers himſelf in a ſubmiſſive and ſuppliant way, with great humility and deference; or in a mournful and pitiful ſtrain, as if he had the moſt tender affection and concern; be not too credulous; do not ſuffer yourſelves to be impoſed upon by him; be upon your guard, diſtruſt him, ſuſpect a ſnake in the graſs. For there are ſeven abominations in his heart; a multitude of wicked purpoſes, ſchemes and deſigns, which he has formed there againſt you, and which he only waits a proper time to put in execution; things abominable to God and men. Aben Ezra thinks, reference is had to the ſeven abominations in chap. vi. 16.

℣. 26. Whoſe hatred is covered by deceit, &c.] The hatred of whoſe heart is covered by deceitful words, and ſtrong expreſſions of love and eſteem; ſo that thoſe to whom they are made are deceived by them. Or, whoſe hatred is covered in a waſte or deſert place[n]; it being not ſeen; as what is done in deſert places is not obvious to view, being little frequented; which agrees with what follows, and keeps up the antitheſis between the two clauſes: Schultens renders it, with a tumultuous noiſe, with loud and public acclamations; ſee Zech. iv. 7. His wickedneſs ſhall be ſhewed before the whole congregation; in an open court of judicature, where he ſhall be brought, arraigned, and tried for his wickedneſs; which, though covertly done, ſhall be expoſed and proved upon him: or before the church of God, where he ſhall be convicted by the word, and be obliged to acknowledge his ſin; and, if a member, be reproved before all and rejected: or however, at the great day of judgment, before angels and men, when all will be convened together; and where every ſecret work will be brought, and will be brought to light, and receive its juſt reward.

℣. 27. Whoſo diggeth a pit, ſhall fall therein, &c.] That deviſes miſchief againſt others, it ſhall come upon himſelf. The alluſion is to the digging of pits for catching wild beaſts, which are ſlightly covered with earth; and which ſometimes the purſuers, through inadvertency, fall into themſelves; the paſſage ſeems to be taken from Pſal. vii. 15, 16. And he that rolleth a ſtone, it will return upon him; that rolls a ſtone up hill, if he does not take care, it will return back, and fall with great force upon himſelf; ſo the miſchief which a wicked man labours hard at, as men do in digging a pit, or rolling a ſtone, in time revolves upon themſelves; the meaſure they mete out to others, is meaſured to them. Jarchi makes mention of an hagadah, or expoſition, which illuſtrates this paſſage, by the caſe of Abimelech; who ſlew threeſcore and ten perſons on one ſtone, and was himſelf killed with a piece of a millſtone caſt upon him, Judg. ix. 18, 53. this may put in mind of the fable of Siſyphus[o], feigned in hell to roll a great ſtone to the top of a mountain, which preſently falling down on his head, made his labour fruitleſs.

℣. 28. A lying tongue hateth thoſe that are afflicted by it, &c.] That is, a man of a lying tongue, that is given to lying, hates thoſe that are hurt and cruſhed by his lies; the reaſon why he hurts them with his lies, is, becauſe he hates them; and having hurt them, he hates them, being made his enemies, and from whom he may expect and be in fear of revenge: moreover, he hates thoſe that are troubled at and diſturbed with his lies; or the contrite[p] and humble men: or thoſe who ſmite or ſtrike[q] him, as ſome render the word actively; that is, reprove him, and bring him to ſhame for lying. The words are by ſome tranſlated, a contrite perſon, or every one of the contrite ones hateth a lying tongue[r]; ſuch as are of a broken and of a contrite ſpirit, and that tremble at the word of God, or are hurt by lies, theſe abhor a liar. The Targum is, “a lying tongue hates the ways of truth;” and the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, a lying tongue hates truth: and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, a lying tongue loves not truth; for nothing is more contrary to a lie than truth. And a flattering mouth worketh ruin; both to itſelf and to the perſons flattered by it: or, makes an impulſe[s]; a puſhing, a driving away; it drives away ſuch as cannot bear its flatteries; and puſhes on ſuch that are taken with it, both into ſin and into ruin.

CHAP. XXVII.

℣. 1. BOAST not thyſelf of to-morrow, &c.] Or, of to-morrow-day[t]. Either of having a to-morrow, or of any future time; no man can aſſure himſelf of more than the preſent time; for however deſirable long life is, none can be certain of it; ſo ſays the poet[u]: for though there is a common term of man's life, threeſcore years and ten, yet no one can be ſure of arriving to it; and though there may be a human probability of long life, in ſome perſons of hale and ſtrong conſtitutions, yet there is no certainty, ſince life is ſo frail a thing; the breath of man is in his noſtrils, which is ſoon and eaſily ſtopped; his life is but as a vapour, which appears for a little while, and then vaniſhes away; all fleſh is as graſs, which in the morning flouriſhes, in the evening is cut down, and on the morrow is caſt into the oven: man is like a flower, gay and beautiful for a ſeaſon, but a wind, an eaſterly, blaſting wind, paſſes over it, and it is gone; his days are as a ſhadow that declineth towards the evening; they are as an hand's breadth; yea; his age is as nothing before the Lord. Death is certain to all men, as the fruit of ſin, by the appointment of God; and there is a certain time fixed for it, which cannot be exceeded; but of that day and hour no man knows; and therefore cannot boaſt of a moment of future time, or of a to-morrow, nor of what he ſhall enjoy on the morrow[w]; for what he has to-day, he cannot be certain he ſhall have the next; he cannot aſſure himſelf of health and honour, of pleaſures, riches and friends; he may have health to-day, and ſickneſs to-morrow; be in honour to-day, and in diſgrace on the morrow: he may bid his ſoul eat, drink, and be merry, ſeeing he has much goods laid up for many years, and vainly ſay, to-morrow ſhall be as this day, and much more abundant, when this night his ſoul may be required of him; he may have his wife and children, friends and relations, about him now, and before another day comes be ſtripped of them all; he may be in great affluence, and have great ſubſtance for the preſent, and in a ſhort time all may be taken from him, as Job's was; riches are uncertain things, they make themſelves wings and flee away. Nor ſhould a man boaſt of what he will do on the morrow; either in civil things, in trade and buſineſs; to which the apoſtle James applies this paſſage, James iv. 13—16. or in acts of charity, ſo Aben Ezra explains it, boaſt not of an alms-deed to be done to-morrow; whatever a man finds to be his duty to do in this reſpect, he ſhould do it at once, while he has an opportunity: or in things religious; as that he will repent of his ſins, and amend his life on the morrow; that he will attend the means of grace, hear the goſpel, the voice of Chriſt; all which ſhould be to day, and not be put off till to-morrow. Nor ſhould true believers procraſtinate the profeſſion of their faith; nor ſhould any duty, or exerciſe of religion, be poſtponed to another ſeaſon; but men ſhould work while it is day, and always abound in the work of the Lord, and be found ſo doing; ſee Iſa. lvi. 12. Luke xii. 19, 20. For thou knoweſt not what a day may bring forth; time is like a teeming woman, to which the alluſion is, big with ſomething; but what that is, is not known till brought forth: as a woman, big with child, knows not what ſhe ſhall bring forth till the time comes, whether a ſon or a daughter, a dead or a living child; ſo the events of time, or what is in the womb of time, are not known till brought forth; theſe are the ſecret things which belong to God, which he keeps in his own breaſt; the times and ſeaſons of things are only in his power, Acts i. 6. We know not what the preſent day, as the Targum renders it, will bring forth; and ſtill leſs what to-morrow will do, what changes it will produce in our circumſtances, in our bodies and in our minds; ſo that we cannot be certain what we ſhall be, what we ſhall have, or what we ſhall do, on the morrow, even provided we have one.

℣. 2. Let another man praiſe thee, and not thine own mouth, &c.] Men ſhould do thoſe things which are praiſe-worthy; and ſhould do them openly, that they may be ſeen and praiſed for them: for it is honourable to have ſuch a character as Demetrius had, who had a good report of all men; and as the brother had, whoſe praiſe in the goſpel was in all the churches. To be commended by others, by any but a man's ſelf, is to his credit and reputation; but nothing more hurtful to it than ſelf-commendation; ſee 2 Cor. x. 18. in ſome caſes, it is right for a man indeed to commend himſelf, when the glory of God, the credit of religion, the cauſe of truth and ſelf-vindication require it; as the prophet Samuel, the apoſtle Paul, and others have been obliged to do, 1 Sam. xii. 3. 2 Cor. xi. 12, &c. A ſtranger, and not thine own lips; a ſtranger means any other than a man's ſelf; and if it is one that he knows not, or has little acquaintance with; or if a foreigner, that does not perſonally know him, only has good teſtimonies of him, or has read his works; and eſpecially if in other reſpects an enemy; it is greatly to his honour to be praiſed by him: and ſuch a commendation comes with much better grace than from himſelf, and from whom indeed it would not come with any.

℣. 3. A ſtone is heavy, and the ſand weighty, &c.] As was the ſtone which was at the well's mouth, where Laban's flocks were watered, which could not be rolled away till all the ſhepherds were gathered together, Gen. xxix. 2, 3, 8. and like the burdenſome ſtone Jeruſalem is compared to, Zech. xii. 3. and as that at the ſepulchre of Chriſt, rolled away by the angel, Matt. xxviii. 2. And ſand is a very ponderous thing; difficult to be carried, as the Septuagint render it, as a bag of it is; and to which heavy afflictions are ſometimes compared, Job vi. 2, 3. But a fool's wrath is heavier than them both; it cannot be removed, it reſts in his boſom; it is ſometimes intolerable to himſelf; he ſinks and dies under the weight of it, as Nabal did: wrath killeth the fooliſh man, Job v. 2. and it is ſtill more intolerable to others, as Nebuchadnezzar's wrath and his fiery furnace were.

℣. 4. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous, &c.] Or an inundation [x]; it is like the breaking in of the ſea, or a flood of mighty waters, which know no bounds, and there is no ſtopping them: ſo cruel and outrageous were the wrath and anger of Simeon and Levi, in deſtroying the Shechemites; of Pharaoh, in making the Iſraelites to ſerve with hard bondage, and ordering their male children to be killed and drowned; and of Herod, in murdering the infants in and about Bethlehem. But who is able to ſtand before envy? which is ſecret in a man's heart, and privately contrives and works the ruin of another, and againſt which there is no guarding. All mankind in Adam fell before the envy of Satan; for it was through the envy of the devil that ſin and death came into the world, Wiſdom ii. 24. Abel could not ſtand before the envy of Cain; nor Joſeph before the envy of his brethren; nor Chriſt before the envy of the Jews, his bitter enemies; and where it is, there is confuſion and every evil work, James iii. 14, 16. An envious man is worſe than an angry and wrathful man; his wrath and anger may be ſoon over, or there may be ways and means of appeaſing him; but envy continues and abides, and works inſenſibly.

℣. 5. Open rebuke is better than ſecret love.] This is to be underſtood, not of rebuke publicly given; though Aben Ezra thinks public reproof is meant, which ariſing from love, is better than that which is done in ſecret, though in love, as being more effectual; for rebuke among friends ſhould be given privately, according to our Lord's direction, Matt. xviii. 15. but it ſignifies reproof given faithfully and plainly, with openneſs of heart, and without mincing the matter, and palliating the offence; but ſpeaking out freely, and faithfully laying before a perſon the evil of his ſin, in all the circumſtances of it, as the apoſtle Paul did to Peter, when he withſtood him to the face becauſe he was to be blamed, Gal. ii. 11. Now ſuch kind of reproof is better than ſuch love to a perſon, as will not ſuffer him to tell him of his faults, for fear of grieving him, or loſing his friendſhip; or than ſuch love as does not ſhew itſelf in deeds, and particularly in faithful reproofs; for ſo to act, is to hate a perſon, and ſuffer ſin to be upon him, Lev. xix. 17.

℣. 6. Faithful are the wounds of a friend, &c.] That is, friendly reproofs; which, though they may be ſevere, at leaſt thought ſo, and may grieve and wound, and cauſe pain and uneaſineſs for the preſent; yet proceeding from a ſpirit of love, faithfulneſs and integrity, and deſigned for the good of the perſon reproved, ought to be kindly received; ſee Pſal. cxli. 5. But the kiſſes of an enemy are deceitful; flow from a deceitful heart, and not to be confided in, as the kiſſes of Joab and Judas. It may be rather rendered, are to be deprecated [y]; prayed againſt, as real evils, hurtful and pernicious: and ſo the Targum renders it, are evil. Good is the advice of Iſocrates [z], "reckon them faithful, not who "praiſe every thing thou ſayeſt or doeſt, but thoſe "that reprove what is amiſs."

℣. 7. The full ſoul loatheth an honey-comb, &c.] Or tramples upon it [z], as the word ſignifies, and moſt verſions render it, expreſſive of contempt and abhorrence; and ſuits with the ſituation of the honey-comb, which was uſually in trees and rocks in Paleſtine; and ſo might drop from thence, and be trampled upon by paſſengers; and eſpecially ſuch as are here deſcribed, whoſe appetites have been ſated with dainties, and their ſtomachs heave at the moſt delicious food. Jarchi interprets this of one that has no deſire after the doctrines of the law; and ſo the ſenſes of it are not eſteemed by him; whereas he that has a deſire for it, even the things which come to him with bitterneſs and labour, are ſweet to him. But it may be better applied to a ſelf-ſufficient man, that is full of himſelf; of his own wiſdom, and knowledge in divine things; of his ſtrength, and the power of his free-will; of his purity, holineſs, goodneſs and righteouſneſs; who loaths the goſpel, comparable to the honey-comb for its ſweetneſs; ſee chap. xvi. 24. it being diſagreeable to his taſte, and as inſipid as the white of an egg to him; and as being againſt him, which makes him out an arrant fool, blows a blaſt on all his goodneſs and goodlineſs, ſtrips the creature of his righteouſneſs, and excludes boaſting. But to the hungry ſoul every bitter thing is ſweet; that is in want of proviſion, has an appetite for it; any thing, though ever ſo mean and diſreliſhing to others, is ſweet to ſuch an one; as were barley-bread to Artaxerxes king of Perſia, and country bread made of bran to Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, when in great diſtreſs for food [a]; Seneca ſays [b], hunger will make bad bread fine manchet. And ſo is the goſpel, and every doctrine of it, to a ſenſible ſinner; that is in want, and knows its wants, and has deſires after ſpiritual things created in it; hungers and thirſts after the word and ordinances; after Chriſt, the bread of life; after the bleſſings of grace in him; particularly after the pardon of ſin, and juſtifying righteouſneſs and ſalvation by him; and after more knowledge of him, and communion with him. Now though there is nothing bitter in the goſpel, properly ſpeaking, as in the law; yet, that which is bitter to others, and had been bitter to the above perſons, is now ſweet, and which are diſagreeable to the fleſh; as the denial of ſinful, civil, and righteous ſelf, which the goſpel teaches; and even that which is the moſt contemptible to men; as the preaching of the croſs, or the doctrine of ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt; the doctrines of electing grace, imputed righteouſneſs, the ſatisfaction of Chriſt, &c. How ſweet are theſe to the taſte of a hungry ſoul? and even though they are attended with bitter afflictions, the reproaches, revilings, and perſecutions of men; as the paſchal lamb, a type of Chriſt, was eaten with bitter herbs. This may alſo be applied to the hearing of the word; where and when there is plenty of means, men grow weary of the word, ſick of it, and ſurfeit upon it and loath it; or however, are very curious and nice, and cannot take up with plain preaching, but muſt have ſomething ſuited to their palate, dreſſed up in a very elegant manner: but when the word of the Lord is precious or rare, and where there are few opportunities of hearing it, ſenſible ſouls, that have ſpiritual appetites, are glad of it; and it is ſweet unto them, though not ſo nicely dreſſed, and though brought to them in a homely manner.

℣. 8. As a bird that wandereth from her neſt, &c.] To ſeek for food for herſelf and her young; or that leaves it without returning to it, and ſo her eggs or her young are expoſed, and ſhe herſelf liable to fall into the hands of birds of prey, or of the fowler, when ſhe would be ſafe in her neſt; as there was a law in Iſrael in her favour, Deut. xxii. 6. or as one that is forced out and obliged to wander from place to place, Iſa. xvi. 2. So is a man that wandereth from his place; who in time of famine and diſtreſs goes into other parts for bread, as Jacob's ſons went down into Egypt; and ſuch are they in a ſpiritual ſenſe who leave all and follow Chriſt for food for their ſouls; or who are forced to flee from place to place, and wander about in deſerts and mountains, in dens and caves of the earth, becauſe of the perſecution of their enemies; or rather it is to be taken in an ill ſenſe, and applied to ſuch who abide not in the calling whereunto they are called; diſlike and are unſatisfied with their preſent buſineſs of life, and ſeek new employments, which oftentimes is to the hurt and detriment of themſelves and families; and alſo to ſuch who wander from the way of ſpiritual underſtanding, from the place of divine worſhip, from the word, ordinances, and commandments of the Lord; ſee chap. xxi. 16.

℣. 9. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart, &c.] Meaning not the holy anointing oil for ſacred uſe, or the perfume or incenſe offered on the altar of incenſe; but common oil or ointment uſed at entertainments, poured on the heads of the gueſts; and incenſe in cenſing of rooms, which were very delightful, pleaſed the ſenſes, and ſo exhilarated the heart. So doth the ſweetneſs of a man's friend by hearty counſel; ſo the ſweet and pleaſant words, the wiſe and cordial counſel of a man's friend, rejoice his heart; he takes it well, he is highly delighted with it; he receives it kindly, and purſues it to advantage: or by counſel of ſoul [c], ſuch as relates to the welfare of the ſoul here and hereafter; ſuch is the counſel Chriſt gives, to buy of him gold tried in the fire, white raiment, eye-ſalve; and ſuch as the ſcriptures give, which, with the ſaints, are the men of their counſel, as they were David's; and which miniſters of the goſpel give, who are therefore like ointment and perfume, a ſweet ſavour of life unto life: ſome render the words, and they will bear it, ſo the ſweetneſs of a man's friend, more than the counſel of his ſoul [d], or than his own; that is, the ſweet counſel of a friend is better than his own, and more rejoices his heart, and gives him more pleaſure than that does; and this way go the Jewiſh commentators.

℣. 10. Thine own friend and thy father's friend forſake not, &c.] Who have been long tried and proved, and found faithful; theſe ſhould be kept to and valued, and not new ones ſought; which to do is oftentimes of bad conſequence. Solomon valued his father's friend Hiram, and kept up friendſhip with him; but Rehoboam his ſon forſook the counſel of the old men, his father's friends and counſellors, and followed the young men his new friends, and thereby loſt ten tribes at once. Jarchi interprets this of God, the friend of Iſrael and of their fathers, who is not to be forſaken, and is a friend that loves at all times; and to forſake him is to forſake the fountain of living waters. Neither go into thy brother's houſe in the day of thy calamity; poverty and diſtreſs, to tell him thy caſe, expecting ſympathy, relief, and ſuccour from him; but rather go to thy friend and father's friend, who ſticks cloſer than a brother; ſee chap. xviii. 24. For better is a neighbour that is near, than a brother far off; a neighbour that is a faſt and faithful friend, and who is not only near as to place, but as to affections; is more ſerviceable and uſeful to a man in time of diſtreſs than a brother, though near in blood, yet as far off in place, ſo much more in affection, and from whom a man can promiſe nothing, and little is to be expected. The phraſe in the preceding clauſe ſignifies a cloudy day, and ſuch a day of diſtreſs through poverty is; in which ſenſe it is uſed by Latin[e] writers, when a man is alone, and former friends care not to come nigh him.

℣. 11. My ſon, be wiſe, and make my heart glad, &c.] That is, ſhew thyſelf to be a wiſe man by thy words and actions; endeavour to get a good ſhare of wiſdom and knowledge, and make a good uſe of it, and that will rejoice my heart; as nothing more gladdens the heart of a parent than the wiſdom and prudent behaviour of his ſon; ſee chap. x. 1. and xxiii. 15, 24, 25. That I may anſwer him that reproacheth me; with begetting a fooliſh ſon, or a wicked man; or making him ſuch by ill examples; or through neglect of education; or by uſing too much ſeverity in it.

℣. 12. A prudent man foreſeeth the evil, &c.] See the note on chap. xxii. 3. or ſeeth the evil[f]; the evil of ſin, as it is contrary to the nature, will, and law of God, and abominable in his ſight; and not only the evil of groſs actions of ſin, but of indwelling luſt; and ſuch an one who is wiſe to that which is good, ſees the ſad work ſin has made in the world; and in himſelf; how it has defaced the image of God in man, ſtripped him of his righteouſneſs, and defiled all the powers and faculties of his ſoul; upon which ſight of it he is filled with ſhame, reflects upon himſelf for his paſt conduct, loaths ſin and himſelf for it, repents of it, confeſſes and forſakes it: he likewiſe ſees the evil of puniſhment for ſin, the juſt demerit of it, the curſe of the law, the wrath of God, the ſecond and eternal death, a ſeparation from God, a ſenſe and feeling of divine vengeance, anguiſh, and diſtreſs intolerable, and that for ever. And hideth himſelf; not in ſecret places, that he may not be ſeen by the Lord; nor in his own works of righteouſneſs, to ſecure him from the wrath of God: nor is it to be underſtood of his hiding himſelf from ſinners and their company, and ſo eſcaping the pollutions of the world; but of his betaking himſelf to Chriſt, who is the city of refuge, the ſtronghold, the rock, in the clefts of which the people of God hide themſelves; even in his wounds, or in him as a ſuffering, crucified Saviour, and who is the hiding place from the wind, and covert from the ſtorm of divine wrath; ſuch are redemption by him, his ſacrifice and ſatisfaction, his blood and righteouſneſs, and interceſſion; ſee Iſa. xxxii. 2. ſee alſo the note on chap. xxii. 3. But the ſimple paſs on, and are puniſhed; ſuch who are thoughtleſs and fooliſh, have no ſight nor ſenſe of ſin and danger, go on in their ſinful courſe of life without any care or concern, without any fear or dread, till their feet ſtumble on the dark mountains of eternity; and they fall into the bottomleſs pit of perdition, from whence there is no recovery.

℣. 13. Take his garment that is ſurety for a ſtranger, &c.] See the note on chap. xxvi. 16. where the ſame proverb is, and is expreſſed in the ſame words as here.

℣. 14. He that bleſſeth his friend with a loud voice, &c.] So as not only to be heard by him but by others; who is extravagant in his praiſes and commendations of him; who exceeds all bounds of modeſty, truth, and decency; who affects pompous words, and hyperbolical expreſſions; and ſhews himſelf to be a real ſycophant and flatterer, having ſome ſiniſter end to ſerve by it. Riſing early in the morning; leſt any ſhould be before him, and get the benefit he ſeeks by his flattery; or as if he had not time enough in the day to finiſh his encomium, unleſs he began early in the morning and continued it all the day; and ſo it denotes his being inceſſant at this work, always harping on this ſtring, or expreſſing himſelf in this adulatory way; or as ſome think, this is mentioned as an aggravation of his ſin, that he ſhould be acting this low, mean, and criminal part, when he ſhould be employed in devotion and prayer to God. It ſhall be counted a curſe to him; either to the flatterer, by his friend whom he bleſſes, and by all wiſe men that hear him, who will deſpiſe him all one as if he curſed him. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it to this ſenſe, that ſuch an one nothing differs, or nothing ſeems to differ, from one that curſes: or elſe to the perſon bleſſed, whom others will curſe, or however detract from his character, becauſe of the profuſe praiſes beſtowed upon him; nay ſometimes God himſelf curſes ſuch a man, who liſtens to, is fond of, and receives the fulſome flatteries of wicked men, as in the caſe of Herod, Acts xii. 22, 23.

℣. 15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day, &c.] That is, through the roof of a houſe which is not well covered, or which lets in rain by one means or another; ſo that in a thorough rainy day it keeps continually dropping, to the great annoyance of thoſe within, and which is very uncomfortable to them: it is obſerved[g] that rain is called by the name in the text, becauſe a man is ſhut up under a roof whilſt it falls; and continuing long he is ſhut up within doors and cannot come out. And a contentious woman are alike; troubleſome and uncomfortable; as in a rainy day a man cannot go abroad with any pleaſure, and if the rain is continually dropping upon him in his houſe he cannot ſit there with any comfort; and ſo a contentious woman, that is always ſcolding and brawling, a man has no comfort at home; and if he goes abroad he is jeered and laughed at on her account by others; and perhaps ſhe the more ſeverely falls upon him when he returns for having been abroad; ſee chap. xix. 13.

℣. 16. Whoſoever hideth her, hideth the wind, &c.] Whoever attempts to ſtop her brawls and contentions, to repreſs and reſtrain them, and hinder her voice being heard in the ſtreets, and endeavours to hide the ſhame that comes upon herſelf and family, attempts a thing as impoſſible as to hide the wind in the palm of a man's hand, or to ſtop it from blowing; for as that by being reſtrained or pent up by any methods that can be uſed, makes the greater noiſe, ſo by all the means that are uſed to ſtill a contentious woman, ſhe is but the more noiſy and clamorous, and becomes more ſhameful and infamous. And the ointment of his right hand which bewrayeth itſelf; or will call or calls[h], and ſays in effect here am I; for the ſmell of it, which cannot be hid when held in a man's hand betrays it, and the faſter he holds it, and the more he preſſes and ſqueezes it, and the more it is heated hereby, the more it diffuſes its ſavour, and is known to be where it is; and ſo all attempts to ſtop the mouth of a brawling woman does but cauſe her to brawl the louder.

℣. 17. Iron ſharpeneth iron, &c.] A ſword or knife made of iron is ſharpened by it; ſo butchers ſharpen their knives. So a man ſharpeneth the countenance of his friend; by converſation with him; thus learned men ſharpen one another's minds, and excite each other to learned ſtudies; chriſtians ſharpen one another's graces, or ſtir up each other to the exerciſe of them, and the gifts which are beſtowed on them, and to love and to good works. So Jarchi and Gerſom underſtand it of the ſharpening of men's minds to the learning of doctrine; but Aben Ezra takes it in an ill ſenſe, that as iron ſtrikes iron and ſharpens it, ſo a wrathful man irritates and provokes wrath in another. Some render the words, as iron delighteth in iron, ſo a man rejoiceth the countenance of his friend[i], by his company and converſation.

℣. 18. Whoſo keepeth the fig-tree ſhall eat the fruit thereof, &c.] That takes care of a fig-tree, either his own or another's, planted in his garden or vineyard; ſee Luke xiii. 6. who cultivates it, digs about and dungs it, and prunes it, and does every thing neceſſary to it; when it brings forth fruit, and that is ripe and fit to eat, he eats of it, as it is but juſt he ſhould; ſee 1 Cor. ix. 7. So he that waiteth on his maſter; or that keeps his maſter[k], his perſon from danger, and his goods faithfully committed to his truſt; or that obſerves his maſter[l], that looks to his hand, obſerves his motions, directions, and commands. Shall be honoured; as Joſeph was in Potiphar's houſe, and elſewhere; and as all thoſe are who obſerve the commandments of God, and are the ſervants of Chriſt; ſee 1 Sam. ii. 30. John xii. 26.

℣. 19. As in water face anſwereth to face, &c.] As water is as a looking glaſs, in which a man may behold his own face and another's; or as the face in the water anſwers to the face of a man, and there is a great likeneſs between them. All things thro' water appear greater, as Seneca[m] obſerves, and ſo more clear and plain. So the heart of man to man; one man's heart may be ſeen and diſcerned in ſome meaſure by another, as by his countenance; for though, as the poet[n] ſays, frontis nulla fides, yet the countenance is often the index of the mind, though not an infallible one; wrath and anger in the breaſt may be ſeen in the face, as were in Cain's; thus Jacob ſaw ſome reſentment at him in the mind of Laban, and judged he had ſome deſign of miſchief againſt him by the change of his countenance; alſo what is in the heart of man is diſcerned by what comes out of it, by his words, and alſo by his actions; yea a man may know in a good meaſure what is in another man's heart, by what he finds in his own: the word of God is a glaſs, or medium of viſion, and like water, in which a man's face is ſeen, through which a man ſees his own heart; the law is a glaſs, in which an enlightened perſon ſees not only the perfections of God, the nature of righteouſneſs, but alſo his ſin, and the ſinfulneſs of it; this glaſs neither magnifies nor multiplies his ſins, but ſets them in a true light before him, by which he diſcerns heart-ſins, and ſees and knows the plague of his heart; and the goſpel is a glaſs, wherein he beholds the glory of Chriſt, ſees and can diſcern whether Chriſt is formed in him, and he has the grace of the Spirit of God wrought in his ſoul, as faith, hope, love, repentance, humility, ſelf-denial, &c. moreover, as the face ſeen in the water is ſimilar to a man's face, ſo the hearts of men are alike, not merely in a natural ſenſe, ſee Pſal. xxxiii. 15. but in a moral and ſpiritual ſenſe the hearts of unregenerate men are alike, and anſwer to each other; for they are all equally corrupted and depraved; the heart of every man is deſperately wicked; the imaginations of the thoughts of the hearts of wicked men, one and all of them, are only evil, and that continually; their affections are inordinately the ſame, they love and hate the ſame perſons and things; their minds and conſciences are all defiled; their underſtandings are darkened; their wills are averſe to that which is good, and bent on that which is evil: and ſo the hearts of good men are alike; they have all one heart and one way given them; their experiences agree as to the work of grace and converſion; they are all made ſenſible of ſin, the evil of it, and danger by it; they are all brought off of their own righteouſneſs, and are led to Chriſt to depend on him alone for righteouſneſs, pardon, and eternal life; they are partakers of the ſame promiſes in the goſpel, and have the ſame enemies to grapple with, and the ſame temptations, trials, and exerciſes from ſin, Satan, and the world; and they have the ſame things put into their hearts, the laws of God, the doctrines of Chriſt, and the ſeveral graces of the Spirit of Chriſt; ſo that there cannot be a greater likeneſs between a man's face and that ſeen in the water, than there is between the heart of one ſaint and another; the hearts of Old and New Teſtament-ſaints, and of all in all ages and places, anſwer to one another. The Targum paraphraſes it to a ſenſe quite the reverſe, “as waters “and as faces which are not like one to another, “ſo the hearts of the children of men are not like “one to another;” and to the ſame ſenſe are the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions.

℣. 20. Hell and deſtruction are never full, &c.] The grave, as the word uſed often ſignifies; and which may be called deſtruction, becauſe bodies laid in it are ſoon corrupted and deſtroyed; and tho' bodies are caſt into it and devoured by it, it is ready for more; it is one of the four things which never have enough. The place where Gog is ſaid to be buried is called Hamon Gog, the multitude of Gog, Ezek. xxxix. 11. and by the Septuagint there Polyandrion, which is the name the Greeks give to a burying-place, becauſe many men are buried there; and with the Latins the dead are call Plures[o], the many, or the more; and yet the grave is never ſatisfied with them, Prov. xxx. 16. Or hell, the place of everlaſting damnation and deſtruction is meant, which has received multitudes of ſouls already, and where there is room for more; nor will it be full until the laſt day. So the eyes of man man are never ſatisfied; as not the eyes of his body with ſeeing corporeal objects, but ſtill are deſirous of ſeeing more, and indeed every thing that is to be ſeen, and are never glutted, Eccl. i. 8. ſo neither the eyes of the carnal mind, or the luſts of it, which are inſatiable things, let the objects of them be what they will; as in an ambitious man, a covetous perſon, or an unclean one.

[n] Juvenal. Satyr. 2. v. 8.

[o] Plauti Trinum, act. 2. ſc. 2. v. 14.

℣. 21. As the fining pot for ſilver, and the furnace for gold, &c.] For the trying, proving, and purifying theſe metals; ſee chap. xvii. 3. So is a man to his praiſe; or according to the mouth of his praiſe[p]; if his own mouth praiſes him, as in ℣. 2. he is known to be what he is, a fooliſh and vain-glorious perſon; or ſo a man is proved by the mouth of him that praiſes him, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; or of them that praiſe him, as the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions; and ſo the Targum: the meaning is, either a man is known by the perſons that praiſe him, according to what their characters are; if he is praiſed by good and virtuous men, he may be thought to be ſo himſelf; and if by wicked men, he may be concluded to be ſo likewiſe; ſee chap. xxviii. 4. or he is known by the effect that praiſe has upon him; if it ſwells him with pride, and makes him haughty, conceited, and over-bearing, he will appear to be a weak and fooliſh man; but if he continues modeſt and humble, and ſtudious and diligent to anſwer his character, thankful to God for what he has, and to whom he gives all the glory, he will approve himſelf a wiſe and good man.

℣. 22. Though thou ſhouldeſt bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a peſtle, &c.] As the manna was, Numb. xi. 8. and as wheat beat and bruiſed in a mortar, or ground in a mill, retains its own nature; ſo let a wicked man be uſed ever ſo roughly or ſeverely, by words, admonitions, reproofs, and counſels; or by deeds, by corrections and puniſhment, by hard words or blows, whether publicly or privately; in the midſt of the congregation, as the Targum and Syriac verſion; or of the ſanhedrim and council, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions. Yet will not his fooliſhneſs depart from him; his inbred depravity and natural malignity and folly will not remove, nor will he leave his courſe of ſinning he has been accuſtomed to; he is ſtricken in vain, he will revolt more and more, Iſa. i. 5. Jer. v. 3. and xiii. 23. Anaxarchus the philoſopher was ordered by the tyrant Nicocreon to be pounded to death in a ſtone mortar with iron peſtles[q], and which he endured with great patience.

℣. 23. Be thou diligent to know the ſtate of thy flocks, &c.] In what condition they are; what health they enjoy; how fat and fruitful they be; what paſturage they have; and that they want nothing fitting for them, that can be had and is neceſſary; and alſo the number of them. The calling of the ſhepherd is here particularly mentioned, becauſe valiant, honourable, innocent and uſeful; but the ſame diligence is to be uſed in all other callings and buſineſs men are employed in, that they may provide for themſelves and their families. It is in the original text, the face of thy flocks[r]; perhaps the alluſion is to the exact and diſtinct knowledge, ſome very diligent, careful ſhepherds might have, ſo as to know each ſheep in their flocks diſtinctly; ſee John x. 3. The Septuagint verſion renders it, the ſouls of thy flock, as if it was an inſtruction to ſpiritual paſtors or ſhepherds, who have the care of the ſouls of men: and certain it is, that if it is the duty of ſhepherds in common to be diligent in looking after their ſheep, and doing every thing the duty of their office requires; then it muſt become the indiſpenſible duty of paſtors of churches to take heed to the flock of God committed to them, and to look into their ſtate and condition, and provide for them, and feed them with knowledge and underſtanding, Acts xx. 28. And look well to thy herds; or, put thy heart[s] to them: ſhew a cordial regard for them, and take an hearty care of them, that they have every thing needful for them; and which is for the owner's good as well as their's.

℣. 24. For riches are not for ever, &c.] A man cannot be aſſured of the continuance of them; they are uncertain things, here to-day and gone to-morrow: wherefore, though a man has a conſiderable ſhare of them, yet ſhould follow one calling or another; particularly huſbandry is recommended, or keeping ſheep and cattle, which are increaſing; by which means his ſubſtance will be continued and augmented, which otherwiſe is not to be depended on, but in a diligent attendance to buſineſs. And doth the crown endure to every generation? the royal crown, that is not to be depended upon; a king that wears a crown, is not ſure he ſhall always wear it, or that it ſhall be continued to his family one generation after another. And it is ſuggeſted, that it is not even beneath ſuch perſons to have a regard to their flocks and herds, and the increaſe of their riches in this way: the Chineſe kings, many of them formerly employed themſelves in huſbandry, and ſet examples of induſtry and diligence to their ſubjects[t]; king Hezekiah provided himſelf poſſeſſions of flocks and herds in abundance, 2 Chron. xxix. 17.

℣. 25. The hay appeareth, and the tender graſs ſheweth itſelf, &c.] Some think this is mentioned to illuſtrate the uncertainty of riches, which ſoon vaniſh away; as the tender graſs ſhews itſelf, and is preſently cut down and quickly appears hay, and that ſoon conſumed: but rather, this contains an argument to take to the paſtoral life and calling, ſince it may be performed with ſo much eaſe; for the earth, the vallies and hills, are covered with graſs for the cattle; ſo that there is no further trouble than to drive the flocks into the paſtures, and feed them there; or to cut down the graſs, and make hay of it, and lay it up againſt the winter for fodder for them. The firſt clauſe, I think, may be rendered, the hay removes[u], or is carried off; the graſs being fit to cut, is mowed and made hay of, and that is carried off, and laid up for the winter: and the tender graſs ſheweth itſelf; ſprings up after the hay is carried off, and ſo makes a ſecond crop; or however, becomes good paſture for cattle to feed on. And herbs of the mountains are gathered; for the preſent uſe of the cattle; or being made hay of, are laid up for future uſe; or are gathered for medicine; many of this kind grow on mountains.

℣. 26. The lambs are for thy cloathing, &c.] This is another argument, exciting to diligence in the paſtoral calling, taken from the profit ariſing from it: the wool of the lambs, or rather ſheep, as many verſions render it; of it cloth is made, and of that garments to be worn, to keep decent, warm, and comfortable; ſee Job xxxi. 20. And the goats are the price of thy field; theſe being brought up and ſold, furniſh the huſbandman with money to purchaſe more fields to feed his cattle on. The Targum is, "the goats are for negotiation;" with the price of them a man may purchaſe any of the neceſſaries of life for himſelf and family; theſe are negotiated, Ezek. xxvii. 21. the Syriac verſion is, the goats are for thy food; and ſo between both the ſheep and goats, man has both food and raiment; though his food is particularly mentioned in the next verſe.

℣. 27. And thou ſhalt have goats milk enough for thy food, &c.] The word for goats, in the preceding verſe, ſignifies he-goats, which were ſold to buy fields, pay ſervants or rent, or purchaſe the neceſſaries of life; and this here ſignifies ſhe-goats, which were kept for their milk; and which was daily uſed for food in ſome countries, and is ſtill in uſe for the ſame purpoſe in ſome parts of our kingdoms; and in medicine it has been preferred by ſome phyſicians above all others, next to the milk of women[w]: and the diligent huſbandman is promiſed not only plenty of this for his own eating, at leaſt a ſufficiency of it, but for his family. For the food of thy houſhold; his wife and children: and for maintenance for thy maidens; or the lives[x] of them, on which they ſhould live; for though men-ſervants might require ſtrong meat, yet the maidens might live upon milk; beſides, Athenæus[y] ſpeaks of moſt delicious cheeſe made of goats-milk, called Tromilicus. The deſign of the whole is to ſhew, that a man diligent in his buſineſs ſhall have a ſufficiency for himſelf and his family; and though it may be but the meaner ſort of food and cloathing he may get, yet having food and raiment, he ſhould therewith be content.

CHAP. XXVIII.

℣. 1. THE wicked flee when no man purſueth, &c.] Through the terrors of a guilty conſcience, as in Cain and others; who fear where no immediate cauſe of fear is, are frighted with their own ſhadows; and as Gaal was with the ſhadow of the mountains, he took for an army of men, as his friend told him, Judg. ix. 36. they are chaſed with the ſound of a ſhaken leaf, and fancy men are at their heels to deſtroy them, and therefore with all haſte flee to ſome place of ſafety; ſee Lev. xxvi. 17, 36. Deut. xxviii. 7, 25. But the righteous are bold as a lion; which turns not away from any creature it meets with, nor mends its pace when it is purſued, but walks on intrepidly; and oftentimes lies down and ſleeps in open places, and as ſecurely as in woods and dens, being devoid of all fear; hence the heart of a valiant man is ſaid to be as the heart of a lion, 2 Sam. xvii. 10. ſee Prov. xxx. 30. ſo Pindar[z] compares a courageous man to a lion for boldneſs. Now righteous men are as bold as this creature, or more ſo; ſome of them have ſtopped the mouths of lions, and have dwelt ſecurely in the midſt of them, as righteous Daniel: and all righteous men are or may be as fearleſs as the lion; fear God they do, but have no reaſon to fear any other; and many of them are fearleſs of men, of their menaces and reproaches, or of any thing they can do to them; ſince not only angels are their guardians, but God is on their ſide, and Chriſt has overcome the world for them: they are fearleſs of Satan and his principalities; they are delivered out of his hands; they know he is a coward, though a roaring lion, and when reſiſted will flee from them; yea, that he is a chained, conquered enemy: and though they are afraid of committing ſin, yet are fearleſs of the damning power of it; Chriſt having bore their ſins, made ſatisfaction for them; for whoſe ſake they are pardoned; and whoſe righteouſneſs juſtifies, and blood cleanſes from all ſin: they are fearleſs of death; its ſting being removed, itſelf aboliſhed as a penal evil, and become a bleſſing, and is the righteous man's gain: they are fearleſs of wrath to come; Chriſt having delivered them from it, and they being juſtified by his blood: they are courageous as the lion in fighting the Lord's battles with ſin, Satan, and the world, and in enduring hardneſs as good ſoldiers of Chriſt; knowing their cauſe is good, that Chriſt is the Captain of their ſalvation, their ſpiritual armour is proved, and they are ſure of victory and of a crown. They are confident[a] as the lion, as the word may be rendered; they are confident of the love of God, of their intereſt in Chriſt, of the grace of God in their hearts, and that all things work together for their good; and that it is, and always will be well with them, let things go how they will in the world, and ſo are ſecure. They are bold and undaunted, both before God and men; before God in prayer, knowing him to be their covenant-God in Chriſt, having in view the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and being aſſiſted by his Spirit: and they are undaunted before men; if the righteous man is a miniſter of the word, he ſpeaks it boldly, as it ought to be ſpoken, fearing the faces of none, knowing it to be the goſpel of Chriſt, the truth, as it is in him, and the power of God to ſalvation; and if a private Chriſtian, he is a public profeſſor of Chriſt, his word and ordinances, which he is not aſhamed to own before all the world. In ſhort, the righteous are bold in life and in death, and will be ſo in the day of judgment; and it is their righteouſneſs which makes them ſo, from which they are denominated righteous, even not their own, but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt.

℣. 2. For the tranſgreſſion of a land many are the princes thereof, &c.] Either together; that is, reigning princes, ſuch as lay claim to the crown, and uſurp it; otherwiſe it is a happineſs to a nation to have many princes of the blood, to inherit in ſucceſſion, to ſupport the crown in their family, and defend a nation, and ſtudy the good of it; but it is a judgment to a nation, when many riſe up as competitors for rule, or do rule, as at Athens, where thirty tyrants ſprung up at once; by which factions and parties are made, and which iſſue in oppreſſion, rapine and murder: or ſucceſſively, very quickly, one after another, being dethroned the one by the other: or removed by death, as in the land of Iſrael, in the times of the Judges, and of the kings of Iſrael and Judah, after the revolt of the ten tribes; which frequent changes produce different adminiſtrations, new laws, and freſh taxes, diſagreeable to the people; and oftentimes children come to be their princes, which is always reckoned an infelicity to a nation; ſee Eccl. x. 16. Iſa. iii. 12. and all this is uſually for ſome national ſin or ſins indulged to, which draw upon a people the divine reſentment, and provoke God to ſuffer ſuch changes among them. But by a man of underſtanding and knowledge the ſtate thereof ſhall be prolonged; either by a ſet of wiſe and underſtanding, good and virtuous men, who will oppoſe the growing vice and immoralities of a people, and form themſelves into ſocieties for the reformation of manners; the word man being taken collectively for a body of men: or by a wiſe and prudent miniſter or miniſtry, or a ſet of civil magiſtrates, who will ſhew themſelves to be terrors to evil-doers, and a praiſe to them that do well: or by a wiſe and prudent prince, who ſeeks to eſtabliſh his throne by judgment and mercy; who will take care that juſtice and judgment be executed in the land, and that vice and profaneneſs be diſcouraged; by means of ſuch, the ſtate of a kingdom, which ſeemed near to ruin, will be prolonged, and the happineſs and proſperity of it ſecured and eſtabliſhed; and God, in mercy to it, may long preſerve the life of their king, who being a good one, a long reign is always a happineſs to a nation. And to this ſenſe is the Vulgate Latin verſion, the life of the prince ſhall be longer: and the Targum, which is, “ and the ſons of men “ that underſtand knowledge ſhall endure;” ſee Eccl. ix. 15.

℣. 3. A poor man that oppreſſeth the poor, &c.] Either one that is poor at the time he oppreſſes another like himſelf, either by ſecret fraud or open injury; from whom the oppreſſed can get no redreſs, as ſometimes he may and does from a rich man: or rather, one that has been poor, but now become rich, and got into ſome place of authority and profit, who ſhould remember what he had been; and it might be expected that ſuch an one would put on bowels of compaſſion towards the poor, as knowing what it was to be in indigent circumſtances; but if, inſtead of this, he exerciſes his authority over the poor, in a ſevere and rigid manner, and oppreſſes them, and ſqueezes that little out of them they have: He is like a ſweeping rain which leaveth no food; like a violent, haſty ſhower of rain; which, inſtead of watering the ſeed, herbs and plants, and cauſing them to grow, as moderate rain does; it waſhes away the very ſeed ſown in the earth, or beats out the ripe corn from the ears, or beats it down, ſo that it riſeth not up again; the effect of which is, there is no bread to the eater, nor ſeed to the ſower, and conſequently a famine. The deſign of the proverb is, to ſhew how unnatural as well as intolerable is the oppreſſion of the poor, by one that has been poor himſelf; even as it is contrary to the nature and uſe of rain, which is to fructify, and not to ſweep away and deſtroy; and which when it does, there is no ſtanding againſt it or diverting it.

℣. 4. They that forſake the law, praiſe the wicked, &c.] Who are like them; who forſake and tranſgreſs the law, as they do; every like loves its like; wicked men delight in ſin, the tranſgreſſion of the law, and in thoſe that do it. One covetous man will bleſs and praiſe another, whom the Lord abhors, and commend his covetouſneſs as frugality and good huſbandry: one proud man will call another happy, and praiſe him as a man of ſpirit, that will not debaſe himſelf, but keep up his authority, rank and dignity, and not condeſcend to men of low eſtates; the workers of wickedneſs are ſet up and extolled, and tempters of God, men of atheiſtical and deiſtical principles, are not only delivered from the puniſhment they deſerve, but are commended for their bold ſpirits; ſee Pſal. x. 3. Mal. iii. 15. Or, every wicked man praiſes thoſe that forſake the law, ſo Schultens. But ſuch as keep the law, contend with them; that is, with them that forſake it, and praiſe the wicked; they are diſpleaſed with them, and ſhew their reſentment at them; they contend with them by arguments, and endeavour to convince them of their folly and wickedneſs; they reprove them for it, even though they may be in high places, as John the Baptiſt reproved Herod. The Targum is, “ they contend with them that they “ may return,” or be converted; they ſtrive and take pains with them, to convince them and bring them to repentance, and to a change of ſentiments, life and manners.

℣. 5. Evil men underſtand not judgment, &c.] Or, men of wickedneſs [b]; that are under the governing power of it; who are given up, and give up themſelves unto it; who, like Ahab, ſell themſelves to work wickedneſs: theſe know not what is juſt and right between man and man, at leaſt not to do it; they know it not practically; they are wiſe to do evil, but to do good have no knowledge, Jer. iv. 22. they know not the law of God, the rule of judgment, juſtice and equity; at leaſt not the extenſiveneſs and ſpirituality of it, Jer. viii. 7. and much leſs the goſpel of Chriſt, which is ſometimes ſo called, Iſa. xlii. 1, 4. and li. 4. Nor do they advert, as they ſhould, to the judgments of God in the earth; they do not conſider his work, and the operation of his hand; the vengeance he takes on wicked men, ſo Jarchi interprets it; nor do they take any notice of the judgment to come, at which they muſt appear, and into which they will be brought, and all things done by them. But they that ſeek the Lord, underſtand all things; this character deſcribes all good men that ſeek the Lord, in private and in public, that ſeek him by prayer and ſupplication, that wait upon him in the ordinances of his houſe; and all ſenſible ſinners, who ſeek to Chriſt for righteouſneſs, for reſt, for life and ſalvation, for more grace from him, for more communion with him, for a greater degree of knowledge of him, and for immortality and eternal life, his kingdom and glory. And ſuch underſtand all things; not in the moſt full and abſolute ſenſe; for this is proper and peculiar to God: nor all things natural and civil, which truly righteous perſons, generally ſpeaking, have the leaſt ſhare of, as arts, ſciences, languages, trade and commerce in all its branches; and indeed univerſal knowledge of theſe things does not belong to any one man: nor all things in a religious ſenſe; not all the difficult paſſages of ſcripture, in which there are many things hard to be underſtood; but all things neceſſary to ſalvation; all things relating to their fallen, depraved and miſerable ſtate and condition by nature, and to the way and means of their recovery and ſalvation by Chriſt; all things relating to a ſpiritual and ſaving knowledge of God in Chriſt; and to the knowledge of the perſon, offices and grace of Chriſt; and to the work of the Spirit of God upon the heart; and of the doctrines of the goſpel, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt, and ſo as to be food for their ſouls: and which underſtanding is given them, and they attain unto and increaſe in, by ſeeking the Lord, and uſing the means of knowledge, the word and ordinances; ſee 1 Cor. ii. 15, 1 John ii. 20, 27. The Targum and Syriac verſion render it, "that underſtand all good "things;" and ſo Aben Ezra interprets it: the Arabic verſion is, they underſtand it in all things; that is, judgment, juſtice, and equity in all its branches, and practiſe it.

[b] אנשי רע viri mali, (in genitivo caſu) Mercerus; vel malitiæ, Baynus, Gejerus.

℣. 6. Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightneſs, &c.] See the note on chap. xix. 1. Than he that is perverſe in his ways, though he be rich; or, in his two ways [c]: that halts between two ways, or makes uſe of both; ſometimes turns to the one, to the right hand, and ſometimes to the other, to the left hand; or that pretends to the one, and walks in the other; would be thought to be a virtuous and religious man, and to walk in the paths of righteouſneſs and truth, when he walks in thoſe of ſin and wickedneſs. And now a poor man, that walks evenly and uprightly, according to the word of God and truth of the goſpel, in the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, and in the paths of faith and holineſs, is better than he; more honourable, more comfortable, and happy in life and in death; he has grace now, and will have glory hereafter.

℣. 7. Whoſo keepeth the law, is a wiſe ſon, &c.] That obſerves the law of God; for though he cannot perfectly keep it, yet he delights in it after the inward man; and with his ſpirit ſerves it, from a principle of love, in faith, and with a view to the glory of God, without mercenary and ſiniſter ends. Such a man enjoys peace, and has a reward in, though not for keeping the commandments of it; ſo that it is his wiſdom to obſerve it; and he may be truly called a wiſe man, Deut. iv. 6. Or that obſerves the law or commandments of his parents, which they enjoin him; ſee chap. vi. 20, 21. and particularly the law of God, which requires honour and obedience to be given to parents, and which turns to the account of children; it is well with them, and their days are prolonged on earth, and therefore they are wiſe that keep it, Eph. vi. 1—3. and ſuch a wiſe ſon makes a glad father, as the contrary brings ſhame to him, as in the next clauſe. But he that is a companion of riotous men, ſhameth his father; that keeps company with gluttons, and indulges his ſenſual appetite with them; that feeds [d] ſuch perſons and himſelf, as ſome render the word; that gives up himſelf to an epicurean life: he brings himſelf at laſt to diſgrace and poverty, and ſo cauſes ſhame to his father; who will be charged with neglecting his education, and indulging him in ſuch a luxurious way of living; ſee chap. x. 5. and xxix. 15.

℣. 8. He that by uſury and unjuſt gain increaſeth his ſubſtance, &c.] By biting and oppreſſing the poor; letting him have money at an exorbitant intereſt, and goods at an exorbitant price, and ſo increaſes his ſubſtance in this ſcandalous manner: hence uſury is in Lev. xxv. 36. called increaſe, and by the Greeks τοκος, a birth, becauſe money is the birth of money, as Ariſtotle [e] obſerves; and ſo by the Latins, fænus, as if it was fœtus [f], a birth. The word for uſury here ſignifies biting; and ſo uſury, with claſſical writers [g], is ſaid to bite; and whilſt it increaſes the ſubſtance of the uſurer, it leſſens and devours that of others. He ſhall gather it for him that will pity the poor; not for himſelf, nor for his poſterity; but for ſuch, though not intentionally but eventually, as will make a good uſe of it, and diſtribute it to the neceſſities of the poor. The meaning is, that things ſhould be ſo overruled by the providence of God, that what ſuch an avaricious man gets in his diſhoneſt way, ſhould not be enjoyed by him or his; but ſhould be taken out of his hands, and put into the hands of another, that will do good with it, by ſhewing mercy to the poor; ſee Job xxvii. 16, 17.

℣. 9. He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, &c.] Not merely the moral law, but the word of God in general, and any and every doctrine of it; though the law is to be heard and attended to, what it commands and forbids, its precepts, menaces, and curſes: indeed the Spirit of God is not received by the hearing of the law, nor does faith come by that; but by hearing the word of God, particularly the goſpel; which yet men turn away their ears from, and are turned to fables, and chooſe to hearken to any thing rather than that; and like the deaf adder, ſtop their ears to the voice of the charmer charming ever ſo wiſely; the folly and ſad effects of which will be ſeen when too late. Even his prayer ſhall be abomination; that is, to God; not only his ungodly actions, but even his outward exerciſes of religion, which carry in them ſome ſhew of goodneſs and holineſs; and particularly his prayer to God, which in upright perſons is the delight of the Lord; yet in ſuch an one it will be abhorred by him; when he is in diſtreſs, and ſhall pray to the Lord, he will not only turn a deaf ear to him, as he has to his law or word, but he will deſpiſe and abhor him and his prayer; becauſe he has ſet at nought his counſel, and deſpiſed his reproof, chap. i. 24—28.

℣. 10. Whoſo cauſeth the righteous to go aſtray in an evil way, &c.] That is, who attempts to deceive them, and draw them into errors or immoralities, and ſo into a ſnare, into miſchief and ruin; firſt into the evil of ſin, in order to bring them into the evil of puniſhment; I ſay, who attempts to do it; for it is not poſſible that God's elect, thoſe who are truly righteous and good, ſhould be totally and finally deceived, Matt. xxiv. 24. He ſhall fall himſelf into his own pit; which he had dug and prepared for the righteous, who through the grace and goodneſs of God is preſerved from it; the miſchief intended for the good man falls upon himſelf in righteous judgment, Pſalm vii. 15, 16. But the upright ſhall have good things in poſſeſſion; or ſhall inherit good things [h]; they are heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Chriſt, and ſhall inherit all things; they have all good things in Chriſt, with him and from him now; nor can they be taken from them, or they be cauſed to loſe them by all the policy and craft of men and devils, who ſeek to draw them into ſin and ſnares with that view; but notwithſtanding all their efforts, they ſhall keep poſſeſſion of their good things here, the grace of the Spirit, and the bleſſings of grace, and ſhall enjoy glory hereafter.

℣. 11. The rich man is wiſe in his own conceit, &c.] Aſcribing his getting riches to his great ſagacity, wiſdom, and prudence; and being flattered with it by dependents on him. But the poor that hath underſtanding ſearcheth him out; a man of good underſtanding, whether in things natural, civil, moral, or ſpiritual, though poor, as a man may be poor and yet a wiſe man; ſuch an one, when he comes into company with a rich man, wiſe in his own conceit, he ſoon by converſation with him finds him out to be a very fooliſh man, and expoſes him as one; for riches are not always to men of underſtanding, or all that have them are not ſuch; and better is a poor wiſe man, than even a fooliſh king; ſee Eccl. ix. 11, 15. and iv. 13.

℣. 12. When righteous men do rejoice, there is great glory, &c.] When it is well with them; when they are in proſperous circumſtances; when they are countenanced and encouraged by the government under which they are; when they have the free exerciſe of their religion; and eſpecially when they are advanced to places of profit, honour, and truſt, which muſt make them chearful and joyful; it is a glory to a land, it adds greatly to the glory of it, and a fine proſpect there is of the increaſe and continuance of it. But when the wicked riſe; to honour and dignity, and are ſet in high places, and are in great power and authority, which they exerciſe to the diſtreſs of the righteous, and all good men: a man is hidden; a good man; he hides himſelf, as in ℣. 28. he withdraws himſelf from court, from city, from company, from commerce, and buſineſs, becauſe of the tyranny and perſecution of wicked men; and flees to diſtant places, and wanders in deſerts and mountains, in caves and dens of the earth; as ſome ſaints under the Old Teſtament did, and as the church in goſpel-times fled from the tyranny of Antichriſt into the wilderneſs to hide herſelf: or, a man is or ſhall be ſought for[i], and ſearched out; as wicked perſecutors are very diligent to ſearch for and find out ſuch perſons that hide themſelves, and fetch them out of their hiding places, and cruelly uſe them.

℣. 13. He that covereth his ſins ſhall not proſper, &c.] God may cover a man's ſins, and it is an inſtance of his grace, and it is the glory of it to do it, but a man may not cover his own: it is right in one good man to cover the ſins of another, reproving him ſecretly, and freely forgiving him; but it is wrong in a man to cover his own: not that any man is bound to accuſe himſelf before a court of judicature, or ought to expoſe his ſins to the public, which would be to the hurt of his credit, and to the ſcandal of religion; but whenever he is charged with ſin, and reproved for it by his fellow-chriſtian, he ſhould not cover it, that is, he ſhould own it; for not to own and acknowledge it, is to cover it; he ſhould not deny it, which is to cover it with a lie, and is adding ſin to ſin; nor ſhould he juſtify it, as if he had done a right thing; nor extenuate or excuſe it, or impute it to others that drew him into it, as Adam, which is called a covering tranſgreſſion, as Adam, Job xxxi. 33. for ſuch a man ſhall not proſper; in ſoul or body, in things temporal or ſpiritual; he ſhall not have peace of mind and conſcience, but ſooner or later ſhall feel the ſtings of it; he ſhall not ſucceed even in thoſe things he has in view by covering his ſins; he ſhall not be able to cover them long, for there is nothing covered but what ſhall be revealed; if not in this life, which yet often is, however at the day of judgment, when every ſecret thing ſhall be made manifeſt; nor ſhall he eſcape the ſhame and puniſhment he thought to avoid by covering it, as may be obſerved in the caſe of Achan, Joſhua vii. 11—25. in ſhort, he ſhall have no mercy ſhewn him by God or man, as appears by the antitheſis in the next clauſe. But whoſo confeſſeth and forſaketh them ſhall have mercy; who confeſſes them to men privately and publicly, according to the nature of the offences, from whom they find mercy; but not to a prieſt in order for abſolution, which no man can give; ſin is only in this ſenſe to be confeſſed to God, againſt whom it is committed, and who only can pardon it; and though it is known unto him, yet he requires an acknowledgment of it, which ſhould be done from the heart, with an abhorrence of the ſin, and in the faith of Chriſt, as a ſacrifice for it; and it is not enough to confeſs, there muſt be a forſaking likewiſe, a parting with ſin, a denying of ſinful ſelf, a leaving the former courſe of ſin, and a quitting the company of wicked men before uſed to, and an abſtaining from all appearance of evil; as is and will be the caſe, where there is a true ſight and ſenſe of ſin, and the grace of God takes place: and ſuch find mercy, pardoning grace and mercy, or pardon in a way of mercy, and not merit; for though the ſinner confeſſes and forſakes it, it is not that which merits pardon; it is ſtill an act of grace and mercy in God, who is rich in it, delights in ſhewing it, and from whom it may be hoped for, and expected by all ſuch perſons; ſee Pſalm xxxii. 5. 1 John i. 9. So the Targum and Syriac verſion, God will have mercy on him.

℣. 14. Happy is the man that feareth alway, &c.] Not men, but the Lord; there is a fear and reverence due to men, according to the ſtations in which they are; but a ſlaviſh fear of man, and which deters from the worſhip of God and obedience to him, is criminal, and brings a ſnare; and a man under the influence of it cannot be happy: nor is a ſervile fear of God intended, a fear of wrath and damnation, or a diſtruſt of his grace, a continual calling in queſtion his love, and an awful apprehenſion of his diſpleaſure and vengeance; for in ſuch fear is torment, and with it a man can never be happy; but it is a reverence and godly fear, a filial one, a fear of God and his goodneſs, which he puts into the hearts of his people; a fear indeed of offending him, of ſinning againſt him, by which a man departs from evil and forſakes it, as well as confeſſes it; but is what ariſes from a ſenſe of his goodneſs: and it is well when ſuch a fear of God is always before the eyes and on the hearts of men; in their cloſets and families, in their trade and commerce, in all companies into which they come, as well as in the houſe of God and the aſſembly of his ſaints, where he is to be feared; as alſo in proſperity and adverſity, even throughout the whole courſe of life, paſſing the time of their ſojourning here in fear: and ſuch a man is happy; the eye of God is on him, his heart is towards him, and he delights in him; his ſecret is with him, he ſets a guard of angels about him, has laid up goodneſs for him, and communicates largely to him. But he that hardeneth his heart ſhall fall into miſchief; that hardens his heart from the fear of the Lord; neither confeſſes his ſin, nor forſakes it; bids as it were defiance to heaven, ſtrengthens and hardens himſelf in his wickedneſs, and by his hard and impenitent heart treaſures up to himſelf wrath againſt the day of wrath; he falls into evil [k], as it may be rendered, into the evil of ſin yet more and more, which the hardneſs of his heart brings him into, and ſo into the evil of puniſhment here and hereafter.

℣. 15. As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear, &c.] Which are both terrible; the lion that roars for want of food, or when it is over its prey; and the bear, when it runs from place to place in queſt of proviſion; being hungry and very deſirous of food, has a keen appetite, as ſome think the word [l] ſignifies. The Targum and Jarchi take it to be expreſſive of the cry and roaring it makes at ſuch a time, as well as the lion; ſee Iſa. lix. 11 ſo the Tigurine verſion. Roaring is the proper epithet of a lion, and is frequently given it in ſcripture, and in other writers [m]; and the bear, it is thought, to have its name in the Oriental language, from the growling and murmuring noiſe it makes when hungry; hence that of Horace [n]. So is a wicked ruler over the poor people; one that rules over them in a tyrannical manner, ſadly oppreſſes them, takes away the little from them they have, which is very cruel and barbarous; when he ought to protect and defend them, and againſt whom they cannot ſtand, and whom they dare not reſiſt; and who therefore muſt be as terrible to them, being as cruel and voracious as the above animals. Tyrants are frequently compared to lions, Jer. iv. 7. and l. 17. 2 Tim. iv. 17. and the man of ſin, the wicked ruler and great oppreſſor of God's poor people, is compared to both; his feet are as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion, Rev. xiii. 2.

℣. 16. The prince that wanteth underſtanding, is alſo a great oppreſſor, &c.] Or, much in oppreſſions [o]; he multiplies them, and abounds in them: he diſtreſſes his ſubjects in a variety of ways and methods he uſes to extort money from them, by which he ſhews his want of underſtanding: he is a wiſe prince that uſes gentle methods, and gains the affections of his people, and who chearfully ſupports his crown and government with honour and glory; but he is a fooliſh prince that uſes them with rigour. It may be rendered, and a prince that wanteth underſtanding, and is much or abounds in oppreſſions; in laying heavy burdens and taxes on his people, in an arbitrary manner; ſhall ſhorten, and not prolong his days [p], as it may be ſupplied from the next clauſe; either his ſubjects will riſe up againſt him, and dethrone him, and deſtroy him; or God, in mercy to them, and in judgment to him, will remove him by death. But he that hateth covetouſneſs, ſhall prolong his days; to hate covetouſneſs, is a good qualification of a civil magiſtrate, prince or ruler, Exod. xviii. 21. This ſin is the cauſe of a wicked prince oppreſſing his ſubjects; but where it is hated, which is ſeen by moderation in government, and eaſing of the people as much as poſſible; ſuch a prince, as he has the hearts of his ſubjects, is well-pleaſing to God, by whom he reigns; and ſuch an one, through the prayers of the people for him, and the goodneſs of God unto him, lives long, and reigns proſperouſly; and dies as David, in a good old age, full of days, riches and honour.

℣. 17. A man that doth violence to the blood of any perſon, &c.] That ſheds the blood of any in a violent manner; that lays violent hands upon a man, and takes away his life, contrary to the law in Gen. ix. 6. Or, that is preſſed becauſe of the blood of any perſon [q]; preſſed in his own mind; filled with horror, and tortured in his conſcience, for the innocent blood he has ſhed: the letter daleth in the word Adam is leſſer than uſual; and Vitringa, on Iſa. xxxiv. 6. obſerves, that it ſignifies a man red with blood, oppreſſed in his conſcience, and depreſſed by God, which this minute letter is a ſymbol of; and thinks it applicable to Edom or Rome: or it ſignifies one preſſed, purſued, and cloſe followed by the avenger of blood. Shall flee to the pit, let no man ſtay him; ſupport or help him. When ſuch a murderer flees, and is purſued, and unawares falls into a pit, or is like to do ſo, let no man warn him of it, or help him out of it; or if he flees to a pit to hide himſelf, let no man hold him or detain him there, or ſuffer him to continue in ſuch a lurking-place, but diſcover him or pluck him out; or if he is a fugitive and a vagabond all his days, as Cain, the murderer of his brother was, till he comes to the pit of the grave, let no man yield him any ſupport or ſuſtenance.

℣. 18. Whoſo walketh uprightly, ſhall be ſaved, &c.] Or be ſafe [r] from thoſe that ſeek his life, plot againſt him, ſhoot at him, as the wicked do at the upright in heart, but the Lord protects him; and it is even well with him in times of public calamities; the Lord has his chambers and hiding-places for him; and he is ſafe from falling, as may be gathered from the oppoſite clauſe; for he walks ſurely, and is in the hands of Chriſt, and is kept by him from a final and total falling away: and he ſhall be ſaved alſo with an everlaſting ſalvation; from ſin, and all the effects of it; from the curſe of the law, from wrath to come, from hell and damnation. Not that his upright walk is the cauſe of this; the moving cauſe of ſalvation is the grace of God; the procuring cauſe, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the only author of it: but this is a deſcriptive character of the perſons that are and ſhall be ſaved; it is a clear caſe that ſuch have the grace of God, and therefore ſhall have glory; ſee the note on chap. x. 9. But he that is perverſe in his ways; in his two ways, as in ℣. 6. or many ways; and all perverſe and wicked: ſhall fall at once; his deſtruction ſhall come ſuddenly upon him, when he is not aware of it, and when he cries, Peace, peace, to himſelf: or in one of them; in one or other of his perverſe ways.

℣. 19. He that tilleth his land, ſhall have plenty of bread, &c.] Or, ſhall be filled or ſatisfied with bread [s]: ſhall have bread enough and to ſpare; proviſions of all ſorts, and in great plenty; ſee the note on chap. xii. 11. But he that followeth after after vain perſons; empty, idle perſons; keeps company, and ſpends his time with them, when he ſhould be about the buſineſs of his calling: ſhall have poverty enough; or be filled with it [t]; he ſhall be exceeding poor, reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, be cloathed in rags, and deſtitute of daily food.

℣. 20. A faithful man ſhall abound with bleſſings, &c.] Or, a man of faithfulneſſes [u]. A very faithful man, that is truly ſo; that is ſo in a moral ſenſe; true to his word, makes good his promiſes, fulfils his contracts, abides by the obligations he lays himſelf under; is faithful in every truſt repoſed in him, be it greater or leſſer matters, in every ſtation in which he is, and throughout the whole courſe of his life. Such a man abounds with the bleſſings and praiſes of men; all value him, and ſpeak well of him: and with the bleſſings of divine providence; he is much in bleſſings [w], as it may be rendered; as in receiving bleſſings from God, ſo in giving them to men; ſuch a man is uſually charitable and beneficent. And it may be underſtood of one that is faithful, in a ſpiritual and evangelic ſenſe; for of ſuch characters are the followers of the Lamb, Rev. xvii. 14. It is in the original, a man of truths [x]; one that has the truth of grace in him; that knows the grace of God in truth; with whom the truth of the goſpel is; who has learnt it, known it, embraced it, values it and abides by it; and who has a concern with Chriſt, who is the truth, who is formed, lives and dwells in his heart; of whom he has made a good profeſſion, and holds it faſt, and whom he cleaves unto. The character of faithful belongs both to the true miniſters of Chriſt, who preach the pure goſpel, and the whole of it; who ſeek not to pleaſe men, but God; and not themſelves, and their own glory, but the things of Chriſt, and his glory; and continue to do ſo in the face of all oppoſition: and to private Chriſtians, the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus; who truly believe in him, ſtand by his truths, abide by his ordinances, and are faithful to one another, and continue ſo till death: theſe abound with the bleſſings of the covenant of grace, with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt, with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt; they have an abundance of grace in them, given them in converſion, faith, hope, love, humility, and many other graces, in the exerciſe of which they are made to abound; and they have an abundance of bleſſings of grace beſtowed on them, pardon of ſin, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, adoption, meetneſs for and right unto eternal life; they have Chriſt, and all things along with him; ſo that they may be truly ſaid to have all things and abound. But he that maketh haſte to be rich, ſhall not be innocent; he that is over-anxious, and immoderately deſirous of being rich, and purſues every method of obtaining his deſires, with all his might and main; that labours night and day for it; though he takes no criminal, nor unlawful methods, properly ſo called, nor does he do any thing injurious to others, yet he is not innocent; that over-anxiety in him is criminal; nor is he free from covetouſneſs; ſee chap. xxiii. 4. and if he uſes any unjuſt and unlawful means to acquire wealth, and reſolves to be rich, right or wrong, per fas, per nefas, he ſhall not be innocent neither before God nor men: ſo the Targum renders it, "he that runs into iniquity, that he may be rich;" and indeed when a man haſtily, or in a ſhort time becomes rich, tho' he cannot be directly charged with fraud and injuſtice; yet he is not innocent in the minds of men, or free from their ſuſpicions and jealouſies of him. A man that makes haſte to be rich, is oppoſed to him that is faithful and true to his word and contracts, and is the ſame that Juvenal [y] calls avarus properans; ſee 1 Tim. vi. 9 10.

℣. 21. To have reſpect of perſons, is not good, &c.] In courts of judicature, to give a cauſe or paſs ſentence in favour of a perſon, becauſe he is rich, or is a relation, a friend, an acquaintance, or has done a kindneſs; and againſt another, becauſe of the reverſe, Lev. xix. 15. Deut. xvi. 19. nor in religious aſſemblies, making a difference between the rich and the poor, James ii. 1, 2. this is not good in itſelf, nor productive of good effects, and cannot be well pleaſing to God, who himſelf is no reſpecter of perſons. For, for a piece of bread that man will tranſgreſs; the laws of God and men; having uſed himſelf to ſuch unrighteous methods of proceeding, he will do any baſe action for a ſmall gain, he will ſtick at nothing, and do it for any thing; as Cato uſed to ſay of M. Cælius the tribune, "that he might be hired for a morſel of bread, to ſpeak or hold his peace;" ſee Ezek. xiii. 19.

℣. 22. He that haſteth to be rich, &c.] As every man that is eagerly deſirous of riches is; he would be rich at once [z], and cannot wait with any patience in the ordinary courſe of means: hath an evil eye; on the ſubſtance of others, to get it, right or wrong; is an evil man, and takes evil methods to be rich [a]; ſee 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. or an envious one; is an envious man, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions; he envies others, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, the riches of other men; he grudges every thing that goes beſides himſelf; and that makes him in haſte to be rich, that he may be equal to, or ſuperior to others: or he is a ſordid, avaricious, illiberal man, that will not part with any thing for the relief of others, and is greedy of every thing to amaſs wealth to himſelf; an evil eye is oppoſed to a good or bountiful one, that is, to a man that is liberal and generous, chap. xxii. 9. Matt. xx. 15. And conſidereth not that poverty ſhall come upon him; for wealth gotten haſtily, and eſpecially wrongfully, diminiſhes, waſtes, and comes to nothing in the end; it ſometimes flies away as faſt as it comes; it has wings to do the one, as well as the other: this the man in haſte to be rich does not conſider, or he would have taken another method; ſince this is not the true way of getting and keeping riches, but of loſing them, and coming to want; ſee chap. xiii. 11. and xx. 21.

℣. 23. He that rebuketh a man, &c.] His friend and acquaintance, for any fault committed by him; which reproof he gives in a free and faithful manner, yet kind, tender and affectionate. The word rendered afterwards, which begins the next clauſe, according to the accents belongs to this, and is by ſome rendered, he that rebuketh a man after me [b]; after my directions, according to the rules I have given; that is, after God, and by his order; or Solomon, after his example, and who delivered out theſe ſentences and inſtructions. The Targum ſo connects the word, and renders the clauſe, "he "that rebukes a man before him;" openly, to his face: but rather it may be rendered behind; that is, as Cocceius interprets it, apart, alone, privately and ſecretly, when they are by themſelves; which agrees with Chriſt's inſtructions, Matt. xviii. 15. Afterwards ſhall find more favour than he that flattereth with the tongue; for though the reproofs given him may ſit uneaſy upon his mind at firſt, and may be cutting and wounding, and give him ſome pain, and ſo ſome diſlike to the reprover; yet when he coolly conſiders the nature and tendency of the reproof, the manner in which it was given, and the deſign of it; he will love, value, and eſteem his faithful friend and rebuker, more than the man that fawned upon him, and flattered him with having done that which was right and well; or, as the Targum, than he that divideth the tongue, or is double-tongued; and ſo the Syriac verſion; ſee chap. xxvii. 5, 6. Pſal. cxli. 3.

℣. 24. Whoſo robbeth his father or his mother, &c.] As Micah did of eleven hundred ſhekels of ſilver, Judges xvii. 2. And ſaith, It is no tranſgreſſion; what is his father's or his mother's is his own, or as good as his own, it will come to him at their death; and if he wants it before, he thinks he ought to have it; and if they are not willing to give it him, it is with him no ſin to rob them of it; and this he ſays within himſelf to quiet his conſcience when he has done it; or to others who may charge him with it: but whatever ſuch a man thinks, ſins againſt parents are greater than againſt others; as parricide is a greater ſin than any other kind of murder, ſo robbing of parents is greater than any other kind of theft; it is more aggravated, eſpecially when parents are aged and cannot work for themſelves, but depend on what they have for their livelihood; whereas a young man can and ought, and ſhould rather give to his parents than rob them of what they have. The ſame is the companion of a deſtroyer; of a murderer; either he has got into ſuch company which have put him upon ſuch wicked practices; or he will ſoon get into ſuch a ſociety, and from a robber of his father and mother become a robber on the highway, and a murderer; and he has wickedneſs enough to be a deſtroyer of the lives of his parents, as well as of their ſubſtance; and ſometimes the one ſin leads to the other.

℣. 25. He that is of a proud heart ſtirreth up ſtrife, &c.] Or of a large heart [c], or has an enlarged one; not with uſeful knowledge and underſtanding, as Solomon had; nor an heart enlarged with love and affection to the ſouls of men, as the apoſtle Paul had; but either has a covetous one, who enlarges its deſire as hell, and is never ſatisfied with what he has, and ſo is continually contending with his neighbours, engaging in law-ſuits for their property, or unwilling to pay his lawful debts; or of a proud ſpirit, and deſpiſes all around him, and cannot bear oppoſition and contradiction; and is of a wrathful and revengeful ſpirit, and always at variance with his neighbours, and quarrelling with them; ſee chap. xviii. 15. But he that putteth his truſt in the Lord ſhall be made fat; that truſts in the Lord, both for things temporal and ſpiritual; does not covet his neighbour's goods, nor diſturbs his peace, nor injures his perſon or property to increaſe his own, but depends upon the Lord for a ſupply of neceſſary good things; ſuch an one ſhall be fat and flouriſhing, both in his temporal and ſpiritual eſtate; all he does ſhall proſper; he ſhall want no good thing, Pſalm lxxxiv. 11, 12. Jer. xvii. 7, 8.

℣. 26. He that truſteth in his own heart is a fool, &c.] Since the thoughts and imaginations of the thoughts of the heart are only evil, and that continually; they are vain and vague, ſinful and corrupt; the affections are inordinate, the conſcience defiled, the underſtanding darkened, and the will perverſe; there is no good thing in it, nor any that comes out of it, but all the reverſe; it is deceitful and deſperately wicked: he muſt be a fool, and not know the plague of his heart, that truſts in it; and even for a good man to be ſelf-confident, and truſt to the ſincerity of his heart, as Peter did, or to the good frame of the heart as many do, is acting a fooliſh part; and eſpecially ſuch are fools as the ſcribes and phariſees, who truſted in themſelves that they were righteous and deſpiſed others, when a man's beſt righteouſneſs is impure and imperfect, and cannot juſtify him in the ſight of God; it is moreover a weak and fooliſh part in men to truſt to the wiſdom and counſel of their heart, to lean to their own underſtanding, even in things natural and civil, and not to aſk wiſdom of God, or take the advice of men, and eſpecially in things religious and ſacred; ſee chap. iii. 5, 6. But whoſo walketh wiſely; as he does who walks according to the rule of the divine word; who makes the teſtimonies of the Lord his counſellers; who conſults with the ſacred writings, and follows the directions of them; who walks as he has Chriſt for his pattern and example, and makes the Spirit of God his guide and walks after him, and not after the fleſh; who walks with wiſe men, and takes their advice in all matters of moment, not truſting to his own wiſdom and knowledge; who walks as becomes the goſpel of Chriſt, and in all the ordinances of it; who walks inoffenſively to all men, and ſo in wiſdom towards them that are without, and in love to them who are within; who walks circumſpectly, not as fools but as wiſe, redeeming the time. He ſhall be delivered; he ſhall be delivered from the ſnares of his own deceitful heart, which he will not truſt; and from the temptations of Satan; and from all afflictions and troubles he meets with in the way; and from a final and total falling away; and from eternal death and deſtruction: he ſhall be ſaved, as ſome verſions render it, even with an everlaſting ſalvation. The Targum is, "he ſhall be protected "from evil."

℣. 27. He that giveth unto the poor ſhall not lack, &c.] That gives alms unto them, relieves them in their diſtreſs, ſupplies them with money, food, or clothes, and does it chearfully, largely, and liberally, as the caſe requires; ſuch an one ſhall not want any good thing; he ſhall not be the poorer for what he gives; he ſhall not miſs it, nor his ſubſtance be diminiſhed; he ſhall not come to poverty and want, yea he ſhall be inriched and his ſubſtance increaſed, for more is intended than is expreſſed. Jarchi interprets this of a wiſe man not reſtraining doctrine from a diſciple, but giving it to him liberally. But he that hideth his eyes; that is, from the poor, as the Targum and Syriac verſion add; that does not care to ſee his perſon, to behold his miſeries, or know his caſe, leſt his heart ſhould be moved with compaſſion, and ſhould draw out any thing from him; ſee Iſa. lviii. 7. Such an one ſhall have many a curſe; not only from the poor he hardens himſelf againſt, but from other perſons who obſerve his miſerable and covetous diſpoſition; and from the Lord himſelf, who abhors ſuch perſons, and curſes their very bleſſings now, and will bid them depart from him as accurſed perſons hereafter.

℣. 28. When the wicked riſe, men hide themſelves, &c.] When wicked men are raiſed to places of power and authority, rich men hide themſelves, leſt they ſhould become a prey to them; and good men hide themſelves that they may not be put to death by them; or as aſhamed to behold their evil actions; ſee the note on ℣. 12. But when they periſh; wicked men, either by a natural or violent death; or periſh as to their authority and power, being turned out of their places. The righteous increaſe; ſuch who before hid themſelves appear, and being put into the places of the wicked, encourage truth and righteouſneſs, by which means the number of good men is multiplied; and which is a great happineſs to a nation, and ſhews the uſefulneſs and advantage that good magiſtrates are of unto it.

CHAP. XXIX.

℣. 1. HE that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, &c.] Or a man of reproofs [d]; either a man that takes upon him to be a cenſurer and reprover of others, and is often at that work, and yet does thoſe things himſelf which he cenſures and reproves in others; and therefore muſt have an impudent face and a hard heart, a ſeared conſcience and a ſtiff neck; his neck muſt be an iron ſinew, and his brow braſs: or rather a man that is often reproved by others, by parents, by miniſters of the goſpel, by the Lord himſelf, by the admonitions of his word and Spirit, and by the correcting diſpenſations of his providence; and yet deſpiſes and rejects all counſel and admonition, inſtruction and reproofs of every kind, and hardens himſelf againſt them, and ſhews no manner of regard unto them. The metaphor is taken from oxen, which kick and toſs about, and will not ſuffer the yoke to be put upon their necks. Such an one ſhall ſuddenly be deſtroyed; or broken [e]; as a potter's veſſel is broken to pieces with an iron rod, and can never be put together again; ſo ſuch perſons ſhall be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction, which ſhall come upon them ſuddenly, when they are crying peace to themſelves, notwithſtanding the reproofs of God and men. And that without remedy; or, and there is no healing [f]; no cure of their diſeaſe, which is obſtinate; no pardon of their ſins; no recovery of them out of their miſerable and undone ſtate and condition; they are irretrievably loſt; there is no help for them, having deſpiſed all advice and inſtruction; ſee chap. v. 12, 13.

℣. 2. When the righteous are in authority, &c.] Or are increaſed [g]; either in numbers or in riches, or in power and dominion; are ſet in high places, and have the exerciſe of civil government, and the execution of the laws in their hands; for the protection of good men in their civil and religious privileges, and for the puniſhment of evil men; for the encouraging of all that is good, and for the diſcouraging of every thing that is bad. The people rejoice; the whole body of the people, becauſe of the public good; a ſtate is happy under ſuch an adminiſtration; every one feels and enjoys the advantage of it; ſee 1 Kings iv. 20. But when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn; or groan [h], or will groan, under their tyranny and oppreſſion, and becauſe of the ſad ſtate of things; the number of good men is leſſened, being cut off, or obliged to flee; wicked men and wickedneſs are encouraged and promoted; heavy taxes are laid upon them, and exorbitant demands made, and cruelty, injuſtice, and arbitrary power exerciſed; and no man's perſon and property ſafe; ſee chap. x. 11. and xxviii. 12, 28.

℣. 3. Whoſo loveth wiſdom rejoiceth his father, &c.] He that is a philoſopher, eſpecially a religious one, that not only loves and ſeeks after natural wiſdom, but moral wiſdom and knowledge; and more particularly evangelical wiſdom, Chriſt the wiſdom of God, who is to be valued and loved above all things; and the goſpel of Chriſt, which is the wiſdom of God in a myſtery; and the knowledge of it, which is the wiſdom which comes from above, and is pure and peaceable; and which lies much in the fear of God, and in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, attended with all the fruits of righteouſneſs: ſuch a ſon makes glad his father, both becauſe of his temporal good, ſince he does not waſte but improve the ſubſtance he has given him; and becauſe of his ſpiritual and eternal welfare; and ſince inſtead of being a reproach he is an honour to him; ſee chap. x. 1. But he that keepeth company with harlots ſpendeth his ſubſtance; his father has given him, and comes to want and beggary; all which is a grief to his parents: or, that feeds harlots [i]; who live in a riotous and voluptuous manner, and ſoon drain a man of his ſubſtance, and bring him to a morſel of bread; ſee Luke xv. 13, 14, 30. Prov. vi. 26. and ſuch a ſon grieves his father, ſeeing he ſpends his ſubſtance and damns his ſoul.

℣. 4. The king by judgement eſtabliſheth the land, &c.] By executing judgment and juſtice among his ſubjects he eſtabliſhes the laws of the land, and the government of it; he ſecures its peace and proſperity, and preſerves his people in the poſſeſſion of their properties and privileges; and makes them rich and powerful, and the ſtate ſtable and flouriſhing, ſo that it continues firm to poſterity; ſuch a king was Solomon, 2 Chron. ix. 8. But he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it; that is, a king that does ſo; Gerſom obſerves that he is not called a king, becauſe ſuch a man is not worthy of the name, who takes gifts and is bribed by them to pervert judgment and juſtice; whereby the laws of the nation are violated, and the perſons and properties of his ſubjects become the prey of wicked men; and ſo the ſtate is ſubverted and falls to ruin: it is in the original text, a man of oblations [k]; the word is generally uſed of the ſacred oblations or offerings under the law; hence ſome underſtand it of a ſacrilegious prince, who of his own arbitrary power converts ſacred things to civil uſes. The Targum, Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions render it, a wicked and ungodly man; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, a covetous man; as ſuch a prince muſt be in whatſoever light he is ſeen, whether as a perverter of juſtice through bribes, or as a ſacrilegious man; though it may be rendered, a man of exactions [l], for it is uſed of the oblation of a prince which he receives from his people, Ezek. xlv. 9, 13. as Aben Ezra obſerves; and ſo it may be interpreted of a king that lays heavy taxes upon his people, and thereby brings them to diſtreſs and poverty, and the ſtate to ruin.

℣. 5. A man that flattereth his neighbour, &c.] That ſpeaks ſmooth things to him, gives him flattering titles, ſpeaks fair to his face, highly commends him on one account or another. Spreadeth a net for his feet; has an ill deſign upon him, and therefore ſhould be guarded againſt; his view is to draw him into a ſnare, and make a prey of him; he attacks him on his weak ſide, and hopes to make ſome advantage of it to himſelf; wherefore flatterers ſhould be avoided as pernicious perſons; or he ſpreads a net for his own feet, and is taken in the ſnare which he had laid for his neighbour; or falls into the pit he dug for him, as Gerſom obſerves; ſee Pſal. cxl. 5. Hoſea v. 1.

℣. 6. In the tranſgreſſion of an evil man there is a ſnare, &c.] Or according to the accents in ſome copies, in the tranſgreſſion of a man is an evil ſnare, as Aben Ezra obſerves, the words may be read; there is a ſnare in ſin to man himſelf; one ſin leads on to another, and a man is ſnared by the works of his own hands, and is implicated and held in the cords of his own iniquity, and falls into the ſnare of the devil, out of which he is not eaſily recovered; and the tranſgreſſion of one man is a ſnare to another; he is drawn into ſin by ill examples; and by indulging himſelf in ſin, the evil day comes upon him unawares as a ſnare; and ſooner or later he is filled with horrors of conſcience, anguiſh, and diſtreſs. But the righteous doth ſing and rejoice; not at the ſnares of others, their ſin or puniſhment; for ſuch a man rejoices not in iniquity, though he ſometimes does at the puniſhment of ſinners, becauſe of the glory of the divine juſtice; and Gerſom thinks this is here meant; ſee Pſal. lviii. 10. but rather, as he alſo obſerves, the righteous man rejoices at his deliverance from the ſnares of ſin and Satan, and of the world; he rejoices in the righteouſneſs by which he is denominated righteous; not his own but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, it being ſo rich and glorious, ſo perfect and complete; he rejoices in ſalvation by him, it being ſo ſuitable, ſo great, ſo full, ſo free, and ſo much for the glory of God; he rejoices in the pardon of his ſins through the blood of Chriſt, and in the expiation of them by his ſacrifice; he rejoices in his perſon, in the greatneſs, fitneſs, fulneſs, and beauty of it; he rejoices in all his offices he bears and executes, and in all the relations he ſtands in to him; he rejoices in his word and ordinances, in the proſperity of his cauſe and intereſt, in the good of his people, and in hope of the glory of God; and even ſings for joy in the view of electing, redeeming, and calling grace, and eternal life and happineſs; he has peace of conſcience now, fears no enemy, nor any danger, and expects a life of glory in the world to come; and oftentimes ſings on the brink of the grave, in the view of death and eternity.

℣. 7. The righteous conſidereth the cauſe of the poor, &c.] Not his poverty and diſtreſs, ſo as to relieve him, which yet he does, Pſal. xli. 1. nor the perſon of the poor in judgment, and which he ought not to do; for as he ſhould not regard a rich man's perſon, and favour him, becauſe he is rich; ſo neither a poor man, becauſe he is poor, through an affectation of mercy, Lev. xix. 15. but the cauſe of the poor, and the juſtice of that, and do him juſtice, though a poor man. This is to be underſtood chiefly of a civil magiſtrate, a judge in civil courts, that is righteous; who will take notice of and regard a poor man's cauſe, and take a good deal of pains and care that he is not injured. Or, knoweth the judgment of the poor [m]; he acquaints himſelf with his caſe, makes himſelf thoroughly maſter of it, ſearches out his cauſe, as Job did, chap. xxix. 16. But the wicked regardeth not to know it; or, does not underſtand knowledge [n] of the poor man's cauſe and caſe; and there being no money to be had, he does not care to conſider it and look into it, and get knowledge of it, and do him juſtice; he will not take his cauſe in hand, or plead it.

℣. 8. Scornful men bring a city into a ſnare, &c.] Such as deſpiſe dominion, ſpeak evil of dignities; proud and haughty men, that ſpeak loftily, and with a contempt of their ſuperiors; or who make a mock at religion, and ſcoff at all that is good and ſerious; theſe bring the inhabitants of a city into a ſnare, to rebel againſt their governors, and ſo into miſchief and ruin: or, they burn a city, as the Septuagint and Syriac verſions [o]; they inflame it, or blow it up into a flame; raiſe a combuſtion in it, and fill it with ſtrifes and contentions; and bring down the wrath of God upon it, like fire: or, they blow upon a city [p]; raiſe ſtorms and tempeſts in it; turn all things upſide down, and throw it into the utmoſt confuſion, or blow it up. But wiſe men turn away wrath; the wrath of men, by their wiſe counſels and advice, and appeaſe tumults and ſeditions, and reſtore things to a quiet and ſettled ſtate; or the wrath of God, by interpoſing with their prayers between him and a ſinful people, as Moſes did, Pſal. cvi. 23.

℣. 9. If a wiſe man contendeth with a fooliſh man, &c.] Enters into a controverſy with him, either by word or writing, in order to convince him of his folly and wickedneſs, of his errors and miſtakes. Whether he rage or laugh, there is no reſt; that is, either whether the fool is angry with the wiſe man, and rages at him and abuſes him, and calls him names, or laughs at him, and ſcoffs at all his arguments, reaſons and advice; yet the wiſe man does not ceaſe from proceeding in the conteſt with him; or he is not dejected, and caſt down, and diſcouraged; or, as the Targum is, "he is "not broken;" but patiently bears his wrath and fury, his ſcoffs and jeers: or elſe, whether the wiſe man deals roughly or gently with the fool, in a more moroſe or in a more jocoſe way; it has no influence upon him; he is never the better for it; he does not acquieſce or reſt in what he ſays; like the Phariſees in Chriſt's time, who are compared to ſurly children; who when piped to, danced not; and when mourned to, lamented not, Matt. xi. 16, 17. ſee the note there. The deſign of the proverb is to ſhew, that all labour to reclaim a fool from his folly is loſt, let a man take what methods he will, chap. xxvii. 22.

℣. 10. The blood-thirſty hate the upright, &c.] As Cain did Abel; and as the wicked world hate all good men, and perſecute them, even unto death. But the juſt ſeek his ſoul; either the ſoul of the blood-thirſty, and that either the good of their ſouls; ſeek their ſpiritual welfare, and pray for it, even though they are ſo cruel and inhuman: or juſt magiſtrates will ſeek after ſuch perſons, to puniſh them for ſhedding the blood of the upright. Or elſe the meaning is, that juſt perſons ſeek the ſoul of the upright, and make inquiſition for the blood of ſuch, to puniſh for it; which comes to the ſame ſenſe, as Aben Ezra obſerves: or rather, ſuch ſeek to defend and preſerve the ſoul or life of upright men, from thoſe that hate and perſecute them. Jarchi illuſtrates it by 1 Sam. xxii. 23. the Targum is, "men that ſhed blood, hate integrity; "but the upright ſeek it."

℣. 11. A fool uttereth all his mind, &c.] At once; tells all he knows, all that is in his breaſt; whatever he thinks, and all that he intends to do; what or whom he loves or hates. Or, a fool brings out all his wrath; ſo the Targum, Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions; he cannot reſtrain it, nor hide it; it breaks out at once, even all of it, and is ſoon known, as in chap. xii. 16. But a wiſe man keepeth it in till afterwards; reſerves his mind, and thoughts, and deſigns to himſelf; and does not diſcover them until a proper opportunity offers, when to diſcloſe them is moſt to advantage; or he reſtrains his wrath and anger, defers ſhewing it to a proper time, when it may anſwer a better purpoſe, and he may do it without ſin.

℣. 12. If a ruler hearken to lies, &c.] To men that tell them, in order to ſooth and flatter him, or to hurt the character and reputation of others, that they may raiſe their own: rulers ſhould not liſten to and encourage ſuch ſort of perſons; for as lying lips do not become a prince, ſo it is not right to have liars about him; David would not ſuffer ſuch to dwell in his court, Pſal. ci. 7. All his ſervants are wicked; or the greateſt part of them: for a ruler of ſuch a diſpoſition will take none but ſuch into his ſervice, that flatter him, and calumniate others; and ſuch a conduct, being pleaſing and agreeable to him, is a temptation to his miniſters to act the ſame wicked part; as is a prince, ſuch are his courtiers, his example has great influence upon them.

℣. 13. The poor and the deceitful man meet together, &c.] Or the uſurer[q]; who by uſury, by fraud and deception, is poſſeſſed of the mammon of unrighteouſneſs, and is become rich; he and the poor man meet together; and ſo the ſenſe is the ſame as in chap. xxii. 2. ſee the note there. The Lord lightneth both their eyes; with the light of natural life, and with the light of natural reaſon, John i. 4, 9. and ſo is the ſame as being the maker of them all, in the above place; or he beſtows his providential favours on both; cauſes his ſun to ſhine upon the rich and poor, the wicked and the righteous, Matt. v. 45. Or it may be underſtood of the light of grace; for though, for the moſt part, God chooſes and calls the poor of the world, and lightens their eyes with the light of his grace, when not many wiſe and noble are called and enlightned; yet this is not reſtrained wholly to men of one and the ſame condition of life; yea, God ſometimes calls and enlightens publicans, tax-gatherers and extortioners, as Matthew and Zaccheus.

℣. 14. The king that faithfully judgeth the poor, &c.] That truly executes juſtice and judgment among all his ſubjects; particularly the poor, who are too often neglected, becauſe they cannot fee perſons to plead their cauſe: ſuch a king was Solomon; and eſpecially the Meſſiah, of whom he was a type, Pſal. lxxii. 1, 2, 4, 12, 13. His throne ſhall be eſtabliſhed for ever; be ſecure to him as long as he lives, and to his poſterity after; juſtice to all men, and mercy to the poor, are the ſupport of a prince's throne; ſee chap. xx. 28. and xxv. 5.

℣. 15. The rod and reproof give wiſdom, &c.] Are the means of giving wiſdom to a child, reproved by its parent with the rod; and of driving out fooliſhneſs from him, and of making him wiſer for the time to come; he ſhunning thoſe evils, for which he was before corrected, chap. xxii. 15. So the children of God grow wiſer by the corrections and chaſtiſements of their heavenly Father, which are always for their good; and he is a man of wiſdom that hearkens to the rod, and to him that has appointed it, and learns the proper inſtructions from it, Mic. vi. 9. But a child left to himſelf, bringeth his mother to ſhame; a child that has the reins thrown upon his neck, is under no reſtraint of parents, but ſuffered to take his own way, is left to do his own will and pleaſure; he does thoſe things which his parents are aſhamed of, one as well as another; though the mother is only mentioned, being generally moſt fond and indulgent, and moſt criminal in ſuffering children to have their own wills and ways; and ſo has the greater ſhare in the ſhame that follows on ſuch indulgences.

℣. 16. When the wicked are multiplied, &c.] Or are in authority[r], as the word is rendered, ℣. 2. tranſgreſſion increaſeth; among the common people, being encouraged by their wicked rulers, whoſe examples they follow; or as the wicked themſelves increaſe, in numbers, in age, in power and riches, their ſins increaſe too. But the righteous ſhall ſee their fall; from their places of authority and power, of honour, riches and grandeur, into a low and deſpicable condition, into ruin and deſtruction; and that with pleaſure, becauſe of the glory of God, his wiſdom, juſtice, truth and faithfulneſs, diſplayed therein; ſee Pſal. lviii. 10.

℣. 17. Correct thy ſon, and he ſhall give thee reſt, &c.] Eaſe of mind, ſatisfaction and contentment, freedom from all anxious thoughts and cares; the correction being taken in good part, and ſucceeding according to wiſh and deſign. Yea, he ſhall give delight delight unto thy ſoul; by his tenderneſs to his parents, obedience to them, and reſpect for them; by his prudent behaviour among men; by his ſobriety, diligence, and induſtry in his calling; by his fear of God, and walking in his ways; than which nothing can give a greater delight and pleaſure to religious parents.

℣. 18. Where there is no viſion, the people periſh, &c.] That is, no prophecy, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; and which is often the ſenſe of the word, as the viſion of Iſaiah is the prophecy of Iſaiah; and in the New Teſtament, propheſying is often put for preaching; and here viſion or prophecy, ſignifies the public miniſtration of the word and ordinances, and want of perſons to adminiſter them; no expounder, as the Septuagint verſion; or interpreter, as the Arabic. This was the caſe in the latter end of Eli's life, 1 Sam. iii. 1. in Aſa's times, and before, 2 Chron. xv. 3. in the Babyloniſh captivity, Ezek. vii. 26. Lam. ii. 9. in the times of Antiochus, Pſal. lxxiv. 9. when John Baptiſt and Chriſt firſt came preaching the word, Matt. ix. 36. and now is the caſe of the Jews, and will be till the time of their converſion. So it was in the Gentile world, before the goſpel was brought into it, Acts xvii. 30. and ſo it now is in thoſe places where the ſeven churches of Aſia were; and in all Aſia, which once heard the word of the Lord, even all that large country; and now it is not heard at all in it, but covered with Mahometan darkneſs. And this is the caſe in all popiſh countries, ſubject to the ſee of Rome, where the word of God is not preached to the people, nor ſuffered ſo much as to be read by them; and even in reformed churches, for the moſt part, only a little morality is preached, and not the goſpel of Chriſt; ſo that here the people are periſhing for lack of knowledge, Hoſea iv. 6. and when the witneſſes will be ſlain, who now propheſy in ſackcloth, there will be an entire ſtop put to propheſying or preaching for a while; but when they ſhall riſe, the earth will be filled with the knowledge of God, through the miniſtry of the word. Now where there is no preaching, men periſh in their ſins; the word being the ordinary means of grace, of regeneration, converſion, faith, and ſalvation; without which, men know nothing of Chriſt, of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life by him: and where there is preaching, yet it not being of the right kind, there is no ſpiritual knowledge ſpread by it, no food for ſouls under it; they periſh with hunger, as the prodigal did, or are in ſtarving and famiſhing circumſtances; no comfort for the people of God, who periſh in their comforts under ſuch a miniſtry, 1 Cor. viii. 11. and poiſon is ſpread among others; falſe doctrine eats as a canker, and deſtroys ſouls. Again, where there is right viſion and prophecy, or true preaching of the word, and that is deſpiſed and neglected, men periſh notwithſtanding; as the Jews of old, and all deniers and contemners of the word now, Acts xiii. 41. Heb. ii. 3. and this ſeems to be intended here, as appears by the following clauſe. The word tranſlated periſh, has various ſenſes, which agree with the text. It may be rendered, the people become idle, or ceaſe [s]; from the performance of good works, grow diſſolute in their manners, and licentious in their practices: or they become refractory [t]; fierce, obſtinate and ungovernable, and rebel againſt their ſuperiors: or they are made naked [u]; ſtripped of their ornaments; of their privileges, civil as well as religious, which is often the caſe where no viſion is; as well of all virtue and morality, and of the bleſſing and protection of God. But he that keepeth the law, happy is he; not the moral law, which no man can keep perfectly, but the law of faith. It may be rendered, happy is he that obſerves doctrine [w]; the doctrine of the goſpel, where it is preached; that attends to it, values and eſteems it, receives it by faith, and with meekneſs; bleſſed is he, bleſſed are his eyes and ears; he ſees wondrous things out of this law or doctrine, and he hears and knows the joyful ſound, which brings ſalvation and eternal life unto him!

℣. 19. A ſervant will not be corrected by words, &c.] Not by them only, eſpecially one that is of a ſervile, ſurly and untractable diſpoſition; otherwiſe a good ſervant, and well diſpoſed to his maſter, and willing to ſerve him, and promote his intereſt, a word is ſufficient for ſuch an one; when he is bid to go, he goes; or to come, he comes, Matt. viii. 9. or if he has done wrong, and his fault is told him, he will amend another time; whereas a rough, ill-natured ſervant, will not regard words, but muſt have blows to correct him. For though he underſtand; what his maſter ſays, and what is his will, and knows he has done wrong, and ought to do otherwiſe, which is an aggravation of ſin: he will not anſwer; own his fault, and promiſe to do better for the future; through the ſurlineſs of his nature, and contempt of his maſter, whom he does not think worthy of an anſwer: ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, he deſpiſes to anſwer; thus Job was uſed by his ſervants, Job xix. 16. There is an anſwering which is forbidden ſervants, Titus ii. 9. but this is what becomes them, and is expreſſive of their reſpect and reverence to their maſters, and their ready, hearty and chearful obedience to them; and which eſpecially ſhould be in chriſtian ſervants to chriſtian maſters, 1 Tim. vi. 1. Eph. vi. 5—7.

℣. 20. Seeſt thou a man that is haſty in his words, &c.] Swift to ſpeak either before God or men; that takes upon him to ſpeak upon a ſubject, or return an anſwer to a queſtion, before he has thoroughly thought of it, and well conſidered it, and digeſted what he ſhould ſay; ſee Eccl. v. 2. James i. 19. or, haſty in his matters [x]; in his buſineſs; runs raſhly and precipitately into things, without duly conſidering within himſelf what is right and proper to be done, and without taking the advice of others. There is more hope of a fool than of him; of one that has not the gift of elocution, or not ſo much ſagacity in buſineſs, and yet takes time to think, and adviſes with others.

℣. 21. He that delicately bringeth up his ſervant from a child, &c.] In a very tender and affluent way; uſes him with great familiarity; makes him ſit at table with him, feeds him with dainties, and clothes him in the moſt handſome manner, as if he was one of his own children: ſhall have him become his ſon at the length; he will expect to be uſed as a ſon; he will not care to do any ſervile work, or any thing, eſpecially that is hard and laborious; he will be for ſupplanting the ſon and heir, and think to inherit all himſelf; or however, become proud, haughty and ſaucy. Jarchi interprets this of the evil imagination, or the corruption of nature, which is in a man from a child; which, if cheriſhed and not ſubdued, will in the iſſue rule over a man: and ſome apply it to the body; which, if delicately pampered, and not kept under, will be maſter of the ſoul, inſtead of ſervant to it, and its members be inſtruments of unrighteouſneſs.

℣. 22. An angry man ſtirreth up ſtrife, &c.] In families, neighbourhoods, communities, churches and commonwealths; that is, one that is given to anger, and gives way to it, in whom it prevails and rules. And a furious man aboundeth in tranſgreſſion; or, a maſter of wrath or fury[y]; one much addicted to it: or, the huſband of wrath; wedded to it, as a man to his wife: or, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, who is eaſy to be angry; is eaſily provoked, wrath riſes up in him at once; this leads him on to many ſins, as curſing, ſwearing, murder, &c.

℣. 23. A man's pride ſhall bring him low, &c.] As the pride of Adam, in affecting to be as gods, knowing good and evil; he loſt the image of God; was brought into a ſtate of darkneſs and ignorance, into debt and to a dunghil, to beggary and rags; filled with loathſome diſeaſes, and left in thraldom and bondage to ſin and Satan; and ſo all his poſterity were brought into the ſame low eſtate. This might be exemplified in particular perſons, in Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Herod, and others; and as will be in that monſter of pride, the man of ſin and Antichriſt; who will be humbled and brought low in the midſt of his pride and boaſting, Rev. xviii. 7, 8. But honour ſhall uphold the humble in ſpirit; not who are humble in appearance only, or merely in words, having a ſhew of humility, a voluntary and affected one; but really in their hearts; whoſe ſpirits are humble and contrite; who are ſo in ſpiritual things, and are made ſo by the Spirit of God: they are ſuch who are truly ſenſible of ſin; of their folly, and want of ſpiritual knowledge; of their impotence, and weakneſs to do any thing that is ſpiritually good; of their ſpiritual poverty, and want of righteouſneſs; who ſee that ſalvation is all of grace; and that whatever they have, is owing to the grace of God; that they are deficient in all their duties, and theſe inſufficient to juſtify them before God; who ſubmit to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and give all the glory of ſalvation to the grace of God. Theſe, as they are honourable, being cloathed with humility, which is itſelf an ornament of great price; ſo they are honoured with more grace from the Lord; they are beautified with the garments of ſalvation; they have the honour to have the ſpiritual and gracious preſence of God, and fellowſhip with him, who dwells with ſuch as are of an humble ſpirit: theſe are the meek and lowly, that ſhall inherit the new earth, and reign as kings with Chriſt in it; and the poor in ſpirit, to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs: and this honour is durable, they ſhall always abide in it; the grace they have, which makes them glorious, ſprings up unto eternal life; and the glory they ſhall have, is an eternal weight of glory, a crown of glory that fadeth not away: for ſo the words may be rendered, the humble in ſpirit ſhall lay hold on glory[z] or honour; poſſeſs it and enjoy it: or rather, ſhall retain[a] it; ſhall hold it faſt, as the word is tranſlated in chap. iii. 18. and xi. 16. The ſum of the proverb, in both parts, is the ſame with the words of Chriſt, often uſed by him, Matt. xxiii. 12. Luke xiv. 11. and xviii. 14.

℣. 24. Whoſo is partner with a thief, &c.] That robs and ſteals, and takes away another man's property; which to do is ſinful and contrary to the law of God, and puniſhable by it; and ſo it is to join with him in the theft, or to deviſe, or conſent unto it; or to receive the ſtolen goods, or to hide and conceal them; or to hide the thief, or the theft, and not declare them; ſee Pſalm l. 18. Iſa. i. 23. Such an one hateth his own ſoul; that is, he is not careful of it, he is not concerned for its welfare as he ſhould be; for otherwiſe no man properly ſpeaking hates his own fleſh or body, and much leſs his ſoul; but he is negligent of the good of it, and for the ſake of the mammon of unrighteouſneſs runs the riſk of the ruin of it; by which he ſhews that he loves the world more than his own ſoul; when the profit of the whole world is nothing to the ſoul of man, Matt. xvi. 26. ſee chap. viii. 36. He heareth curſing, and bewrayeth it not; or does not declare it[b]; he heareth the curſing of thoſe that have loſt their goods, and yet he does not declare where they are, and who is the author of the theft, though he knows; or being ſuſpected of being concerned in it, or at leaſt of knowing who did it, he is had before a civil magiſtrate, and an oath is given him, which he takes, and yet he conceals the matter; which is an aggravation of his ſin, and brings ruin to his ſoul. So the Targum, "an oath is determined (or brought to him) and he confeſſeth "not." Some underſtand this of a diſtinct evil, of hearing curſing and ſwearing, and taking the name of God in vain, and blaſphemy againſt him; yet through fear of incurring the diſpleaſure of men, and being reckoned a buſy body, or thro' indifference and want of zeal for the glory of God, do not diſcover it, or inform of it, to a proper perſon for the puniſhment of ſuch; ſee Lev. v. 1. and render the words[c], as he that is partner with a thief, hateth his own ſoul; ſo he that heareth curſing, and bewrayeth it not.

℣. 25. The fear of man bringeth a ſnare, &c.] Either that which is ſubjectively in man; not a divine fear, or the fear of God, that grace which is put into the heart, for that leads to no ſnare, but tends to life; but a human fear, a ſervile one, a diſtruſt of the power and providence, grace and goodneſs of God, which has torment in it; which brings into bondage, and into many diſtreſſes and difficulties, and is oppoſed to truſt in the Lord: or objectively, which has man for its object; a fear of loſing the favour and friendſhip of men, of not having honour and applauſe from them; and a fear of their reproaches and reviling; of the wrath of men, of perſecution from them, and of ſufferings by them, even death itſelf; which has been ſometimes a ſnare to miniſters of the word, to drop or conceal ſome truths of it; and to profeſſors of religion, not to embrace, own, and profeſs them; as many through fear of the Jews would not profeſs Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, though they knew he was, John vii. 13. and ix. 21. and xii. 42, 43. yea ſuch a fear has been a ſnare to the beſt of men, and leads into temptation and ſin; as particularly Abraham and Peter, Gen. xii. 12, 13. and xx. 11. Matt. xxvi. 69—74. But whoſo putteth his truſt in the Lord

Lord ſhall be ſafe; that truſts in the Lord as the God of nature and providence, and the God of all grace for all mercies, ſpiritual, temporal, and eternal, and leaves himſelf and caſe with him; ſuch an one is ſafe from men and the fear of them, and from ſnares and temptations, and ſin and miſchief, which come by them: or ſhall be lifted up on high[d]; he is upon a high rock, firm and ſure; he dwells on high, his place of defence is the munition of rocks; he is in an high tower which is impregnable, in a city of refuge where he is ſafe; he is as immoveable as mount Zion; he is above the fear of man or danger from him; he is out of the reach of all his enemies, men or devils; ſee chap. xviii. 10.

℣. 26. Many ſeek the ruler's favour, &c.] Or face[e]; are very deſirous of being admitted into his preſence, and of having his company and converſation; of having an opportunity to aſk a favour of him, and of receiving honour from him, and of gaining him on their ſide, to take their part in a cauſe depending; ſee chap. xix. 6. But every man's judgement cometh from the Lord; who has the hearts of kings and rulers in his hand, and directs them in beſtowing their favours, and in determining cauſes; ſo that all things are ultimately from the Lord; and therefore it is beſt to ſeek unto him and truſt in him: or the ſtate and condition and circumſtances of men as to riches and honour and the like, are all from the Lord, according as he ſees fit; who ſets up one and pulls down another, according to his pleaſure.

℣. 27. An unjuſt man is an abomination to the juſt, &c.] Not his perſon but his actions, his unrighteous actions, his ungodly life and converſation; which a man holy, juſt and good, loaths and abhors, and cannot forbear expreſſing his abhorrence of; and therefore ſhuns his company, and will have no fellowſhip with him. And on the other hand, he that is upright in the way is abomination to the wicked; that man that is upright in heart and life, that walks according to the rule of the divine word, in the path of holineſs, in the way of truth and righteouſneſs, he is abhorred by a wicked man; he cannot have any pleaſure in his company; he is under ſome awe and reſtraint which is diſagreeable to him; and he cannot bear the reproofs he gives him; beſides if he is ſilent, his whole life and converſation carries in it a tacit reproof, conviction, and condemnation of him. There always has been a mutual enmity between the ſeed of the woman and the ſeed of the ſerpent, Gen. iii. 15.

CHAP. XXX.

℣. 1. THE words of Agur the ſon of Jakeh, &c.] Here begins, according to Aben Ezra, the fourth part of this book; though according to others it is the fifth; ſee the note on chap. xxii. 17. Who this Agur was is a matter of doubt; ſome of the Jewiſh writers, as Jarchi and Gerſom, and likewiſe ſome chriſtian writers[f], take him to be Solomon himſelf, who calls himſelf Agur, which is ſaid to ſignify a gatherer; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, the words of the gatherer, the ſon of the vomiter; juſt as he calls himſelf Koheleth, or the caller, or preacher, Eccl. i. 1, 12. The reaſon given of this name is, becauſe he gathered wiſdom and the law[g]; or as Jarchi, he gathered wiſdom and vomited it; that is, delivered it out to others; ſo he did, he ſought after and attained to more wiſdom than any before him, for he was wiſer than all men; and it may be added, that he gathered ſilver and gold, and the treaſure of kings, and increaſed in riches more than any before him, Eccl. i. 13, 16. and ii. 8. But then all this does not agree with the perſon whoſe words theſe are; for he ſpeaks of himſelf as being very ignorant, and as not having learned wiſdom, ℣. 2, 3. and deſires neither poverty nor riches, ℣. 8. beſides the word Agur ſignifies not a gatherer, but gathered, as Hillerus[h] renders it; and ſo Cocceius, who thinks alſo that Solomon is meant, yet not for the above reaſons, but tranſlates the clauſe thus, the words of the recollected ſon of the obedient; as if it deſcribed Solomon the ſon of David, the obedient one, the man after God's own heart, when he was reſtored by repentance; but it ſeems better, with Aben Ezra, to underſtand this of ſome very good, knowing and worthy man, who lived in thoſe times, either before the times of Solomon, or in the ſame, whoſe pithy ſayings and ſentences he had a great regard for, and joined them to his own; or who lived in the times of Hezekiah, or before, whoſe proverbs were collected by his men, and added to thoſe of Solomon's they had copied in the preceding chapters; ſee chap. xxv. 1. Even the prophecy; or burden[i], as many of the prophecies are called; it deſigns ſomething received from the Lord, taken up and carried to others; ſo Balaam is ſaid to take up his parable, Numb. xxiii. 7. Here it does not deſign a prediction of future events, unleſs it can be thought that there is in the following words a prophecy of the Meſſiah; but an inſtruction, a declaration of things uſeful and profitable; ſo preaching in the New Teſtament is called propheſying often, 1 Cor. xiv. 1, 3, 4. This is a part of the word of God, of the prophecy which came not by the will of man but by the inſpiration of God, 2 Pet. i. 19—21. which prophecy the man ſpake, this excellent good man Agur, who was divinely inſpired; ſee Numb. xxiv. 3. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Unto Ithiel, even unto Ithiel and Ucal; who were either the children of Agur, whom he inſtructed in the knowledge of divine things; or they were, as Aben Ezra, either his companions with whom he converſed about ſacred things, or his diſciples who enquired of him about theſe things, and learned them of him. Some think[k] theſe are titles of God himſelf, to whom Agur directs his ſpeech, and acknowledges his ignorance of the divine Being, whom he might juſtly call Ithiel and Ucal, that is, God with me, and the mighty One; and certain it is that Agur does direct a prayer to God, ℣. 7—9. And ſome read theſe words themſelves as a prayer, let God be with me, and I ſhall prevail[l], that is, over all mine enemies; for if God is on the ſide of his people who ſhall be againſt them? or I ſhall be be able to do all things through the Lord's ſtrength, Rom. viii. 31. Phil. iv. 13. But I rather think the words ſhould be read, as Jarchi obſerves, concerning Ithiel and Ucal[m]; that is, concerning the Meſſiah, to whom theſe names agree. Ithiel, or God with me, is very ſimilar to a phraſe uſed by Chriſt himſelf in the days of his fleſh, John viii. 29. and xvi. 32. God was with him as the eternal Word, and his only begotten Son from all eternity, which denotes his co-exiſtence, nearneſs of union, equality of nature, and diſtinction of perſons; he was with him as Mediator before the world began, in the council of peace, which was between them both; in the covenant of grace made with him, in which all things were agreed upon reſpecting the ſalvation of his people; he was with him in the beginning of time down to his incarnation; he was with him in the creation of all things, in the ſuſtentation of them; in the works of providence, and in the government of the church; he was with him during his ſtate of humiliation; in his infancy, to protect him from the malice of Herod; he was with him when diſputing with the doctors in the temple, to direct him; he was with him at his baptiſm, transfiguration, and other times; he was with him throughout his public miniſtry, from the beginning to the end of it; he did good and healed all manner of diſeaſes, and wrought amazing miracles, God being with him, John iii. 2. Acts x. 38. and he was with him in his ſufferings and at his death; and ſo he is with him in his exalted ſtate; he raiſed him from the dead, ſet him at his own right hand, and ever attends to his prevalent interceſſion; and will be with him in raiſing the dead and judging the world. Ucal, which has the ſignification of being able, ſtrong, mighty, and powerful, agrees with Chriſt, who is the mighty God, the moſt mighty, the almighty; and which appears by the works he did before his incarnation, as the creation of all things out of nothing, the preſervation of all things, and the ſeveral wonderful events in which he was concerned, as the confuſion of languages, the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, the conducting the children of Iſrael through the wilderneſs, with others; alſo what he did when here on earth, the mighty works and miracles done by him, and eſpecially the great work of man's redemption, and alſo the raiſing of himſelf from the dead: moreover what he now does and will do for his people, ſhew him to be the mighty One; taking the care of all the churches and providing for them; ſupplying all the wants of his people, bearing all their burdens, ſupporting them under all their temptations, and delivering them out of them; ſtrengthening them for his ſervice, protecting them from their enemies, keeping them from falling, raiſing their dead bodies, and bringing all the ſons of God to glory: or if the word ſhould be rendered, as it may, eaten or conſumed[n], it is true of Chriſt, whoſe zeal eat him up, Pſal. lxix. 9. and who is the antitype of the ſacrifice conſumed by fire.

ỳ. 2. Surely I am more brutiſh than any man, &c.] Every man is become brutiſh in his knowledge; man in his original ſtate was a knowing creature, but ſinning loſt his knowledge, and became like the beaſts that periſh; hence we read of the brutiſh among the people: but Agur thought himſelf not only brutiſh among the reſt, but more brutiſh than any. So Plato[o] ſays of ſome ſouls living on earth, that they are θηριώδεις, of a brutiſh nature; ſee Jer. x. 14. Pſal. xlix. 20. and xciv. 8. Or I think the words may be rendered, a brute am I rather than a man[p]; have more of the brute than of the man, eſpecially in the ſight and preſence of God; a very beaſt before him, or in compariſon of other wiſe, holy, and good men; or with reſpect to the knowledge of ſpiritual, divine, and heavenly things, Pſal. lxxiii. 22. or a brute was I from the time, or ever ſince I was a man[q]; as ſoon as he was born, being born in ſin and like a wild aſs's colt, Job xi. 12. And have not the underſtanding of a man; or of Adam[r]; who was made after the image of God, which conſiſted in knowledge as well as holineſs; who knew much of God, his nature, perfections, and perſons; of the creatures, and the works of his hands, and of all things in nature; but affecting more knowledge than he ſhould, loſt in a great meaſure what he had, and brought his poſterity in and left them in a ſtate of blindneſs and ignorance, one of whoſe ſons Agur was: or his meaning is, that he had not the underſtanding, as not of Adam in innocence, and of prophets and other eminent men of God, ſo not of ordinary men, of thoſe who had the leaſt ſhare of the knowledge of divine things. Aben Ezra, who takes Ithiel and Ucal to be ſcholars or companions of Agur, ſuppoſes, that they aſked him queſtions concerning the divine Being, nature and perfections, to which he anſwers in this ſtrain; ſhewing his inſufficiency to give them any inſtruction or ſatisfaction in ſuch matters, or to diſcourſe on ſuch ſublime ſubjects: or rather his view was to ſhew the blindneſs and ignorance of human nature with reſpect to divine things he was about to treat of; and particularly to obſerve, that the knowledge of a Saviour, and ſalvation by him, were not from nature, and attainable by that; and that a man muſt firſt know himſelf, his own folly and ignorance, before he can have any true knowledge of Ithiel and Ucal, the mighty Saviour and Redeemer; of the need of him, and of intereſt in him. Some think his view is to prove that his words, his prophecy, or what he was about to ſay, or did ſay, muſt be owing entirely to divine inſpiration; ſince he was of himſelf, and without a divine revelation, ſo very blind, dark, and ignorant; it could not be owing to any natural ſagacity of his, who was more brutiſh than any; nor to any acquired knowledge, or the inſtruction of men, ſince he had none, as follows; and ſo כי with which the words begin, may be rendered for or becauſe[s], as it uſually is, for I am more brutiſh than any man, &c.

ỳ. 3. I neither learned wiſdom, &c.] Natural wiſdom or philoſophy, ſo as to underſtand the nature of things, and reaſon about them in a philoſophical manner; or political wiſdom, ſo as to know how to govern ſtates, and manage the affairs of kingdoms; or in a lower ſphere, to tranſact the affairs of life to any peculiar advantage; he had not a polite or liberal education: or ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom; that is, not of himſelf, through the mere ſtrength and force of his genius and natural capacity, or of others; he was not the ſon of a prophet, nor brought up in the ſchools of the prophets; he did not learn it, nor was he taught it by men; for this is not acquired by human teaching; it is what comes from above, from heaven, and by the revelation of God. Nor have the knowledge of the Holy; or Holies [s]; either of holy perſons, ſuch knowledge as holy men of God had; or of the holy angels, not of their nature, capacities, influence, and operations; nor ſuch as they have: or rather of the holy perſons in the Trinity, Father, Son, and Spirit; their nature, modes of ſubſiſting, perfections, purpoſes, and the like; at leaſt not a full and comprehenſive one: or of holy things, of the holy ſcriptures, and the holy doctrines of them; however not what is perfect and complete. It may be rendered, but I have the knowledge of the holy [t]; though he had not the advantage of human literature, nor had ever been under the inſtructions of men on one account or another, and therefore what he knew, or was about to diſcourſe of, was from God. Some underſtand this and the preceding verſe of Ithiel, or Chriſt [u], as in the eſteem of men, 1 Cor. i. 23. John vii. 15.

℣. 4. Who hath aſcended up into heaven, or deſcended? &c.] That has been thither to fetch knowledge of God and divine things, and has returned to communicate it. Enoch was taken up to heaven before this time; and Elijah, as is very probable, after; but neither of them returned again, to inform mortals what was to be ſeen, known, and enjoyed there: ſince, the apoſtle Paul was caught up into the third heaven, and came back again; but then the things he heard were ſuch as it was not lawful for a man to utter: and indeed, ſince the coming of Chriſt, there is no need of any further revelation to be made, nor of any ſuch expedition, in order to obtain it, Rom. x. 6—8. And, properly ſpeaking, there never was any beſides him, whoſe names are Ithiel and Ucal, that ever did this: he lay in the boſom of the Father, and was privy to his whole mind and will; he deſcended from heaven to earth, not by local motion, but by aſſumption of nature; and when he had made known his Father's will, and done his work, he aſcended far above all heavens, and received gifts for men; to fill his churches and miniſters with them, in order to communicate and improve ſpiritual and divine knowledge; and therefore, with great propriety and pertinence, he applies theſe words to himſelf, John iii. 13. Who hath gathered the wind in his fiſts? not any mere creature; not any man or ſet of men; it is not in the power of any, either men or angels, to reſtrain or let looſe the winds at pleaſure; nor has Satan, though called the prince of the power of the air, that is, of the devils in the air, any ſuch command of them; none but he that made them, can command them to blow, or be ſtill; even he who brings them out of his treaſures, and his own Son, whom the wind and ſeas obeyed; ſee Pſal. cxxxv. 7. Matt. viii. 26, 27. and xiv. 32. The heathens [w] themſelves are ſo ſenſible of this, that the power of the winds only belongs to God, that they have framed a deity, they call Æolus; whom the ſupreme Being has made a kind of ſteward or ſtore-keeper of the winds, and given him a power to ſtill or raiſe them as he pleaſes [x]. Who hath bound the waters in a garment? either the waters above, which are bound in the thick clouds, as in a garment, which hold them from pouring out; or the waters of the ſea, which are as eaſily managed by the Lord, as an infant by its parent, and is wrapped about with a ſwadling band, Job xxvi. 8. and xxxviii. 8, 9. But can any creature do this? none but the mighty God; and his almighty Son, the Ithiel and Ucal, who clothes the heavens with blackneſs, and makes ſackcloth their covering; even he who is the Redeemer of his people, and has the tongue of the learned, to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to them, Iſa. l. 2—4. Who hath eſtabliſhed all the ends of the earth? fixed the boundaries of the ſeveral parts of the world, Europe, Aſia, Africa and America, and the ſeveral countries in them? ſettled the foundations of the earth, and ſecured the banks and borders of it from the raging of the ſea? None but theſe next mentioned; ſee Job xxxviii. 4, 5. What is his name, and what is his ſon's name, if thou canſt tell? if thou ſayeſt, it is a mere man that does all theſe things, tell his name; or if he be dead, ſay what is the name of his ſon, or of any of his family; ſo Jarchi and others interpret it: or rather, ſince it is the Lord alone, and his own proper Son, to whom theſe things can be aſcribed, ſay what is his name; that is, his nature and perfections, which are incomprehenſible and ineffable; otherwiſe he is known by his name Jehovah, and eſpecially as his name is proclaimed in Chriſt, and manifeſted by him and in his goſpel: and ſeeing he has a Son of the ſame nature with him, and poſſeſſed of the ſame perfections, co-eſſential and coexiſtent, and every way equal to him, and a diſtinct perſon from him, ſay what is his nature and perfections alſo; declare his generation, and the manner of it; his divine filiation, and in what claſs it is; things which are out of the reach of human capacity, and not to be expreſſed by the tongue of men and angels; ſee Matt. xi. 27. and xvi. 15—17. Otherwiſe, though his name for a while was a ſecret, and he was only called the ſeed of the woman and of Abraham, Gen. iii. 15. and xxii. 18. and xxxii. 29. Judges xiii. 17, 18. yet he had many names given him under the Old Teſtament; as Shiloh, Immanuel, the Wonderful, Counſellor, the mighty God, the everlaſting Father, and Prince of peace; the Lord our righteouſneſs, and the Man, the Branch: and under the New Teſtament, Jeſus the Saviour, Chriſt the anointed; the Head of the church, the Judge of the world; the Word of God, and King of kings, and Lord of lords. This ſcripture is a proof of Chriſt's being the eternal Son of God; of his equality with his divine Father as ſuch, their name and nature being alike ineffable; of his co-exiſtence with his Father as ſuch; and of his omnipreſence and omnipotence, expreſſed by the phraſes here uſed of aſcending, &c. and of his diſtinct perſonality from the Father; the ſame queſtion being diſtinctly put of him, as of the Father. Some render the laſt clauſe, doſt thou know [y]? thou doſt not know God and his Son; their being and perfections are not to be known by the light of nature, only by revelation, and but imperfectly.

℣. 5. Every word of God is pure, &c.] The whole word of God. All ſcripture, given by inſpiration of God, to which Agur directs, as giving the beſt account of God, of his name, nature and perfections; of his Son, perſon, offices and grace; being pure, very pure, purified [z] like ſilver, purified in a furnace of earth. The whole of ſcripture is pure, free from all falſhood and error; coming from the God of truth, who cannot lie, and therefore called the ſcriptures of truth: every promiſe is pure as well as precious, made without diſſimulation, faithfully performed, and all yea and amen in Chriſt; every doctrine is pure, free from the mixtures and inventions of men; the ſincere milk of the word; conſiſtent and all of a piece, not yea and nay; and tending to promote purity of heart and life; wholſome words, and doctrines according to godlineſs; ſee Pſal. xii. 6. and xviii. 30. and cxix. 140. He is a ſhield unto them that put their truſt in him; not the word, but God, whoſe the word is; and which repreſents him as a proper object of truſt, both with reſpect to things temporal and ſpiritual, at all times; and as a ſhield to protect ſuch, by his power and grace, from all their enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world, and alſo from all errors and falſe doctrines; ſee Pſal. iii. 3. and v. 12. and xviii. 35. and lxxxiv. 9, 11, 12.

℣. 6. Add thou not unto his words, &c.] To the words of God; as the Jews did, by joining their oral law, or the traditions of the elders, to the written word, and preferring them before it; and as the Papiſts, by making their unwritten traditions, and the ſenſe and determinations of their church, equal to the ſcriptures; and as all enthuſiaſts do, who ſet up their pretended dreams, viſions, revelations and prophecies, upon a foot with the word of God, or as ſuperior to it; whereas that is, and that only, the rule and ſtandard of faith and practice, and is a ſufficient and perfect one; ſee Deut. iv. 2. Leſt he reprove thee; that is, God; either by words or by blows, by threatnings and denunciations of his wrath and diſpleaſure; or by chaſtiſements and corrections for ſuch daring pride, blaſphemy and wickedneſs; thoſe who add to his words, he threatens to add plagues unto them, Rev. xxii. 18. And thou be found a liar; a forger, ſpeaker and ſpreader of doctrinal lies, ſuch doctrines as are contrary to the word of truth; not being built on that, but upon human inventions, and additions to it.

℣. 7. Two things have I required of thee, &c.] Or, have aſked of thee [a], O God; as may be ſupplied, for the words are addreſſed to him. The following is a prayer made unto him, which contains the two requeſts here referred to; his requeſts are not many, his words are few; he did not make long prayers, or expect to be heard for much ſpeaking. Deny me them not before I die; not that he thought he was near his end; nor is it his ſenſe that he deſired ſome time or other, at leaſt before he died, that he might have theſe two requeſts granted him after mentioned; for what are poverty and riches, or convenient food, to a man juſt dying? but his meaning is, that he might be thus favoured as long as he lived; that all the while he was in the world, he might be kept from ſin, and be free from anxious, worldly thoughts and cares, having a moderate competency of good things: faith in prayer will have no denial; a wreſtling Jacob will not let the angel go without a bleſſing; importunity in prayer gets much from the hands of God; the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much, James v. 16.

℣. 8. Remove far from me vanity and lies, &c.] This is the firſt requeſt, to be preſerved from ſin in general; which is a vain, lying, and deceitful thing; promiſing pleaſure, profit, liberty and impunity, which it does not give. Agur deſires to have vain thoughts removed out of his mind, vain words from his mouth, and vain actions from his life and converſation; to have his eyes turned from beholding vanity, and his feet from walking in it; and his affections taken off from the vain things of the world, the luſts, pleaſures, profits and honours of it; as well as to be kept from all errors and falſe doctrines, which are lies in hypocriſy; with which men that lie in wait to deceive, would, if it were poſſible, deceive the very elect: Agur, conſcious of his own weakneſs, and proneneſs to evil, deſires the Lord would not lead him into temptation, but deliver him from all evil, doctrinal and practical. Some underſtand this of the forgiveneſs of ſin; which is ſometimes expreſſed by a putting or removing it away, 2 Sam. vii. 13. Pſal. ciii. 12. Give me neither poverty nor riches; this is the ſecond requeſt, not to be extremely poor nor over-rich; but to be in a middle ſtate between both, neither rich nor poor; which Horace [b] calls the golden mean, and which Agur wiſely judged to be the happieſt ſtate; moſt free from care, leaſt liable to temptation, and the beſt ſituation to ſerve the Lord in: a like wiſh was made by Theognis [c], "I neither love to be rich, nor deſire it; but to "live on a little, having no evil;" ſo Martial [d]. Both riches and poverty are of God; men are rich or poor, as the Lord pleaſes; he ſuffers poverty in ſome, and gives riches to others: Agur deprecates both, as having their ſeparate, peculiar ſnares and temptations; though no doubt this requeſt was made with ſubmiſſion to the will of God; and not as conſidering either of them as evils in themſelves, but as they might be attended with bad conſequences, and what is next mentioned being more eligible. Feed me with food convenient for me; not merely what was agreeable to his palate, ſuitable to his conſtitution, and ſufficient for nature; nor for him perſonally, but for his family alſo; and what was proper and ſuitable to the condition and circumſtances in which he was, and to the rank and quality he held, whether in a more private or in a more public capacity. Some render it, the food of my allowance [e]; what is allotted and appointed for me. It ſeems to be the ſame which Job calls, his neceſſary food; and Chriſt, our daily bread: it takes in both food and raiment, which having, men ſhould be contented with; ſee Job xxiii. 12. Matt. vi. 11. 1 Tim. vi. 8. The alluſion ſeems to be to the ſtated meaſure of food, allowed to ſervants by the day, or rather by the month, called demenſum, and which was but ſmall and ſcanty [f]; yet with this Agur could be content.

℣. 9. Leſt I be full, and deny thee, &c.] This is the dangerous conſequence of riches, and the temptation they expoſe men unto; who, being full of the things of this world, are tempted to deny the Lord; not his being and perfections directly, but chiefly his providence; to deny that what they have, they have received of him, but attribute it to their own care, diligence and induſtry; and now think they can live without him, without any dependence on his providence, having a large affluence of the things of life: yea, they may be ſaid to deny him, when they forget the bounties of his providence; are not thankful to him for them; that flatter themſelves with a continuance of them, without any regard to him, as if he had no concern in the affairs of life; ſee Deut. xxxii. 15. And ſay, Who is the Lord? as Pharaoh did, Exod. v. 2. I am not obliged to him; I can live without him, I have enough of my own. Or leſt I be poor, and ſteal, and take the name of my God in vain; this is the ſnare that attends poverty: men, for want of food and raiment, are tempted to ſteal from their neighbours, which is a ſin againſt the law of God, the eighth command; and then to cover the theft, when an oath is offered to purge them from the charge and ſuſpicion of it, they take it, and ſo are guilty of falſe ſwearing, or taking the name of God not only in vain but falſly, and ſo become guilty of the breach of the third command. Agur, a good man, is deſirous he might not be expoſed to temptations to ſuch evils, and eſpecially which ſo affected the honour and glory of God.

℣. 10. Accuſe not a ſervant unto his maſter, &c.] Wrongly, raſhly, and without any foundation, nor for any trifling thing; unleſs it be in a caſe of moment and importance, when his maſter's buſineſs is ſadly neglected, or he is injured in his property by him: eſpecially care ſhould be taken not to calumniate a ſervant, to abuſe him with the tongue, as the word [g] ſignifies; the circumſtance he is in, ſhould be conſidered, as a ſervant; and how ſevere maſters are apt to be towards them, and therefore little matters ſhould be hid from them; and much leſs ſhould they be aggravated, and leaſt of all, ſhould falſhoods be told of them. So Doeg the Edomite accuſed David to Saul, and the Phariſees accuſed the diſciples of Chriſt to their Maſter, 1 Sam. xxii. 9. Matt. xv. 2. the apoſtle's advice is good, and agrees with Agur's, Rom. xiv. 4. Leſt he curſe thee, and thou be found guilty; or, and thou ſhouldſt ſin [h]; that is, afterwards; and ſo the curſe come upon thee he has wiſhed for: or the ſenſe is, leſt he ſhould curſe thee before men, and hurt thy character and reputation; or imprecate a curſe from the Lord, which he may ſuffer to come upon thee for ſin. Aben Ezra interprets this of a ſervant, that flies from heathen countries to the land of Iſrael, to be made a proſelyte of; who ſhould not be diſcovered and returned to his old maſter.

℣. 11. There is a generation that curſeth their father, &c.] A ſort of men that neither fear God, nor regard men; and are ſo inhuman, as to be without natural affections to their parents; have no reverence of them, love to them, nor give them any honour or obedience; ſo far from it, that they curſe their father that begot them; imprecate on him all the evils in life they can think of, and wiſh him out of the world. And doth not bleſs their mother; cannot give her a good word, who bore them, and brought them up in the moſt tender and indulgent manner; yea, ſo unnatural as to curſe her alſo, for that is intended by this way of ſpeaking; ſee ℣. 17.

℣. 12. There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, &c.] Not in the eyes of God, who ſees the heart, and all the impurities of it, as well as of life and converſation; nor in the eyes of others, though ſuch may appear outwardly righteous before men; but in their own eyes, in their own conceit and imagination, truſting in themſelves that they are righteous: but ſuch have not their eyes opened or enlightened to ſee the plague of their own hearts, the ſpirituality of the law of God, the perfection of righteouſneſs that requires; nor the righteouſneſs and holineſs of God himſelf; nor the imperfection and inſufficiency of their own; did they, they would not ſeem pure and righteous to themſelves. No man is pure by nature, or through any thing done by them; but by the grace of God, and through the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and ſuch are far from being pure in their own eyes, or as conſidered in themſelves: but thoſe who are pure, neither by nature nor by grace, yet think they are ſo. There were ſome ſuch in Agur's time, and ſuch were the Scribes and Phariſees in Chriſt's time; there were a generation of them; and there are of the ſame ſort in our days, as Papiſts, Perfectioniſts, and all ſelf-juſticiaries; ſee Luke xviii. 9. And yet is not waſhed from their filthineſs; their native, original, and univerſal pollution by ſin, they have from their birth, and which is increaſed by numerous actual tranſgreſſions; and from which none are or can be waſhed, but thoſe who are born of water and of the Spirit, or are waſhed with the waſhing of regeneration; and are waſhed from their ſins in the blood of the Lamb, whoſe blood cleanſes from all ſin; and are arrayed with the fine linen, clean and white, the righteouſneſs of the ſaints, which is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them: whatſoever is ſhort of theſe, leaves men unwaſhed from their filthineſs, whatever opinion they may have of themſelves; ſee Job ix. 30, 31. Jer. ii. 22.

℣. 13. There is a generation; O how lofty are their eyes! and their eye-lids are lifted up.] Above others, on whom they look with ſcorn and contempt; as thoſe do who have more riches than others, and boaſt of them; they deſpiſe their poor neighbours, and diſdain to look upon them: and ſuch alſo who have more knowledge and wiſdom than others, or at leaſt think ſo; they are puffed up in their fleſhly minds, and ſay of the illiterate or leſs knowing, as the proud Phariſees did, this people, who knoweth not the law, are curſed: and likewiſe thoſe who fancy themſelves more holy and righteous than others; theſe, in a ſcornful manner, ſay, ſtand by thyſelf, I am holier than thou; and thank God, they are not as other men are, as publicans and ſinners; ſee chap. xix. 4, 7. John vii. 49. Iſa. lxv. 4. Luke xviii. 11, 12. Hence Pliny [i] ſays, that in the eye-brows there is a part of the mind; thoſe eſpecially ſhew haughtineſs; that pride has a receptacle elſewhere, but here it has its ſeat; it is bred in the heart, but here it comes and here it hangs: wherefore Juvenal [k] calls pride and haughtineſs, grande ſupercilium; and proud, haughty perſons are ſaid to be ſupercilious.

℣. 14. There is a generation whoſe teeth are as ſwords, &c.] As ſharp as ſwords; like ſuch the beaſts of prey have; cruel, barbarous and inhuman creatures; ſee Pſal. lvii. 4. And their jaw-teeth as knives; exceeding ſharp and biting: to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men; by their tyranny, oppreſſion and cruelty, to deprive them of the little they have; and even to take away their lives from them, and utterly deſtroy them; of this diſpoſition are all tyrants and perſecutors: ſuch were Rome pagan, compared to a red dragon in the times of the ten heathen perſecutions; and ſuch is Rome papal, ſignified by a beaſt, like a leopard, bear and lion; and which has been drunk with the blood of the ſaints.

℣. 15. The horſe-leach hath two daughters, crying, Give, give, &c.] Or the blood-ſucker [l]; ſo it began to be called in the times of Pliny [m], to which the laſt generation of men may well be compared; blood-thirſty creatures, that never have enough, and are not ſatisfied with the fleſh of men, nor with their blood; and ſuch particularly the Papiſts are: and not only this generation of men, but there are three or four things beſides, which reſemble the horſe-leach for its inſatiableneſs; for the horſe-leach has not two daughters only but more. Some, by her two daughters, underſtand the two forks of its tongue, which ſome naturaliſts ſay it has; tho' later ones, and more diligent enquirers into thoſe things, find it has not; but either with its three teeth, or by the compreſſion of its mouth on all ſides, ſucks the blood, and will not let go until it is filled with it [n]: others have propoſed the two ſorts of leaches as its daughters, the ſea-leach, and that which is found in fenny and marſhy places. But it is beſt, by its daughters, to underſtand ſuch that reſemble it, and are like unto it; as thoſe that are of like nature and quality, and do the ſame things as others, are called their children; ſee Matt. xxiii. 31, 33. John viii. 44. 1 John iii. 10. and ſo the number of its daughters, which are always craving and aſking for more, and are never ſatisfied, are not only two, but more, as follows. There are three things; or, yea there are three things that are never ſatisfied: yea, four things ſay not, It is enough; not two only, but three, and even four, that are quite inſatiable, and are as follow. The Syriac verſion renders the whole thus, "the horſe-"leach hath three beloved daughters; three, I ſay, "they are, which are not ſatisfied; and the fourth "ſays not, It is enough." Some, as Abendana obſerves, interpret it of hell, by a tranſpoſition of the letters; becauſe every one that perverts his ways, deſcends thither. Bochart [o] interprets it of fate, and ſo Noldius [p]: and Schultens renders the word, the moſt monſtrous of evils; it ſignifying in the Arabic language, as he obſerves, any thing monſtrous and dreadful; ſuch as wood-dæmons, ſerpents and dragons, which devour men and beaſts. Suidas [q], by the horſe-leach, underſtands ſin, whoſe daughters are fornication, envy and idolatry, which are never ſatisfied by evil actions, and the fourth is evil concupiſcence.

℣. 16. The grave, &c.] Which is the firſt of the four daughters, or inſatiable things, which reſemble the horſe-leach: the grave is the houſe appointed for all living; it ſtands ready for them, it is open to receive them when dead; and though ſuch multitudes have been put into it, ſince death reigned in the world, yet it is not full, it waits for more; nor will its mouth be ſhut till the laſt enemy, death, is deſtroyed; ſee chap. xxvii. 20. This is an emblem of a covetous man, who enlarges his deſire, as hell or the grave; and is never ſatisfied with gold, ſilver, and increaſe of ſubſtance he has, but is always craving more. And the barren womb; the ſecond daughter, that cries, Give, give, as Rachel, give me children, or I die: barren women are oftentimes impatient for children, as ſhe was; and importunate, as Hannah; and as the Iſraelitiſh women were before the coming of the Meſſiah, each hoping he might be born of them; eſpecially before it was ſo clearly known that he ſhould be born of a virgin: though it may be rather, the barren womb of harlots is here meant, and who are generally barren, and whoſe luſt is inſatiable; and this may be an emblem of luſt, which is never ſatisfied; whether it be a luſt of riches, or of honour, or of uncleanneſs, or of ſenſual pleaſures. The earth that is not filled with water; which is dry and parched, and opens and gapes; and though large quantities of rain may fall upon it, which it greedily drinks in; yet is not ſeen, nor is it filled with it, but it thirſts for more: this may be an emblem of good men, that have received abundance of the grace of God; and though they thirſt not after ſin, as they before did, and others do; yet thirſt after God, more knowledge of him, and communion with him, and for more grace, like the dry and thirſty land, and cannot have enough of it; ſee John iv. 13, 14. Pſal. lxiii. 1, 2. Heb. vi. 7. or rather of wicked men, who drink up iniquity like water, and yet never have their fill of it to their ſatisfaction. This is the third thing, and the fourth follows: And the fire that ſaith not, It is enough; but let what fuel will be caſt into it, it devours it, and ſtill wants more: by the Egyptians, as Herodotus [r] relates, fire is reckoned an animated beaſt, which devours all it can lay hold on; and when it is filled with food, it dies with that which is devoured by it. Such is the fire of divine wrath, hell-fire, in which ſinners are, as thorns and briars; and which is unquenchable, everlaſting, burns for ever and ever; the Tophet, ordained of old, deep and large, the pile thereof is fire and much wood, kindled by the breath of the Lord, like a ſtream of brimſtone, Iſa. xxx. 33. Theſe are the four daughters of the horſe-leach, which reſemble that in its inſatiableneſs. Jarchi makes mention of ſome that interpret the horſe-leach of ſheol, or the ſtate of the dead; and the two daughters, of paradiſe and hell; the one ſays, Give me the righteous; and the other ſays, give me the wicked. Aben Ezra applies theſe four to the four generations before ſpoken of; the grave, into which are caſt the generation of thoſe that curſe their father, and die before their time; the barren womb, the generation of thoſe that are not waſhed from the filthineſs of whoredom, and have no children; the earth not filled with water, the proud and haughty, who are humbled by famine; and the fire is that which deſcends from heaven, to conſume the generation that deſtroy the poor, and oppreſs the needy, as fire came down upon them in the days of Elijah. Jarchi takes notice of a Midraſh, which applies theſe four things to the four monarchies; as it does alſo all the four things after mentioned.

℣. 17. The eye that mocketh at his father, &c.] At his advice, admonitions and inſtructions; looks upon him with ſcorn and diſdain, and treats him as a weak, ſilly, old man: here Agur returns to the firſt generation he had obſerved. And deſpiſeth to obey his mother; her orders and commands: or, the obedience of his mother [s]; her diſcipline and inſtruction, having no regard to it. The word is rendered gathering in Gen. xlix. 10. and Jarchi interprets it of the gathering of wrinkles in her face: and ſo the Targum, Arabic and Syriac verſions render it, the old age of his mother; deſpiſing her as an old, fooliſh woman; ſee chap. xxiii. 22. להק in the Ethiopic language, ſignifies to grow old, from whence the word here uſed, by a tranſpoſition of letters, may be derived; and Mr Caſtell[t] obſerves, that the royal prophet, among others, ſeems to have taken this word from the queen of Sheba. The ravens of the valley ſhall pick it out, and the young eagles ſhall eat it; it ſignifies, that ſuch perſons ſhall come to an untimely end, and an ignominious death; either be drowned in a river, when floating upon it, or caſt upon the banks of it, the ravens that frequent ſuch places, and are moſt cruel and voracious, ſhould feed upon them: or they ſhould be hanged on a tree, or be crucified[u], where birds of prey would light upon them; and particularly pick out their eyes and eat them, as being ſofteſt and ſweeteſt to them; therefore firſt aim at them, and of which birds, and eſpecially ravens, are very fond[w]; and is a juſt retaliation for their ſcornful and diſdainful looks at their parents. This may figuratively deſign the black devils of hell, the poſſe of them in the air, who are ſometimes compared to the fowls thereof; to whom ſuch unnatural and diſobedient children ſhall become a prey; ſee Matt. xiii. 4, 19.

℣. 18. There be three things which are too wonderful for me, &c.] Which were above his reach and comprehenſion; what he could not find out, nor account for, nor ſufficiently admire. Yea, four things which I know not; the way of them; as follows.

℣. 19. The way of an eagle in the air, &c.] And ſo of any other bird; but this is mentioned, becauſe it flies ſwifteſt, and ſoars higheſt: but the way in which it goes is not known, nor can it be ſeen with the eye; it cuts the air, and paſſes through it, but leaves no track behind it, which may be pointed to, and it may be ſaid, that is the way the eagle took and flew towards heaven out of ſight. The way of a ſerpent upon a rock; a ſmooth, hard rock; and wonderful it is, that it ſhould creep up it without legs; and where it leaves no impreſſion, no footſteps, by which it can be traced, as it may in ſoft and ſandy places. The way of a ſhip in the midſt of the ſea; it is marvellous that ſuch a veſſel ſhould be ſupported upon the ſea; that it ſhould weather the ſtorms and tempeſts of it; that it ſhould be ſteered through the trackleſs ocean to diſtant countries; and particularly, though it makes furrows in the waters, and divides the waves; yet theſe quickly cloſe again, and there is no path to be ſeen in which it goes; there is no beaten road made by it, nor by the vaſt numbers which go the ſame way, which a man can ſee with his eyes or follow. And the way of a man with a maid; or, to a maid[x]; the many artful ways and methods he uſes to get into her company, who is kept recluſe; and to convey the ſentiments and affections of his heart unto her, to gain her love to him, and obtain her in an honourable way of marriage; or to decoy and deceive her, and draw her into impure and unlawful embraces: it may deſign the private and ſecret way of committing fornication with her; which ſenſe ſeems to be confirmed by the following verſe. Some of the ancients, particularly Ambroſe[y], interpreted the whole of this verſe of Chriſt: The way of an eagle in the air, of his aſcenſion to heaven, with men his prey, taken out of the jaws of the enemy; and which is ſuch, as is beyond the comprehenſion of men, that one of ſo great majeſty ſhould vouchſafe to come down from heaven, or aſcend thither: the way of a ſerpent upon a rock, he underſtands of the temptations of Satan, the old ſerpent, with which he attacked Chriſt, the rock; but could imprint no footſteps of his malice and wickedneſs on him; could find nothing in him to work upon, nor leave any ſign behind him, as upon Adam: the way of a ſhip in the midſt of the ſea, he interprets of the church; which, though diſtreſſed with ſtorms and tempeſts of perſecution and falſe doctrine, yet cannot ſuffer ſhipwreck, Chriſt being in it: and the laſt clauſe he renders, as the Vulgate Latin verſion does, and the way of a man in youth; which he explains of the journies which Chriſt took, and the ways of virtue he purſued, to do good to the bodies and ſouls of men, which are ſo many as not to be numbered. But it may be better interpreted of the wonderful incarnation of Chriſt, his conception, and birth of a virgin; which was a new and unheard-of thing, and the way and manner of it quite inſcrutable, and more hard and difficult to be underſtood than any of the reſt; for the words may be rendered, the way of a man in a maid or virgin; that is, the conception of Geber, the mighty Man, in the virgin; ſee Jer. xxxi. 22. Guſſetius[z] gives the myſtical ſenſe of the whole, as referring to the aſcenſion of Chriſt; his coming out of the ſtony grave; his converſation among the people, like the tumultuous waves; and his incarnation of a virgin.

℣. 20. Such is the way of an adulterous woman, &c.] It is equally unknown, as the way of a man with a maid; it is difficult to detect her, ſhe takes ſo much care and caution, and uſes ſo many artful methods to conceal her wickedneſs from her huſband; though ſhe lives in adultery, it is in a moſt private manner, and carried on ſo ſecretly and artfully that ſhe is not eaſily diſcovered. She eateth, and wipeth her mouth; like one that eats what he ſhould not, wipes his mouth that it might not be known or ſuſpected he had eat any thing; ſo ſuch an adultereſs commits the ſin of adultery; and when ſhe has done looks as grave and demure, and carries it ſo to her huſband and all her friends, as if ſhe was the chaſteſt perſon upon earth. The alluſion may be to harlots, who after an impure congreſs uſed to waſh themſelves[a], and had ſervants to wait upon them and ſerve them with water, called from hence aquarioli[b]. And ſaith, I have done no wickedneſs; ſhe ſays by her behaviour, by her demure looks; and if ſuſpected and challenged with it utterly denies it. This is an emblem of the antichriſtian whore of Rome, who, though the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth; though guilty of the fouleſt adultery, that is, the groſſeſt idolatry, yet pretends to be the pure and chaſte ſpouſe of Chriſt; and under the guiſe of purity and holineſs, and with all deceivableneſs of unrighteouſneſs, ſeduces the minds of many; ſee Rev. xvii. 1, 5. 2 Theſſ. ii. 10, 11.

℣. 21. For three things the earth is diſquieted, &c.] The inhabitants of it are made very uneaſy. And for for four which it cannot bear; they are a load and burden upon it, and are intolerable to thoſe that dwell on it, and make them very uncomfortable.

℣. 22. For a ſervant, when he reigneth, &c.] Being unfit for it through his education, not having been trained up in and learned the arts of government and maxims of it; and through the diſpoſition of his mind, which is mean, abject, and ſervile; and as he has been uſed himſelf when a ſervant, ſo he will uſe others [c]; and through his circumſtances, being poor, he will take oppreſſive methods to become rich; and being raiſed from a low eſtate, he is the more imperious, proud, and haughty [d]; all which and more make his reign intolerable; ſee chap. xix. 10. and xxviii. 3. This may be applied to Antichriſt, the ſervus ſervorum, who in a haughty, tyrannical, and inſolent manner exalts himſelf above all that is called God; and reigns over the kings of the earth, at leaſt has done ſo, and that in ſuch a manner as was unbearable; depoſing kings at pleaſure, diſpoſing of their kingdoms, and trampling upon their necks, and making their ſubjects his vaſſals; ſee 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. Rev. xvii. 12, 13, 17, 18. And a fool, when he is filled with meat; as Nabal at his feaſt, when he behaved ſo intolerably in his cups towards David and his meſſengers, that he determined on his deſtruction, had not Abigail interpoſed, 1 Sam. xxv. 10, 11, 36. and there are many ſuch fools, who having their bellies full of food, and their heads full of liquor, are very overbearing in company, and give their tongues ſuch a looſe as is very diſturbing: or this may intend ſuch fools, or wicked men, who are full of wealth and riches, and being purſe-proud are exceeding haughty and inſolent; ſet their mouths againſt the heaven, and blaſpheme God that is in it; and their tongues walk through the earth, and ſpare none, but laſh all in an inſufferable manner. Theſe diſquiet families, neighbourhoods, communities, and commonwealths; ſee Pſalm lxxiii. 7—9.

℣. 23. For an odious woman, when ſhe is married, &c.] Odious for her perſon, her uglineſs, and the deformity of her body; or rather for the ill qualities of her mind, which whilſt ſingle, ſhe endeavours to conceal, but being married, hides them no longer; but becomes imperious, proud, ſcornful, and malicious, and behaves in an ill-natured way to her huſband and all about her to ſuch a degree, that there is no bearing the place where ſhe is. And an handmaid, that is heir to her miſtreſs; that has got ſo much into her affections that ſhe leaves all ſhe has to her when ſhe dies, which makes her inſufferably proud and vain; or ſhe marries her maſter after the death of her miſtreſs, and ſo coming into her place enjoys all ſhe had, but only her wiſdom and humility; which being wanting, ſhe behaves in ſuch a manner as to make the whole family uneaſy. This might be exemplified in the caſe of Hagar, the bond-maid of Sarah, a type of thoſe that are under the law of works, and ſeek the inheritance by it; and who truſt in themſelves that they are righteous, and deſpiſe others, Gen. xvi. 4—6. and xxi. 10. Gal. iv. 24—31.

℣. 24. There be four things which are little upon the earth, &c.] Small in bulk, that have little bodies, are the leſſer ſort of animals. But they are exceeding wiſe; ſhew a great deal of art and wiſdom in what they do; or but they are wiſe, made wiſe [e]; by the inſtinct of nature, by the direction of providence, by which they do things that are ſurprizing. Some verſions, that have no regard to the points, read the words, but they are wiſer than the wiſe [f]; than even wiſe men; wiſe men may learn much from the leaſt of creatures; ſee Job xii. 7.

℣. 25. The ants are a people not ſtrong, &c.] Far from it; what is weaker than an ant? a multitude of them may be deſtroyed at once, with the cruſh of a foot. Pliny calls it minimum animal, the leaſt animal; and the Arabians uſe it as a proverb, to call a weak man, one weaker than an ant: and there is one ſort of ants called dſar, ſo ſmall that one hundred of them will not weigh more than a barley corn [g]: they are called a people, becauſe they aſſociate together in great numbers; though ſmall in bulk, and weak as to power and ſtrength; and which is a figure elſewhere uſed in the ſacred ſcriptures; ſee Joel i. 6. and by profane writers, as Homer and Virgil, who ſpeak of bees as a people and nation [h]; and of nations of flies, and of flying birds, geeſe, cranes, and ſwans [i]. Yet they prepare their meat in the ſummer; build granaries with great art and wiſdom, carry in grains of corn with great labour and induſtry, in the ſummer ſeaſon, when only to be got, and lay them up againſt winter. Phocylides [k] the poet ſays much the ſame things of them; he calls them a tribe or nation, ſmall but laborious, and ſays, they gather and carry in their food in ſummer for the winter, which is a proof of their wiſdom. Cicero [l] ſays, the ant has not only ſenſe, but mind, reaſon, and memory. Ælianus [m] aſcribes unſpeakable wiſdom to it; and Pliny [n] diſcourſe and converſation; ſee the notes on chap. vi. 16—18. It is a pattern of induſtry and diligence both as to temporal and ſpiritual things, Eccl. ix. 10. Matt. vi. 19, 20.

℣. 26. The conies are but a feeble folk, &c.] Or rabbits; though ſome think theſe creatures are not intended, becauſe they are not ſo little as thoſe with which they are ranked, the ant, the locuſt, and ſpider; and becauſe of the places in which they burrow and make their houſes, which though in holes and caverns of the earth, yet not in rocky but ſandy places; rather therefore it is thought that the mountain-mouſe, or bear-mouſe [o], as Jerom calls it, is meant; of which, he ſays [p], there were great numbers in Paleſtine, and which had their habitations in the holes of rocks; though if Spain has its name from שפן as ſome ſay, becauſe of the multitudes of conies in it; and hence that part of Spain called Celtiberia, is called by Catullus [q] cuniculoſa; the coney may be thought to be meant by this word, and ſo it is tranſlated in Lev. xi. 5. Deut. xiv. 7. Pſal. civ. 18. the only places where it is elſewhere uſed; and the word may be derived either from ספן to cover, by a change of the letters ש and ס; or from שוף, which has the ſignification both of breaking, and of hiding and covering, Gen. iii. 15.

15. Pſal. cxxxix. 11. and this creature breaks the earth and hides itſelf in it [r]. Yet make they their houſes in the rocks; it is uſual with other writers to call the receptacles of any creatures, beaſts, birds, or inſects, their houſes; ſo we read of the houſe of the ant, and of the tortoiſe and ſnail [s]; and which, becauſe it carries its houſe on its back, it is called by Cicero [t], domiporta; ſee Pſal. civ. 17, 18. the conies make theirs in the rocks, to ſecure themſelves from their more potent enemies; and thus what they want in ſtrength, is made up in ſagacity; and, by their wiſe conduct, they provide for their ſafety and protection. Theſe are an emblem of the people of God, who are a weak and feeble people; unable of themſelves to perform ſpiritual duties, to exerciſe grace, to withſtand the corruptions of their nature, reſiſt the temptations of Satan, bear up under afflictive providences, and grapple with ſpiritual enemies, or defend themſelves from them: but ſuch heavenly wiſdom is given them, as to betake themſelves for refuge and ſhelter to Chriſt, the rock of Iſrael; the rock of ſalvation, the rock that is higher than they; a ſtrong one, on which the church is built, and againſt which the gates of hell cannot prevail: and here they are ſafe from the ſtorms of divine wrath, and the avenging juſtice of God; from the rage and fury of men, and the fiery darts of Satan; here they dwell ſafely and delightfully, and have all manner of proviſion at hand for them; they are the inhabitants of that rock, who have reaſon to ſing indeed! ſee Iſa. xxxiii. 16. and xlii. 11.

℣. 27. The locuſts have no king, &c.] Theſe are ſmall creatures alſo, yet very devouring ones; and conſume the fruits of the earth, wherever they come and light; ſee Exod. x. 13—15. they are very numerous, and move in large bodies, and yet with great regularity and order; which ſhews the wiſdom there is in them by natural inſtinct, though they have no king to command, guide and direct them: in this the myſtical locuſts differ from them, who have a king, whoſe name is Abaddon, Rev. ix. 11. Yet they go forth all of them by bands; the Targum is, "they are all gathered together as one." They get together in one place; they aſſociate and join themſelves in bands, and keep together, tho' they have no ruler over them; an emblem of unity, concord and harmony, let the form of government be what it will, as the beſt ſecurity to a people: and theſe creatures, when they move from place to place, they move in a body, in a very regular manner; in preciſe order [u], as the words may be rendered, with great exactneſs, every one in his proper place, all in rank and file; and though they have no general to marſhal them, yet are in, and march in as good order as the moſt regular army does. So the Arabic verſion, "yet in their army, "their affairs and manner are in a beautiful diſpoſition;" indeed they are God's army, as they are called, Joel ii. 25. and it is he that gives them their wiſdom, inſtructions, directions, and commiſſion. It is rendered by ſome, every one cutting; that is, as Kimchi [w] interprets it, cutting the green graſs and trees: or, every one dividing [x]; that is, to himſelf, the prey or ſpoils, as kings do; ſee Iſa. xxxiii. 4.

℣. 28. The ſpider taketh hold with her hands, &c.] On the thread ſhe ſpins, or on the flies and bees ſhe catches in her web. This is a ſmall creature, yet very wiſe; what a curious thread does ſhe ſpin! what a fine web does ſhe weave! with what exactneſs and proportion is it framed! as if ſhe underſtood the rules of mathematics and architecture. And is in kings palaces; as well as in the houſes of poor people, and in temples alſo; we read [y] of one in the temple of Ceres, which drew its web over the face of the image: and though her webs are oftentimes deſtroyed, eſpecially in kings palaces; yet ſuch is her conſtancy and aſſiduity, and her unwearied application to buſineſs, that, as faſt as they are deſtroyed, ſhe attempts to reſtore them. This creature is an emblem of diligence in things temporal and ſpiritual; which thoſe that uſe in the former ſenſe, ſhall ſtand before kings, and not before mean men; and in the latter ſenſe, ſhall have the preſence of the King of kings, and dwell in his palace here and hereafter: alſo of worldly-minded men, who labour to be rich; ſpend their time, and take a great deal of pains for mere trifles; weave curious webs, and, after all, only catch flies; and thoſe they cannot hold, uncertain riches, which make themſelves wings and fly away. Likewiſe this creature may reſemble hypocrites, whoſe hope and truſt are as the ſpider's web, built upon their own righteouſneſs, ſpun out of their own bowels; a fine, thin, ſlender thread, which cannot bear one ſtroke of the beſom of divine juſtice; ſuch as theſe are in the palaces of Chriſt the King, are in his churches, hypocrites in Zion; ſee Job viii. 13, 14. Aben Ezra interprets it of the ape; the ſame David de Pomis [z] obſerves, and Mr Weemſe [a], who ſeems to incline to this ſenſe; and this creature king Solomon, no doubt, had in his palace, ſince his navy brought many of theſe every three years, from thoſe parts to which it was ſent, 1 Kings x. 22. and to theſe, hands more properly belong than to ſpiders, and are taken into king's palaces for their pleaſure and diverſion; but to theſe there is one objection, that this creature is not a little one. Others underſtand it of the lizard, that ſort which is called ſtellio; but it is a queſtion, whether this is to be found in king's palaces. Bellonius [b] makes mention of a kind of lizard, which creeps into walls and catches flies, and is called by the Greeks ſamiamiton, a name very near the Hebrew word here uſed: and Pliny [c] ſpeaks of the ſtellio, or lizard, as being in doors, windows and chambers; and as a very fraudulent and deceitful creature to men, none more ſo; and alſo as poiſonous, as this creature in the text by its name ſeems to be: and Auſtin [d] makes mention of the lizard, as a domeſtic animal; which catches flies as the ſpider, with whom he joins it. The Targum, Jarchi and Gerſom, take it to be the ſpider, as we do; which may be thought moſt likely, ſince the creature here meant ſeems to have its name from the Arabic word ſam, which ſignifies poiſon [e]; though it is affirmed [f], the ſpider is not poiſonous; as is well known by perſons who have frequently ſwallowed them, without any more harm than happens to hens, robin-red-breaſts, and other birds, who make them their daily food; and ſo men have been bit by them, without any ill conſequence: wherefore it is ſtill thought by ſome, that the lizard is more probably meant; ſince ſome ſorts of them are poiſonous [g], though not all, for ſome are eatable; ſee the note on Lev. xi. 30.

℣. 29. There be three things which go well, &c.] In a very orderly and compoſed manner; with conſtancy and chearfulneſs, with great ſtatelineſs and majeſty, intrepidly, and without fear. Yea, four are comely in going; very beautiful and lovely to look at as they walk.

℣. 30. A lion which is ſtrongeſt among beaſts, &c.] For what is ſtronger than a lion? or more courageous and undaunted? it walks with great majeſty, very ſlowly, ſtep by ſtep, the left foot firſt; ſhaking its ſhoulders as it goes, as the philoſopher [h] deſcribes its going, and as here intended, and this without fear. And turneth not away for any; it does not go out of its way for any creature it meets with; nor does it haſten its pace when purſued, nor ſhew the leaſt ſign of fear; nor does it turn its back to any; which is obſerved and confirmed by Ariſtotle [i], Ælianus [k], Pliny [l], and other naturaliſts; particularly what Homer [m] and Virgil [n] ſay of this animal, agrees with this account of Solomon. This creature is an emblem of Chriſt, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who is ſtronger than the ſtrong man armed; who never turned his back to any of his enemies; nor turned aſide from the way of his duty, or the work of his office, on account of any; not Herod the fox, who threatened to kill him; nor Satan, the roaring lion, when he knew he was on the march to meet him; nor any of thoſe, who, though they had a band of ſoldiers, that came to take him; ſee Luke xiii. 31, 32. John xiv. 30, 31. and xviii. 4—8. and alſo it is an emblem of righteous men, who are as bold as a lion; and cannot be moved from their duty by any thing they meet with, but remain ſtedfaſt and conſtant in it; ſee chap. xxviii. 1. Acts xx. 23, 24.

℣. 31. A grey-hound, &c.] So Gerſom interprets the word; but Jarchi owns he does not know what is meant; and Aben Ezra only ſays, it is the name of a living creature, but does not ſay what; but obſerves, that ſome interpret it of the bee, and others of the eagle. The words of the original text only deſcribe ſomething girt about the loins [o]: and Kimchi [p] obſerves, that ſome ſay it is a hunting dog, ſo called, becauſe it is thin about the loins, as if it was bound and girt; and Ariſtotle [q] deſcribes hunting dogs, as well girded about their loins: but others, as Kimchi in the ſame place obſerves, interpret it of the leopard, which is ſmall, and ſtrong in its loins; and others, of a bird called the ſtarling; but he owns, he cannot underſtand the meaning of its loins being girt: David de Pomis [r] interprets it of a cock; others, he ſays, interpret it a hunting dog; others, a leopard; and ſome, a ſpecies of an unclean bird; perhaps he means the ſtarling, as before; and ſo the word is uſed for that bird in the Talmud [s], and in the Arabic language [t]. Moſt likely the horſe is meant; which is a very ſtately and majeſtic creature in its going, and is very comely when it has its harneſs girt on; and eſpecially a war-horſe, with all its warlike accoutrements, when it proceeds to battle, and ſtalks on in it; this creature, one ſhould think, could not be omitted among the four, which is deſcribed in ſo magnificent a manner in Job xxxix. 19—25. and is called the goodly horſe in the battle, Zech. x 3. unleſs a fine, ſlender-bodied race-horſe ſhould be meant: the horſe bids fairer than any other creature named to be what is deſigned. The third creature follows, which goes well, and is comely in going: An he-goat alſo; which with its long beard walks very gravely, and in a ſtately manner, before the flock; and the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions add, going before the flock; ſee Jer. l. 8. This ſtately walk of the goat is very particularly taken notice of by Ælian [u]; he obſerves, that the ſhe-goat diſdains to be laſt in a flock of ſheep, but declares by her walk that ſhe ought to be firſt; he adds, that the he-goat goes before the ſhe-goats, glorying in his beard; and, by a kind of wonderful inſtinct in nature, judges the male is to be preferred to the female [w]. Kings, rulers and governors, are compared to this creature; as Alexander the Great is in Dan. viii. 5, 11. ſee Zech. x. 3. eſpecially ſuch reſemble it, who rule well, and ſet good examples to their ſubjects: and to ſuch, miniſters of the goſpel are like; who go before their flocks, guide and direct them, and are examples to them: and likewiſe all believers; who ſtrive to go before others in good works, and who then are comely in their going. The fourth is, and a king, againſt whom there is no riſing up; no inſurrection, no oppoſition; who is not to be reſiſted or withſtood; a lawful king, in the lawful adminiſtration of government, who rules in the fear of God, and according to his word, and the good and wholſome laws of a nation, ought not to be reſiſted, Rom. xiii. 1, 2. and a powerful, ſucceſsful, and victorious king cannot be reſiſted, withſtood, and prevailed over; he drives all before him, and ſubdues all under him, as David, Cyrus, Alexander, and others. But to none can this better be applied than to Chriſt, the King of kings; againſt whom there is no riſing, before whom none can ſtand, againſt whom the gates of hell can never prevail; who, even in his ſtate of humiliation, conquered and ſubdued all his and our enemies; deſtroyed the tyrant, ſin; ſpoiled Satan, and his principalities and powers; overcame the world; aboliſhed death, the laſt enemy; and delivered his people out of the hands of all, and made them more than conquerors: and who went forth in the miniſtry of the goſpel, into the Gentile world, conquering and to conquer; bearing down all oppoſition before him, and ſubduing the people under him; and who, in the latter day, will engage with his antichriſtian enemies, the beaſt, falſe prophet, and kings of the earth, and ſhall overcome them, and clear the world of them. And this is a King who is comely in his going; as he was in his goings of old from everlaſting; when he drew nigh to his divine Father, and became the ſurety of his people; and in his coming into this world, by the aſſumption of our nature, to ſave loſt, periſhing ſinners: and ſo he is in his ſpiritual viſits to his ſaints; in his goings in the ſanctuary, and walks he takes amidſt the golden candleſticks, his churches; as he will be alſo when he comes a ſecond time in the clouds of heaven: it will be a glorious appearing; he will come with all the ſaints, and be attended with his mighty angels; he will come in their glory, in his own, and in the glory of his Father; and will be comely in his going indeed; it will be with great ſtatelineſs and majeſty. The learned Dr Pococke [x], from the uſe of the word alkum in the Arabic language, renders the words thus, and a king with whom the people is; who agree together; the one rules well, and the other obey chearfully; ſuch a king, walking with majeſty, is comely to his people, and terrible to his enemies. The Targum is, "and a king, who ſtands and ſpeaks "in the houſe of his people."

ỳ. 32. If thou haſt done fooliſhly in lifting up thyſelf, &c.] Againſt a king, againſt whom there is no riſing up; by ſpeaking evil of him, or rebelling againſt him; which is acting a fooliſh part, ſince it brings a man into troubles and difficulties inextricable: or by ſelf-commendation, which is the height of folly, and the fruit of pride; or carried it in ſuch a haughty and overbearing manner to others, as to provoke to wrath and anger. Or if thou haſt thought evil; purpoſed and deſigned it, and contrived the ſcheme of doing it, though not yet put in execution; though folly is not actually committed, yet ſince the thought of it is ſin, care ſhould be taken to prevent it. Lay thine hand upon thy mouth; think again before the thing reſolved on is done; as ſtudious and thoughtful men put their hand to their mouth, when they are deeply conſidering any affair before them: or put a ſtop to the deſign, let it go no further; what has been thought of in the mind, let it never come out of the mouth, nor be carried into execution; ſtifle it in the firſt motion: or if this reſpects a fooliſh action done, as it alſo may, ſince it ſtands connected with both clauſes, then the ſenſe is, be ſilent; do not pretend to deny the action, nor to excuſe it; nor to ſay one word in the defence of it; nor to lay the blame upon others; and much leſs to calumniate and reproach ſuch who faithfully reprove for it; take ſhame to thyſelf in ſilence, and repent of the iniquity done. Aben Ezra thinks theſe words are ſaid to Ithiel and Ucal; but rather, to any and every one, to all that ſhould hear and read theſe proverbs. The Targum is, "do not lift "up thyſelf, leſt thou be fooliſh, and do not ſtretch "out thine hand to thy mouth."

ỳ. 33. Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, &c.] Or the preſſing of it. This is a thing well known and certain, that of milk, when preſſed out of the udder, and put into a churn, and there is ſhook together, by a conſtant, violent agitation or motion, called churning, butter is produced; and cheeſe is ſometimes called preſſed milk [y], and is preſſed with the runnet, and by the hand alſo [z]. And the wringing of the noſe bringeth forth blood; a too violent compreſſion of it, or forcible blowing of it, in order to purge it from any impurity in it; inſtead of doing which, it may break the tender ſkin, and bring forth blood, which may be of bad conſequence. So the forcing of wrath bringeth forth ſtrife; irritating the paſſions of men, and provoking them by ſcurrilous and reproachful words to wrath and anger, produce contentions, feuds and law-ſuits, which are not ſoon and eaſily ended; and therefore ſuch a conduct ſhould be carefully avoided. The ſame word is uſed in the three clauſes, and ſignifies preſſing, ſqueezing, forcing.

CHAP. XXXI.

THIS chapter contains the laſt part of the book of Proverbs; which ſome reckon the fifth, others the ſixth. It contains the inſtructions of the mother of a prince, whoſe name was Lemuel, which ſhe gave unto him; and which are ſo valuable, as to be annexed to the proverbs of Solomon. The preface or introduction to them is in ỳ. 1. the addreſs to her ſon, ỳ. 2. The vices ſhe cautions him againſt, are uncleanneſs and intemperance; which ſhe diſſuades from, becauſe of the pernicious conſequences of both to kings and to their ſubjects, ỳ. 3—5. Adviſes rather to give wine and ſtrong drink to poor people, ſuch as are in diſtreſs; as being more uſeful to them, at leaſt leſs prejudicial, ỳ. 6, 7. and exhorts her ſon to the duties of his office; by pleading the cauſe of the poor and injured, and adminiſtering juſtice to them, ỳ. 8, 9. And then at large deſcribes a virtuous woman; perhaps deſigned as an inſtruction to her ſon in the choice of a wife, ỳ. 10—31. though more than that may be intended by it.

ỳ. 1. The words of king Lemuel, &c.] Not what were ſpoken by him, but what were ſpoken to him; or declaring what his mother ſaid, as what follows ſhews; of this king we have no account elſewhere under this name. Grotius thinks that king Hezekiah, whoſe mother Abijah, the daughter of Zechariah, whom he ſuppoſes to be a wiſe man, from whom ſhe had learned much, inſtructed her ſon in the following manner; but gives no other reaſon for this conjecture, but that this chapter follows the collection of proverbs made by the men of Hezekiah; but they are expreſsly ſaid to be Solomon's, and the words of Agur more immediately follow them; and beſides Hezekiah does not appear ever to be addicted to the vices this prince was; much more probable is the conjecture of Biſhop Patrick, that he was a prince of another country, perhaps in Chaldea, ſince a Chaldee word is three times uſed in his mother's addreſs to him, and another word in a Chaldee termination; and he ſuppoſes his mother to be a Jewiſh lady, that taught her ſon the leſſons herein contained. But the general ſenſe of Jewiſh and Chriſtian writers is, that Solomon himſelf is meant; whoſe name Lemuel is either a corruption of his name Solomon, a fond, pretty name his mother Bathſheba gave him when young, and he thought fit to write it juſt as his mother ſpoke it; as mothers often do give ſuch broken names to their children in fond affection to them: or it was another name of his, as it appears he had more than one; it ſignifies to God, one that was devoted to him, as he was by his parents and by himſelf; or one that belonged to God, was his, as Solomon was; he was beloved of God, and therefore called Jedidiah, 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. one to whom God was a father, and he a ſon to him; and he was choſen and appointed by him to ſucceed his father David in the kingdom, 2 Sam. vii. 13. 1 Chron.

xxviii. 5. Hillerus[a] makes the word to ſignify over againſt God, or before the face of the firſt, or of God; and was a type of the angel of faces, or of God's preſence, Iſa. lxiii. 9. The prophecy that his mother taught him; either in his youth, or when he was come to the throne; to whom ſhe had acceſs, and with whom ſhe uſed freedom; and particularly when ſhe ſaw he was inclined unto, or going into the vices ſhe cautions him againſt. Her inſtruction is called a prophecy, becauſe ſhe delivered it on a foreſight of the ſins her ſon would be tempted with, and liable to fall into; and this foreſight was either through her natural ſagacity, or under a ſpirit of prophecy; or rather it is ſo called, becauſe any wiſe ſaying, or doctrine of moment and importance, and eſpecially if it was by divine inſpiration, was ſo called; ſee chap. xxx. 1. as Solomon tells us what his father David taught him, ſo here what his mother Bathſheba inſtructed him in; and it would have been well if he had taken the advice ſhe gave him, and he gave to his ſon; ſee chap. iv. 3, 4. and i. 8.

℣. 2. What, my ſon? &c.] What ſhall I call thee? though thou art a king, can I addreſs thee in more ſuitable language, or uſe a more endearing appellative than this, and what follows? permit me, thy mother, to ſpeak unto thee as my ſon: and what ſhall I ſay to thee? I want words, I want wiſdom, O that I knew what to ſay to thee, that would be proper and profitable; or what is it I am about to ſay to thee? things of the greateſt moment and importance, and therefore liſten to me; and ſo the manner of ſpeaking is deſigned to excite attention: or what ſhall I aſk of thee? no part of thy kingdom, or any ſhare in the government of it; only this favour, to avoid the ſins unbecoming a prince, and to do the duty of a king, aftermentioned. The Targum and Syriac verſion repreſent her as exclaiming, reproving, and threatening; as, Alas, my ſon! is this the life thou deſigneſt to live, to give up thyſelf to wine and women? fy upon it, my ſon, is this becoming thy birth, education, and dignity? is this the fruit of all the pains I have taken in bringing thee up? conſider the unbecoming part thou art acting. And what, the ſon of my womb? whom I bore in ſorrow, brought forth in pain, and took ſo much care and trouble to bring up in a religious way, and form for uſefulneſs in church and ſtate? not an adopted ſon, but my own fleſh and blood; and therefore what I ſay muſt be thought to proceed from pure affection to thee, and ſolely for thy good; ſee Iſa. xlix. 15. And what, the ſon of my vows? whom I aſked of God, and promiſed to give up to him again, and did; for which reaſon ſhe might call him Lemuel, as Hannah called her ſon Samuel, for a like reaſon, 1 Sam. i. 28. a ſon for whom ſhe had put up many prayers, for his temporal and ſpiritual good; and on whoſe account ſhe had made many vows, promiſes, and reſolutions, that ſhe would do ſo and ſo, ſhould ſhe be ſo happy as to bring him into the world, and bring him up to man's eſtate, and ſee him ſettled on the throne of Iſrael.

℣. 3. Give not thy ſtrength unto women, &c.] Strength of body, which is weakened by an exceſſive uſe of venery[b] with a multiplicity of women; ſee chap. v. 9. and ſtrength of mind, reaſon, and wiſdom, which is impaired by converſation with ſuch perſons; whereby time is conſumed and loſt, which ſhould be ſpent in the improvement of knowledge: or thy riches, as the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, thy ſubſtance, which harlots devour, and who bring a man to a piece of bread, as the prodigal was, chap. vi. 26. Luke xv. 30 and even drain the coffers of kings and princes. Nor thy ways to that which deſtroyeth kings; do not give thy mind to take ſuch courſes and purſue ſuch ways and methods as bring ruin on kings and kingdoms, as converſation with harlots does; ſee chap. vii. 26. Some think the deſign of this advice is to warn againſt any ambitious views of enlarging his dominions by invading neighbouring countries, and making war with neighbouring kings, to the ruin of them; but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt. The Targum is, "nor "thy ways to the daughters of kings." Solomon was given to women, who proved very pernicious to him, 1 Kings xi. 1—5. Some render it, which deſtroyeth counſel[c]; for whoredom weakens the mind, as well as the body.

℣. 4. It is not for kings, O Lemuel, &c.] It is not fit for them, it is very unbecoming them; it is diſhonourable to them, to ſuch as Lemuel was, or was likely to be; or far be it from kings, let no ſuch thing be done by them, nor by thee. It is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes, ſtrong drink; it is lawful for kings to drink wine in a moderate manner, and for princes, counſellors, and judges to drink ſtrong drink; meaning not ſuch as is made of malt, which in thoſe times was not uſed; but of honey, dates, pomegranates, and ſuch like things; but then it was very unbecoming for either of them to drink any of theſe to exceſs; it is very diſgraceful to any man to drink immoderately, to make a beaſt of himſelf, and much more a king or judge, who of all men ought to be grave and ſober; both that they may perform their office well, and maintain the grandeur and dignity of it, which otherwiſe would become uſeleſs and deſpicable, yea pernicious, as follows. Solomon, notwithſtanding this advice, gave himſelf unto wine as well as women, Eccl. ii. 3. The Targum is, "take care of "kings, O Lemuel, of kings who drink wine, and "of princes that drink ſtrong drink." So the Syriac verſion, keep no company with them, nor follow their example; ſee Eccl. x. 17. Hoſea vii. 5. The laſt clauſe may be rendered, nor for princes to ſay where is ſtrong drink[d]? where is it to be had? where is the beſt? as drunkards do; which is according to the marginal reading; but the cetib, or writing is או or[e]; but ſome render it as a noun, the deſire of ſtrong drink[f]; it does not become princes to covet it.

℣. 5. Leſt they drink, and forget the law, &c.] The law of God by Moſes, which the kings of Iſrael were obliged to write a copy of, and read over daily, to imprint it on their minds that they might never forget it, but always govern according to it, Deut. xvii. 18, 19. or the law of their anceſtors, or what was made by themſelves, which through intemperance may be forgotten; for this ſin ſtupifies the mind and hurts the memory, and makes men forgetful. And pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted; a king on the throne, or a judge on the bench drunk, muſt be very unfit for his office; ſince he muſt be incapable of attending to the cauſe before him, of taking in the true ſtate of the caſe; and as he forgets the law, which is his rule of judgment, ſo he will miſtake the point in debate, and put one thing for another; and change[g] and alter, as the word ſignifies, the judgment of the afflicted and injured perſon, and give the cauſe againſt him which ſhould be for him; and therefore it is of great conſequence that kings and judges ſhould be ſober. A certain woman being undeſervedly condemned by Philip king of Macedon when drunk, ſaid, "I would appeal to Philip, but it ſhall be "when he is ſober;" which arouſed him; and more diligently examining the cauſe, he gave a more righteous ſentence[h].

℣. 6. Give ſtrong drink unto him that is ready to periſh, &c.] Thou, O Lemuel, and other kings and judges, rather than drink ſtrong drink yourſelves, at leaſt to exceſs; give it out of your great abundance and liberality to poor perſons in ſtarving circumſtances, who muſt periſh unleſs relieved; it will do them good, moderately uſed; and ſhould they drink too freely, which they ought not, yet it would not be attended with ſuch bad conſequences as if kings and princes ſhould. And wine to thoſe that be of heavy heart; of melancholy diſpoſitions, under gloomy apprehenſions of things; preſſed with the weight of their affliction and poverty: or bitter in ſoul[i]; ſuch as God has dealt bitterly with, as Naomi ſays was her caſe, and therefore called her own name Marah, which ſignifies bitter; of ſuch a ſorrowful ſpirit, and one thus bitter in ſoul, was Hannah; and ſo Job, and others; perſons in great affliction and diſtreſs, to whom life itſelf is bitter; ſee Ruth i. 20. 1 Sam. i. 10. Job iii. 20. and x. 1. now wine to ſuch is very exhilarating and chearing; ſee Judges ix. 13. Pſal. civ. 15.

℣. 7. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, &c.] Which has been very preſſing upon him, and afflicting to him; let him drink till he is chearful, and forgets that he is a poor man; however, ſo far forgets as not to be troubled about it, and have any anxious thoughts how he muſt have food and raiment[k]. And remember his miſery no more; the anguiſh of his mind becauſe of his ſtraitened circumſtances; or his labour[l], as it may be rendered; ſo the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, the labour of his body, the pains he takes to get a little food for himſelf and family. The Targum is, "and re-"member his torn garments no more;" his rags, a part of his poverty. Such virtue wine may have for the preſent to diſpel care, than which it is ſaid nothing can be better[m]; and to induce a forgetfulneſs of miſery, poverty, and of other troubles. So the mixed wine Helena gave to Telemachus, called Nepenthe, which when drank had ſuch an effect as to remove ſorrow, and to bring on forgetfulneſs of paſt evils[n]; and of which Diodorus Siculus[o] and Pliny[p] ſpeak as of ſuch uſe. The ancients uſed to call Bacchus, the god of wine, the ſon of forgetfulneſs; but Plutarch[q] thought he ſhould rather be called the father of it. Some by thoſe that are ready to periſh, underſtand condemned malefactors juſt going to die; and think the Jewiſh practice of giving wine mingled with myrrh or frankincenſe; or a ſtupifying potion to ſuch that they might not be ſenſible of their miſery[r], ſuch as the Jews are ſuppoſed to offer to Chriſt, Mark xv. 23. is grounded upon this paſſage; but the ſenſe given is beſt: the whole may be applied in a ſpiritual manner to ſuch perſons who ſee themſelves in a periſhing ſtate and condition; whoſe conſciences are loaded with guilt, whoſe ſouls are filled with a ſenſe of wrath, have a ſight of ſin, but not of a Saviour; behold a broken, curſing, damning law, the flaming ſword of juſtice turning every way, but no righteouſneſs to anſwer for them, no peace, no pardon, no atoning ſacrifice, but look upon themſelves loſt and undone: and ſo of heavy hearts; have a ſpirit of heavineſs in them, a heavineſs upon their ſpirits; a load of guilt on them too heavy to bear, ſo that they cannot look up: or are bitter in ſoul; ſin is made bitter to them, and they weep bitterly for it: now to ſuch perſons wine, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, ſhould be given; the goſpel, which is as the beſt wine, that goes down ſweetly, ſhould be preached unto them; they ſhould be told of the love of God and Chriſt to poor ſinners, which is better than wine; and the bleſſings of grace ſhould be ſet before them, as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life by Chriſt, the milk and wine to be had without money and without price; of theſe they ſhould drink, or participate of by faith, freely, largely, and to full ſatiſfaction; by means of which they will forget their ſpiritual poverty, and conſider themſelves as poſſeſſed of the riches of grace, as rich in faith, and heirs of a kingdom; and ſo remember no more their miſerable eſtate by nature, and the anguiſh of their ſouls in the view of that; unleſs it be to magnify and adore the riches of God's grace in their deliverance.

℣. 8. Open thy mouth for the dumb, &c.] Not who are naturally ſo, but who cannot ſpeak in their own behalf, either through want of elocution, or knowledge of the laws; or who are baſhful, timorous, and fearful, being over-awed by the majeſty of a court of judicature, or by their proſecutors; or who, as they have not a tongue, ſo not a purſe to ſpeak for them, the fatherleſs and the widow; which latter has her name in the Hebrew language from dumbneſs. Here Lemuel's mother adviſes him to open his mouth freely, readily, boldly and intrepidly, and plead for ſuch perſons. Even in the cauſe of all ſuch as are appointed to deſtruction; whoſe deſtruction is reſolved on by their accuſers and proſecutors; and who are in danger of it, being charged with capital crimes; unleſs ſome perſons of wiſdom, power, and authority, interpoſe on their behalf. It may be rendered, in the cauſe of all the children of change, or paſſing away[s]; the children of the world which paſſeth away with all things in it, as Kimchi; or orphans, whoſe help paſſeth away, as Jarchi; or rather ſtrangers, as others, who paſs from place to place, and whoſe ſtate and condition is liable to many changes; who may be ignorant of the laws of the country where they are, and may ſtand in need of perſons to plead for them.

℣. 9. Open thy mouth, judge righteouſly, &c.] Having heard the cauſe, pronounce a righteous ſentence; deliver it freely and impartially, with all readineſs and boldneſs, not caring for the cenſures of wicked and unjuſt men. And plead the cauſe of the poor and needy; who are oppreſſed by the rich, cannot plead for themſelves, nor fee others to plead for them; do thou do it freely and faithfully. Thus as Lemuel's mother cautions him againſt women and wine, ſhe adviſes him to do the duties of his office in adminiſtring impartial juſtice to all, and particularly in being the advocate and judge of the indigent and diſtreſſed.

℣. 10. Who can find a virtuous woman? &c.] This part of the chapter is disjoined from the reſt in the Septuagint and Arabic verſions; and Huetius[t] thinks it is a compoſition of ſome other perſon, and not Lemuel's mother, whoſe words he ſuppoſes ends at the preceding verſe; but it is generally thought, that what follows to the end of the chapter is a continuance of her words, in which ſhe deſcribes a perſon as a fit wife for her ſon. Some think that Bathſheba gave the materials, the ſum and ſubſtance of this beautiful deſcription, to Solomon; who put it in the artificial form it is, each verſe beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order till the whole is gone through; though rather it ſeems to be a compoſition of Solomon's, deſcribing the character and virtues of his mother Bathſheba. But be this as it will, the deſcription is drawn up to ſuch a pitch, and wrote in ſuch ſtrong lines as cannot agree with any of the daughters of fallen Adam, literally underſtood; not with Bathſheba the mother of Solomon; nor with the virgin Mary, as the papiſts, who, they fancy, was immaculate and ſinleſs, of which there is no proof; nor indeed with any other; for though ſome parts of the deſcription may meet in ſome, and others in others, yet not all in one; wherefore the myſtical and ſpiritual ſenſe of the whole muſt be ſought after. Some by the virtuous woman underſtand the ſenſitive ſoul, ſubject to the underſtanding and reaſon, as Gerſom; others the ſcriptures, as Lyra, which lead to virtue, contain much riches in them, far above rubies; in which men may ſafely confide as the rule of their faith and practice; and will do them good, and not evil, continually. Others, wiſdom, who in the beginning of this book is repreſented as a woman making proviſion for her houſhold, and ſaid to be more precious than rubies; and is to be underſtood of Chriſt; which I ſhould have readily given into, but that this virtuous woman is ſaid to have a huſband, ℣. 11, 23, 28. which cannot agree with Chriſt, who is himſelf the huſband of his church and people, which church of his, I think, is here meant; nor is this a novel ſenſe of the paſſage, but what is given by many of the antient chriſtian writers, as Ambroſe, Bede, and others; and whoever compares ℣. 28, 29. with Cant. vi. 8, 9. will eaſily ſee the agreement; and will be led to obſerve that Solomon wrote both, and had a view to one and the ſame perſon, the church of Chriſt, who is often repreſented by a woman, Iſa. liv. 1, 5, 6. Gal. iii. 26. Rev. xii. 1. a woman grown and marriageable, as the goſpel-church may be truly ſaid to be, in compariſon of the Jewiſh church, which was the church in infancy; a woman actually married to Chriſt; a woman fruitful, bringing forth many children to him; a woman beautiful, eſpecially in his eyes, with whom ſhe is the faireſt among women; a woman, the weaker veſſel, unable to do any thing without him, yet every thing through him: a virtuous one, inviolably chaſte in her love and affection to Chriſt, her huſband; ſtedfaſt in her adherence to him by faith, as her Lord and Saviour; incorrupt in doctrine, ſincere and ſpiritual in worſhip, retaining the purity of diſcipline, and holineſs of life; and holding the myſtery of faith in a pure conſcience: or a woman of ſtrength[u], valour and courage, as the word ſignifies, when uſed of men, 1 Sam. xvi. 18. Pſalm lxxvi. 6. The church is militant, has many enemies, and theſe powerful and mighty, as well as cunning and crafty; yet with all their power and policy cannot overcome her; the gates of hell cannot prevail againſt her; ſhe engages with them all, and is more than a conqueror over them; ſhe is of great ſpiritual ſtrength, which ſhe has from Chriſt, to fight the Lord's battles, to withſtand every enemy, to exerciſe grace, and do every good work; and all her true members perſevere to the end: or a woman of riches[w]; that gets wealth and riches by her wiſdom and prudence, ſo Aben Ezra; a woman of fortune, as is commonly ſaid: ſuch is the church of Chriſt, through his unſearchable riches communicated to her; riches of grace ſhe now poſſeſſes, and riches of glory ſhe is intitled to. But who can find ſuch a one? there is but one to be found[x]; though there are many particular churches, there is but one church of the firſt-born, conſiſting of God's elect, of which Chriſt is the head and huſband, Cant. vi. 9. and there is but one that could find her, even her Surety, Saviour, and Redeemer; compare with this Rev. v. 3—5. This ſuppoſes her loſt, as ſhe was in Adam; Chriſt's ſeeking of her, as he did in redemption, and does in effectual vocation; and who perfectly knows her, and all her members, and where they are; and whom he finds out, and beſtows on them the bleſſings of grace and goodneſs. For her price is far above rubies; ſhewing the value Chriſt her huſband puts upon her, the eſteem ſhe is had in by him; who reckons her as his portion and inheritance; as preferable to the pureſt gold and choiceſt ſilver; as his peculiar treaſure; as his jewels, and more valuable than the moſt precious ſtones: this appears by his undertaking for her; by doing and ſuffering what he has on her account; the price he has paid for her is far above rubies; ſhe is bought with a price, but not with corruptible things, as ſilver and gold, but with the precious blood of Chriſt; the ranſom-price paid for her is himſelf, who is more precious than rubies, and all the things that can be deſired, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. 1 Tim. ii. 6. chap. iii. 15.

℣. 11. The heart of her huſband doth ſafely truſt in her, &c.] Chriſt her maker is her huſband, who has aſked her in marriage, and has betrothed her to himſelf in righteouſneſs; and of whoſe chaſte love and inviolable attachment to him he is fully ſatisfied, as well as of her fidelity in keeping what he commits unto her; he truſts her with his goſpel and ordinances, which ſhe faithfully retains and obſerves; and with his children born in her, who are nurſed up at her ſide, to whom ſhe gives the breaſts of ordinances, bears them on her ſides, and dandles them on her knees, as a tender and careful mother does, Iſa. lx. 4. and lxvi. 11, 12. So that he ſhall have no need of ſpoil; he ſhall never want any; by means of the word preached in her, the prey and ſpoil ſhall be taken out of the hands of the mighty, and he ſhall divide the ſpoil with them; or have ſouls ſnatched out of the hands of Satan, and tranſlated into his kingdom, Iſa. liii. 12. The Septuagint verſion underſtands it of the virtuous woman, and not of her huſband. Such an one as ſhe ſhall not want good ſpoils; now, prey or ſpoil ſometimes ſignifies food, as in Pſal. cxi. 5. and ſo Jarchi interprets it here; and then the ſenſe is, ſhe ſhall not want ſpiritual proviſions; ſhe ſhall have plenty of them from her huſband, who repoſes ſuch confidence in her; or ſhall not want excellent treaſures, as the Arabic verſion, which alſo underſtands it of her; ſuch are the word and ordinances, and particularly precious promiſes, which are more rejoicing than a great ſpoil, Pſal. cxix. 162. and ſo Ambroſe interprets[y] it of the church, who needs no ſpoils becauſe ſhe abounds with them, even with the ſpoils of the world and of the devil.

℣. 12. She will do him good and not evil, &c.] Or repay good unto him, give him thanks for all the good things beſtowed by him on her; will ſeek his intereſt, and promote his honour and glory to the uttermoſt; all the good works ſhe does, which ſhe is qualified for and ready to perform, are all done in his name and ſtrength, and with a view to his glory; nor will ſhe do any evil willingly and knowingly againſt him, againſt his truths and ordinances; or that is detrimental to his honour, and prejudicial to his intereſt, 2 Cor. xiii. 8. All the days of her life; through which ſhe deſires to ſerve him in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; and to be ſtedfaſt and immoveable, always abounding in his work, Luke i. 74, 75.

℣. 13. She ſeeketh wool and flax, &c.] To get them, in order to ſpin them, and work them up into garments; ſhe ſtays not till they are brought to her, and ſhe is preſſed to take them; but ſhe ſeeks after them, which ſhews her willingneſs to work, as is after more fully expreſſed. It was uſual in ancient times for great perſonages to do ſuch works as theſe, both among the Grecians[z] and Romans: Lucretia with her maids were found ſpinning, when her huſband Collatinus paid a viſit to her from the camp[a]: Tanaquilis, or Caia Cæcilia, the wife of king Tarquin, was an excellent ſpinſter of wool[b]; her wool, with a diſtaff and ſpindle, long remained in the temple of Sangus, or Sancus, as Varro[c] relates; and a garment made by her, wore by Servius Tullius, was reſerved in the temple of Fortune; hence it became a cuſtom for maidens to accompany new-married women with a diſtaff and ſpindle, with wool upon them[d], ſignifying what they were principally to attend unto; and maidens are adviſed to follow the example of Minerva, ſaid to be the firſt that made a web[e]; and if they would have her favour, to learn to uſe the diſtaff, and to card and ſpin[f]: ſo did the daughters of Minyas, in Ovid[g]; and the nymphs, in Virgil[h]. When Alexander the Great adviſed the mother of Darius to uſe her nieces to ſuch employments, the Perſian ladies were in great concern, it being reckoned reproachful with them for ſuch to move their hands to wool; on hearing which, Alexander himſelf went to her, and told her, the cloaths he wore were wrought by his ſiſters[i]: and the daughters and grand-daughters of Auguſtus Cæſar employed themſelves in the woollen manufacture by his order[k]; and he himſelf uſually wore no other garment than what was made at home, by his wife, ſiſter, daughter and grand-daughters[l]. The Jews have a ſaying[m], that there is no wiſdom in a woman, but in the diſtaff; ſuggeſting, that it is her wiſdom to mind her ſpinning, and the affairs of her houſhold: at the Roman marriages, the word thalaſſio was often repeated[n], which ſignified a veſſel in which ſpinning work was put; and this was done to put the bride in mind what her work was to be. Now as to the myſtical ſenſe of theſe words; as of wool, outward garments, and of flax, linen and inward garments are made; by the one may be meant external, and by the other, internal acts of religion; both are to be done, and not the one without the other: outward acts of religion are, ſuch as hearing the word, attendance on ordinances, and all good works, which make up a converſation-garment that ſhould be kept; and they ſhould be done ſo as to be ſeen of men, but not for that reaſon: and internal acts of religion are, the fear of God, humility, faith, hope, love, and other graces, and the exerciſes of them, which make up the new man, to be put on as a garment; and theſe ſhould go together; bodily exerciſe, without powerful godlineſs, profiteth little; and pretenſions to ſpirituality and internal religion, without regard to the outward duties of religion, are all vain. Hence Ambroſe, on the text, obſerves that one may ſay, "It is enough to worſhip "and ſerve God in my mind; what need have I "to go to church, and viſibly mingle with Chriſ-"tians? Such a man would have a linen, without "a woollen garment, this woman knew not; ſhe "does not commend ſuch works." She ſought all opportunities of doing good works externally, as believers do; and ſought after the kingdom of God, inward godlineſs, which lies in peace, righteouſneſs, and joy in the holy Ghoſt. Not that ſuch garments are to be joined with Chriſt's robe of righteouſneſs, to make up a juſtifying one; a garment mingled with linen and woollen, in this ſenſe, is not to come upon the ſaints, Lev. xix. 19. And worketh willingly with her hands; or, with the pleaſure of her hands[o]; as if her hands took delight in working, as the church and all true believers do; who are made willing in the day of the Lord's power upon them, to ſerve him, as well as to be ſaved by him; in whoſe hearts he works, both to will and to do; and theſe do what they do chearfully: theſe do the work of the Lord, not by the force of the law, nor through fear of puniſhment, but in love; not by conſtraint, but willingly, having no other conſtraint but the love of God and Chriſt; and not with mercenary, ſelfiſh views, but with a view to his glory; and they find a pleaſure and delight in all they do; Chriſt's ways are ways of pleaſantneſs; his commandments are not grievous, his yoke is eaſy.

℣. 14. She is like the merchant ſhips, &c.] Not like a ſingle one, but like a navy of them, that croſs the ſeas, go to foreign parts, and come back laden with rich goods: ſo the church of Chriſt, and her true members, like ſhips of burden, trade to heaven, by prayer and other religious exerciſes, and return with the riches of grace and mercy, to help them in time of need; and though they have often difficult and dangerous paſſages, are toſſed with tempeſts, and covered with billows; yet, Chriſt being their pilot, faith their ſail, and hope their anchor, they weather the ſeas, ride out all ſtorms, and come ſafe home with their merchandize. She bringeth her food from afar; from a far country, from Egypt particularly, from whence corn for bread, as the word here uſed ſignifies, was fetched and carried in ſhips to divers parts of the world [p]; to which the alluſion may be: in a ſpiritual ſenſe, it may mean that the church brings her food or bread from heaven, the good land afar off; where God her Father, Chriſt her huſband, and her friends the angels are; with whom ſhe carries on a correſpondence, and from hence ſhe has her food for her family; not from below, on earth; not duſt, the ſerpent's food; nor aſhes, on which a deceitful heart feeds; nor huſks, which ſwine eat; but the corn of heaven, angels food, the hidden and heavenly manna; the bread of life, which comes down from heaven; the goſpel of the grace of God, the good news from a far country.

℣. 15. She riſeth alſo while it is yet night, &c.] That is, before the aſcent of the morning, as Aben Ezra explains it, before break of day; a great while before day, as Chriſt is ſaid to riſe to pray, Mark i. 35. while it was yet dark; ſo the church here: which ſhews her affection for her family, her care of her children, and fervent zeal for her huſband's intereſt and good; a different frame of ſpirit this, from that of her's in Cant. v. 2, 3. And giveth meat to her houſhold, and a portion to her maidens; in alluſion to a daily, ſtated allowance [q] of food given to ſuch; and ſpiritually may be meant, by her houſhold or family, the ſame with the family of Chriſt, that is named of himſelf, which conſiſts of various perſons, fathers, young men, and children; and by her maidens, the miniſters of the word; ſee chap. ix. 3. who are ſtewards in the family, and have the food for it, put into their hands to diſpenſe; it is by theſe, the church gives meat to her houſhold, feeds them with knowledge and underſtanding, with the wholſome words of Chriſt, with the good doctrines of the goſpel; theſe have a certain portion given them, and they rightly cut and divide the word of truth, and give to every one their portion of meat in due ſeaſon, according to their age and circumſtances; milk indeed to babes, and meat to ſtrong men; ſee Luke xii. 42. The Targum renders the word, for portion, by ſervice; underſtanding not a portion of food, but of work, a taſk ſet them, and ſo the word is uſed in Exod. v. 14. The Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, works; which may be very well applied to the work and ſervice of the goſpel-miniſtry, and the ſeveral parts of it.

℣. 16. She conſidereth a field, and buyeth it, &c.] The field are the ſcriptures, in which are hid the rich treaſures of goſpel-doctrines and promiſes; and the church, and all truly enlightened perſons, conſider to what uſe this field may be put, to what account it will turn; how profitable the ſcriptures are, for doctrine, reproof, correction, and inſtruction in righteouſneſs; what a rich mine, and valuable treaſure is in them; things more deſirable, and of greater worth, than thouſands of gold and ſilver; and therefore will buy this field at any rate, and not ſell it; will part with all they have before they will part with that; even life itſelf, which, in an improper ſenſe, is called buying of it, though it is without money and without price; ſee Matt. xiii. 44. With the fruit of her hand ſhe planteth a vineyard; her own vineyard, whoſe plants are an orchard of pomegranates, Cant. i. 6. and iv. 13. who, through the miniſtry of the word, are planted in the houſe of the Lord, and flouriſh there; this the church is ſaid to do by her miniſters, who plant and water, as Paul and Apollos did, 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7. And it is obſervable, that in the Hebrew text there is a double reading; the keri, or marginal reading, is feminine; but the cetib, or writing, is maſculine; to ſhew that ſhe did it by means of men, ſhe made uſe of in her vineyard for that ſervice; it being, as Aben Ezra obſerves, not the cuſtom and buſineſs of women to plant vineyards, but men. It may be rendered, he planted, and be applied to her huſband, Chriſt; who, through the miniſtry of the word in his church, plants ſouls in it; and happy are they who are the planting of the Lord! trees of righteouſneſs, that he may be glorified, Iſa. lxi. 3.

℣. 17. She girdeth her loins with ſtrength, &c.] Shewing her readineſs to every good work; and with what chearfulneſs, ſpirit and reſolution, ſhe ſet about it, and with what diſpatch and expedition ſhe performed it: the alluſion is to the girding and tucking up of long garments, wore in the eaſtern countries, when any work was ſet about in earneſt, which required diſpatch; ſee Luke xvii. 8. and xii. 35. the ſtrength of creatures being in their loins, Job xl. 16. the loins are ſometimes put for ſtrength, as in Plautus [r]; and the ſenſe is much the ſame with what follows. And ſtrengtheneth her arms; does all ſhe finds to do with all her might and main, as the church does; not in her own ſtrength, but in the ſtrength of Chriſt; to whom ſhe ſeeks for it, and in whoſe ſtrength ſhe goes forth about her buſineſs; by whom the arms of her hands are made ſtrong, even by the mighty God of Jacob; and becauſe ſhe thus applies to him for it, ſhe is ſaid to do it herſelf, Gen. xlix. 24. Phil. iv. 13. here ſhe plays the man, and acts the manly part, 1 Cor. xvi. 13.

℣. 18. She perceiveth that her merchandiſe is good, &c.] That it turns to good account; that her trading to heaven is of great advantage; that ſhe grows rich hereby; that her merchandiſe with wiſdom, or Chriſt, is better than the merchandiſe of ſilver, and the gain thereby than fine gold; and though her voyages are attended with trouble and danger, yet are profitable, and therefore ſhe is not diſcouraged, but determined to purſue them; ſhe is like the merchant-man, ſeeking goodly pearls, who finds a pearl of great price, worth all his trouble; ſee the note on ℣. 14. and chap. iii. 14. Matt. xiii. 45, 46. Her candle goeth not out by night; or lamp [s]; her lamp of profeſſion, which is always kept burning, Luke xii. 35. or the glorious light of the goſpel, which always continues in the darkeſt times the church ever has been in; or her ſpiritual proſperity, which, though it may be damped, will never be extinct; when the candle of the wicked is often put out, Job xxi. 17. It may denote her diligence in working; who, as ſhe riſes betimes in the morning, ℣. 15. ſo ſits up late at night, and is never weary of well-doing, night and day. Ambroſe interprets it of the lamp of hope, which burns in the night, and by and for which men work, Rom. viii. 24. 1 Cor. ix. 10.

ỳ. 19. She layeth her hands to the ſpindle, &c.] As Penelope and her maidens did [t]. Or ſpinning-wheel more properly, the wheel itſelf, which is laid hold on by the right hand, and turned round. And her hands hold the diſtaff; the rock, ſtick or ſtaff, about which the wool is wrapped, which is ſpun, and is held in the left hand; for though hands are mentioned in both clauſes, yet it is only with one hand the wheel is turned, and the diſtaff held with the other. Not only wool and flax were ſought by her, ỳ. 13. but ſhe ſpins them, and works them up into garments; her web is not like the ſpider's, ſpun out of its own bowels, on which it hangs; to which the hope and truſt of a hypocrite are compared, and whoſe webs do not become garments to cover them, Job viii. 14. Iſa. lix. 5, 6. but the church's web is both for ornament, to the adorning of her profeſſion, and for defence and protection from the calumnies of the world; for by theſe are meant good works, as Ambroſe interprets them.

ỳ. 20. She ſtretcheth out her hand to the poor, &c.] Her liberality is very extenſive, reaches to many, and at a diſtance; it is done with great chearfulneſs and readineſs; to do good and communicate, ſhe forgets not, it being acceptable to her Lord and huſband, Heb. xiii. 16. Yea, ſhe reacheth forth her hands to the needy; ſhe gives with both hands, liberally and largely. It may be applied to the church, giving ſpiritual food by her miniſters to thoſe who are poor in ſpirit, ſpiritually poor and needy, and who hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs.

ỳ. 21. She is not afraid of the ſnow for her houſehold, &c.] That her family ſhould ſuffer through the rigour of a cold ſeaſon, when it is froſt and ſnow. For all her houſhold are clothed with ſcarlet; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, with double [u], i. e. with double garments; and ſo the Septuagint and Arabic verſions, joining the words to a following verſe; and this, by ſome, is thought to be the better rendering of the words; ſince the ſcarlet colour is no fence againſt cold, no more than any other, whereas double garments are; and which may be applied to the garment of juſtification, or the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, as one; and to the garment of ſanctification, internal and external, as the other: the one, even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, or Chriſt the Lord our righteouſneſs, is an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the ſtorm; a ſufficient ſhelter from the cold of ſnow, and all inclemencies of the weather; by which the vindictive wrath and juſtice of God may be ſignified: and the other is a ſkreen from the malicious inſinuations and reproaches of men. But had the word been deſigned to ſignify double, it would have been in the dual number; as it is not, and is always uſed in this form for ſcarlet; and ſo the Targum, Jarchi and Aben Ezra interpret it; which colour is an emblem of the blood of Chriſt, by which the church is juſtified, Rom. v. 9. and all the houſhold of faith, the whole family of Chriſt and houſhold of God, are all juſtified by the ſame righteouſneſs of Chriſt, conſiſting of his active and paſſive obedience, for the whole of which his crimſon blood is put; it is a garment down to the feet, which covers all his people; they are all made righteous by the one obedience of Chriſt; they are all clothed in ſcarlet alike, all kings and prieſts unto God, all alike juſtified, and ſhall be glorified alike. The literal ſenſe is, that if her ſhouſhold are clothed in ſcarlet in common; much more may it be thought, that coarſe and ſuitable garments would be provided for them, to protect them from the cold in winter [w].

ỳ. 22. She maketh herſelf coverings of tapeſtry, &c.] For the furniture and ornament of her houſe, or for her bed; which may ſignify the ordinances of the goſpel, and the decent, orderly and beautiful adminiſtration of them, wherein the church has communion with her Lord; ſee Cant. i. 16. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, garments of divers colours, ſuch as was Joſeph's coat, Gen. xxxvii. 3. and, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, may be applied to the above mentioned garments, and agrees with what goes before and follows. Her clothing is ſilk and purple; the Tyrian purple, which Strabo ſays [x], is the beſt; or purple ſilk, ſilk of a purple colour: or rather, fine linen of this colour; a dreſs ſuitable to a queen, as the church is, who is repreſented as clothed with clothing of wrought gold, with raiment of needle-work, Pſal. xlv. 9, 13, 14. ſee Ezek. xvi. 10, 13. This is not her own natural clothing, for ſhe has none by nature that deſerves the name; nor of her own working, not works of righteouſneſs done by her; nor of her own putting on, but what Chriſt has wrought out for her, and clothes her with; and which is very rich in itſelf, the beſt robe, very ornamental to her; her wedding garment, and which will laſt for ever; ſee Iſa. lxi. 10.

ỳ. 23. Her huſband is known in the gates, &c.] Of the city, where courts of juſtice were kept, and cauſes heard and tried by the judges, the elders of the land after mentioned; among whom the huſband of the virtuous woman was, where he was known, taken notice of, and celebrated; not ſo much for the beautiful garments ſhe made him, as Jarchi; but rather for his wiſdom, as Gerſom, and for being the huſband of ſuch a woman; who, taking ſuch care of his domeſtic affairs, he was more at leiſure to attend public buſineſs, and tranſact it with reputation. Chriſt is the huſband of the church in general, and of particular churches, and of every private believer; he fell in love with them, aſked them of his Father, and betrothed them to himſelf; and is a kind, tender, loving, and ſympathizing huſband to his church and people; that nouriſhes and cheriſhes them, and provides all things for them, and intereſts them in all he has: and he is known by them, in the dignity of his perſon, in the excellency of his offices, and the fulneſs of his grace; he is known by them in the relation of an huſband; he is well known in the church of God, in the aſſembly of his ſaints, Pſal. lxxvi. 1. he is known in the gates of Zion, in the public miniſtration of the word and ordinances; his name is celebrated, it becomes great and famous, wherever his goſpel is preached in the world; he is "known in the provinces," as the Targum; or, "among the cities," as the Syriac verſion; among the nations of the world, in the cities of the Gentiles; as he will be, even from the riſing of the ſun to the going down of the ſame, Mal. i. 11. When he ſitteth among the elders of the land; when he ſits in his houſe, at his table, encircled by his ſaints, his ancient ones; or as King, head and huſband of his people, on his throne in the church, encompaſſed with the four and twenty elders, the repreſentatives of goſpel-churches, Rev. iv. 2—4. And eſpecially when he ſhall take to himſelf his great power, and reign glorioully before his ancients, the patriarchs, prophets and apoſtles, and all his ſaints, which will come with him; whom he has loved with an everlaſting love; who were choſen in him before the foundation of the world; and had grace given them, in him, before the world began, Iſa. xxiv. 23. and when he ſhall come to judge the world, and will appear in great glory, and be ſeen and known of all; and ſhall ſit on his throne of glory, and his elders alſo, ſitting on twelve thrones, judging the tribes of Iſrael, Matt. xix. 28. ſo Ambroſe interprets it of the univerſal judgment.

℣. 24. She maketh fine linen, and ſelleth it, &c.] She not only ſeeks wool and flax, and ſpins it, but makes it up into fine linen, which ſhe diſpoſes of to advantage to herſelf and family. Kimchi ſays [y], the word ſignifies coverings for the night, as well as day; he ſeems to deſign linen ſheets: the Arabic verſion adds, and ſells it to the inhabitants of Boſra. This, in the myſtic ſenſe, may ſignify, either the good works the church does, and which ſhe propoſes as a pattern and example to her members; or divine inſtruction, as others, the preaching of the goſpel, and the truths of it; which ſhe ſells, and others buy, though both without money and without price; for as ſhe freely receives, ſhe freely gives: or the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which is called fine linen and white raiment; which, properly ſpeaking, is made by Chriſt, and ſold by him, or bought of him as before, without money; ſee Rev. xix. 8. and iii. 18. yet this the church makes her own, by laying hold upon it by faith, and which ſhe holds forth freely to others in the goſpel; which is therefore called the miniſtration of righteouſneſs, 2 Cor. iii. 9. And delivereth girdles unto the merchant; to diſpoſe of them for her; either to ſell to others, to the Egyptian prieſts which wore them; or for their own uſe, to put their money in, girdles being uſed for that purpoſe; ſee the note on Matt. x. 9. Or, a girdle to the Canaanite [z]; the Canaanites or Phœnicians being generally merchants, the word is put for one. By theſe may be meant miniſters of the word; for as the prieſts of Rome are called the merchants of the earth, and falſe teachers are ſaid to make merchandize of men, Rev. xviii. 3. 2 Pet. ii. 3. ſo faithful miniſters, who trade for the good of ſouls, and ſeek not their's, but them, and not their own things, but Chriſt's, may be called merchants: and to theſe the girdle of truth is given; and theſe the church exhorts to gird their loins with it, as well as all her members; that they may be ready to every good work, and particularly prepared to preach the goſpel of peace, Eph. vi. 14, 15.

℣. 25. Strength and honour are her cloathing, &c.] Strength, not of body, but of mind. The church is cloathed with ſtrength, as her Lord, head and huſband, is ſaid to be, Pſal. xciii. 1. and which ſhe has from him; for though ſhe is the weaker veſſel, and weak in herſelf, yet is ſtrong in him; and is able to bear and do all things, with a fortitude of mind, to withſtand every enemy, and perſevere in well-doing: and ſhe is cloathed with honour; with honourable garments, ſuitable to her rank and dignity; in cloth of gold, in raiment of needle-work; with the garments of ſalvation, and the robe of righteouſneſs. And ſhe ſhall rejoice in time to come; Aben Ezra interprets it of old age, or of the world to come; and Jarchi and Gerſom, of the day of death: having fulneſs of food and cloathing, ſhe is not afraid of want in old age, or in any time of diſtreſs that may come; and having a good name, laughs at death, and departs in peace: ſo theſe interpreters. The church of Chriſt fears no want at any time, nor need any of her members; they have a cloathing that never waxes old, a righteouſneſs that will anſwer for them in a time to come; their bread is given, and their waters are ſure; they ſhall want no good thing: all their need is ſupplied from Chriſt; they have hope in their death, and rejoice then and ſing, O death, where is thy ſting? they will have confidence in the day of judgment, and not be aſhamed; ſhall come to Zion with everlaſting joy; and ſhall rejoice with Chriſt, angels and ſaints, to all eternity.

℣. 26. She openeth her mouth with wiſdom, &c.] When ſhe opens her mouth, for it is not always open, ſhe expreſſes herſelf in a diſcreet and prudent manner; as well as ſpeaks of things not fooliſh and trifling, but of moment and importance, and of uſefulneſs to others: or concerning wiſdom [a]; the church and people of Chriſt talk of the wiſdom of God in the works of creation, providence, and redemption; of Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and as made ſo to them; of the goſpel, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, the hidden wiſdom; and of wiſdom in the hidden part, or the truth of grace in their ſouls; of their gracious experiences; nor will they ſuffer any fooliſh, filthy, and corrupt communication to proceed out of their mouths, but ſpeak the pure language of Canaan; what is for the uſe of edifying, and being taken out of the ſcriptures is profitable for inſtruction in righteouſneſs; ſee Pſalm xxxvii. 30. And in her tongue is the law of kindneſs; or the law of love [b], grace and mercy; which is the law of Chriſt, Gal. vi. 2. ſpeaking kindly and tenderly to every one, exhorting to acts of mercy and kindneſs, and doing them herſelf: or the doctrine of grace is in her tongue [c]; the goſpel, which is called the goſpel of the grace of God, and the grace of God itſelf; it is the doctrine of the grace and love of God the Father towards men in Chriſt, as it appears in their election in him and redemption by him; of the grace of Chriſt in his incarnation, ſufferings, and death; and of the grace of the Spirit in regeneration, converſion, and ſanctification; and which contains various doctrines of grace, as of juſtification, pardon of ſin, and effectual vocation; and of ſalvation itſelf, which is all of grace: and this doctrine of grace in the ſeveral branches of it, the church, and all gracious ſouls cannot forbear ſpeaking of; it is often in their mouths, it dwells upon their tongues; and careful are they in other reſpects that their ſpeech be ſeaſoned with grace, and be ſuch that miniſters grace to the hearers, Eph. iv. 29. Col. iii. 6.

℣. 27. She looketh well to the ways of her houſhold, &c.] The buſineſs of her houſe, her domeſtic affairs; that her children and ſervants have convenient food, and in due ſeaſon; that they have proper cloathing, and keep their garments cloſe about them, and unſpotted; that every one does the buſineſs of his calling, her ſeveral officers, and private members; that a good decorum is kept, that all things are done decently and in order; that the rules of her lord and huſband are obſerved; that the converſations of all in her houſe are according to the word of God, and becoming their character: ſhe takes care of the ſick and weak, comforts the feeble-minded, and ſupports the infirm; ſhe cannot bear them that are evil, whether in principle or practice; that are immoral in their lives, or unſound in their faith; but admoniſhes them according to the nature of their offences, and caſts out the obſtinate or incorrigible. The words may be rendered, She looks well to the ways of her houſe[d]; that lead unto it, ſo Gerſom; either her houſe below, the way or entrance into which is by faith in Chriſt, and a profeſſion of it; and ſhe takes care that none be admitted but ſuch who have it: or the ways in it, the commands, ordinances, appointments, and conſtitutions of Chriſt, called the ways of Zion; and concerned ſhe is that all in her family walk in them, and obſerve them: or her houſe above, which is eternal in the heavens; Chriſt's Father's houſe and hers, in which are many manſions, and everlaſting habitations; the way to this alſo is Chriſt, who is the true way to eternal life, the ſtrait gate and narrow way that leads to it; without his imputed righteouſneſs, and the regenerating grace of his Spirit, there is no entrance into it: beſides this, there are leſſer paths which agree and coincide; as the paths of faith, truth and holineſs, and the ways of Chriſt's commandments, which iſſue in it, and which the church and her true members are careful to look unto and obſerve. The Arabic verſion renders it, the paths of her houſe are ſtrait; with which compare Matt. vii. 13, 14. Jarchi interprets theſe ways of the law, which teaches the good way, and to ſeparate from tranſgreſſion. And eateth not the bread of idleneſs; of an idle woman, as Aben Ezra; or ſhe being idle does not eat bread; ſhe does not eat it without labour; it is the bread of labour, of many labours ſhe eats, as in Pſalm cxxvii. 2. ſhe labours for the meat which endures to everlaſting life, John vi. 27. the goſpel, that bread which ſtrengthens man's heart, refreſhes his ſpirit, is made of the fineſt of the wheat, contains the wholeſome words of Chriſt, and by which men are nouriſhed up unto everlaſting life; and which particularly directs to Chriſt the true bread, the bread of life, of which if a man eat he ſhall never die, but live for ever; and on which true believers feed by faith; but though this is prepared for them, and is the gift of God to them, yet muſt be laboured for; it is not eaten without labour: believers read, hear and pray, and diligently attend all ordinances for the ſake of this food.

℣. 28. Her children ariſe up, &c.] As olive plants around her table; grow up to maturity of age, and ripeneſs of judgment, and ſo capable of obſerving things, and doing the work here aſcribed to them: or they riſe up in reverence of her, and reſpect to her, ſuitable to the relation they ſtand in to her: or rather it ſignifies their readineſs to ſhew a regard unto her, and their ſetting about the work of commendation of her in earneſt: or elſe their earlineſs in doing it; they riſe in the morning, as Aben Ezra's note is; her lamp not being extinct in the night. Jarchi interprets theſe children of diſciples; but they are to be underſtood of regenerate perſons, young converts, born in Zion, and brought up by her; the children of that Jeruſalem that is the mother of us all, Iſa. liv. 1. Gal. iv. 26. And call her bleſſed; bleſs God for her, for ſuch a mother, and wiſh themſelves as happy as ſhe is; they pray for her bleſſedneſs, peace, and proſperity, as all Zion's children ſhould, Pſalm cxxii. 6—9. they pronounce her bleſſed, as well they may, ſince ſhe is bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt; and ſo are all in her family that truly belong to her, her children and her ſervants, Pſalm lxxxiv. 4. 1 Kings x. 8. ſee Cant. vi. 9. Her huſband alſo, and he praiſeth her; that is, he is ready alſo to riſe up and ſpeak in her praiſe and commendation. Jarchi ſays this is the holy bleſſed God. Chriſt is the church's huſband, who is her maker; ſee the note on ℣. 23. he praiſes her for her beauty, tho' ſhe owes it all to him; for her comely parts and graceſulneſs, which he deſcribes with wonder; for her dreſs, her garments, though they are his own; for her faith, love, humility, and other graces, though they are his gifts; ſee Cant. i. 8, 10, 15. and iv. 1—11. and vii. 1—7.

℣. 29. Many daughters have done virtuouſly, &c.] This, according to Aben Ezra and Gerſom, is what was ſaid by her huſband and children, and which ſeems to be right; eſpecially they may be thought to be the words of her huſband. By theſe daughters may be meant falſe churches, ſuch as the church of Rome and her daughters, who is the mother of harlots, Rev. xvii. 5. Theſe are many, when the true church of Chriſt is but one, to whom ſhe is oppoſed, Cant. vi. 8, 9. Theſe may do many virtuous things externally; may make a great ſhew of religion and devotion; may have a form of godlineſs, without the power of it; and a name to live, and be dead. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, many daughters have gathered riches; or have poſſeſſed riches, as the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions, and ſo the Targum; and in this ſenſe the phraſe is ſometimes uſed for getting riches and wealth; ſee Deut. viii. 17, 18. Ezek. xxviii. 4. and may well be applied to the falſe churches, the church of Rome and her daughters, who poſſeſs great riches and large emoluments, which yet in a ſhort time will come to nothing, Rev. xviii. 17. But thou excelleſt them all; in real beauty, in true riches, in purity of doctrine, in ſimplicity of worſhip, in holineſs of life and converſation, in undefiled religion, in doing good works, properly ſo called. Chriſt's church is the faireſt among women, Cant. i. 8. So Ambroſe interprets the daughters of hereſies and heretics.

℣. 30. Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain, &c.] A well favoured look, a graceful countenance, ſymmetry and proportion of parts, natural or artificial beauty, are vain and deceitful; oftentimes under them lies an ill-natured, deformed, and depraved mind; nor is the pleaſure and ſatisfaction enjoyed as is promiſed along with theſe; and particularly how do they fade[e] and conſume away by a fit of illneſs, and through old age, and at laſt by death? And ſo vain and deceitful are the favour and beauty, the artificial paintings of Jezebel, that whore of Rome; all her meretricious deckings, dreſſings and ornaments; her gaudy pomp and ſhew in her worſhip, and the places of it; ſee Rev. xvii. 4. Jarchi interprets this of the grandeur and glory of the kings of the nations. But a woman that feareth the Lord, ſhe ſhall be praiſed; any ſingle individual, man or woman, that fears the Lord; or a collective body of them, a society consisting of such persons, as the true church of Christ does; who have the grace of fear in their hearts, which is the beginning of wisdom, and includes the whole of religious worship, internal and external, private and public: such are taken notice of and highly valued by the Lord; his eye is upon them; his hand communicates to them much grace; and many benefits are bestowed upon them here, and great honour is conferred upon them, and great goodness is laid up for them.

℣. 31. Give her of the fruit of her hands, &c.] According to Aben Ezra, these are the words of her husband to her children; exhorting them to give her the praise and glory that is due unto her. Jarchi interprets it of the world to come; at which time, it is certain, the graces of the church, and of all believers, which are the fruits of the Spirit in them, and of their hands, as exercised by them, such as faith, hope, love, humility, patience, and others, will be found to honour and praise; and every such person shall have praise of God, 1 Pet. i. 7. 1 Cor. iv. 5. and also of men and angels; to whom these words may be an exhortation to give it to them. And let her own works praise her in the gates; where her husband is known, in public assemblies; before angels and men, in the great day; when her works will follow her, and speak for her, and she will be publickly praised by Christ, as all the faithful and righteous will, Rev. xiv. 13. Matt. xxv. 21, 34—40. The Septuagint and Arabic versions render it, let her husband be praised in the gate; see ℣. 23. so Ambrose, who interprets it of the happiness of the saints in heaven.

ECCLESIASTES,

OR

The PREACHER.

THIS book has been univerſally received into the canon of the ſcriptures, by Jews and Chriſtians. The former indeed had once ſome controverſy [a] about it; and they thought to have hid it, or put it among the Apocryphal books; becauſe, at firſt ſight, ſome things ſeemed contradictory to each other [b], and to incline to hereſy [c], atheiſm and epicuriſm, and to aſſert the eternity of the world [d]: but they better conſidered of it; and when they obſerved thoſe paſſages were capable of a good ſenſe, and that the whole agreed with the law of God, they changed their minds [e]. And ſo likewiſe it has been rejected by ſome heretical perſons, of the Chriſtian name, as Theodore of Mopſueſt, and others; and by deiſts, and ſome deiſtically inclined. But it carries in it ſuch internal evidences of a divine original, as cannot well be denied; it delivers out and inculcates ſuch divine inſtructions, concerning the duties of men to God, and one another; concerning the contempt of the world, and the carnal pleaſures of it; the fear and worſhip of God, and a future judgment; as none but the wiſdom of God could ſuggeſt. There are various things in it which ſeem to be referred to by Chriſt and his apoſtles; at leaſt there is an entire agreement between them: among the many things that might be obſerved, compare chap. xi. 5. and xii. 11. with John iii. 8. and x. 16. chap. xi. 9. and xii. 14. with 2 Cor. v. 10. 1 Cor. iv. 5. and chap. vii. 20. with 1 John i. 8. As to the author of it, there are evident marks of its being wrote by Solomon; yet, by ſome Jewiſh writers, it is aſcribed to Iſaiah [f], which ſeems exceeding ſtrange; for though he was a great prophet, and an evangelical preacher, yet no king in Jeruſalem; whatever may be ſaid for his being of the houſe of David, and of the royal family, as ſome have thought: and beſides, there is no agreement in ſtile between this book and the writings of Iſaiah. Others of them aſcribe it to Hezekiah and his men [g]; Hezekiah was indeed the ſon of David, and David is expreſly called his father; and he was a prince of great character, both with reſpect to religion, and to wealth and grandeur; ſee 2 Chron. xxix. 2. and xxxii. 27—29. 2 Kings xviii. 5. which might induce them to ſuch a conceit; though it ſeems to take its riſe from Hezekiah's men being the copiers of ſome of Solomon's proverbs, Prov. xxv. 1. but the proof from thence muſt be exceeding weak; that becauſe they were the tranſcribers of ſome of his proverbs, therefore were the writers of this book; and eſpecially king Hezekiah; for whatever may be ſaid of his character, it falls greatly ſhort of Solomon's, for wiſdom or riches; and ſuch things are ſaid with reſpect to both in this book, as cannot agree with him: and, on the other hand, it does not appear that he was addicted to wine and women, and gave himſelf a looſe to carnal pleaſures, as the writer of this book had formerly done. Grotius thinks it was wrote by ſome perſons in the times of Zorobabel, and publiſhed under the name of Solomon, as a penitent; which is quite ſhocking, that an inſpired writing ſhould have a falſe title put to it, and be impoſed upon the church of God under a wrong name: beſides, the name of Solomon is never mentioned in it; though this by the way betrays a conviction, that he is intended in the title of it: nor are many perſons concerned in it; it appears throughout the whole to be the work of a ſingle perſon, who often ſpeaks as ſuch in it. That Zorobabel ſhould be meant, by the one ſhepherd, chap. xii. 11. is a mere fancy; it is better interpreted, as by many, of Jeſus Chriſt: his chief argument for this conjecture is, becauſe there are three or four Chaldee words in it, as he ſuppoſes; which yet does not appear, and are no where to be found but in Daniel, Ezra, and the Chaldee interpreter: and ſo there are in the book of Proverbs, chap. xxxi. 2, 3. but it does not follow, that becauſe theſe words, or others, are but once uſed in ſcripture, that they are not originally Hebrew; ſince the language was more extenſive and better underſtood in Solomon's time than now, when we have only the copy of the Old Teſtament in which it is preſerved. In ſhort, what is ſaid of the deſcent and dignity of the writer of this book, of his wiſdom, wealth, riches and grandeur, of his virtues and of his vices, agrees with none as with Solomon; to which may be added, that there is one paſſage in it, the ſame he uſed in his prayer at the dedication of the temple, chap. vii. 20. compared with 1 Kings viii. 46. As to the time in which it was written by him, it ſeems to have been in his old age, as the Jewiſh writers obſerve [h]; after his ſin and fall, and recovery out of it, and when he was brought to true repentance for it: it was after he had made him great works, and built houſes, his own houſe and the houſe of God, which were twenty years in building; it was after he had acquired not only vaſt riches and treaſures, which muſt require time, but had got knowledge of all things in nature; and had ſeen all the works that are done under the ſun, and had made trial of all pleaſures that were to be enjoyed; ſee chap. i. and ii. it was after he had been enſnared by women, which he confeſſes and laments, chap. vii. 26. and his deſcription of old age ſeems to be made, not merely upon the theory of it, but from a feeling experience of the evils and infirmities of it, chap. xii. 1—6. The general ſcope and deſign of it is to expoſe the vanity of all worldly enjoyments; to ſhew that a man's happineſs does not lie in natural wiſdom and knowledge; nor in worldly wealth; nor in civil honour, power and authority; nor in the mere externals of religion; but in the fear of God, and the worſhip of him. It encourages men to a free uſe of the good things of life in a moderate way, with thankfulneſs to God; to ſubmit with chearfulneſs to adverſe diſpenſations of providence; to fear God, and honour the king; to be dutiful to civil magiſtrates, and kind to the poor; to expect a future ſtate, and an awful judgment; with many other uſeful things.

CHAP. I.

AFTER the title of the book, which deſcribes the author of it, by his office, as a preacher; by his deſcent, as the ſon of David; and by his dignity, king in Jeruſalem, ℣. 1. the principal doctrine inſiſted on in it is laid down, that the world, and all things in it, are moſt vain things, ℣. 2. Which is proved in general, by the unprofitableneſs of all labour to attain them, be they what they will, wiſdom, knowledge, riches, honours and pleaſures, ℣. 3. by the ſhort continuance of men on earth, though that abides, ℣. 4. by the conſtant revolution, going and returning of the moſt uſeful creatures, the ſun, winds and water, ℣. 5—7. by the unfruitful and unſatisfactory labour all things are full of, ℣. 8. by the continual repetition of the ſame things, and the oblivion of them, ℣. 9—11. and by Solomon's own experience in one particular thing; his ſearch after, and acquiſition of knowledge and wiſdom, which he attained a large ſhare of; and which he found attended with labour, difficulty, and little ſatisfaction, nay, was vanity and vexation of ſpirit; for, as his knowledge increaſed, ſo did his grief and ſorrow, ℣. 12—18.

℣. 1. The words of the preacher, &c.] Or the preacher's ſermon. The whole book is one continued diſcourſe, and an excellent one it is; conſiſting not of mere words, but of ſolid matter; of things of the greateſt importance, clothed with words apt and acceptable, which the preacher ſought out, chap. xii. 10. The Targum is, "the "words of the prophecy, which the preacher, who "is Solomon, propheſied." According to which, this book is prophetical; and ſo it interprets it, and owns it to be Solomon's. The word Koheleth, rendered preacher, is by ſome taken to be a proper name of Solomon; who, beſides the name of Solomon, his parents gave him, and Jedidiah, as the Lord called him, had the name of Koheleth; nay, the Jews ſay [i], he had ſeven names, and to theſe three, add four more, Agur, Jake, Ithiel and Lemuel: the word by many is left untranſlated [k]; but it ſeems rather to be an appellative, and is by ſome rendered gathered, or the ſoul-gathered [l]. Solomon had apoſtatiſed from the church and people of God, and had followed idols; but now was brought back by repentance, and was gathered into the fold, from whence he had ſtrayed as a loſt ſheep; and therefore chooſes to call himſelf by this name, when he preached his recantation-ſermon, as this book may be ſaid to be. Others rather render it, the gatherer [m]; and was ſo called, as the Jewiſh writers ſay [n], either becauſe he gathered and got much wiſdom, as it is certain he did; or becauſe he gathered much people from all parts, to hear his wiſdom, 1 Kings iv. 34. and x. 1. in which he was a type of Chriſt, Gen. xlix. 10. John iii. 26. Matt. xxiii. 37. or this diſcourſe of his was delivered in a large congregation, got together for that purpoſe; as he gathered and aſſembled together the heads and chief of the people, at the dedication of the temple, 1 Kings viii. 1. ſo he might call them together to hear the retraction he made of his ſins and errors, and repentance for them: and this might juſtly intitle him to the character of a preacher, as we render it, an office of great honour, as well as of great importance to the ſouls of men; which Solomon, though a king, did not diſdain to appear in; as David his father before him, and Noah before him, the father, king, and governor of the new world, Pſal. xxxiv. 11. 2 Pet. ii. 5. The word uſed is in the feminine gender, as miniſters of the goſpel are ſometimes expreſſed by a word of the like kind; and are called maidens, Pſal. lxviii. 11.

Prov. ix. 3. to denote their virgin-purity, and incorruptneſs in doctrine and converſation: and here ſome reſpect may be had to wiſdom, or Chriſt, frequently ſpoken of by Solomon, as a woman, and who now ſpoke by him; which is a much better reaſon for the uſe of the word, than his effeminacy, which his ſin or his old age had brought him to. The word ſoul may be ſupplied, as by ſome, and be rendered, the preaching ſoul[o]; ſince no doubt he performed his work as ſuch with all his heart and ſoul. He further deſcribes himſelf by his deſcent, The ſon of David; which he mentions either as an honour to him, that he was the ſon of ſo great, ſo wiſe, ſo holy and good a man; or as an aggravation of his fall, that being the deſcendent of ſuch a perſon, and having had ſo religious an education, and ſo good an example before him, and yet ſhould ſin ſo foully, as he had done; and it might alſo encourage him, that he had intereſt in the ſure mercies of David, and in the promiſes made to him, that when his children ſinned, they ſhould be chaſtiſed, yet his loving-kindneſs and covenant ſhould not depart from them. King of Jeruſalem; not of Jeruſalem only, but of all Iſrael, for as yet no diviſion was made; ſee ỷ. 12. In Jeruſalem, the city of wiſdom, as Jarchi obſerves, where many wiſe and good men dwelt, as well as it was the metropolis of the nation; and, which was more, it was the city where the temple ſtood, and where the worſhip of God was performed, and his prieſts miniſtered, and his people ſerved Him; and yet he, their king, that ſhould have ſet them a better example, fell into idolatry!

ỷ. 2. Vanity of vanities, ſaith the preacher, &c.] This is the preacher's text; the theme and ſubject he after enlarges upon, and proves by an induction of particulars; it is the ſum of the whole book. Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; moſt extremely vain, exceedingly ſo, the height of vanity; this is repeated, both for the confirmation of it, men being hard of belief of it; and to ſhew how much the preacher was affected with it himſelf, and to affect others with the ſame. The Targum reads, vanity of vanities in this world; which is right as to the ſenſe of the paſſage; for though the world, and all things in it, were made by God, and are very good; yet, in compariſon of him, are leſs than nothing and vanity; and eſpecially as become ſubject to it through ſin, a curſe being brought upon the earth by it; and all the creatures made for the uſe of men liable to be abuſed, and are abuſed, through luxury, intemperance and cruelty; and the whole world uſurped by Satan, as the god of it. Nor is there any thing in it, and put it all together, that can give ſatisfaction and contentment; and all is fickle, fluid, tranſitory and vaniſhing, and in a ſhort time will come to an end: the riches of the world afford no real happineſs, having no ſubſtance in them, and being of no long continuance; nor can a man procure happineſs for himſelf or others, or avert wrath to come, and ſecure from it; and eſpecially theſe are vanity, when compared with the true riches, the riches of grace and glory, which are ſolid, ſubſtantial, ſatisfying, and are for ever: the honours of this world are empty things, laſt a very ſhort time; and are nothing in compariſon of the honour that comes from God, and all the ſaints have, in the enjoyment of grace here, and glory hereafter: the ſinful pleaſures of life are imaginary things, ſhort-lived ones; and not to be mentioned with ſpiritual pleaſures, enjoyed in the houſe of God, under the word and ordinances; and eſpecially with thoſe pleaſures for evermore, at the right hand of God. Natural wiſdom and knowledge, the beſt thing in the world; yet much of it is only in opinion; a great deal of it falſe; and none ſaving, and of any worth, in compariſon of the knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt; all the forms of religion, and external righteouſneſs, where there is not the true fear and grace of God, are all vain and empty things. Man, the principal creature in the world, is vain man; that is his proper character in nature and religion, deſtitute of grace: every man is vain, nay, vanity itſelf; high and low, rich and poor, learned or unlearned; nay, man at his beſt eſtate, as worldly and natural, is ſo; as even Adam was in his ſtate of innocence, being fickle and mutable, and hence he fell, Pſal. xxxix. 5, 11. and lxii. 9. and eſpecially his fallen poſterity, whoſe bodies are tenements of clay; their beauty vain and deceitful; their circumſtances changeable; their minds empty of all that is good; their thoughts and imaginations vain; their words, and works, and actions, and their whole life and converſation; they are not at all to be truſted in for help, by themſelves or others. The Targum is, "when Solomon, king of "Iſrael, ſaw by the ſpirit of prophecy, that the "kingdom of Rehoboam his ſon would be divided "with Jeroboam, the ſon of Nebat; and that Je"ruſalem, and the houſe of the ſanctuary, would "be deſtroyed, and the people of the children of "Iſrael would be carried captive; he ſaid by his "word, Vanity of vanities in this world, vanity of "vanities; all that I and my father David have la"boured for, all is vanity!"

ỷ. 3. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the ſun?] This is a general proof of the vanity of all things, ſince there is no profit ariſes to a man of all his labour; for though it is put by way of queſtion, it carries in it a ſtrong negative. All things a man enjoys he gets by labour; for man, through ſin, is doomed and born unto it, Job v. 7. he gets his bread by the ſweat of his brow, which is a part of the curſe for ſin; and the wealth and riches got by a diligent hand, with a divine bleſſing, are got by labour; and ſo all knowledge of natural and civil things, is acquired thro' much labour and wearineſs of the fleſh; and theſe are things a man labours for under the ſun, which meaſures out the time of his labour: when the ſun riſeth, man goeth forth to his labour; and by the light and comfortable warmth of it, he performs his work with more exactneſs and chearfulneſs; in ſome climates, and in ſome ſeaſons, its heat, eſpecially at noon, makes labour burdenſome, which is called, bearing the heat and burden of the day, Matt. xx. 12. and when it ſets, it cloſes the time of ſervice and labour, and therefore the ſervant earneſtly deſires the evening-ſhadow, Job vii. 2. But now, of what profit and advantage is all this labour man takes under the ſun, towards his happineſs in the world above the ſun? that glory and felicity, which lies in ſuper-celeſtial places in Chriſt Jeſus? none at all. Or, what remains of all his labour[p]? as it may be rendered; that is, after death: ſo the Targum, "what is there remains to a man "after he is dead, of all his labour which he la"boured under the ſun in this world?" nothing at all. He goes naked out of the world, as he came into it; he can carry nothing away with him of all his wealth and ſubſtance he has acquired; nor any of his worldly glory, and grandeur, and titles of honour; theſe all die with him, his glory does not deſcend after him; wherefore it is a clear caſe, that all theſe things are vanity of vanities; ſee Job i. 21. 1 Tim. vi. 7. Pſal. xlix. 16, 17. Eccl. v. 15. And indeed, works of righteouſneſs done by men, and truſted in, and by which they labour to eſtabliſh a juſtifying righteouſneſs, are of no profit and advantage to them in the buſineſs of juſtification and ſalvation; indeed, when theſe are done from right principles, and with right views, the labour in them ſhall not be in vain; God will not forget it; it ſhall have a reward of grace, though not of debt.

℣. 4. One generation paſſeth away, and another generation cometh, &c.] This ſhews that a man can have no profit of all his labour under the ſun, becauſe of his ſhort continuance; as ſoon almoſt as he has got any thing by his labour, he muſt leave it: not only particular perſons, but families, nations and kingdoms; even all the inhabitants of the world, that are cotemporaries, live together in the ſame age, in a certain period of time; theſe gradually go off by death, till the whole generation is conſumed, as the generation of the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs were. Death is meant by paſſing away; it is a going out of time into eternity; a departure out of this world to another; a quitting of the earthly houſe of this tabernacle for the grave, the houſe appointed for all living; it is man's going to his long home: and this is going the way of all the earth; in a ſhort time a whole race or generation of men go off the ſtage of the world, and then another ſucceeds [q]; they come in by birth; and men are deſcribed from their birth, by ſuch as come into the world; for which there is a ſet time, as well as for going out, John i. 9. Eccl. iii. 2. and theſe having been a while in the world, go off to make room for another generation; and ſo things have been from the beginning of the world, and will be to the end of it. Homer [r] illuſtrates this by the ſucceſſion of leaves of trees; as is the generation of trees, he ſays, ſuch is that of men; ſome leaves the wind ſheds them on the ground; others the budding foreſt puts forth, and they grow in their room in the ſpring-time; ſo is the generation of men; one is born, and another ceaſes. Now death puts an end to all a man's enjoyments got by labour, his riches, honour, and natural knowledge; theſe all ceaſe with him, and therefore he has no profit of all his labour under the ſun. But the earth abideth for ever; for a long time, until the diſſolution of all things; and then, though that and all in it will be burnt up, yet it will rather be changed than deſtroyed; the form of it will be altered, when the ſubſtance of it will continue; it will not be annihilated, but renewed and refined. This is mentioned to ſhew that the earth, which was made for man, of which he is the inhabitant and proprietor, is more ſtable than he himſelf; he ſoon paſſes off from it, but that continues; he returns to the earth, from whence he came, but that remains as it did; he dies, and leaves the earth behind him, and all his acquiſitions in it; and therefore what profit has he of all his labours on it? Beſides, that remains to have the ſame things tranſacted on it, over and over again, as has been already; God, that made it for men to dwell in, has determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of mens habitations in it; he has appointed who ſhall dwell on it, and where, in ſucceſſive generations; and till all theſe men are born and gone off, age after age, the earth ſhall continue, and then paſs through its laſt change. The Targum is, "the earth ſtands "for ever, to bear the vengeance that is to come "upon the world for the ſins of the children of "men." The Midraſh Tanchuma, as Jarchi obſerves, interprets it of all the righteous of Iſrael, called the earth; and he himſelf, of the meek that ſhall inherit the earth: ſays R. Iſaac [s], "one king"dom comes, and another kingdom goes, but Iſ"rael abideth for ever."

℣. 5. The ſun alſo ariſeth, and the ſun goeth down, and haſteth to his place where he aroſe.] The ſun riſes in the morning and ſets at evening in our hemiſphere, according to the appearance of things; and then it makes haſte to go round the other hemiſphere in the night: it pants, as the word [t] ſignifies; the ſame figure is uſed by other writers [u]; like a man out of breath with running; ſo this glorious body, which rejoiceth as a ſtrong man to run his race, and whoſe circuit is from one end of the heavens to the other, Pſal. xix. 5, 6. is in haſte to get to the place where he roſe in the morning, and there he makes no ſtop, but purſues his courſe in the ſame track again. By this inſtance is exemplified the ſucceſſion of the generations of men one after another, as the riſing and ſetting of the ſun continually follows each other; and alſo ſets forth the reſtleſs ſtate of things in the world, which, like the ſun, are never at a ſtand, but always moving, and ſwiftly taking their courſe; and likewiſe the changeable ſtate of man, who, like the riſing ſun, and when at noon-day, is in flouriſhing circumſtances, and in the height of proſperity, but as this declines and ſets, ſo he has his declining times and days of adverſity. Moreover, like the riſing ſun, he comes into this world and appears for a while, and then, like the ſetting ſun, he dies; only with this difference, in which the ſun has the preference to him, as the earth before had; the ſun haſtens and comes to its place from whence it aroſe, but man lies down and riſes not again till the heavens be no more, and never returns to his place in this world, that knows him no more, Job vii. 10. and xiv. 12. The Jews [w] ſay, before the ſun of one righteous man ſets, the ſun of another righteous man riſes.

℣. 6. The wind goeth toward the ſouth, and turneth about unto the north, &c.] The word wind is not in this clauſe in the original text, but is taken from the next, and ſo may be rendered, it goeth towards the ſouth, &c. that is, the ſun [x] before mentioned, which as to its diurnal and nocturnal courſe in the day-time goes towards the ſouth, and in the night towards the north; and as to its annual courſe before the winter ſolſtice it goes to the ſouth, and before the ſummer ſolſtice to the north, as interpreters obſerve. And the Targum not only interprets this clauſe, but even the whole verſe, of the ſun, paraphraſing the whole thus, "it goes all the ſide of the ſouth in the day-time, and goes round to the ſide of the north in the night, by the way of the abyſs; it goes its circuit, and comes to the wind of the ſouth-corner in the revolution of Niſan and Tammuz; and by its circuit it returns to the wind of the north-corner in the revolution of Tiſri and Tebet; it goes out of the confines of the eaſt in the morning, and goes into the confines of the weſt in the evening." But Aben Ezra underſtands the whole of the wind, as our verſion and others do, which is ſometimes in the ſouth point of the heavens, and is preſently in the north. It whirleth about continually; and the wind returneth again according to his circuits; which may be meant of the circuits of the ſun, which has a great influence on the wind, often raiſing it in a morning and laying it at night; but it is the wind itſelf which whirls and ſhifts about all the points of the compaſs, and returns from whence it came, where the treaſures of it are. Agreeable to Solomon's account of the wind is Plato's definition of it, "the wind is the motion of the air round about the earth [y]." This alſo exemplifies the rotation of men and things, the inſtability, inconſtancy, and reſtleſs ſtate of all ſublunary enjoyments; the unprofitableneſs of mens labours, who, whilſt they labour for riches and honour, and natural knowledge, labour for the wind, and fill their belly with eaſt-wind, which cannot ſatisfy, chap. v. 16. Job xv. 2. as well as the frailty of human life, which is like the wind that paſſes away and comes not again; and in this reſpect, like the reſt of the inſtances, exceed man, which returns to its place, but man does not, Job vii. 7. Pſalm lxxviii. 39.

℣. 7. All the rivers run into the ſea; yet the ſea is not full, &c.] Which flow from fountains, or are formed by haſty rains; theſe make their way to the ſea, yet the ſea is not filled therewith, and made to abound and overflow the earth, as it might be expected it would. So Seneca ſays [z], we wonder that the acceſſion of rivers is not perceived in the ſea; and Lucretius [a] obſerves the ſame, that it is wondered at that the ſea ſhould not increaſe, when there is ſuch a flow of waters to it from all quarters; beſides the wandering ſhowers and flying ſtorms that fall into it, and yet ſcarce increaſed a drop; which he accounts for by the exhalations of the ſun, by ſweeping and drying winds, and by what the clouds take up. Homer [b] makes every ſea, all the rivers, fountains and wells, flow from the main ocean. Hence Pindar [c] calls the lake or fountain Camarina, the daughter of the ocean. But Virgil [d] makes the rivers to flow into it, as the wiſe man here; with which Ariſtotle [e] agrees. So Lactantius [f] ſays, mare quod ex fluminibus conſtat, the ſea conſiſts of rivers. Both may be true, for thro' ſecret paſſages under ground, the waters of it are cauſed to paſs back again to their reſpective places from whence they flowed, as follows. Unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again; this alſo illuſtrates the ſucceſſion of men, age after age, and the revolution of things in the world, their unquiet and unſettled ſtate; and the unſatisfying nature of all things; as the ſea is never full with what comes into it, ſo the mind of man is never ſatisfied with all the riches and honour he gains, or the knowledge of natural things he acquires; and it ſuggeſts that even water, as fluctuating a body as it is, yet has the advantage of men; that though it is always flowing and reflowing, yet it returns to its original place, which man does not. And from all theſe inſtances it appears that all things are vanity, and man has no profit of all his labour under the ſun.

℣. 8. All things are full of labour, &c.] Or are laborious [g]; gotten by labour, and attended with fatigue and wearineſs; riches are got by labour, and thoſe who load themſelves with thick clay, as gold and ſilver be, weary themſelves with it; honour and glory, crowns and kingdoms, are weighty cares, and very fatiguing to thoſe that have them; much ſtudy to acquire knowledge is a wearineſs to the fleſh; and as men even weary themſelves to commit iniquity, it is no wonder that religious exerciſes ſhould be a wearineſs to a natural man, and a carnal profeſſor. Man cannot utter it; or declare all the things that are laborious and fatiguing, nor all the labour they are full of; time would fail, and words be wanting to expreſs the whole; all the vanity, unprofitableneſs, and unſatisfying nature of all things below the ſun; particularly, the eye is not ſatisfied with ſeeing, nor the ear filled with hearing; both one and the other require new objects continually; the pleaſure of theſe ſenſes is blunted by the ſame objects conſtantly preſented; men are always ſeeking new ones, and when they have got them they want others; whatever curious thing is to be ſeen the eye craves it, and after it has dwelt on it a while, it grows tired of it, and wants ſomething elſe to divert it; and ſo the ear is delighted with muſical ſounds, but in time loſes the taſte of them and ſeeks for others; and in diſcourſe and converſation never eaſy unleſs, like the Athenians, it hears ſome new things, and which quickly grow ſtale, and then wants freſh ones ſtill: and indeed the ſpiritual eye and ear will never be ſatiſfied in this life, until the ſoul comes into the perfect ſtate of bleſſedneſs, and beholds the face of God, and ſees him as he is; and ſees and hears what eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard below. The Targum is, "all the words that ſhall be in the world, the ancient prophets were weary in them, and they could not find out the ends of them; yea a man has no power to ſay what ſhall be after him; and the eye cannot ſee all that ſhall be in the world, and the ear cannot be filled with hearing all the words of all the inhabitants of the world."

℣. 9. The thing that hath been, it is that which ſhall be, &c.] The thing that has been ſeen and heard, is no other than what ſhall be ſeen and heard again; ſo that what is now ſeen and heard, is only what has been ſeen and heard before; it is but the ſame thing over again; and that is the reaſon why the eye and ear are never ſatisfied; the ſame objects as the viſible heavens and earth, and all therein, which have been from the beginning, theſe are they which ſhall be, and there is nothing elſe to be ſeen, and heard, and enjoyed. And that which is done, is that which ſhall be done; what is done in the preſent age, nay in this year, month, or day, ſhall be done over again in the next. And there is no new thing under the ſun; which is to be underſtood of things natural, as the works of creation, which were finiſhed from the beginning of the world, and continue as they were ever ſince, Heb. iv. 3. 2 Pet. iii. 4. the various ſeaſons of day and night, of ſummer and winter, of ſpring and autumn, of heat and cold, of ſeed-time and harveſt, come in courſe, as they always did; theſe ordinances never fail, Gen. viii. 22. Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. and xxxiii. 20, 21. The things before mentioned, the conſtant ſucceſſion of men on earth, who are born into the world and die out of it, juſt as they always did; the ſun riſes and ſets at its appointed time, as it did almoſt ſix thouſand years ago; the winds whirl about all the points of the compaſs now as formerly; the rivers have the ſame courſe and recourſe, and the ſea its ebbing and flowing, they ever had; the ſame arts and ſciences, trades and manufactures, obtained formerly as now, though in ſome circumſtances there may be an improvement, and in others they grow worſe; ſee Gen. iv. 2, 20—22. Exod. xxxi. 3—5. and even ſuch things as are thought of new invention, it may be only owing to the ignorance of former times, hiſtory failing to give us an account of them; thus the art of printing, the making of gunpowder, and the uſe of guns and bombs, and of the loadſtone and mariner's compaſs, were thought to be of no long ſtanding; and yet according to the Chineſe hiſtories, that people were in poſſeſſion of theſe things hundreds of years before; the circulation of the blood, ſuppoſed to be firſt found out by a countryman of ours in the laſt century, was known by Solomon, and is thought to be deſigned by him in Eccl. xii. 6. and the like may be obſerved of other things. The emperor Mark Antonine, l. 7. de ſeipſo, c. 1. has the very phraſe ουδεν καινον, nothing new: ſo Seneca, ep. 24. "nothing "new I ſee, nothing new I do." This will likewiſe hold good in moral things; the ſame vices and virtues are now as ever, and ever were as they are; men in every age were born in ſin, and were tranſgreſſors from the womb; from their infancy corrupt, and in all the ſtages of life; there were the ſame luxury and intemperance, and unnatural luſts, rapine and violence, in the days of Noah and Lot as now; in Sodom and Gomorrah, and in the old world, as in the preſent age; and there were ſome few then, as now, that were men of ſobriety, honeſty, truth, and righteouſneſs. There is nothing to be excepted but preternatural things, miraculous events, which may be called new, unheard of, and wonderful ones; ſuch as the earth's opening and ſwallowing men alive at once; the ſtanding ſtill of the ſun and moon for a conſiderable time; the miracles wrought by the prophets of the Old, and the apoſtles of the New Teſtament, and eſpecially by Chriſt; and particularly the incarnation of Chriſt, or his birth of a virgin, that new thing made in the earth; theſe and ſuch like things are made by the power of the divine Being, who dwells above the ſun, and is not bound by the laws of nature. Spiritual things may alſo be excepted, which are the effects of divine favour, or the produce of efficacious grace; and yet theſe things, though in ſome ſenſe new are alſo old; or there have been the ſame things for ſubſtance in former ages, and from the beginning, as now; ſuch as the new covenant of grace; the new and living way to God; new creatures in Chriſt; a new name; the New Teſtament, and the doctrines of it; new ordinances, and the new commandment of love; and yet theſe, in ſome ſenſe, are all old things, and indeed are the ſame in ſubſtance: there is nothing new but what is above the ſun, and to be enjoyed in the realms of bliſs to all eternity; and there are ſome things new[h], new wine in Chriſt's Father's kingdom, new glories, joys, and pleaſures that will never end.

℣. 10. Is there any thing whereof it may be ſaid, See, this is new? &c.] This is an appeal to all men for the truth of the above obſervation, and carries in it a ſtrong denial, that there is any thing new under the ſun; and is an addreſs to men to enquire into the truth of it, and thoroughly examine it, and ſee if they can produce any material objection to it; look into the natural world, and the ſame natural cauſes will be ſeen producing the ſame effects; or into the moral world, and there are the ſame virtues, and their contrary; or into the political world, and the ſame ſchemes are forming and purſuing, and which iſſue in the ſame things, peace or war; or into the learned world, and the ſame languages, arts, and ſciences are taught and learned; and the ſame things ſaid over again[i]: or into the mechanic world, and the ſame trades and buſineſſes are carrying on: or the words may be conſidered as a conceſſion, and carry in them the form of an objection, there is a thing[k] whereof it may be ſaid, or a man may ſay, See, this is new; ſo the Targum; there were ſome things in Solomon's time it is allowed that might be objected, as there are in ours, to which the anſwer is, it hath been already of old time which was before us; what things are reckoned new are not ſo; they were known and in uſe in ages paſt, long before we had a being. R. Alſhech takes the words to be an aſſertion, and not an interrogation, and interprets it of a ſpiritual temple in time to come, which yet was created before the world was.

℣. 11. There is no remembrance of former things, &c.] Which is the reaſon why ſome things that are really old are thought to be new; becauſe either the memories of men fail them, they do not remember the cuſtoms and uſages which were in the former part of their own lives, now grown old; or they are ignorant of what were in ages paſt, through want of hiſtory, or defect in it; either they have no hiſtory at all, or what they have is falſe; or if true, as there is very little that is ſo, it is very deficient; and among the many things that have been, very few are tranſmitted to poſterity, ſo that the memory of things is loſt; therefore who can ſay with certainty of any thing, this is new, and was never known in the world before? and the ſame for the future will be the caſe of preſent things; ſee chap. ii. 16. Neither ſhall there be any remembrance of things that are to come, with thoſe that ſhall come after; this will be the caſe of things preſent and future, that they will be buried in oblivion, and lie unknown to poſterity that ſhall come after the things that are done; and if any perſon or perſons ſhould riſe up and do the ſame things, they may be called new, though they are in fact old, for want of knowing that they were before. The Targum is, "there is no remembrance of former "generations, and even of after ones that ſhall be, "there will be no remembrance of them, with the "generations of them that ſhall be in the days of "the king Meſſiah." R. Alſhech interprets it of the reſurrection of the dead.

℣. 12. I the preacher was king over Iſrael in Jeruſalem.] Solomon having given a general proof of the vanity of all things here below, and of the inſufficiency of them to make men happy; proceeds to particular inſtances, and begins with human wiſdom and knowledge, which of all things might be thought to be moſt conducive to true happineſs; and yet it falls ſhort of it: he inſtances in himſelf for proof of it; and he could not have pitched on any one more proper and pertinent to the purpoſe, who had all the advantages of obtaining wiſdom, was aſſiduous in his purſuit of it, and made a proficiency in it above all mankind; wherefore he muſt be owned to be a proper judge, and whatever is concluded by him may be taken for granted as certain; and this is the ſum of the following verſes to the end of the chapter. Now let it be obſerved, that he was a preacher, not a private perſon, and muſt have a good ſhare of knowledge to qualify him for teaching and inſtructing others; and more than this, he was a king, and did not want money to purchaſe books, and procure maſters to inſtruct him in all the branches of literature; and when he entered upon the more profound ſtudy of wiſdom, and eſpecially when he ſaid this, it was not in his infancy or childhood, or before he came to the throne, but after; even after he had aſked wiſdom of God to govern, and it had been given him; yea after he had been a long time king, as he now was; though the Jewiſh writers, as the Targum, Jarchi, and others, conclude from hence that he was not now a king, but become a private perſon, depoſed or driven from his throne, which does not appear: moreover he was king of Iſrael, not over a barbarous people, where darkneſs and ignorance reigned, but over a wiſe and underſtanding people, as they are called Deut. iv. 6. and he was king over them in Jeruſalem too, the metropolis of the nation; there he had his royal palace, where were not only the temple, the place of divine worſhip, but a college of prophets, and a multitude of prieſts, and an abundance of wiſe and knowing men, whom he had opportunity of converſing with frequently; to which may be added, his large correſpondence abroad; perſons from all kings and kingdoms came to hear his wiſdom, as the queen of Sheba; and by putting queſtions to him, and ſo exerciſing his talents, not a little contributed to the improvement of them. Now a perſon ſo qualified, muſt be a judge of wiſdom, and what he ſays deſerves attention; and it may be obſerved, that what he ſays, as follows, is in verbo regis & ſacerdotis, on the word of a king and preacher, who would never riſk his honour, or forfeit his character, by ſaying an untruth.

℣. 13. And I gave my heart to ſeek and ſearch out by wiſdom, &c.] As he had all advantages and opportunities, ſo he did not want for induſtry and application to obtain knowledge; he gave his mind to it; he took up a reſolution not to be diſcouraged by any difficulties, but to break through them, if poſſible; he ſet about the work with great readineſs and chearfulneſs; he had a price in his hand to get wiſdom, and he had a heart unto it; ſee Prov. xvii 16. and he purſued it with all diligence, with all his might and main: nor did he content himſelf with a ſuperficial knowledge of things; but ſearched after the moſt recondite and abſtruſe learning, and penetrated into the utmoſt receſſes of it, to find out all that was to be known; and this he did, by uſing all the wiſdom and ſagacity, the light and ſtrength of reaſon, and all thoſe bright, natural parts, which God had given him in a very extraordinary manner. And his enquiry was very extenſive, it was concerning all things that are done under heaven; into the nature of all things, animate and inanimate; trees, herbs, plants, foſſils, minerals and metals; beaſts, birds, fiſh, and all creeping things; ſee 1 Kings iv. 33. with every thing elſe in nature: he ſought to make himſelf maſter of all arts and ſciences; to get knowledge of all trades and manufactures; to underſtand every thing in politics, relating to kingdoms and ſtates, and the government of them; to obſerve all the actions of men, wiſe and fooliſh, that he might know the difference, and be a judge of what was right and wrong. And his obſervation upon the whole is, This ſore travel hath God given to the ſons of men, to be exerciſed therewith; he found by experience it was a heavy taſk, which God had put upon the children of men, to get wiſdom and knowledge in the way it was to be gotten; which was very burdenſome and wearisome to the fleſh: nay, he found it was an evil buſineſs[l], as it may be rendered; or there was ſomething ſinful and criminal, which God ſuffered men in their purſuit after knowledge to fall into, and which their ſtudies expoſed them to; as to indulge a vain and ſinful curioſity, to pry into things unlawful, and to be wiſe above what is written; or to be over-anxious in attaining natural knowledge, to the neglect of things of greater importance; or to abuſe or truſt in knowledge attained unto, or be vainly elated and puffed up with it. Or this may be underſtood of the evil of puniſhment, which God inflicts on men for the ſin of eating of the tree of knowledge; and that as he is doomed to get his bread, ſo his knowledge, with the ſweat of his brow, that is, with great pains and labour; which otherwiſe would have been more eaſily obtained: but this God has done to afflict or humble[m] men, as the word may be rendered; to afflict or puniſh them for ſin; and to humble them by ſhewing them how weak are the powers and faculties of their minds, that ſo much pains muſt be taken to get a ſmall ſhare of knowledge. The Targum is, "and I ſaw all the "works of the children of men obnoxious to an "evil buſineſs; the Lord gave to the children of "men, to be afflicted with it."

℣. 14. I have ſeen all the works that are done under the ſun, &c.] All things done by the Lord, that were on the earth, and in it, and in the ſea; he conſidered them, and endeavoured to ſearch into the nature of them; and did attain to a very great knowledge of them, ſo that he could ſpeak of them to the inſtruction of others; ſee 1 Kings iv. 33. and all that were done by men, by their head or by their hands; all that were written or wrought by them; all their philoſophical works and experiments, and all their mechanic operations; as well as all their good and bad works, in a moral ſenſe; ſo the Targum, "I ſaw all the deeds of the children of men, which are done under the ſun in "this world." And behold, all is vanity and vexation of ſpirit; not only the things known, but the knowledge of them; it is mere vanity, there is nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in it, or that can make a man happy; yea, on the contrary, it is vexatious and diſtreſſing; it is not only a wearineſs to the fleſh to obtain it, but, in the reflection of it, gives pain and uneaſineſs to the mind: it is a breaking of the ſpirit[n] of the man, as the Targum, Jarchi and Alſhech, interpret the phraſe; it waſtes and conſumes his ſpirit, as well as his time, and all to no purpoſe; it is, as ſome ancient Greek verſions and others render it, and not amiſs, a feeding on wind; wind [o]; what is uſeleſs and unprofitable, and like labouring for that; ſee Hoſea xii. 1. Job xv. 2. Eccl. v. 16. and ſo Aben Ezra.

℣. 15. That which is crooked, cannot be made ſtraight, &c.] By all the art and cunning, wiſdom and knowledge of man, that he can attain unto; whatever he, in the vanity of his mind, may find fault with in the works of God, either of nature or providence, and which he may call crooked, it is not in his power to make them ſtraight, or to mend them; ſee chap. vii. 13. There is ſomething which, through ſin, is crooked, in the hearts, in the nature, in the principles, ways and works of men; which can never be made ſtraight, corrected or amended, by all the natural wiſdom and knowledge of men, which ſhews the inſufficiency of it: the wiſeſt philoſophers among men, with all their parade of wit and learning, could never effect any thing of this kind; this only is done by the Spirit and grace of God; ſee Iſa. xlii. 16. And that which is wanting, cannot be numbered; the deficiencies in human ſcience are ſo many, that they cannot be reckoned up; and the defects in human nature can never be ſupplied, or made up by natural knowledge and wiſdom; and which are ſo numerous, as that they cannot be underſtood and counted. The Targum is, "a man whoſe ways are "perverſe in this world, and dies in them, and "does not return by repentance, he has no power "of correcting himſelf after his death; and a man "that fails from the law and the precepts in his "life, after his death hath no power to be numbered with the righteous in paradiſe:" to the ſame ſenſe Jarchi's note and the Midraſh.

℣. 16. I communed with my own heart, &c.] That is, looked into it, examined it, and conſidered what a ſtock and fund of knowledge he had in it, after all his reſearches into it; what happineſs accrued to him by it, and what judgment upon the whole was to be formed upon it; and he ſpoke within himſelf after this manner: Saying, Lo I am come to great eſtate; or become a great man; famous for wiſdom, arrived to a very great pitch of it; greatly increaſed in it, through a diligent application to it. And have gotten more wiſdom than all they that have been before me in Jeruſalem; or, that before me were over Jeruſalem [p]; governors of it, or in it; not only than the Jebuſites, but than Saul, the firſt king of Iſrael, or than even his father David; or, as Guſſetius [q], than any princes, rulers, and civil magiſtrates in Jeruſalem, in his own days or in the days of his father; and alſo than all the prieſts and prophets, as well as princes, that ever had been there: and indeed he was wiſer than all men, 1 Kings iv. 30—32. and even than any that had been in Jeruſalem, or any where elſe, or that ſhould be hereafter, excepting the Meſſiah; ſee 1 Kings iii. 12. and x. 27. Matt. xii. 42. And ſeeing this is ſaid of him by others, and even by the Lord himſelf, it might not only be ſaid with truth by himſelf, but without oſtentation; ſeeing it was neceſſary, it ſhould be ſaid to anſwer his purpoſe, which was to ſhew the vanity of human wiſdom in its higheſt pitch; and it was no where to be found higher than in himſelf. Yea, my heart had great experience of wiſdom and knowledge; or, ſaw much wiſdom and knowledge [r]; he thoroughly underſtood it, he was a complete maſter of it; it was not a ſuperficial knowledge he had attained unto, or a few leſſons of it he had committed to memory; ſome ſlight notions in his head, or ſcraps of things he had collected together, in an undigeſted manner; but he had made himſelf thoroughly acquainted with every thing worthy to be known, and had digeſted it in his mind.

℣. 17. And I gave my heart to know wiſdom, &c.] Which is repeated, for the confirmation of it, from ℣. 13. and that it might be taken notice of, how aſſiduous and diligent he had been in acquiring it; a circumſtance not to be overlooked. And to know madneſs and folly; that he might the better know wiſdom, and learn the difference between the one and the other, ſince contraries illuſtrate each other; and that he might ſhun madneſs and folly, and the ways thereof, and expoſe the actions of mad and fooliſh men: ſo Plato [s] ſays, ignorance is a diſeaſe, of which there are two kinds, madneſs and folly. The Targum, Septuagint, and all the Oriental verſions, interpret the laſt word, tranſlated folly, by underſtanding, knowledge and prudence; which ſeems to be right, ſince Solomon ſpeaks of nothing afterwards, as vexation and grief to him, but wiſdom and knowledge: and I would therefore read the clauſe in connection with the preceding, thus, and the knowledge of things boaſted of, vain-glorious knowledge; and prudence, or what may be called craftineſs and cunning; or what the apoſtle calls, ſcience falſly ſo called, 1 Tim. vi. 20. ſee Prov. xii. 8. Dan. viii. 25. I perceived that this alſo is vexation of ſpirit; ſee the note on ℣. 14. the reaſon follows.

℣. 18. For in much wiſdom is much grief, &c.] In getting it, and loſing it when it is gotten: or indignation [t], at himſelf and others; being more ſenſible of the follies and weakneſs of human nature. And he that increaſeth knowledge, increaſeth ſorrow; for the more he knows, the more he would know, and is more eager after it, and puts himſelf to more pains and trouble to acquire it; and hereby becomes more and more ſenſible of his own ignorance; and of the difficulty of attaining the knowledge he would come at; and of the inſufficiency of it, to make him eaſy and happy: and beſides, the more knowledge he has, the more envy it draws upon him from others, who ſet themſelves to oppoſe him, and detract from his character; in ſhort, this is the ſum of all human knowledge and wiſdom, attained to in the higheſt degree; inſtead of making men comfortable and happy, it is found to be mere vanity, to cauſe vexation and diſquietude of mind, and to promote grief and ſorrow. There is indeed wiſdom and knowledge oppoſite to this, and infinitely more excellent, and which, the more it is increaſed, the more joy and comfort it brings; and this is wiſdom in the hidden part; a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt, and of divine and evangelical truths; but ſhort of this knowledge, there is no true peace, comfort and happineſs. The Targum is, "for a man who multiplies wiſdom, when "he ſins and does not turn by repentance, he multiplies indignation from the Lord; and he who "increaſes knowledge, and dies in his youth, increaſes grief of heart to thoſe who are near akin "to him."

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

SOLOMON, having made trial of natural wiſdom and knowledge in its utmoſt extent, and found it to be vanity, proceeds to the experiment of pleaſure, and tries whether any happineſs was in that, ℣. 1. As for that which at firſt ſight was vain, frothy and frolickſome, he diſpatches at once, and condemns it as mad and unprofitable, ℣. 2. but as for thoſe pleaſures which were more manly, rational and lawful, he dwells upon them, and gives a particular enumeration of them, as what he had made full trial of; as good eating and drinking, in a moderate way, without abuſe; fine and ſpacious buildings; delightful vineyards, gardens and orchards; parks, foreſts and incloſures; fiſh-pools, and fountains of water; a large retinue, and equipage of ſervants; great poſſeſſions, immenſe riches and treaſure; a collection of the greateſt rarities and curioſities in nature; all kinds of muſic, vocal and inſtrumental, ℣. 3—8. in all which he exceeded any that went before him; nor did he deny himſelf of any pleaſure in a lawful way, that could poſſibly be enjoyed, ℣. 9, 10. And yet on a ſurvey of the whole, and after a thorough experience of what could be found herein, he pronounces all vanity and vexation of ſpirit, ℣. 11. and returns again to his former ſubject, wiſdom; and looks that over again, to ſee if he could find real happineſs in it, being ſadly diſappointed in that of pleaſure, ℣. 12. He indeed commends wiſdom, and prefers it to folly, and a wiſe man to a fool, ℣. 13, 14. and yet obſerves ſome things which leſſen its value; and ſhews there is no happineſs in it, the ſame events befalling a wiſe man and a fool; both alike forgotten, and die in like manner, ℣. 15, 16. And then he takes into conſideration buſineſs of life, and a laborious induſtry to obtain wealth; and this he condemns as grievous, hateful and vexatious, becauſe, after all a man's acquiſitions, he knows not to whom he ſhall leave them, whether to a wiſe man or a fool, ℣. 17—21. And becauſe a man himſelf has no reſt all his days, nothing but ſorrow and grief, ℣. 22, 23. wherefore he concludes, it is beſt for a man to enjoy the good things of this life himſelf; which he confirms by his own experience, and by an antitheſis between a good man and a wicked one, ℣. 24—26.

℣. 1. I ſaid in mine heart, &c.] He communed with his heart, he thought and reaſoned within himſelf, and came to this reſolution in his own mind; that ſince he could not find happineſs in natural wiſdom and knowledge, he would ſeek for it elſewhere, even in pleaſure; in which he obſerved, ſome men placed their happineſs; or however, ſought for it there: or, I ſaid to my heart, as the Syriac verſion. Go to now; or, go, I pray thee [u]; liſten to what I am about to ſay, and purſue the track I ſhall now point out to thee. I will prove thee with mirth; with thoſe things which will cauſe mirth, joy and pleaſure; and try whether any happineſs can be enjoyed this way, ſince it could not be had in wiſdom and knowledge. Jarchi and Aben Ezra render it, I will mingle, wine with water, or with ſpices; or, I will pour out, wine in plenty to drink of, with joy, and to promote mirth: but the Targum, Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, interpret it as we do, and which ſenſe Aben Ezra makes mention of. Therefore enjoy pleaſure; which man is naturally a lover of; he was ſo in his ſtate of innocency, and this was the bait that was laid for him, and by which he was drawn into ſin; and now he loves, lives in, and ſerves ſinful pleaſures; which are rather imaginary than real, and laſt but for a ſeaſon, and end in bitterneſs: but ſuch ſordid luſts and pleaſures are not here meant; Solomon was too wiſe and good a man to give into theſe, as the ſummum bonum; or ever to think there could be any happineſs in them, or even to make a trial of them for that purpoſe: not criminal pleaſures, or an impure, ſottiſh, and epicurean life, are here intended; but manly, rational and lawful pleaſures, for no other are mentioned in the detail of particulars following; and, in the purſuit of the whole, he was guided and governed by his wiſdom, and that remained in him, ℣. 3, 9. It may be rendered, therefore ſee good [w]; look upon all the good, pleaſant, and delectable things of life; and enjoy them in ſuch a manner as, if poſſible, happineſs may be attained in them. And behold, this alſo is vanity; it will be found, by making the experiment, that there is no ſolid and ſubſtantial happineſs in it, as it was by himſelf.

℣. 2. I ſaid of laughter, It is mad, &c.] The riſible faculty in man is given him for ſome uſefulneſs; and when uſed in a moderate way, and kept within due bounds, is of ſervice to him, and conduces to the health of his body, and the pleaſure of his mind; but when uſed on every trivial occaſion, and at every fooliſh thing that is ſaid or done, and indulged to exceſs, it is mere madneſs, and makes a man look more like a mad man and a fool, than a wiſe man; it laſts but for a while, and the end of it is heavineſs, chap. vii. 6. Prov. xiv. 13. Or, I ſaid to laughter, Thou art mad [x]; and therefore will have nothing to do with thee in the exceſſive and criminal way, but ſhun thee, as one would do a mad man: this therefore is not to be reckoned into the pleaſure, he bid his ſoul go to and enjoy. And of mirth, What doth it? what good does it do? of what profit and advantage is it to man? If the queſtion is concerning innocent mirth, the anſwer may be given out of Prov. xv. 13. and xvii. 22. but if of carnal, ſinful mirth, there is no good ariſes from that to the body or mind; or any kind of happineſs to be enjoyed that way, and therefore no trial is to be made of it. What the wiſe man propoſed to make trial of, and did, follows in the next verſes.

℣. 3. I ſought in mine heart to give myſelf unto wine, &c.] Not in an immoderate way, ſo as to intoxicate himſelf with it, in which there can be no pleaſure, nor any ſhew of happineſs; but in a moderate, yet liberal way, ſo as to be innocently chearful and pleaſant, and hereby try what good and happineſs were to be poſſeſſed in this way. By wine is meant, not that only, but every thing eatable able and drinkable that is good; it ſignifies what is called good living, good eating and drinking: Solomon always lived well; was brought up as a prince, and when he came to the throne, lived like a king; but being increaſed in riches, and willing to make trial of the good that was in all the creatures of God, to ſee if any happineſs was in them; determines to keep a better table ſtill, and reſolved to have every thing to eat or drink that could be had, coſt what it will; of Solomon's daily proviſion for his houſhold, ſee 1 Kings iv. 22, 23. the Midraſh interprets it, of the wine of the law. It may be rendered, I ſought in mine heart to draw out my fleſh with wine, or my body[y]; to extend it, and make it fat and plump; which might be reduced to ſkin and bones, to a mere ſkeleton, through ſevere ſtudies after wiſdom and knowledge. The Targum is, "I ſought in my heart to draw my fleſh into the houſe of the feaſt of wine;" as if there was a reluctance in him to ſuch a conduct; and that he as it were put a force upon himſelf, in order to make the experiment. (Yet acquainting mine heart with wiſdom); or, yet my heart led me in wiſdom[z]: he was guided and governed by wiſdom in this reſearch of happineſs; he was upon his guard, that he did not go into any ſinful extravagancies, or criminal exceſſes in eating and drinking. And to lay hold on folly; that he might better know what folly was, and what was the folly of the ſons of men to place their happineſs in ſuch things; or rather, he ſtudiouſly ſought to lay hold on folly, to reſtrain it, and himſelf from it, that it might not have the aſcendant over him; ſo that he would not be able to form a right judgment, whether there is any real happineſs in this ſort of pleaſure, or no, he is ſpeaking of; for the epicure, the voluptuous perſon, is no judge of it. Till I might ſee what was that good for the ſons of men, which they ſhould do under the heaven, all the days of their life; where the ſummum bonum, or chief happineſs of man lies; and which he ſhould endeavour to ſeek after and purſue, that he might enjoy it throughout the whole of his life, whilſt in this world: and that he might ſtill more fully know it, if poſſible, he did the following things.

ꝟ. 4. I made me great works, &c.] He did not ſpend his time in trifling things, as Domitian[a], in catching and killing flies; but in deviſing, deſigning, directing, and ſuperintending great works of art and ſkill, becoming the grandeur of his ſtate, and the greatneſs of his mind: the Midraſh reſtrains it to his great throne of ivory, overlaid with gold, 1 Kings x. 18. but it is a general expreſſion, including all the great things he did, of which the following is a particular enumeration. I builded me houſes; among which muſt not be reckoned the houſe of God, though that was built by him, and in the firſt place; yet this was built, not for his own pleaſure and grandeur, but for the worſhip and glory of God: but his own houſe and palace is chiefly meant, which was thirteen years in building; and the houſe of the foreſt in Lebanon, which perhaps was his country-ſeat; with all other houſes and offices, for his ſtores, for his ſervants, his horſemen and chariots; ſee 1 Kings vii. 1, 2. and ix. 1, 19. and in fine, ſpacious buildings, men take a great deal of pleaſure, and promiſe themſelves much happineſs in dwelling in them, and in perpetuating their names to poſterity by them; ſee Pſal. xlix. 11. Job xxi. 21. The Targum is, "I multiplied good works in Jeruſalem; I builded me houſes; the houſe of the ſanctuary, to make atonement for Iſrael; the king's houſe of refreſhment, and the conclave and porch; and the houſe of judgment, of hewn ſtones, where the wiſe men ſit and do judgment; I made a throne of ivory for the royal ſeat." I planted me vineyards; perhaps thoſe at Engedi were of his planting; however, he had one at Baal-hamon, and no doubt in other places, Cant. i. 14. and viii. 11. the Targum makes mention of one at Jabne, planted by him; theſe alſo add to the pleaſure of human life; it is delightful to walk in them, to gather the fruit, and drink of the wine of them; ſee Cant. vii. 12.

ꝟ. 5. I made me gardens and orchards, &c.] Of the king's garden, we read Jer. xxxix. 4. Adrichomius[b] makes mention of a royal garden in the ſuburbs of Jeruſalem, fenced with walls; and was a paradiſe of fruit-trees, herbs, ſpices and flowers; abounded with all kind of fruit, exceeding pleaſant and delightful to the ſenſes: and, as Solomon was ſo great a botaniſt, and knew the nature and uſe of all kind of trees and herbs, 1 Kings iv. 33. no doubt but he had a phyſic-garden, well ſtocked with every thing of that kind, curious and uſeful; ſee 1 Kings xxi. 2. Gardens are made for pleaſure as well as profit; Adam, as ſoon as created, was put into a garden, to add to his natural pleaſure and felicity, as well as for his employment, Gen. ii. 8. and the pleaſure of walking in a garden, and partaking of the fruits of it, are alluded to by Solomon, Cant. iv. 12, 13, 16. and v. 1. and vi. 2. And I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits; which, as before obſerved, he had thorough knowledge of, and many of which were brought him from foreign parts; and all ſerved to make his gardens, orchards, parks, foreſts and incloſures, very pleaſant and delectable. The Targum adds, "ſome for food, others for drink, and others for medicine."

ꝟ. 6. I made me pools of water, &c.] For caſcades and water-works to play in, as well as to keep and produce fiſh of all kinds: mention is made of the king's pools, Neh. ii. 14. the fiſh-pools at Heſhbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim, perhaps belonged to Solomon, Cant. vii. 4. Little more than a league from Bethlehem, are pools of water, which at this day are called the fiſh-pools of Solomon; they are great reſervatories cut in the rock, the one at the end of the other; the ſecond being a little lower than the firſt, and the third than the ſecond, and ſo communicate the water from one to another when they are full[c]; and of which Mr Maundrell[d] gives the following account: "They are about an hour and a quarter diſtant from Bethlehem, ſouthward; they are three in number, lying in a row above each other, being ſo diſpoſed, that the waters of the uppermoſt may deſcend into the ſecond, and thoſe of the ſecond into the third; their figure is quadrangular; the breadth is the ſame in all, amounting to above ninety paces; in their length, there is ſome difference between them; the firſt being about 160 paces long, the ſecond 200, the third 220; they are all lined with a wall and plaiſtered, and contain a great depth of water." And to theſe he obſerves, together with the gardens adjoining, Solomon is ſuppoſed to allude, Eccl. ii. 5, 6. There are to be ſeen, he ſays[e], ſome remains of an old aqueduct, which anciently conveyed the waters from Solomon's pools to Jeruſalem; this is ſaid to be the genuine work of Solomon, and may well be allowed to be in reality what it is pretended for. So Rauwolff[f] ſays, "beyond the tower of Ader, in another valley not far from Bethlehem, they ſhew ſtill to this day a large orchard, full of citron, lemon, orange, pomegranate and fig-trees, and many others, which king Solomon did plant in his days; with ponds, canals, and other water-works, very pleaſantly prepared, as he ſaith himſelf, Eccl. ii. 5. this is ſtill in our time full of good and fruitful trees, worthy to be ſeen for their ſakes, and ditches there: wherefore I really believe it to be the ſame Joſephus[g] makes mention of, called Ethan, one hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem; where Solomon had pleaſant gardens and water-pools, to which he uſed to ride early in a morning." Mr Maundrell[h] alſo makes mention of ſome ciſterns, called Solomon's ciſterns, at Roſelayn, about an hour from the ruins of Tyre; of which there are three entire at this day; one about a furlong and a half diſtant from the ſea, the other two a little further up; and, according to tradition, they were made by that great king, in recompence to king Hiram, for ſupplying materials towards building the temple: but, as he obſerves, theſe, though ancient, could not be built before the time of Alexander; ſince the aqueduct, which conveys the water from hence to Tyre, is carried over the neck of land, by which he joined the city to the continent. Jarchi interprets theſe pools in the text, of places to keep fiſh alive in, and ſo the Midraſh underſtands by them fiſh-pools; though they ſeem to be canals made in the gardens, orchards and parks. To water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees; the young nurſeries, which in time grew up to large fruit-bearing trees; which, being numerous and thick, looked like a wood or foreſt, as the word is; and which canals and nurſeries both added greatly to the delight and pleaſure of thoſe places. In this manner the Indians water their gardens; who commonly have in them a great pit, or kind of fiſh-pool, which is full of rain-water; and juſt by it there is a baſon of brick, raiſed about two feet higher than the ground: when therefore they have a mind to water the garden, it is filled with water from the fiſh-pool or pit; which, through a hole that is at the bottom, falls into a canal, that is divided into many branches, proportionable in bigneſs to their diſtance from the baſon, and carries the water to the foot of each tree, and to each plat of herbs; and when the gardeners think they are watered enough, they ſtop up or turn aſide the canals with clods of earth[i]. The beauty of a plant or tree is thus deſcribed by Ælianus[k]; "Branches generous, leaves thick, ſtem or trunk firm and ſtable, roots deep; winds ſhaking it; a large ſhadow caſt from it; changing with the ſeaſons of the year; and water, partly brought through canals, and partly coming from heaven, to water and nouriſh it; and ſuch beautiful, well-watered, and flouriſhing trees, contribute much to the pleaſure of gardens."

℣. 7. I got me ſervants and maidens, &c.] Men-ſervants and maid-ſervants; the Targum adds, "of "the children of Ham, and of the reſt of the "ſtrange people;" theſe were ſuch as he hired or bought with his money. And had ſervants born in my houſe; and theſe were all employed by him; either as his retinue and equipage, his attendants and life-guards; or to take care of his houſhold, his gardens and pools; or for his horſes and chariots, and for various offices; ſee 1 Kings iv. 26, 27. Ezra ii. 58. Villalpandus computes the number of his ſervants to be 48,000; if there were any pleaſure and happineſs in ſuch a numerous attendance, Solomon had it. Alſo I had great poſſeſſions of great and ſmall cattle, above all that were in Jeruſalem before me; oxen, cows, horſes, aſſes, camels, mules, &c. alſo ſheep and goats; which, as they were profitable, ſo it was pleaſant to ſee them grazing on the hills and valleys, in the fields, mountains and meadows.

℣. 8. I gathered me alſo ſilver and gold, &c.] In great quantities: the weight of gold which came to him in one year, was ſix hundred threeſcore and ſix talents; ſee 1 Kings ix. 14, 28. and x. 14, 22, 27. And the peculiar treaſure of kings and of the provinces; whatſoever was valuable and precious, ſuch as is laid up in the cabinets of kings, as jewels and precious ſtones; and every thing rare and curious, to be found in all provinces of the earth, or which were brought from thence as preſents to him; the Targum is, "and the treaſures of kings and pro-"vinces, given to me for tribute:" wherefore if any pleaſure ariſes from theſe things, as do to the virtuoſi, Solomon enjoyed it. Moreover, among the treaſures of kings, were precious garments of various ſorts, as were in the treaſury of Ahaſuerus[l]; and when Alexander took Shuſhan, he found in the king's treaſures, of Hermionic purple, to the value of five thouſand talents, which had been laid up there almoſt two hundred years[m]; and to ſuch treaſure Chriſt alludes, Matt. vi. 19. I got me men-ſingers and women ſingers; the harmony and muſic of whoſe voices greatly delight; ſee 2 Sam. xix. 35. the Targum interprets it, both of inſtruments of muſic for the Levites to uſe in the temple, and of ſinging men and women at a feaſt: and ſuch perſons were employed among other nations[n], on ſuch occaſions, to entertain their gueſts; and are called the ornaments of feaſts[o]; as were alſo choraules, or pipers[p]. And the delights of the ſons of men; as muſical inſtruments, and that of all ſorts; ſuch as David his father invented; and to which he might add more, and indeed got all that were to be obtained; ſee Amos vi. 5. The two laſt words, rendered muſical inſtruments, of all ſorts, are differently interpreted; the Targum interprets them of hot waters and baths, having pipes to let out hot water and cold; Aben Ezra, of women taken captive; Jarchi, of chariots and covered waggons; the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions, of cup-bearers, men and women, that pour out wine and ſerve it; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, of cups and pots, to pour out wine. It ſeems beſt to underſtand it of muſical inſtruments, or of muſical compoſitions[q]; ſung either with a ſingle voice or in concert; which, according to Bochart[r], were called ſidoth, from Sido, a Phœnician woman of great note, the inventor of them; or rather, from giving unequal ſounds, which, by their grateful mixture and temperament, broke and deſtroyed [s] one another.

℣. 9. So I was great, &c.] Became famous for the great works wrought by him before mentioned. And increaſed more than all that were before me in Jeruſalem; the Targum adds, in riches; but it ſeems rather to reſpect his fame and glory among men; though in general it may include his increaſe of wealth, power and honour, and every thing that contributed to his external happineſs. Alſo my wiſdom remained with me; the Targum adds, and it helped me; which he exerciſed and ſhewed in the government of his kingdom, in the conduct of his family, in his perſonal deportment and behaviour; amidſt all his pleaſures, he did not neglect the ſtudy of natural knowledge, nor give himſelf up to ſordid and ſinful luſts; and ſo was a better judge of pleaſure, whether true happineſs conſiſted in it, or no.

℣. 10. And whatſoever mine eyes deſired, I kept not from them, &c.] Though this ſenſe is only mentioned, all are deſigned; he denied himſelf of nothing that was agreeable to him, that was pleaſing to the eye, to the ear, to the taſte, or any other ſenſe; he indulged himſelf in every thing, obſerving a proper decorum, and keeping himſelf within the due bounds of ſobriety and good ſenſe. I withheld not my heart from any joy; the Targum ſays, from all joy of the law; but it is to be underſtood of natural pleaſure, and of the gratifications of the ſenſes in a wiſe and moderate manner. For my heart rejoiced in all my labours; he took all the pleaſure that could be taken, in the works he wrought for that purpoſe before enumerated. And this was my portion of all my labour; pleaſure was what he aimed at, and that he enjoyed; this was the fruit and iſſue of all his laborious works; the part allotted him, the inheritance he poſſeſſed, and the thing he ſought after.

℣. 11. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do, &c.] He had looked at them, and on them, over and over again, and had taken pleaſure therein; but now he ſits down and enters into a ſerious conſideration of them, what prodigious expences he had been at; what care and thought, what toil and labour of mind, he had taken in contriving, deſigning, and bringing theſe works to perfection; what pleaſure and delight he had found in them, and what happineſs upon the whole aroſe from them: he now paſſes his judgment, and gives his ſentiments concerning theſe things, having had it in his power to make himſelf maſter of every thing delightful, which he did; was a competent judge, and thoroughly qualified to give a juſt eſtimate of matters; and it is as follows. And behold, all was vanity and vexation of ſpirit; nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in the whole; no true pleaſure and real joy, and no ſatisfaction or happineſs in that pleaſure; theſe pleaſing things periſhed with the uſing, and the pleaſure of them faded and died in the enjoyment of them; and inſtead of yielding ſolid delight, only proved vexations, becauſe the pleaſure was ſo ſoon over, and left a thirſt for more, and what was not to be had; at moſt and beſt only the outward ſenſes were fed, the mind not at all improved, nor the heart made better, and much leſs contented; it was only pleaſing the fancy and imagination, and feeding on wind. And there was no profit under the ſun; by thoſe things; to improve and ſatisfy the mind of man, to raiſe him to true happineſs, to be of any ſervice to him in the hour of death, or fit him for an eternal world. Alſhech interprets the labour mentioned in this text of the labour of the law, which brings no reward to a man in this world.

℣. 12. And I turned myſelf to behold wiſdom, and madneſs, and folly, &c.] Being diſappointed in his purſuit of pleaſure, and not finding ſatisfaction and happineſs in that; he turns from it, and reaſſumes his ſtudy of natural wiſdom and knowledge, to make a freſh trial, and ſee whether there might be ſome things he had overlooked in his former enquiries; and whether upon a reviſe of what he had looked into he might not find more ſatisfaction than before; being convinced however that the purſuit of pleaſure was leſs ſatisfying than the ſtudy of wiſdom, and therefore relinquiſhed the one for the ſake of the other: and in order, if poſſible, to gain more ſatisfaction in this point; he determined to look more narrowly, and penetrate into the ſecrets of wiſdom, and find out the nature of it, and examine its contraries; that by ſetting them in a contraſt, and comparing them together, he might be the better able to form a judgment of them. Jarchi interprets wiſdom of the law, and madneſs and folly of the puniſhment of tranſgreſſion. Alſhech alſo by wiſdom underſtands the wiſdom of the law, and by madneſs external wiſdom, or the knowledge of outward things. But Aben Ezra underſtands by madneſs, wine with which men being intoxicated become mad; and by folly, building houſes, and getting riches. For what can the man do that cometh after the king? meaning himſelf; what can a man do that comes after ſuch a king as he was, who had ſuch natural parts to ſearch into and acquire all ſorts of knowledge; who was poſſeſſed of ſuch immenſe riches, that he could procure every thing that was neceſſary to aſſiſt him in his purſuit of knowledge; and who wanted not induſtry, diligence, and application, and who ſucceeded above any before or after him? wherefore what can any common man do, or any one that comes after ſuch a perſon, and ſucceeds him in his ſtudies, and treads in his ſteps, and follows his example and plan, what can he do more than is done already? or can he expect to outdo ſuch a prince, or find out that which he could not? nay, it is as if he ſhould ſay, it is not only a vain thing for another man to come after me in the ſearch of knowledge, in hopes of finding more than I have done; but it is a fruitleſs attempt in me to take up this affair again; for after all that I have done, what can I do more? ſo that theſe words are not a reaſon for his purſuit of wiſdom, but a correction of himſelf for it; I think the words may be rendered, but what can that man do that comes after the king? ſo the particle is ſometimes uſed [t]; meaning himſelf, or his ſucceſſor, or any other perſon; ſince it was only going over the ſame thing again, running round the circle of knowledge again, without any new improvement, or freſh ſatisfaction, according to the following anſwer. Even that which hath been already done; it is only doing the ſame thing over again. The Targum and Jarchi interpret it of the vain attempt of a man to ſupplicate a king after a decree is paſt and executed. The Midraſh by the king underſtands God himſelf, and interprets it of the folly of men not being content with their condition, or as made by him. So Guſſetius renders it, who made him [u]; that is, the king; even God, the three divine perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit; the word being plural.

℣. 13. Then I ſaw that wiſdom excelleth folly, &c.] However, this upon a review of things he could not but own, that natural wiſdom and knowledge, though there was no true happineſs and ſatiſfaction in them, yet they greatly exceeded folly and madneſs. As far as light excelleth darkneſs; as the light of the day the darkneſs of the night; the one is pleaſant and delightful, the other very uncomfortable; the one uſeful to direct in walking, the other very unſafe to walk in: light ſometimes ſignifies joy and proſperity, and darkneſs adverſity; the one is uſed to expreſs the light of grace, and the other the darkneſs of ſin and ignorance; now as the natural light exceeds darkneſs, and proſperity exceeds adverſity and calamities, and a ſtate of grace exceeds a ſtate of ſin and wickedneſs, ſo wiſdom exceeds folly.

℣. 14. The wiſe man's eyes are in his head, &c.] And ſo are the eyes of every man; but the ſenſe is, he makes uſe of them, he looks about him, and walks circumſpectly; he takes heed to his goings, he foreſees the evil and avoids it; or the danger he is expoſed unto, and guards againſt it. Some underſtand it, in a more ſpiritual and evangelical ſenſe, of Chriſt, who is the head of the body the church, and of every true believer; of every one that is wiſe unto ſalvation, whoſe eyes are on him alone for righteouſneſs, ſalvation, and eternal life; or on whom Chriſt's eyes are; who is ſaid to have ſeven eyes, with which he guides, guards and protects his people. But the fool walketh in darkneſs; his eyes are to the ends of the earth; he walks incautiouſly, without any circumſpection or guard; he knows not where he is, nor where he is going, nor where he ſhall ſet his foot next, nor at what he may ſtumble; wherefore a wiſe man is to be preferred to a fool, as wiſdom is to folly. The Midraſh interprets the wiſe man of Abraham, and the fool of Nimrod. And I myſelf perceived alſo that one event happeneth to them all; the wiſe man and the fool; or, but I myſelf perceived[w], &c. though it is allowed that a wiſe man is better than a fool; yet this alſo muſt be owned, which Solomon's experience proved, and every man's does, that the ſame things befal wiſe men and fools; they are liable to the ſame diſeaſes of body, and diſaſters of life; to poverty and diſtreſs, to loſs of eſtate, children, and friends, and to death itſelf.

℣. 15. Then ſaid I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, ſo it happeneth even to me, &c.] The wiſeſt of kings, and the wiſeſt of men; that is, he looked over things in his mind, and conſidered what had befallen him, or what were his preſent circumſtances, or what would be his caſe, eſpecially at death; and ſaid within himſelf, the ſame things happen to me who have attained to the higheſt pitch of wiſdom, as to the moſt errant fool; and therefore no true happineſs can be in this ſort of wiſdom. The Targum paraphraſes it thus, "as it "happened to Saul the ſon of Kiſh, the king who "turned aſide perverſly, and kept not the com"mandment he received concerning Amalek, and "his kingdom was taken from him; ſo ſhall it "happen to me." And why was I then more wiſe? the Targum adds, than he, or than any other man, or even than a fool; why have I took ſo much pains to get wiſdom? what am I the better for it? what happineſs is there in it, ſeeing it gives me no advantage, preference, and excellency to a fool; or ſecures me from the events that befal me? Then I ſaid in my heart that this alſo is vanity; this worldly wiſdom has nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in it, as well as pleaſure; and it is a vain thing to ſeek happineſs in it; ſince this is the caſe, that the events are the ſame to men that have it, as to one that has it not.

℣. 16. For there is no remembrance of the wiſe more than of the fool for ever, &c.] The Targum interprets it, in the world to come; but even in this world the remembrance of a wiſe man, any more than of a fool, does not always laſt; a wiſe man may not only be careſſed in life, but may be remembered after death for a while; the fame of him may continue for a little time, and his works and writings may be applauded; but by and by riſes up another genius brighter than he, or at leaſt is ſo thought, and outſhines him; and then his fame is obſcured, his writings are neglected and deſpiſed, and he and his works buried in oblivion; and this is the common courſe of things. This ſhews that Solomon is ſpeaking of natural wiſdom, and of man's being wiſe with reſpect to that; and his remembrance on that account; otherwiſe ſuch who are truly good and wiſe, their memory is bleſſed; they are had in everlaſting remembrance, and ſhall never be forgotten in this world, nor in that to come, when the memory of the wicked ſhall rot; whoſe names are only written in the duſt, and not in the Lamb's book of life. Seeing that which now is, in the days to come ſhall all be forgotten; what now is in the eſteem of men, and highly applauded by them; what is in the mouths of men, and in their minds and memories, ere long, in future time, after the death of a man, as the Targum; or in ſome time after, will be thought of no more, and be as if it never had been, or as if there never had been ſuch men in the world. Many wiſe men have been in the world whoſe names are now unknown, and ſome their names only are known, and their works are loſt; and others whoſe works remain, yet in no eſteem: this is to be underſtood in general, and for the moſt part; otherwiſe there may be ſome few exceptions to this general obſervation. And how dieth the wiſe man? as the fool; they are both liable to death; it is appointed for men, wiſe or unwiſe, learned or unlearned, to die, and both do die; wiſdom cannot ſecure a man from dying; and then wiſe and fools are reduced to the ſame condition and circumſtances; all a man's learning, knowledge and wiſdom, ceaſe when he dies, and he is juſt as another man is; in that day all his learned thoughts periſh, and he is upon a level with the fool. Solomon, the wiſeſt of men, died as others; a full proof of his own obſervation, and which his father made before him, Pſal. xlix. 10. But this is not true of one that is ſpiritually wiſe, or wiſe unto ſalvation; the death of a righteous man is different from the death of a wicked man; both die, yet not alike, not in like manner; the good man dies in Chriſt, he dies in faith, has hope in his death, and riſes again to eternal life. The Targum is, "and how ſhall the children of men ſay, that "the end of the righteous is as the end of the "wicked?"

℣. 17. Therefore I hated life, &c.] Not ſtrictly and ſimply underſtood, ſince life is the gift of God; and a great bleſſing it is, more than raiment, and ſo dear to a man, that he will give all he has for it: but comparatively, in compariſon of the loving-kindneſs of God, which is better than life; or in compariſon of eternal life, which a good man deſires to depart from this world, for the ſake of enjoying it. The ſenſe ſeems to be this, that ſince the caſe of wiſe men and fools was equal; he had the leſs love for life, the leſs regard to it, the leſs deſire to continue in it; no ſolid happineſs being to be enjoyed in any thing under the ſun: though ſome think that he was even weary of life, impatient of it, as Job, Jonah, and others have been. The Targum is, “I hate all evil life:” Alſhech interprets it of the good things of this world, which were the cauſe of hurt unto him; and Aben Ezra underſtands by life, living perſons. Becauſe the work that is wrought under the ſun, is grievous unto me; which was either wrought by himſelf; particularly his hard ſtudies, and eager purſuits after knowledge and wiſdom, which were a wearineſs to his fleſh; or which were done by others, eſpecially evil ones: ſo the Targum, “for evil to me, “is an evil work, which is done by the children of “men under the ſun in this world.” For all is vanity and vexation of ſpirit; ſee the note on chap. i. 14.

[w] וידעתי ſed agnovi, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſed cognovi, Rambachius; but I ſaw, Broughton.

℣. 18. Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the ſun, &c.] The great works he made; the houſes he built; the vineyards, gardens and orchards, he planted, &c. what he got by his labour, his riches and wealth; and what he alſo got, not by the labour of his hands, but of his mind. Some underſtand this of the books he wrote; which were a wearineſs to his body, and fatigue to his mind; and which he might fear ſome perſons would make an ill uſe of: Aben Ezra interprets it of his labour in this book. All which he had no great regard unto, ſince it was to be left to another. Becauſe I ſhould leave it unto the man that ſhall be after me; becauſe he could not enjoy the fruits of his labour himſelf, at leaſt but a very ſhort time; but muſt be obliged to leave all to another, his poſſeſſions, eſtates, riches and treaſure; which a man cannot carry with him when he dies, but muſt leave all behind him, to his heirs and ſucceſſors[x]. The Targum is, “becauſe I ſhall leave it “to Rehoboam my ſon, who ſhall come after me; “and Jeroboam, his ſervant, ſhall come and take “ten tribes out of his hands, and poſſeſs half the “kingdom.”

℣. 19. And who knoweth whether he ſhall be a wiſe man, or a fool? &c.] The king that ſhould be after him, as the Targum, that ſhould be his ſucceſſor and heir; and ſo whether he would make a good or bad uſe of what was left; whether he would keep and improve it, or ſquander it away; ſuggeſting, that could he be ſure he would be a wiſe man that ſhould come into his labours, it would be ſome ſatisfaction to him that he had laboured, and ſuch a man ſhould have the benefit of it; but as it was a precarious thing what he would be, he could take no pleaſure in reviewing his labours he was about to leave. Some think, that Solomon here gives a hint of the ſuſpicion he had, that his ſon Rehoboam, his ſucceſſor and heir, would turn out a fooliſh man, as he did. Yet ſhall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have ſhewed myſelf wiſe, under the ſun; be he what he will, all will come into his hands; and he will have the power of diſpoſing of all at his pleaſure; not only of enjoying it, but of changing and altering things; and perhaps greatly for the worſe, if he does not entirely deſtroy what has been wrought with ſo much care and induſtry, toil and labour, wiſdom and prudence; the thought of all which was afflicting and diſtreſſing: and therefore he adds, This is alſo vanity; and ſhews there is no happineſs in all that a man does, has, or enjoys; and this circumſtance, before related, adds to his vexation and unhappineſs.

℣. 20. Therefore I went about to cauſe my heart to deſpair, &c.] Of ever finding happineſs in any thing here below. He turned about[y], as the word ſignifies; dropped his ſevere ſtudies of wiſdom, and his eager purſuits of pleaſure; and deſiſted from thoſe toilſome works, in which he had employed himſelf; and went from one thing to another, and ſettled and ſtuck at nothing, on purpoſe to relax his mind, as the Syriac verſion renders it; to diveſt it of all anxious thought and care, and call it off from its vain and fruitleſs undertakings; and be no more concerned about or thoughtful of all the labour which I took under the ſun; and what will be the conſequence and iſſue of it; but quietly leave all to an All-wiſe, diſpoſing Providence; and not ſeek for happineſs in any thing under the ſun, but in thoſe things that are above it; not in this world, but in the world to come.

℣. 21. For there is a man whoſe labour is in wiſdom, and in knowledge, and in equity, &c.] Who does all he does, in natural, civil and religious things, in the ſtate, in his family, and the world; and whatſoever buſineſs he is engaged, in the wiſeſt and beſt manner, with the utmoſt honeſty and integrity, according to all the rules of wiſdom and knowledge, and of juſtice and equity; meaning himſelf; the Midraſh interprets this of God. Yet to a man that hath not laboured therein, ſhall he leave it for his portion; to his ſon, heir and ſucceſſor; who never took any pains, or joined with him, in acquiring the leaſt part of it; and yet all comes into his hands, as his poſſeſſion and inheritance: the Targum interprets this of a man that dies without children; and ſo others[z] underſtand it of his leaving his ſubſtance to ſtrangers, and not to his children. This alſo is vanity, and a great evil; not any thing ſinful and criminal, but vexatious and diſtreſſing.

℣. 22. For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart? &c.] What profit has he by it, when there is ſo much vexation in it, both in getting it, and in the thought of leaving it to others? What advantage is it to him, when it is all acquired for and poſſeſſed by another? and eſpecially of what uſe is it to him after his death? Even of all wherein he hath laboured under the ſun? the Targum adds, in this world: though he has been labouring all his days, yet there is not one thing he has got by his labour, that is of any real advantage to him; or can yield him any ſolid comfort and ſatisfaction, or bring him true happineſs, or lead him to it.

℣. 23. For all his days are ſorrows, and his travail grief, &c.] All his days are full of ſorrows, of a variety of them; and all his affairs and tranſactions of life are attended with grief and trouble; not only the days of old age are evil ones, in which he can take no pleaſure; or thoſe times which exceed the common age of man, when he is got to fourſcore years or more, and when his ſtrength is labour and ſorrow; but even all his days, be they fewer or more, from his youth upward, are all evil and full of trouble, Gen. xlvii. 9. Job xiv. 1. Yea, his heart taketh not reſt in the night; which is appointed pointed for reſt and eaſe; and when laid down on his bed for it, as the word ſignifies; yet, either through an eager deſire of getting wealth, or thro' anxious and diſtreſſing cares for the keeping it when gotten, he cannot ſleep quietly and comfortably, his carking cares and anxious thoughts keep him waking; or if he ſleeps, his mind is diſtreſſed with dreams and frightful apprehenſions of things, ſo that his ſleep is not ſweet and refreſhing to him. This is alſo vanity; or one of the vanities which belong to human life.

℣. 24. There is nothing better for a man than that he ſhould eat and drink, &c.] Not in an immoderate and voluptuous manner, like the epicure and the atheiſt, that diſbelieve a future ſtate and the reſurrection of the dead, and give up themſelves to all ſinful and ſenſual gratifications; but in a moderate way, enjoying in a chearful and comfortable manner, the good creatures of God, which he has given; being contented with them, thankful for them, and looking upon them as the bleſſings of divine goodneſs, and as flowing from the love of God to him; and thus freely uſing, and yet not abuſing them. Some render it, it is not good for a man to eat[a], &c. immoderately and to exceſs, and to place his happineſs in it: or, there is no good with man[b]; it is not in the power of man to uſe the creatures aright. Jarchi renders it by way of interrogation, is it not good? which comes to the ſame ſenſe with ours, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion. And that he ſhould make his ſoul enjoy good in his labour; not leave off labouring; nor eat and drink what he has not laboured for, or what is the fruit of other mens labour; but what is the effect of his own, and in which he continues: and this is the way to go on in it with chearfulneſs, when he enjoys the good, and reaps the benefit and advantage of it; which is certainly preferable to a laying up his ſubſtance, and leaving it to he knows not who. This alſo I ſaw, that it was from the hand of God; not only the riches a man poſſeſſes, but the enjoyment of them, or a heart to make uſe of them; ſee chap. v. 18, 19. The Midraſh interprets this eating and drinking, of the law and good works: and the Targum explains it, cauſing the ſoul to enjoy the good of doing the commandments, and walking in right ways; and obſerves, that a man that proſpers in this world, it is from the hand of the Lord, and is what is decreed to be concerning him.

℣. 25. For who can eat? &c.] Who ſhould eat, but ſuch a man that has laboured for it? or, who has a power to eat, that is, chearfully, comfortably and freely to enjoy the good things of life he is poſſeſſed of, unleſs it be given him of God? ſee chap. vi. 1, 2. Or who elſe can haſten hereunto more than I? the word chuſh, in Rabbinical language, is uſed of the five ſenſes, ſeeing, hearing, feeling, ſmelling and taſting: and R. Elias ſays[c], there are ſome that ſo interpret it here, who has his ſenſe better than I? a quicker ſenſe; particularly of ſmelling and taſting what he eats, in which lies much of the pleaſure of eating; and this is of God; which interpretation is not to be deſpiſed. Or, who can prepare? according to the Arabic ſenſe of the word[d]; that is, a better table than I? No man had a greater affluence of good things than Solomon, or had a greater variety of eatables and drinkables; or had it in the power of his hands to live well, and cauſe his ſoul to enjoy good; or was more deſirous to partake of pleaſure, and haſten more to make the experiment of it in a proper manner; and yet he found, that a heart to do this was from the Lord; that this was a gift of his; and that though he abounded in the bleſſings of life, yet if God had not given him a heart to uſe them, he never ſhould have really enjoyed them.

℣. 26. For God giveth to a man that is good in his ſight, &c.] No man is of himſelf good, or naturally ſo, but evil, very evil, as all the deſcendants of Adam are; there are ſome that are good in their own eyes, and in the ſight of others, and yet not truly good; they are only really good, who are ſo in the ſight of God, who ſees the heart, and knows what is in man; they are ſuch who are made good by his efficacious grace; who are inwardly, and not merely outwardly ſo; who are good at heart, or who have good hearts, clean hearts, new and right ſpirits created in them; who have a good work of grace upon their hearts, and the ſeveral graces of the Spirit implanted there; who have the good Spirit of God in them, in whoſe heart Chriſt dwells by faith; and who have the good word of Chriſt dwelling in them, and have a good treaſure of rich experience of the grace of God; and who, in one word, are born again, renewed in the ſpirit of their minds, and live by faith on Jeſus Chriſt. The phraſe is rendered, whoſo pleaſeth God, chap. vii. 26. and he is one that is accepted with God in Chriſt, his beloved Son, in whom he is well pleaſed; who is clothed with his righteouſneſs, made comely through his comelineſs, and ſo is irreprovable in his ſight; and who by faith looks to, and lays hold on this righteouſneſs, and does all he does in the exerciſe of faith, without which it is impoſſible to pleaſe God. To ſuch a man, God gives wiſdom, and knowledge, and joy; wiſdom to acquire knowledge, to keep, uſe, and improve it; and joy, to be chearful and thankful for the good things of life: or rather this may deſign, not natural wiſdom, but ſpiritual wiſdom, wiſdom in the hidden part, ſo as to be wiſe unto ſalvation, and to walk wiſely and circumſpectly, a good man's ſteps being ordered by the Lord; and knowledge of God in Chriſt, and of Chriſt, and of the things of the goſpel, and which relate to eternal life; and ſo ſpiritual joy, joy and peace in believing, in the preſence of God, and communion with him; joy in Chriſt, and in hope of the glory of God, even joy unſpeakable, and full of glory; all which, more or leſs, at one time or another, God gives to thoſe who are truly good; and which is not to be found in worldly wiſdom, pleaſure, riches, power and authority: the Targum is, "to the man, "whoſe works are right before God, he gives wiſ"dom and knowledge in this world, and joy with "the righteous in the world to come." But to the ſinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up; to gather mammon, and to heap up a large poſſeſſion, as the Targum; to gather together a great deal of riches, but without wiſdom and knowledge to uſe them, without any proper enjoyment of them, or pleaſure in them; all he has is a deal of trouble and care to get riches, without any comfort in them, and he has them not for his own uſe: the Midraſh illuſtrates this of the good man and ſinner, by the inſtances of Abraham and Nimrod, of Iſaac and Abimelech, of Jacob and Laban, of the Iſraelites and Canaanites, of Hezekiah and Sennacherib, and of Mordecai and Haman. But that he may give to him that is good before God; ſo it is ordered by divine providence ſometimes, that all that a wicked man has been labouring for all his days, ſhould come into the hands of ſuch who are truly good men, and will make a right uſe of what is communicated to them. This alſo is vanity, and vexation of ſpirit; not to the good man, but to the wicked man: ſo the Targum, “it is vanity to the “ſinner, a breaking of ſpirit;” it grieves him, that ſuch a man ſhould have what he has been labouring for; or it would, if he knew it.

CHAP. III.

THE general deſign of this chapter is to confirm what is before obſerved, the vanity and inconſtancy of all things; the frailty of man, and changes reſpecting him; his fruitleſs toil and labour in all his works; that it is beſt to be content with preſent things, and chearful in them, and thankful for them; that all comes from the hand of God; that ſuch good men who have not at preſent that joy that others have, may have it, ſince there is a time for it: and that ſinners ſhould not pleaſe themſelves with riches gathered by them, ſince they may be ſoon taken from them, for there is a time for every thing, ℣. 1. of which there is an induction of particulars, ℣. 2—8. ſo that though every thing is certain with God, nothing is certain with men, nor to be depended on, nor can happineſs be placed therein; there is no ſtriving againſt the providence of God, nor altering the courſe of things; the labour of man is unprofitable, and his travail affliction and vexation, ℣. 9, 10. and though all God's works are beautiful in their ſeaſon, they are unſearchable to man, ℣. 11. wherefore it is beſt chearfully to enjoy the preſent good things of life, ℣. 12, 13. and be content; for the will and ways and works of God are unalterable, permanent, and perfect, ℣. 14, 15. and though wicked men may abuſe the power repoſed in them, and pervert public juſtice, they will be called to an account for it in the general judgment, for which there is a time ſet, ℣. 16, 17. and yet ſuch is the ſtupidity of the generality of men, that they have no more ſenſe of death and judgment than the brutes, and live and die like them, ℣. 18—21. wherefore it is beſt of all to make a right uſe of power and riches, or what God has given to men, for their own good and that of others, ſince they know not what ſhall be after them, ℣. 22.

℣. 1. To every thing there is a ſeaſon, &c.] A ſet determined time, when every thing ſhall come into being, how long it ſhall continue, and in what circumſtances; all things that have been, are, or ſhall be, were fore-ordained by God, and he has determined the times before appointed for their being, duration, and end; which times and ſeaſons he has in his own power: there was a determined time for the whole univerſe, and for all perſons and things in it; a ſettled fixed moment for the world to come into being; for it did not exiſt from everlaſting, nor of itſelf, nor was formed by the fortuitous concourſe of atoms, but by the wiſdom and power of God; nor could it exiſt ſooner or later than it did; it appeared when it was the will of God it ſhould; in the beginning he created it, and he has fixed the time of its duration and end; for it ſhall not continue always, but have an end, which when it will be, he only knows: ſo there is a determined time for the riſe, height, and declenſion of ſtates and kingdoms in it; as of leſſer ones, ſo of the four great monarchies; and for all the diſtinct periods and ages of the world; and for the ſeveral ſeaſons of the year throughout all ages; for the ſtate of the church in it, whether in ſuffering or flouriſhing circumſtances; for the treading down of the holy city; for the propheſying, ſlaying, and riſing of the witneſſes; for the reign and ruin of Antichriſt; for the reign of Chriſt on earth, and for his ſecond coming to judgment, though of that day and hour knows no man: and as there is a ſet time in the counſels and providence of God for theſe more important events, ſo for every thing of a leſſer nature. And a time to every purpoſe under the heaven; to every purpoſe of man that is carried into execution; for ſome are not, they are ſuperſeded by the counſel of God; ſome remora or another is thrown in the way of them, ſo that they cannot take place; God withdraws men from them by affliction or death, when their purpoſes are broken; or by ſome other way; and what are executed he appoints a time for them, and overrules them to anſwer ſome ends of his own; for things the moſt contingent, free, and voluntary, fall under the direction and providence of God. And there is a time for every purpoſe of his own; all things done in the world are according to his purpoſes, which are within himſelf wiſely formed, and are eternal and unfruſtable; and there is a time fixed for the execution of them, for every purpoſe reſpecting all natural and civil things in providence; and for every purpoſe of his grace, relating to the redemption of his people, the effectual vocation of them, and the bringing them to eternal glory; which are the things that God wills, that he takes delight and pleaſure in, as the word[e] ſignifies. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions render it, to every thing under the heaven there is a time; and Jarchi obſerves that in the Miſnic language the word uſed ſo ſignifies. The Targum is, “to every man a time ſhall come, and “a ſeaſon to every buſineſs under heaven.”

℣. 2. A time to be born, &c.] The Targum is, “to beget ſons and daughters;” but rather it is to bear them, there being a time in nature fixed for that, called the hour of a woman, Job xvi. 21. And a time to die; the time of a man's coming into the world and going out of it, both being fixed by the Lord[f]: this is true of all men in general, of all men that come into the world, for whom it is appointed that they ſhall die; and particularly of Chriſt, whoſe birth was at the time appointed by the Father, in the fulneſs of time; and whoſe death was in due time, nor could his life be taken away before his hour was come, John vii. 30. and viii. 20. and xiii. 1. and this holds good of every individual man; his birth is at the time God has fixed it; that any man is born into the world, is of God; no man comes into it at his own pleaſure or another's, but at the will of God, and when he pleaſes, not ſooner nor later; and the time of his going out of the world is ſettled by him, beyond which time he cannot live, and ſooner he cannot die, Job xiv. 5. and though no mention is made of the interval of life between a man's birth and death, yet all events intervening are appointed by God; as the place of his abode; his calling and ſtation of life; all circumſtances of proſperity and adverſity; all diſeaſes of body, and what lead on to death, and iſſue in it: the reaſon why theſe two are put ſo cloſe together is, to ſhew the certainty of death; that as ſure as a man is born, ſo ſure ſhall he die; and the frailty and ſhortneſs of life, which is but an hand's-breadth, paſſes away like a tale that is told, yea is as nothing; ſo that no account is made of it, as if there was no time allotted it, or that it deſerved no mention; and alſo to obſerve that the ſeeds of mortality and death are in men as ſoon as they are born; as ſoon as they begin to live they begin to die, death is working in them. A time to plant; a tree, as the Targum, or any herb. And a time to pluck up that which is planted; a tree or herb, as before, when grown to its ripeneſs, and fit for uſe; or when grown old, barren, and unfruitful; there are particular ſeaſons for planting plants, and ſome for one and ſome for another. This may be applied in a civil ſenſe to planting and plucking up kingdoms and ſtates; ſee Jer. i. 10. and xviii. 7—10. as it is by the Jews, particularly to the planting and plucking up of the kingdom of Iſrael; the people of Iſrael were a vine brought out of Egypt and planted in the land of Canaan, and afterwards plucked up and carried captive into Babylon; and afterwards planted again, and then again plucked up by the Romans; and will be aſſuredly planted in their own land again; ſee Pſal. lxxx. 8. Jerem. xlv. 4. and xxxi. 28. and xxxii. 41. It may be illuſtrated in a ſpiritual ſenſe by the planting of the Jewiſh church, ſometimes compared to a vineyard; and the plucking it up, aboliſhing their church-ſtate and ordinances; and by planting goſpel-churches in the Gentile world, and plucking them up again, as in the ſeven cities of Aſia; or removing the candleſtick out of its place; and by planting particular perſons in churches, and removing them again: ſome indeed that are planted in the houſe of the Lord are planted in Chriſt, and rooted and grounded in the love of God; are plants which Chriſt's Father has planted, and will never be rooted up; but there are others who are planted through the external miniſtry of the word, or are plants only by profeſſion, and theſe become twice dead, plucked up by the roots; and there are times for theſe things, Pſalm xcii. 14. Matth. xv 13. 1 Corin. iii. 6—8. Jude 12.

℣. 3. A time to kill, and a time to heal, &c.] A time to kill may be meant of a violent death, as a time to die is of a natural one; ſo the Targum, "a "time to kill in war;" or elſe by the hand of the civil magiſtrate, ſuch who deſerve death. Aben Ezra interprets it to wound, becauſe of the oppoſite to heal; and ſo there is a time when wounds and diſeaſes are incurable, and baffle all the ſkill of the phyſician, being deſigned unto death; and there is a time when, by the bleſſing of God on means, they are healed; the wound or ſickneſs not being unto death: ſo the Targum paraphraſes the laſt clauſe, "to heal one that lies ſick." This may be applied in a civil ſenſe to calamities in kingdoms, and a reſtoration of peace and plenty to them; which is the property of God alone, who in this ſenſe kills and makes alive in his own time, Deut. xxxii. 39. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Hoſea vi. 1. And in a ſpiritual ſenſe to the miniſters of the word, who are inſtruments of ſlaying ſouls by the law, which is the killing letter, and of healing them by the goſpel, which pours in the oil and wine of peace and pardon through the blood of Chriſt, and ſo binds up and heals the broken-hearted; and there is a time for both. A time to break down, and a time to build up; to break down a building, and build a waſte, as the Targum; to break down cities and the walls of them, as the city of Jeruſalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and to build them up, as in the times of Nehemiah and Zerubbabel: and ſo in a ſpiritual ſenſe to break down the church of God, the tabernacle of David, and to raiſe up and repair the breaches of it; to build up Zion, and the walls of Jeruſalem, or to reſtore the goſpel-church-ſtate to its glory, for which there is a ſet time; ſee Amos ix. 11. Pſalm cii. 13, 16.

℣. 4. A time to weep, and a time to laugh, &c.] There is a time for theſe things, as it goes ill or well with perſons, as to their health, eſtate, or friends; and as it goes ill or well with kingdoms and ſtates. The Jews wept when they were in Babylon, and their mouths were filled with laughter when their captivity was returned, Pſal. cxxxvii. 1. and cxxvi. 1, 2. and as it goes ill or well with the church of Chriſt, when there are corruptions in doctrine and worſhip, a neglect of ordinances, declenſions in faith and practice, few inſtances of converſion, and there are diviſions and contentions, it is a time for the mourners in Zion to weep; but when God creates Jeruſalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy; or makes her an eternal excellency, and the praiſe of the whole earth, then it is a time to rejoice and be glad, Iſa. lxi. 3. and lxv. 18. and as it is with believers, when Chriſt is withdrawn from them, it is a time to lament, but when the bridegroom is with them, it is a time of joy; when it is a night of darkneſs and deſertion, weeping endures, but when the morning comes, the day breaks, and the ſun of righteouſneſs ariſes, joy comes with it, Matt. ix. 15. John xvi. 19, 20. Pſal. xxx. 5. Now in the preſent ſtate is the ſaints weeping-time; in the time to come they will laugh, or be filled with joy unſpeakable and full of glory, Luke vi. 21. A time to mourn, and a time to dance; to mourn at funerals, and to dance at feſtivals; in a ſpiritual ſenſe, God ſometimes turns the mourning of his people into dancing, or joy, which that is expreſſive of; ſee Pſalm xxx. 11.

℣. 5. A time to caſt away ſtones, and a time to gather ſtones together, &c.] To caſt ſtones out of a field or vineyard where they are hurtful, and to gather them together to make walls and fences of, or build houſes with; and may be underſtood both of throwing down buildings, as the temple of Jeruſalem, ſo that not one ſtone was left upon another; of pouring out the ſtones of the ſanctuary, and of gathering them again and laying them on one another; which was done when the ſervants of the Lord took pleaſure in the ſtones of Zion, and favoured the duſt thereof. Some underſtand this of precious ſtones, and of caſting them away thro' luxury, wantonneſs, or contempt, and gathering them again: and it may be applied, as to the neglect of the Gentiles for a long time, and the gathering of thoſe ſtones of which children were raiſed to Abraham; ſo of the caſting away of the Jews for their rejection of the Meſſiah, and of the gathering of them again by converſion, when they ſhall be as the ſtones of a crown, lifted up as an enſign on his land, Zech. ix. 16. A time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing; or to be far from [g] it; it may not only deſign conjugal embraces [h], but parents embracing their children, as Jacob did his; and one brother embracing another, as Eſau Jacob, and one friend embracing another; all which is very proper and agreeable at times: but there are ſome ſeaſons, ſo very calamitous and diſtreſſing, in which perſons are obliged to drop ſuch fondneſſes: it is true, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, of the embraces of Chriſt and believers, which ſometimes are, and ſometimes are not enjoyed, Prov. iv. 8. Cant. ii. 6, 9. and iii. 1—3.

[h] Optatos dedit amplexus, Virgil. Æneid. 8. v. 405.

℣. 6. A time to get, and a time to loſe, &c.] To get ſubſtance, as the Targum, and to loſe it; wealth and riches, honour and glory, wiſdom and knowledge: or, to ſeek, and to loſe[i]; a time when the ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael, or God's elect, were loſt, and a time to ſeek them again; which was done by Chriſt in redemption, and by the Spirit of God, in effectual vocation. A time to keep, and a time to caſt away; to keep a thing, and to caſt it away, into the ſea, in the time of a great tempeſt, as the Targum; as did the mariners in the ſhip in which Jonah was, and thoſe in which the apoſtle Paul was, Jonah i. 5. Acts xxvii. 38. It may be interpreted of keeping riches, and which are ſometimes kept too cloſe, and to the hurt of the owners of them; and of ſcattering them among the poor, or caſting them upon the waters; ſee chap. v. 13. and xi. 1. Prov. xi. 24.

℣. 7. A time to rent, and a time to ſew, &c.] To rent garments, in caſe of blaſphemy, and in times of mourning and faſting, and then to ſew them up when they are over; ſee Iſa. xxxvii 1. Joel ii. 13. This the Jews apply to the renting of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, ſignified by the renting of Jeroboam's garment, 1 Kings xi. 30, 31. the ſewing up, or uniting of which is foretold, Ezek. xxxvii. 22. Some interpret it of the rending of the Jewiſh church-ſtate, ſignified by the rending of the veil, at the death of Chriſt; and of the conſtituting the goſpel-church-ſtate among the Gentiles. A time to keep ſilence, and a time to ſpeak[k]; when it is an evil time, a time of calamity in a nation, it is not a time to be loquacious and talkative, eſpecially in a vain and ludicrous way, Amos v. 13. or when a particular friend or relation is in diſtreſs, as in the caſe of Job and his friends, Job ii. 13. or when in the preſence of wicked men, who make a jeſt of every thing ſerious and religious, Pſal. xxxix. 1. and ſo when under afflictive diſpenſations of providence, it is a time to be ſtill and dumb, and not open the mouth in a murmuring and complaining way, Lev. x. 3. Pſal. xxxix. 9. and xlvi. 10. And on the other hand, there is a time to ſpeak, either publickly, of the truths of the goſpel, in the miniſtry of it, and in vindication of them; or privately, of chriſtian experience: there is a time, when an open profeſſion ſhould be made of Chriſt, his word and ordinances, and when believers ſhould ſpeak to God in prayer and praiſe; which, ſhould they not, the ſtones in the wall would cry out.

℣. 8. A time to love, and a time to hate, &c.] For one to love his friend, and to hate a man, a ſinner, as the Targum; to love a friend while he continues ſuch, and hate him, or leſs love him, when he proves treacherous and unfaithful; an inſtance of a change of love into hatred, may be ſeen in the caſe of Amnon, 2 Sam. xiii. 15. A time of unregeneracy is a time of loving worldly luſts and ſinful pleaſures, the company of wicked men, and all carnal delights and recreations; and a time of converſion is a time to hate what was before loved, ſin, and the converſation of ſinners, the garment ſpotted with the fleſh, the principles and practices, though not the perſons of ungodly men; and even to hate, that is, leſs love, the deareſt friends and relations, in compariſon of, or when in competition with Chriſt. A time of war, and a time of peace; for nations to be engaged in war with each other, or to be at peace, which are continually revolving; and there is a time when there will be no more war. In a ſpiritual ſenſe, the preſent time, or ſtate of things, is a time of war; the Chriſtian's life is a warfare-ſtate, though it will be ſoon accompliſhed, in which he is engaging, in fighting with ſpiritual enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world: the time to come, or future ſtate, is a time of peace, when ſaints ſhall enter into peace, and be no more diſturbed by enemies, from within or from without. In the Midraſh, all the above times and ſeaſons are interpreted of Iſrael, and applied to them.

℣. 9. What profit hath he that worketh, in that wherein he laboureth?] That is, he has none. This is an inference drawn from the above premiſes, and confirms what has been before obſerved, chap. i. 3. and ii. 11. Man has no profit of his labour, ſince his time is ſo ſhort to enjoy it, and he leaves it to another, he knows not who; and, whilſt he lives, is attended with continual viciſſitudes and changes; ſometimes it is a time for one thing, and ſometimes for its contrary, ſo that there is nothing certain, and to be depended on; and a man can promiſe himſelf nothing in this world pleaſant or profitable to him, and much leſs that will be of any advantage to him hereafter. The Targum adds, "to make treaſures and gather mammon, unleſs "he is helped by Providence above;" though it is man's duty to labour, yet all his toil and labour will be fruitleſs without a divine bleſſing; there is a time and ſeaſon for every thing in providence, and there is no ſtriving againſt that.

℣. 10. I have ſeen the travail which God hath given to the ſons of men, &c.] The pains and trouble they are at to get a little wiſdom and knowledge, chap. i. 13. and ſo to obtain riches and honour, peace and plenty, which ſometimes they do obtain, and ſometimes not; and when they do, do not keep them long, for there is a time for every thing. This the wiſe man had obſerved, in a variety of inſtances; and he conſidered the end of God in it, which was for men to be exerciſed in it, or by it; or to afflict or humble them by it[l]; to let them ſee that all their toil and labour ſignified little; all depended on a divine bleſſing, and no happineſs was to be had in the creatures; all was vanity and vexation of ſpirit; ſee the note on chap. i. 13.

℣. 11. He hath made every thing beautiful in his time, &c.] That is, God has made every thing; as all things in creation are made by him, for his pleaſure and glory, and all well and wiſely, there is a beauty in them all: ſo all things in providence; he upholds all things; he governs and orders all things according to the counſel of his will; ſome things are done immediately by him, others by inſtruments, and ſome are only permitted by him; ſome he does himſelf, ſome he wills to be done by others, and ſome he ſuffers to be done; but in all there is a beauty and harmony; and all are ordered, diſpoſed and overruled, to anſwer the wiſeſt and greateſt purpoſes; every thing is done in the time in which he wills it ſhall be done, and done in the time moſt fit and ſuitable for it to be done; all things before mentioned, for which there is a time, and all others: all natural things are beautiful in their ſeaſon; things in ſummer, winter, ſpring and autumn; froſt and ſnow in winter, and heat in ſummer; darkneſs and dews in the night, and light and brightneſs in the day; and ſo in ten thouſand other things: all afflictive diſpenſations of providence; times of plucking up and breaking down, of weeping and mourning, of loſing and caſting away, are all neceſſary, and ſeaſonable and beautiful, in their iſſue and conſequences: proſperity and adverſity, in their turns, make a beautiful chequer-work, and work together for good; are like Joſeph's coat, of many colours, which was an emblem of thoſe various providences which attended that good man; and were extremely beautiful, as are all the providences of God to men: and all his judgments will be, when made manifeſt; when he ſhall have performed his whole work, and the myſtery of God in providence will be finiſhed; which is like a piece of tapeſtry, when only viewed in parts, no beauty appears in it, ſcarce any thing to be made of it, but when all is put together, it is moſt beautiful and harmonious. The words may be rendered, the beautiful one hath made all things in his time[m]; the Meſſiah; who, as a divine perſon, is the brightneſs of his Father's glory; as man, is fairer than the ſons of Adam; as Mediator, is full of grace and truth; is white and ruddy, altogether lovely, exceeding precious to his people: this fair and lovely One has made all things in creation; works with his Father in the affairs of providence; and has done all things well in grace and redemption, John i. 2. and v. 17. Mark vii. 37. Alſo he hath ſet the world in their heart; ſo that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end; not a ſinful love of the world, and the things of it; not a criminal deſire after them, and a carking care for them, whereby perſons have no heart and inclination, time and leiſure, to ſearch into and find out the works of God; for though all this is in the heart of the ſons of men, yet not placed there by the Lord: nor an opinion of living for ever, or a long time in this world, the word for world, having the ſignification of perpetuity in it; ſo that they regard not the work of the Lord, nor the operations of his hands, to-morrow being with them as this day, and much more abundant; but this ſenſe meets with the ſame difficulty as the former. Rather the meaning is, that God hath ſet before the minds of men, and in them, the whole world of creatures, the whole book of nature, in which they may ſee and read much of the wiſdom, power and goodneſs of God, in his works; and to ſome he gives an inclination and deſire hereunto; but yet the ſubject before them is ſo copious, there is ſuch a world of matter preſented to them, and their capacity ſo ſmall, and life ſo ſhort, that they cannot all their days find out the works of God, either of creation or providence, to perfection; or find out what God works, from the beginning of the world to the end of it; for of what he has wrought, but a ſmall portion is known by them, and they know leſs ſtill what ſhall be done hereafter: ſome of God's works of providence are ſet on foot and but begun, in the life of ſome men; they do not live to ſee them finiſhed, and therefore cannot find them out; and others are ſo dark and obſcure, that they are obliged to ſay, O the depth of the riches, both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God! how unſearchable are his judgments, and his ways paſt finding out! ſee Rom. i. 19, 20. and xi. 33. and though every thing is beautiful in its time, yet till they are made manifeſt, and all viewed together, they will not be perfectly underſtood, or the beauty of them ſeen, Rev. xv. 4. For God has put ſomething hidden, or ſealed up, in the midſt of them, as it may be rendered[n], ſo that they cannot be perfectly known.

℣. 12. I know that there is no good in them, &c.] In theſe things, as the Arabic verſion; in the creatures, as Jarchi; in all ſublunary enjoyments; in every thing the wiſe man had made a trial of before, as natural wiſdom and knowledge, worldly pleaſure, riches and wealth; the ſummum bonum, or happineſs of men, did not lie in theſe things; this he knew by experience, and had the ſtrongeſt aſſurance of it: or in them, that is, the children of men, as the Targum: there is no real good thing in them, nor comes out of them, nor is done by them; they cannot think a good thought, nor do a good action of themſelves. Or rather, the ſenſe is, I know there is nothing better for them than what follows: But for a man to rejoice; not in ſin and ſinful pleaſures, in a riotous, voluptuous and epicurean manner; but to be chearful, and enjoy the bleſſings of life in a comfortable way, and with a thankful heart; and eſpecially to rejoice in ſpiritual things, and above all in Chriſt; and not in any ſelf-boaſtings or carnal confidences, all ſuch rejoicing is evil; ſee chap. ix. 7. Phil. iv. 4. James iv. 16. The Targum is, "but that they "rejoice in the joy of the law;" but it is much better to rejoice in the things of the goſpel, which is indeed a joyful ſound. And to do good in his life; to himſelf and family, by making uſe of the good things of life, and not withholding and hoarding them up; and to others, to all men, as opportunity offers, and eſpecially to the houſhold of faith; and not only by liberality and alms-deeds, but by doing all good works, from right principles and to right ends, and that always as long as he lives, Gal. vi. 9, 10. Luke i. 75.

℣. 13. And alſo that every man ſhould eat and drink, &c.] Not to exceſs, but in moderation; and yet freely, plentifully and chearfully; and not alone, but giving the poor a portion with him; and in all having in view the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. And enjoy the good of all his labour; take the comfort of what he has been labouring for, and not lay it up for, and leave it to he knows not who: the Targum is, "and ſee good in his days, and "cauſe his children, at the time of his death, to "inherit all his labour." It is the gift of God; not only to have, but to enjoy, and make a proper uſe of the mercies of life. This is the ſame doctrine which is delivered, chap. ii. 24.

℣. 14. I know that whatſoever God doth, it ſhall be for ever, &c.] Which ſome, as Jarchi, underſtand of the works of creation, the heavens and the earth, which are however of long ſtanding and duration; and though they ſhall be diſſolved and periſh, as to their form and quality, yet not as to the ſubſtance of them: the earth particularly is ſaid to abide for ever, chap. i. 4. the ſun, and moon, and ſtars, keep their courſe or ſtation; and the ſeveral ſeaſons of the year have their conſtant revolution, and ſhall as long as the earth endures; ſee Gen. viii. 22. Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. and xxxiii. 20, 21. the ſeveral kinds of creatures God has made, in the earth, air and ſea, though the individuals die, their ſpecies remain; and man, the chief of creatures, though he dies, ſhall live again, and live for ever; ſo the Arabic verſion, "I have learned that all the creatures which God hath made, ſhall perpetually remain in the ſame order and condition:" though Abarbinel[o] interprets this of the continuance of the world for a certain time, and then of the deſtruction of it; which he thinks is ſupported by the verſe following, and which is to be underſtood of the creation of one world after another; and that which is paſt, he explains of the world that is deſtroyed. But rather this is to be underſtood of the decrees of God, which are his works ad intra; the thoughts of his heart, that are to all generations; the counſel of his will, which always ſtands, and is performed; his mind, which is one, the ſame always, and invariable, and which he never changes; his pleaſure he always does; his purpoſes and appointments, which are always accompliſhed, never fruſtrated and made void: for he is all-wiſe in forming them, all-knowing, and ſees the end from the beginning, ſo that nothing unforeſeen can turn up to hinder the execution of them; he is unchangeable, and never alters his will; and all-powerful, able to effect his great deſigns; and faithful and true, cannot deny himſelf, nor ever lie nor repent. To this ſenſe is the Targum, "I know by a ſpirit of prophecy, that all which the Lord does in the world, whether good or evil, after it is decreed from his mouth, it ſhall be for ever." This holds good of all his works, and acts of grace; election of perſons to eternal life ſtands firm, not on the foot of works, but of grace, and has its certain effect; it can never be made void, nor be ſurer than it is; it will ever take place, and continue in its fruit and conſequences: the covenant of grace, as it is made from everlaſting, continues to everlaſting; its promiſes never fail, its bleſſings are the ſure mercies of David: redemption by Chriſt is eternal; ſuch as are redeemed from ſin, Satan, and the law, are ever ſo, and ſhall never be brought into bondage to either again: the work of grace upon the heart being begun, ſhall be performed and perfected; the graces wrought in the ſoul, as faith, hope and love, ever remain; the bleſſings of grace beſtowed, as pardon, juſtification, adoption and ſalvation, are never reverſed, but ever continue; ſuch as are regenerated, pardoned, juſtified, adopted and ſaved, ſhall be ever ſo; and the work of God, as it is durable, ſo perfect. Nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it; the works of nature have been finiſhed and perfected from the foundation of the world; the decrees of God are a complete ſyſtem of his will, according to which he does all things invariably, in providence and grace; the covenant of grace is ordered in all things, and nothing wanting in it; the work of redemption is completely done by Chriſt, who is a rock, and his work is perfect; and the work of grace on the heart, tho' at preſent imperfect, ſhall be perfected; nor is it in the power of men to add any thing to it, nor take any thing from it. And God doth it, that men ſhould fear before him; his works of creation being done in ſo much wiſdom, and giving ſuch a diſplay of his power and goodneſs, command an awe of him in his creatures, Pſal. xxxiii. 6—9. his works of providence, being all according to his wiſe purpoſes and decrees, ſhould be patiently and quietly ſubmitted to; and men ſhould be ſtill, and know that he is God, and humble themſelves under his mighty hand: his decrees, reſpecting the preſent or future ſtate of men, do not lead to deſpair, nor to a neglect of means, nor to a diſſolute life, but tend to promote the fear of God and true holineſs, which they are the ſource of; and the bleſſings of grace have a kind influence on the ſame; particularly the bleſſing of pardoning grace, which is with God, that he may be feared, Pſalm cxxx. 4. Hoſea iii. 5. and one principal part of the work of grace on the heart, is the fear of God; and nothing more ſtrongly engages to the whole worſhip of God, which is often meant by the fear of him, than his grace vouchſafed to men; ſee Heb. xii. 28. Eccl. xii. 14. The Targum refers this to the vengeance of God in the world: and Jarchi, to the unuſual phænomena in it; as the flood, the ſun's ſtanding ſtill and going backward, and the like.

℣. 15. That which hath been, is now; and that which is to be, hath already been, &c.] That which has been from the beginning, now is; that which cometh, and what ſhall be in the end of days, has been already, as the Targum. Jarchi interprets this of God and his attributes, which are always the ſame; he is the I am that I am; the immutable and eternal Jehovah, which is, and was, and is to come, invariably the ſame. Or rather, it deſigns his decrees and purpoſes; what has been decreed in his eternal mind, is now accompliſhed; and what is future, has been already in his decrees; nor does any thing come to paſs but what he has appointed. So it is interpreted, in an ancient tract[p] of the Jews, of "what was before it came into the world, ſo that there is nothing new under the ſun; now it is obliged to come into this world, as it is ſaid, before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, Jer. i. 5." This will alſo hold true of natural things, and of the identity of them; of ſome individuals, as the ſun, moon and ſtars, which are as they always were, and will be; the ſun riſes and ſets as it uſed to do; and the moon increaſes and decreaſes, as it always has done; and the ſtars keep the ſame ſtation or courſe, and ſo they ever will as they have: the ſame ſeaſons are now in their turn as heretofore, and ſuch as will be, have been already; as ſummer, winter, ſpring, autumn, ſeed-time, harveſt, cold, heat, night and day: the ſame kinds and ſpecies of creatures that have been, are; and what will be, have been already; ſo that there is no new thing under the ſun; the ſame thing is here expreſſed, as in chap. i. 9. And God requireth that which is paſt; his decrees and purpoſes to be fulfilled, which are paſt in his mind; the ſame ſeaſons to return, which have been; and the ſame kinds and ſpecies of creatures to exiſt, which have already. The words may be rendered, and God ſeeketh that which is purſued, or perſecuted[q]: and accordingly the whole will bear a different ſenſe; and the preacher may be thought to have entered upon a new ſubject, which he continues in ſome following verſes, the abuſe of power and authority: and the meaning then is, the ſame acts of injuſtice, violence and perſecution, have been done formerly as now, and now as formerly; and what hereafter of this kind may be, will be no other than what has been; from the beginning perſecution was; Cain hated and ſlew his brother, becauſe of his ſuperior goodneſs; and ſo it always has been, is, and will be, that ſuch who are after the fleſh, perſecute thoſe who are after the Spirit; but God will make inquiſition for blood, and require it at the hands of thoſe that ſhed it; he will ſeek out the perſecuted, and vindicate him, and avenge his perſecutor. This way the Midraſh, Jarchi and Alſhech, and the Septuagint verſion, render the words; and ſo the Syriac verſion, God ſeeketh him that is afflicted, who is driven away; and to this agrees the Targum, “and in the great day which ſhall be, “the Lord will require the mean and poor man “of the hands of the wicked that perſecute him.” And what follows ſeems to confirm this ſenſe.

℣. 16. And moreover, I ſaw under the ſun the place of judgment, &c.] Courts of judicature, where judges ſit, and cauſes are brought before them, and are heard and tried; ſuch as were the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, of which the Midraſh and Jarchi interpret it; that wickedneſs was there, wicked judges ſat there, and wickedneſs was committed by them; inſtead of doing juſtice they perverted it; condemned the righteous, and acquitted the wicked; and oppreſſed the widow, fatherleſs, and ſtranger, whoſe cauſe being juſt they ſhould have defended. So the Targum, “in which lying judges condemn the “innocent.” Well does the wiſe man ſay he ſaw this under the ſun, for there is nothing of this kind above it; nor approved of by him that is above it. And the place of righteouſneſs, that iniquity was there; this ſignifies the ſame as before, only it is expreſſed in different words. The Midraſh and Jarchi interpret this of the middle gate in Jeruſalem, where Nergal Sharezer, and other princes of the king of Babylon ſat, and which Solomon foreſaw by a ſpirit of prophecy; but the better ſenſe is, that Solomon had obſerved a great deal of this kind in reading the hiſtories and annals of nations; knew that much of this ſort was practiſed in other countries, and had ſeen a great deal of it in his own, done in inferior courts, and by ſubordinate officers; and tho' he was a wiſe and righteous prince, yet was not able to rectify all theſe abuſes, for want of ſufficient proof, which yet he lamented, and it gave him a concern; compare with this Iſa. i. 21—23.

℣. 17. I ſaid in mine heart, God ſhall judge the righteous and the wicked, &c.] This he conſidered in his mind, and ſet it down for a certain truth, and which relieved him under the conſideration of the ſad perverſion of juſtice; and made him eaſy under it, and willing to leave things to him that judgeth righteouſly, and wait his time when every thing that was now wrong would be ſet right: he knew from reaſon, from tradition, and from the word of God, that there was a judgment to come, a general, righteous, and eternal one; that this judicial proceſs would be carried on by God himſelf, who is holy, righteous, juſt, and true, omniſcient and omnipotent; and being the judge of all the earth, would do right; when he would vindicate the righteous, and clear them from all calumnies and charges; acquit and juſtify them, and condemn the wicked, paſs a juſt ſentence on them, and execute it. For there is a time there for every purpoſe, and for every work; or then, as Noldius; in the day of the great judgment, as the Targum adds; and which continues to paraphraſe the words thus, “for “a time is appointed for every buſineſs, and for “every work which they do in this world, they “ſhall be judged there;” there is a time fixed, a day appointed, for the judgment of the world; though of that day and hour knows no man; yet it is ſettled, and will certainly come, Acts xvii. 31. Matt. xxiv. 36. and when it is come, every purpoſe, counſel, and thought of mens hearts will be made manifeſt, as well as every work, good or bad, open or ſecret, yea every idle word, and men will be judged according to theſe; ſee 1 Cor. iv. 5. 2 Cor. v. 10. Eccl. xii. 14. Matt. xii. 36, 37. Jude 14, 15.

℣. 18. I ſaid in mine heart concerning the eſtate of the ſons of men, &c.] He thought of the condition of the children of men, their ſinful and polluted ſtate; he weighed and conſidered in his mind their actions, converſation, and courſe of life; and was concerned how it would go with them at the day of judgment on account of the ſame. Some render it, I ſaid in mine heart after the ſpeech of the children of men [r]; ſpeaking in their language, and perſonating the atheiſt and the epicure, as ſome think the wiſe man does in the following verſes; though he rather ſpeaks his own real ſentiments concerning men, as they are in their preſent ſtate, and as they will appear in the day of judgment. That God might manifeſt them; or ſeparate them [s]; as the chaff from the wheat, and as goats from the ſheep; as will be done at the day of judgment, Matt. iii. 12 and xxv. 32, 33. or that they might clear God [t]; as they will, when he ſhall judge and condemn them. And that they might ſee that they themſelves are beaſts; as they are through the fall, and the corruption of nature, being born like the wild aſs's colt, ſtupid, ſenſleſs, and without underſtanding of ſpiritual things; nay more brutiſh than the beaſts themſelves, than the horſe and the mule that have no underſtanding, Pſal. xxxii. 9. mulo inſcitior, as is Plautus's [u] phraſe; ſee Pſal. xlix. 12, 20. Job xi. 12. Iſa. i. 3. Jer. viii. 7. this is now made manifeſt to the people of God by the word and Spirit; is ſeen, known, and acknowledged by them, Pſal. lxxiii. 21. Prov. xxx. 2. and the wicked themſelves will ſee, know, and own what beaſts they are and have been, at the day of judgment; how they have lived and died like beaſts; how like brute beaſts they have corrupted themſelves in things they knew naturally; and that as natural brute beaſts, made to be taken and deſtroyed, ſpoke evil of things they underſtood not, and periſhed in their own corruption, Jude 10. 2 Pet. ii. 12. and that they have been beaſts to themſelves, as Jarchi renders and interprets it; made beaſts of themſelves by their brutiſh gratifications; have been cruel to themſelves, ruining and deſtroying their own ſouls; or among themſelves, and to one another, homo lupus homini; hence wicked men are compared to lions, foxes, evening-wolves, vipers, and the like. So Mr Broughton renders it, how they are beaſts, they to themſelves.

℣. 19. For that which befalleth the ſons of men, befalleth beaſts, &c.] Aben Ezra ſays this verſe is according to the thoughts of the children of men that are not wiſe; but rather the wiſe man ſays what he does according to his own thoughts, and proceeds to prove the likeneſs and equality of men and beaſts. Even one thing befalleth them; the ſame events belong to one as to another; the ſame diſeaſes and diſaſters, calamities and diſtreſſes: Noah's flood carried away one as well as another;

℣. 20. All go unto one place, &c.] The earth [w], from whence they came. All are of the duſt, and all turn to duſt again; Adam's body was made of the duſt of the earth, and ſo all his poſterity, all of them; in which they agree with beaſts, who are made of the duſt alſo; and when they die, return to it; ſee Gen. ii. 7. and iii. 19. Pſalm civ. 29.

℣. 21. Who knoweth the ſpirit of man that goeth upward? &c.] There is indeed a difference between a man and a beaſt; though they have one breath, they have not one ſpirit or ſoul: man has a rational and immortal ſoul, which, when he dies, goes upwards to God that gave it; to be judged by him, and diſpoſed of by him, in its proper apartment, until the day of the reſurrection of the body. And the ſpirit of the beaſt that goeth downward to the earth? when the beaſt dies, its ſpirit goes down to the earth, from whence it came, and is reſolved into it, and is no more. But who is it that ſees, or can ſee and know with the eyes of his body, the difference of theſe two ſpirits, or the aſcent of the one, and the deſcent of the other? Or who knows by the dint of reaſon, by the ſtrength of his own underſtanding, without a divine revelation, that man has an immortal ſoul which goes upwards at death, when that of a beaſt goes downwards? No man, clearly and fully, as appears from the doubts, and half faith of the wiſeſt heathens concerning it: or rather, who knows and conſiders this difference between the ſpirit of a man and the ſpirit of a beaſt, and thinks within himſelf what a precious and immortal ſoul he has, and is concerned for the ſalvation of it? Very few; and hence it is, they live and die like beaſts, as they do. The Midraſh interprets this of the ſouls of the righteous that go up to heaven, and of the ſouls of the wicked that go down to hell.

℣. 22. Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man ſhould rejoice in his own works, &c.] The Targum is, in his good works; not as juſtifying him before God, but as vindicating him before men, from unjuſt cenſures and charges: rather the ſenſe is, that this is the wiſe man's concluſion, and this his ſentiment, upon the whole; that there is nothing better for a man, than chearfully to enjoy the fruit of his labours; to eat and drink in moderation, freely, joyfully and thankfully; and make uſe of his riches, power and authority, for his own good, the good of his family for the preſent, and the good of his fellow-creatures; ſee chap. ii. 21. and iii 13. For that is his portion; what is allotted to him, and thus enjoyed, is a very good one, and for which he has reaſon to be thankful. For who ſhall bring him to ſee what ſhall be after him? to ſee who ſhall ſucceed him, and what uſe they will make of what he leaves them; he ſhall never return after death to ſee any thing of this kind, nor ſhall any acquaint him with it; he ſhall not be able to know when he is dead, what ſhall befal his ſons, whether they will proſper or no, ſo Jarchi; wherefore it is beſt for him to enjoy his ſubſtance himſelf in a comfortable way, and be beneficial to others, and not oppreſſive to them. The Midraſh illuſtrates it thus, "Who ſhall bring David to ſee what Solomon did? "and who ſhall bring Solomon to ſee what Rehoboam "did?"

CHAP. IV.

IN this chapter the wiſe man reaſſumes the conſideration of the caſe of the abuſe of power, to ſhew that there is no happineſs in this world, in grandeur and authority enjoyed; ſince, as he had obſerved before, on the one hand, the oppreſſor ſhall be judged and condemned at the great day of account; ſo, on the other hand, the oppreſſed have their lives made ſo uncomfortable, that the dead are preferred unto them, and unborn perſons to them both, ℣. 1—3. Another vanity he obſerves, that whereas men expect to be happy by their diligence and induſtry, this brings upon them the envy of others, ℣. 4. hence ſome, on the other hand, place their happineſs in ſloth and eaſe, which is another vanity, ℣. 5, 6. and others again in covetouſneſs; who are deſcribed by their unſocial life, toilſome labour, unſatiſfied deſires, and withholding good things from themſelves, ℣. 7, 8. upon which ſome things are ſaid, to ſhew the benefits of a ſocial life, ℣. 9—12. And the chapter is concluded with expoſing the vanity of the higheſt inſtance of worldly power and grandeur, royal dignity, through the folly of a king; the effects of which are mentioned, ℣. 13, 14. and through the fickleneſs of the people; who are ſoon weary of a prince on the throne, and court his ſucceſſor, ℣. 15, 16.

[w] Magna parens terra eſt, Ovid. Metamorph. l. 1. fab. 7.

℣. 1. So I returned, and conſidered all the oppreſſions that are done under the ſun, &c.] The wiſe man, according to Aben Ezra, returned from the thought, which he had expreſſed in the latter part of the preceding chapter, that it was good for a man to rejoice in his works, and called it in; ſince he could not rejoice, when he conſidered the oppreſſion and violence that were in the world; but it does not appear that he did call it in, for he afterwards repeats it: or rather, he returns to his former ſubject, the abuſe of power and authority, mentioned chap. iii. 16. and from whence he had digreſſed a little by the above obſervation; and takes a review of all kinds of oppreſſions which are done, and of all ſorts of oppreſſed[x] ones, as ſome render it, which become ſo, under the ſun; ſubjects by their prince; the ſtranger, widow and fatherleſs, by unjuſt judges; the poor by the rich; ſervants and labourers, by their maſters; and the like. Moreover, he ſaw by the holy Ghoſt, as Jarchi paraphraſes it, all oppreſſions by a ſpirit of prophecy; he foreſaw all the oppreſſions that would be done under the ſun; as all the injuries done to the people of Iſrael in their ſeveral captivities; ſo to the church of Chriſt in goſpel-times; all the perſecutions of Rome pagan, and alſo of Rome papal; all that has or will be done by Antichriſt, the man of the earth, who ere long will oppreſs no more, Pſal. x. 18. the Targum reſtrains theſe oppreſſions to thoſe which are done to the righteous in this world: and it is well obſerved by the wiſe man, that they are ſuch as are under the ſun, for there are none above it, nor any beyond the grave, Job iii. 17, 18. And behold, the tears of ſuch as were oppreſſed; which their eyes poured out, and which ran down their cheeks, and were all they could do, having no power to help themſelves: it is in the ſingular number, and behold, the tear[y]; as if it was one continued ſtream of tears, which, like a torrent, flowed from them; or as if they had ſo exhauſted the ſource of nature by weeping, that the fountain of tears was dried up, and ſcarce another could drop; or it was as much as could be, that another ſhould drop from them: and this the wiſe man could not well behold, without weeping himſelf; it being the property of a good man to weep with them that weep, eſpecially with good men oppreſſed. And they had no comforter; to ſpeak a comfortable word to them; not ſo much as to do that which would be ſome alleviation of their ſorrow, much leſs to help them, no human comforter; and this is a very deplorable condition, Lam. i. 2, 9, 16, 17. Pſal. lxix. 20. indeed when this is the caſe, good men under their oppreſſions, have a divine comforter; God comforts them under all their tribulations; one of the names of the Meſſiah is, the conſolation of Iſrael; and the Spirit of God is another comforter; and ſuch are well off, when all other comforters are miſerable ones, or other men have none. And on the ſide of their oppreſſors there was power; to cruſh them and keep them under, or to hinder others from helping or comforting them: or there was no power to deliver them out of the hand of their oppreſſors[z]; ſo ſome render and ſupply the words; with which ſenſe agrees the Targum, "and there is none to redeem them out of the hand of their oppreſſors, "by ſtrength of hand and by power." It may be rendered, out of the hand of their oppreſſors comes power, or violence; ſuch as the oppreſſed are not able to withſtand; ſo the Arabic verſion. But they had no comforter; which is repeated, not ſo much for confirmation, as to excite attention and pity, and to expreſs the affliction of the oppreſſed, and the cruelty of others; and this following on the other clauſe, leads to obſerve, that the power of the oppreſſor is what hinders and deters others from comforting. Jarchi interprets this whole verſe of the damned in hell, puniſhed for their evil works, weeping for their ſouls oppreſſed by the deſtroying angels; and ſo, he ſays, it is explained in an ancient book of theirs, called Siphri.

℣. 2. Wherefore I praiſed the dead which are already dead, &c.] Truly and properly ſo; not in a figurative ſenſe, as dead ſinners, men dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; nor carnal profeſſors, that have a name to live, and are dead; nor in a civil ſenſe, ſuch as are in calamity and diſtreſs, as the Jews in captivity, or in any affliction, which is ſometimes called death: but ſuch who are dead in a literal and natural ſenſe, really and thoroughly dead; not who may and will certainly die, but who are dead already and in their graves, and not all theſe; not the wicked dead, who are in hell, in everlaſting torments; but the righteous dead, who are taken away from the evil to come, and are free from all the oppreſſions of their enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world. The Targum is, "I praiſed thoſe that lie "down, or are aſleep, who, behold, are now dead;" a figure by which death is often expreſſed, both in the Old and New Teſtament; ſleep being, as the poet[a] ſays, the image of death; and a great likeneſs there is between them; Homer[b] calls ſleep and death twins. The ſame paraphraſe adds, "and ſee "not the vengeance which comes upon the world "after their death;" ſee Iſa. lvii. 1, 2. The wiſe man did not make panegyricks or encomiums on thoſe perſons, but he pronounced them happy; he judged them in his own mind to be ſo; and to be much more happy than the living which are yet alive; that live under the oppreſſion of others; that live in this world in trouble until now, as the Targum; of whom it is as much as it can be ſaid, that they are alive; they are juſt alive, and that is all; they are as it were between life and death. This is generally underſtood, as ſpoken according to human ſenſe, and the judgment of the fleſh, without any regard to the glory and happineſs of the future ſtate; that the dead muſt be preferred to the living, when the quiet of the one, and the miſery of the other are obſerved; and which ſenſe receives confirmation from the next verſe: otherwiſe it is a great truth, that the righteous dead, who die in Chriſt and are with him, are much more happy than living ſaints; ſince they are freed from ſin; are out of the reach of Satan's temptations; are no more liable to darkneſs and deſertions; are freed from all doubts and fears; ceaſe from all their labours, toil and trouble; and are delivered from all afflictions, perſecutions and oppreſſions; which is not the caſe of living ſaints: and beſides, the joys which they poſſeſs, the company they are always in, and the work they are employed about, give them infinitely the preference to all on earth; ſee Rev. xiv. 13. Phil. i. 21, 23.

℣. 3. Yea, better is he than both they, which hath not yet been, &c.] That is, an unborn perſon; who is preferred both to the dead that have ſeen oppreſſion, and to the living that are under it; ſee Job iii. 10—16. and x. 18, 19. This ſuppoſes a perſon to be that never was, a mere non-entity; and the judgment made is according to ſenſe, and regards the dead purely as ſuch, and ſo as free from evils and ſorrows, without any reſpect to their future ſtate and condition; for otherwiſe an unborn perſon is not happier than the dead that die in Chriſt, and live with him: and it can only be true of thoſe that periſh, of whom indeed it might be ſaid, that it would have been better for them if they had never been born, according to thoſe words of Chriſt, Matt. xxvi. 24. and is oppoſed to the maxim of ſome philoſophers, that a miſerable being is better than none at all. The Jews from this paſſage, endeavour to prove the pre-exiſtence of human ſouls, and ſuppoſe that ſuch an one is here meant, which, though created, was not yet ſent into this world in a body, and ſo had never ſeen evil and ſorrow; and this way ſome Chriſtian writers have gone. It has been interpreted alſo of the Meſſiah, who, in Solomon's time, had not yet been a man, and never known ſorrow, which he was to do, and has, and ſo more happy than the dead or living. But theſe are ſenſes that will not bear; the firſt is beſt; and the deſign is to ſhew the great unhappineſs of mortals, that even a non-entity is preferred to them. Who hath not ſeen the evil work that is done under the ſun? the evil works of oppreſſors, and the ſorrows of the oppreſſed.

℣. 4. Again I conſidered all travail, and every right work, &c.] The pains that men take to do right works. Some apply themſelves, with great diligence and induſtry, to the ſtudy of the liberal arts and ſciences; and to attain the knowledge of languages; and to writing books, for the improvement of thoſe things, and the good of mankind: and others employ themſelves in mechanic arts, and excel in them, and bring their works to great perfection and accuracy; when they might expect to be praiſed and commended, and have thanks given them by men. But inſtead thereof, ſo it is, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour; who will be ſure to find fault with what he has done; ſpeak contemptibly of him and his work, and traduce him among men. This is alſo true of moral works; which are right, when done from a right principle, from love to God, in faith, and with a view to the glory of God; and which when done, and ever ſo well done, draw upon a man the envy of the wicked, as may be obſerved in the caſe of Cain and Abel, 1 John iii. 12. though ſome underſtand this, not paſſively, of the envy which is brought upon a man, and he endures, for the ſake of the good he excels in; but actively, of the ſpirit of emulation with which he does it; though the work he does, as to the matter of it, is right; yet the manner of doing it, and the ſpirit with which he does it, are wrong; he does not do it with any good affection to the thing itſelf, nor with any good deſign, only from a ſpirit of emulation to outvie his neighbour: ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, "this is the emulation that a man emulates his neighbour, to do as he; if he emulates him to do good, the heavenly Word does good to him; but if he emulates him to do evil, the heavenly Word does evil to him;" and to this ſenſe Jarchi; compare with this Phil. i. 15—18. This is alſo vanity, and vexation of ſpirit; whether it be underſtood in the one ſenſe or the other; how diſſatisfying and vexatious is it, when a man has taken a great deal of pains to do right works for public good, inſtead of having thanks and praiſe, is reproached and calumniated for it? and if he does a right thing, and yet has not right ends and views in it, it ſtands for nothing; it has only the appearance of good, but is not truly ſo, and yields no ſolid peace and comfort.

℣. 5. The fool foldeth his hands together, &c.] In order to get more ſleep, or as unwilling to work; ſo the Targum adds, "he folds his hands in ſummer, and will not labour;" ſee Prov. vi. 10. Some perſons, to eſcape the envy which diligence and induſtry bring on men, will not work at all, or do any right work, and think to ſleep in a whole ſkin; this is great folly and madneſs indeed: ſuch a man eateth his own fleſh; he is ſtarved and famiſhed for want of food, ſo that his fleſh is waſted away; or he is ſo hunger-bitten, that he is ready to eat his own fleſh; or he hereby brings to ruin his family, his wife and children, which are his own fleſh, Iſa. lviii. 7. The Targum is, "in winter he eats all he has, even the covering of the ſkin of his fleſh." Some underſtand this of the envious man, who is a fool, traduces the diligent and induſtrious, and will not work himſelf; and not only whoſe idleneſs brings want and poverty on him as an armed him, but whoſe envy eats up his ſpirit, and is rottenneſs in his bones, Prov. vi. 11. and xiv. 30. Jarchi, out of a book of theirs called Siphri, interprets this of a wicked man in hell, when he ſees the righteous in glory, and he himſelf judged and condemned.

℣. 6. Better is an handful with quietneſs, &c.] Theſe are the words of the fool, according to Aben Ezra; and which is the ſenſe of other interpreters, particularly Mr Broughton, who connects this verſe with the former by adding at the end of that the word ſaying; making an excuſe or apology for himſelf and conduct, from the uſe and profitableneſs of his ſloth; that a little had with eaſe, and without toil and labour, is much better, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of ſpirit; than large poſſeſſions gotten with a great deal of trouble, and enjoyed with much vexation and uneaſineſs; in which he miſtakes ſlothful eaſe for true quietneſs; calls honeſt labour and induſtry travail and vexation; and ſuppoſes that true contentment lies in the enjoyment of little, and cannot be had where there is much; whereas it is to be found in a good man in every ſtate: or elſe theſe words expreſs the true ſentiments of Solomon's mind, ſteering between the two extremes of ſlothfulneſs, and over toilſome labour to be rich; that it is much more eligible to have a competency, though it is but ſmall, with a good conſcience, with tranquillity of mind, with the love and fear of God, and a contented heart, than to have a large eſtate, with great trouble and fatigue in getting and keeping it, eſpecially with diſcontent and uneaſineſs; and this agrees with what the wiſe man ſays elſewhere, Prov. xv. 16, 17. and xvii. 1. The Targum is, "better to a man is a handful of food with quietneſs of ſoul, and without robbery and rapine, than two handfuls of food with robbery and rapine;" or with what is gotten in an ill way.

℣. 7. Then I returned, and I ſaw vanity under the ſun.] Another vanity beſides what he had taken notice of, and is as follows. Aben Ezra's note is, "I turned from conſidering the words of this fool, and I ſaw another fool, the reverſe of the former."

℣. 8. There is one alone, and there is not a ſecond, &c.] According to Aben Ezra, either no friend or companion, or no ſervant, or no wife, which laſt ſenſe he prefers; no friend or companion he chooſes, becauſe friendſhip and fellowſhip lead to expences; and no ſervant, who would be chargeable to him; and no wife, which would be more expenſive, and bring on a family of children; wherefore to ſave charges, he chooſes to have neither of theſe; for this is a covetous man who is here deſcribed. Yea, he hath neither child nor brother; to inherit his ſubſtance, as the Targum adds; ſome worldly men, whoſe bellies are filled with hidden treaſures, having enjoyed much, when they die, leave the reſt of their ſubſtance to their babes; but the man here deſcribed has no children, nor any relations to leave his wealth unto. Yet is there no end of all his labour; when he has executed one ſcheme to get riches, he forms another; and having finiſhed one work, he enters upon another; he riſes early and ſits up late, and works and toils night and day, as if he was not worth a groat, and had a large and numerous family to provide for; or there is no end of what he labours for, or gets by his labour; there is no end of his treaſures, Iſa. ii. 7. he is immenſely rich, ſo Aben Ezra interprets it. Neither is his eye ſatisfied with riches; with ſeeing his bags of gold and ſilver, though he takes a great deal of pleaſure in looking upon them too, without making uſe of them; yet he is not ſatisfied with what he has, he wants more, he enlarges his deſire as hell, and like the grave never has enough; ſee chap. v. 10. Neither ſaith he, For whom do I labour? having neither wife nor child, nor relation, nor friend, and yet ſo wretchedly ſtupid and thoughtleſs as never once to put this queſtion to himſelf, who am I toiling for? I am heaping up riches, and know not who ſhall gather them; it is a vexation to a worldly man to leave his ſubſtance behind him, and even to a man that has an heir to inherit it, when he knows not whether he will be a wiſe man or a fool; but for a man that has no heir at all, and yet to be toiling and labouring for the world, is groſs ſtupidity, downright madneſs; and eſpecially when he deprives himſelf of the comfort of what he is poſſeſſed of. And bereave my ſoul of good? inſtead of richly enjoying what is given him, he withholds it from himſelf, ſtarves his back and belly, lives in pinching want amidſt the greateſt plenty; has not power to eat of what he has, and his ſoul deſireth; ſee chap. vi. 2. This is alſo vanity, yea, it is a ſore travail; a very vain and wicked thing; an evil buſineſs, as it may be rendered; a very great ſin and folly indeed; it is thought by ſome divines to be the worſt ſpecies of covetouſneſs, moſt cruel and unnatural.

℣. 9. Two are better than one, &c.] The wiſe man takes occaſion from the ſolitarineſs of the covetous man before deſcribed, to ſhew in this and ſome following verſes, the preferableneſs and advantages of ſocial life; which as it holds true in things natural and civil, ſo in things ſpiritual and religious; man is a ſociable creature, was made to be ſo; and it was the judgment of God, which is according to truth, and who can never err, that it was not good for man to be alone, Gen. ii. 18. It is beſt to take a wife, or at leaſt to have a friend or companion, more or leſs to converſe with. Society is preferable to ſolitarineſs; conversation with a friend is better than to be always alone; the Targum is, “two righteous men in a generation are “better than one;” ſuch may be helpful to each other in their counſels and comforts, and mutual aids and aſſiſtances in things temporal and ſpiritual. The Midraſh interprets this of the ſtudy in the law together, and of two that trade together; which is better than ſtudying or trading ſeparately. Becauſe they have a good reward for their labour; the pleaſure and profit they have in each other's company and converſation; in religious ſocieties, though there is a labour in attendance on public worſhip, in praying and conferring together, in ſerving one another in love, and bearing one another's burdens, yet they have a good reward in it all; they have the preſence of Chriſt with them, for where two or three are met together in his name, he is with them; and whatſoever two of them agree to aſk in his name they have it; and if two of them converſe together about ſpiritual things, it is much if he does not make a third with them; beſides they have a great deal of pleaſure in each other's company, and much profit in their mutual inſtructions, advices, and reproofs; they ſharpen each other's countenances, quicken and comfort each other's ſouls, eſtabliſh one another in divine truth, and ſtrengthen each other's hands and hearts.

℣. 10. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow, &c.] That is, if any one of them fall, the other will lift him up, as they are travelling together in whatſoever manner; if one falls from his horſe, or out of his carriage, or into a ditch, the other will endeavour to raiſe him up again: this, as it is true in a natural, ſo in a figurative and metaphorical ſenſe, with religious perſons eſpecially; “if one of them falls upon the bed, and lies ſick,” as the Targum paraphraſes it, his friend and brother in a religious community will viſit him, and ſympathize with him, and ſpeak a word of comfort to him, and pray with him, which may iſſue in his reſtoration. So the Targum, “the other will cauſe “his friend to riſe by his prayer;” or if he fall into outward diſtreſs, poverty, and want, his ſpiritual friend or friends will diſtribute to his neceſſity; if he falls into errors, as a good man may, ſuch as are of the ſame religious ſociety with him will take ſome pains to convince him of the error of his way, and to convert him from it, and to ſave a ſoul from death, and cover a multitude of ſins; and if he falls into ſin, to which the beſt of men are liable, ſuch as are ſpiritual will endeavour to reſtore him in a ſpirit of meekneſs. But wo to him that is alone when he falleth! for he hath not another to help him up; no companion to raiſe him up when fallen; no chriſtian friend to viſit and comfort him when ſick, to relieve him under his neceſſities, when poor and afflicted, or to recover him from errors in judgment, or immoralities in practice; and eſpecially if he has not Chriſt with him to raiſe him up, keep, and uphold him.

℣. 11. Again, if two lie together, then they have heat, &c.] The Targum adds, in the winter; when it is a cold ſeaſon, they warm one another by lying together. The Targum interprets it of a man and his wife; it is true of others; ſee 1 Kings i. 1, 2. But how can one be warm alone? not ſoon, nor eaſily, in time of cold weather. This is true in a ſpiritual ſenſe of perſons in a chriſtian communion and religious ſociety; when they are grown cold in their love, lukewarm in their affections, and backward and indifferent to ſpiritual exerciſes, yet by chriſtian converſation may be ſtirred up to love and good works: ſo two cold flints ſtruck againſt each other, fire comes out of them; and even two cold chriſtians, when they come to talk with each other about ſpiritual things, and feel one another's ſpirits, they preſently glow in their affections to each other; and to divine things; and eſpecially if Chriſt joins them with his preſence, as he did the two diſciples going to Emmaus, then their hearts burn within them.

℣. 12. And if one prevail againſt him, two ſhall withſtand him, &c.] If an enemy, or a thief or a robber, attack any one of them, in friendſhip and fellowſhip together, and is an over-match for him; both joining together will be able to reſiſt him; ſo that he ſhall not ſucceed in his enterprize, and do the miſchief he deſigned; ſee 2 Sam. x. 11. Thus when Satan attacks a ſingle believer, which he chooſes to do when alone; ſo he tempted Eve in the garden, and Chriſt in the wilderneſs; and one or more fellow-chriſtians know of it, they are capable of helping their tempted friend, by their advice and counſel, they not being ignorant of Satan's devices; and by ſtriving together in their prayers to God for him: ſo when falſe teachers make their efforts, as they uſually do, Satan-like, upon the weaker ſex, and when alone, they too often ſucceed; but when ſaints ſtand faſt in one ſpirit, and ſtrive together for the faith of the goſpel, they ſtand their ground, withſtand the enemy, and maintain truth. And a threefold cord is not quickly broken; or in haſte [c]; as two are better than one, ſo three or more united together, it is the better ſtill; they are able to make head againſt an enemy; and to conquer him, vis unita fortior eſt: if a family, community, city or kingdom, are divided againſt themſelves, they cannot ſtand, but if united, in all probability nothing can hurt them. This doctrine is taught in the fable of the bundle of ſticks, the old man gave to his ſons to break; which, while faſtened together, could not be done; but when unbound, and took out ſingly, were eaſily ſnapped aſunder; teaching them thereby unity among themſelves, as their greateſt ſecurity againſt their common enemy. The ſame inſtruction is given by this threefold cord; whilſt it remains twiſted together, it is not eaſily broke; but if the threads are untwiſted and unlooſed, they are ſoon ſnapped aſunder: ſo perſons in religious fellowſhip, be they more or fewer, whilſt they keep the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace; they are terrible, as an army with banners, and the gates of hell cannot prevail againſt them. And if this is true of the united love and affections of ſaints, it muſt be much more ſo of the love of Father, Son, and Spirit; that threefold cord, with which the ſaints are drawn and held; and of which it may be ſaid, that it not only is not quickly broken, but that it cannot be broken at all; and therefore thoſe who are held by it, are in the utmoſt ſafety. Some apply this to the three principal graces, faith, hope and love, which are abiding ones; and though they may ſometimes be weak and low in their acts and exerciſe, can never be loſt.

℣. 13. Better is a poor and a wiſe child, than an old and fooliſh king, &c.] The wiſe man proceeds to ſhew the vanity of worldly power and dignity, in the higheſt inſtance of it, which is kingly; and in order to illuſtrate and exemplify this, he ſuppoſes, on the one hand, a perſon poſſeſſed of royal honour; who has long enjoyed it, is ſettled in his kingdom, and advanced in years; and who otherwiſe, for his gravity and dignity, would be venerable; but that he is fooliſh, a perſon of a mean genius and ſmall capacity; has but little knowledge of government, or but little verſed in the arts of it, though he has held the reins of it long in his hand; and, which is worſt of all, is vicious and wicked: on the other hand, he ſuppoſes one that is in his tender years, not yet arrived to manhood; and ſo may be thought to be giddy and inexperienced, and therefore taken but little notice of; and eſpecially being poor, becomes contemptible, as well as labours under the diſadvantage of an ill education; his parents poor, and he not able to get books and maſters to teach him knowledge; nor to travel abroad to ſee the world, and make his obſervations on men and things; and yet being wiſe, having a good genius, which he improves in the beſt manner he can, to his own profit, and to make himſelf uſeful in the world; and eſpecially if he is wiſe and knowing in the beſt things, and fears God, and ſerves him; he is more happy, in his preſent ſtate and circumſtances, than the king before deſcribed is in his, and is fitter to take his place, and be a king, than he is; for though he is young, yet wiſe, and improving in knowledge, and willing to be adviſed and counſelled by others, older and wiſer than himſelf; he is much to be preferred to one that is old and fooliſh. Who will no more be admoniſhed; or, knows not to be admoniſhed any more [d]: he neither knows how to give nor take advice; he is impatient of all counſel; cannot bear any admonition; is ſtubborn and ſelf-willed, and reſolved to take his own way. The Jews in their Midraſh, Jarchi and others, interpret it, allegorically, of the good and evil imagination in men, the principle of grace, and the corruption of nature; the one is the new man, the other the old man; the new man is better than old Adam: the Targum applies it to Abraham and Nimrod; the former is the poor and wiſe child, that feared God, and worſhipped him betimes; the latter, the old and fooliſh king, who was an idolater, and refuſed to be admoniſhed of his idolatry; and ſo the Midraſh.

℣. 14. For out of priſon he cometh to reign, &c.] That is, this is ſometimes the caſe of a poor and wiſe child; he riſes out of a low, mean, abject, obſcure ſtate and condition, to the higheſt dignity; from a priſon-houſe, or a place where ſervants are, to ſit among princes, and even to have the ſupreme authority: ſo Joſeph, to whoſe caſe Solomon is thought to have reſpect, and which is mentioned in the Midraſh; who was but a young man, and poor and friendleſs, but wiſe; and was even laid in priſon, though innocent and guiltleſs, from whence he was fetched, and became the ſecond man in the kingdom of Egypt; ſo David, the youngeſt of Jeſſe's ſons, was taken from the ſheep-fold, and ſet upon the throne of Iſrael: though Guſſetius [e] interprets this of the old and fooliſh king, who comes out of the houſe or family הסורים of degenerate perſons, as he tranſlates the word, with a degenerate genius to rule; the alluſion being to a degenerate vine; which ſenſe agrees with the preceding verſe, and with what follows. Whereas alſo he that is born in his kingdom, becometh poor; who is born of royal parents, born to a kingdom; is by birth heir to one, has it by inheritance, and has long poſſeſſed it; and yet by his own miſconduct, or by the rebellion of his ſubjects, he is dethroned and baniſhed; or by a foreign power is taken and carried captive, and reduced to the utmoſt moſt poverty, as Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar, and others: or if born poor, ſo Guſſetius; with a poor genius, not capable of ruling, and ſo loſes his kingdom, and comes to poverty. Or it may be rendered, although in his kingdom he is born poor [f]; that is, though the poor and wiſe child is born poor in the kingdom of the old and fooliſh king; yet out of this low eſtate, in which he is by birth, he comes and enjoys the kingdom in his room; to ſuch a ſtrange turn of affairs are the higheſt honours ſubject: or, for in his kingdom he is born poor [g]; even the perſon that is born heir to a crown, is born a poor man; he comes as naked out of his mother's womb, as the pooreſt man does; the conditions of both are equal as to birth; and therefore it need not ſeem ſtrange, that one out of priſon ſhould come to a kingdom. But the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt.

℣. 15. I conſidered all the living which walk under the ſun, &c.] All men that were then alive, who were capable of walking upon the earth; even all of them that were under the heavens, in every land and nation, under whatſoever dominion or government: theſe and their manners, Solomon had particularly obſerved, and made his remarks upon; by which it appeared, how fickle the minds of the populace were under every government, and how precarious and uncertain were the honour and dignity of princes. With the ſecond child that ſhall ſtand up in his ſtead; the heir and ſucceſſor of every prince, that ſhall riſe up and take the throne of his father or predeceſſor, and reign in his ſtead. The wiſe man obſerved, how the people commonly behaved towards him; how that they generally ſtood beſt affected to him, than to the reigning prince; worſhipped the riſing ſun, courted his favour and friendſhip, ſoothed and flattered him; expreſſing their wiſhes to ſee him on the throne, and treated with neglect and contempt their lawful ſovereign. Some, contrary to the accents, connect this with the word walk [h]; that walk with the ſecond child, join themſelves to him, converſe with him, and ſhew him great reſpect and honour: and there are others that, by this ſecond child, underſtand the poor and wiſe child, that ſucceeds the old and fooliſh king, whom yet in time the people grow weary of; ſuch is the levity and inconſtancy of people, that they are not long pleaſed with princes, old or young, wiſe or fooliſh. The Targum interprets this of the foreſight Solomon had, by a ſpirit of prophecy, of thoſe that rebelled againſt his ſon Rehoboam, and of thoſe that cleaved unto him, who was his ſecond, and reigned in his ſtead. Noldius [i] thinks, Solomon refers to the hiſtory of his friend Hiram, king of Tyre, whoſe kingdom in his and in his ſon's time was very large, flouriſhing, and opulent, but in a following reign not ſo; and he renders and paraphraſes the words, thus, "I ſaw all the works under the ſun; with Baleazarus, the ſon of a friend (Hiram, for שני rendered ſecond, is the ſame as חבר a friend) who ſhall ſtand or reign after him: there is no end of all the people," &c. the kingdom in thoſe two reigns being very flouriſhing; yet poſterity ſhall not rejoice in him, in Abdaſtratus, the grandſon of Hiram, deſtroyed by the four ſons of his nurſe [k].

℣. 16. There is no end of all the people, even of all that have been before them, &c.] Before the preſent generation, the living that walked under the ſun; a vaſt number they were that lived before them, and they were of the ſame reſtleſs temper and diſpoſition; changeable in their affection and behaviour towards their governors; no end of their number, nor any ſtable affection for, nor ſettled ſatisfaction in their rulers; but this itch of novelty, of having new princes over them, went from age to age, from generation to generation. Some underſtand this of the king and his ſon, the predeceſſor and ſucceſſor, and of thoſe that went before them; and of their behaviour to the kings that reigned before them; the people have not their end or ſatisfaction in their governors, but are reſtleſs: which comes to the ſame ſenſe. They alſo that come after, ſhall not rejoice in him; that come after the preſent generation, and after both the reigning prince, and even after his ſucceſſor; they will not rejoice long in him that ſhall be upon the throne after them, any more than the preſent ſubjects of the old king; or thoſe that now pay their court to the heir apparent; they will be ſo far from rejoicing in him, that they will loath and deſpiſe him, and wiſh him dead or dethroned, and another in his room. Surely, this alſo is vanity and vexation of ſpirit; to a king, to ſee himſelf thus uſed by his ſubjects; for a ſhort time extolled and huzza'd, and then deſpiſed and forſaken.

THIS chapter contains ſome rules and directions concerning the worſhip of God; how perſons ſhould behave when they go into the houſe of God; concerning hearing the word, to which there ſhould be a readineſs, and which ſhould be preferred to the ſacrifices of fools, ℣. 1. Concerning prayer to God; which ſhould not be uttered raſhly and haſtily, and ſhould be expreſſed in few words; which is urged from the conſideration of the majeſty of God, and vileneſs of men; and the folly of much ſpeaking is expoſed by the ſimile of a dream, ℣. 2, 3. good things of this life he is poſſeſſed of, and conſider them as the gifts of God, and be thankful for them; by which means he will paſs through the world more comfortably, and eſcape the troubles that attend others, ℣. 18—20.

℣. 1. Keep thy foot when thou goeſt to the houſe of God, &c.] The houſe of the ſanctuary of the Lord, the temple built by Solomon; and ſo any place of divine worſhip, where the word of God is preached, and his ordinances adminiſtered. The wiſe man, having obſerved many vanities under the ſun, directs men to the houſe of God, where they might learn the nature of them, and how to avoid them; though if care was not taken, they would find or introduce vanity there; which, of all vanities, is the worſt, and ought to be guarded againſt. Wherefore, when men go to any place of divine worſhip, which to do is their duty and intereſt, and for their honour, pleaſure and profit; they ſhould take care to keep their feet, for the ſingular is here put for the plural, not from going into it; nor does it ſignify a ſlow motion towards it, which ſhould be quick, in haſte, ſhewing earneſtneſs, fervency and zeal; but they ſhould keep their feet in proper caſe, in a ſuitable condition. The alluſion is either to the pulling off of the ſhoes off the feet, ordered to Moſes and Joſhua, when on holy ground, Exod. iii. 5. Joſh. v. 15. and which the Jews obſerved, when they entered the temple on their feſtivals and ſabbaths, even their kings, as Juvenal[k] jeers them: not that ſuch a rite ſhould be literally uſed now, or what is analogous to it; putting off of the hat, in a ſuperſtitious veneration of a place; but what was ſignified by it, as the putting off of the old man, with his deeds, laying aſide depraved affections and ſordid luſts; two apoſtles, James and Peter, have taught us this, when we come to the houſe of God to hear his word, James i. 21. 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. or the alluſion is to the cuſtom of perſons in thoſe eaſtern countries, dreſſing or waſhing their feet when they viſited, eſpecially thoſe of any note; and entered into their houſes on any buſineſs, as Mephiboſheth, when he waited on David, 2 Sam. xix. 24. or to the practice of the prieſts, who waſhed their feet when they went into the tabernacle of the Lord, Exod. xxx. 19, 20. Schindler[l] ſays, that hence (becauſe of this text) the Jews had before their ſynagogues, an iron fixed in the wall, (which we call a ſcraper) on which they cleaned their ſhoes before they went into the ſynagogue. All which may denote the purity and cleanneſs of the converſation of the true worſhippers of God; for as the feet are the inſtruments of the action of walking, they may intend the conduct and behaviour of the ſaints in the houſe of God, where they ſhould take care to do all things according to his word, which is a lamp to the feet, and a light unto the path: moreover, what the feet are to the body, that the affections are to the ſoul; and theſe, when a man enters into the houſe of God for worſhip, ſhould be ſet on divine and ſpiritual things, and not on the world, and the things of it, which will choke the word heard, and make it unprofitable; the thoughts ſhould be compoſed, ſedate and quiet, and the mind attentive to what is ſpoken or done; or otherwiſe, if diverted by other objects, the ſervice will be uſeleſs. And be more ready to hear, than to give the ſacrifice of fools; there are ſacrifices to be offered unto God in his houſe, which are acceptable to him; the ſacrifices of beneficence and alms-deeds to the poor, with which he is well pleaſed; and the preſentation of the bodies of men, as a holy, living, and acceptable ſacrifice unto him; and eſpecially their hearts, and thoſe as broken and contrite, which are the ſacrifices of God; as alſo the ſacrifices of praiſe and thankſgiving, which are acceptable to him through Jeſus Chriſt: and under the former diſpenſation, while ſacrifices were in uſe by divine appointment, when they were offered up in the faith of the ſacrifice of Chriſt, they were well-pleaſing to God; but when they were not done in faith, and were without repentance for ſin and reformation of life; when men retained their ſins with them, and made theſe a cover for them, and thought by them to make atonement for their crimes, they were no other than the ſacrifices of fools, and abominable unto God; ſee Iſa. i. 11—16. Jer. vii. 9, 10. Prov. xxi. 27. when theſe ſacrifices were performed in the beſt manner, moral duties, as hearing and obeying the word of the Lord, and ſhewing mercy to men, and offering up the ſpiritual ſacrifices of praiſe and thankſgiving, were preferred unto them, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Hoſea vi. 6. Pſalm lxix. 30, 31. Mark xii. 33. and much more to the ſacrifices of fools. To be ready or near[m], is to hear the word of the Lord, as Jarchi interprets it; though Aben Ezra underſtands it of God, being near to hear his people, when they call upon him in truth. The word of the Lord was not only read publickly in the temple and ſynagogues, but was explained by the prieſts and prophets, the eccleſiaſtical rulers of the people; ſee Mal. ii. 7. Acts xiii. 15. and xv. 21. ſo the Targum, "draw "near thine ear to receive the doctrine of the law, "from the prieſts and wiſe men:" and ſo the people of God ſhould draw near to hear the word; be ſwift to hear it, attentive to it, and receive it with all reverence, humility, love and affection; and ſhould not take up with mere outward forms, which is but the ſacrifice of fools. For they conſider not that they do evil; or know not[n]; they think they are doing well, and doing God good ſervice, when they are doing ill; they know not truly the object of worſhip, nor the ſpiritual nature of it, nor the right end and true uſe of it: or, they know not, only to do evil, ſo Aben Ezra ſupplies it; to do good they have no knowledge: or, they know not to do the will, or good pleaſure[o]; that is, of God; this ſenſe of the word Aben Ezra mentions.

℣. 2. Be not raſh with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be haſty to utter any thing before God, &c.] In private converſation care ſhould be taken that no raſh and unadviſed words be ſpoken in haſte, as were by Moſes and David; and that no evil, nor even any idle word be uttered, ſince from the abundance of the heart the mouth is apt to ſpeak, and all is before the Lord; not a word in the tongue but is altogether known by him, and muſt be accounted for to him, Pſalm cvi. 33. and cxvi. 11. and cxxxix. 4. Matt. xii. 34—37. Jerom interprets this of words ſpoken concerning God; and careful men ſhould be of what they ſay of him, of his nature and perfections, of his perſons, and of his works; and it may be applied to a public profeſſion of his name, and of faith in him; though this ſhould be done with the heart, yet the heart and tongue ſhould not be raſh and haſty in making it; men ſhould conſider what they profeſs and confeſs, and upon what foot they take up and make a profeſſion of religion; whether they have the true grace of God or no: and it will hold true of the public miniſtry of the word, in which every thing that comes uppermoſt in the mind, or what is crude and indigeſted, ſhould not be uttered; but what miniſters have thought of, meditated on, well weighed in their minds, and properly digeſted. Some underſtand this of raſh vows, ſuch as Jephtha's is ſuppoſed to be, which are afterwards treated of; but rather ſpeaking unto God in prayer is intended. So the Targum, "thy heart ſhall not haſten "to bring out ſpeech at the time thou prayeſt be-"fore the Lord;" any thing and every thing that comes up into the mind ſhould not be uttered before God; not any thing raſhly and haſtily; men ſhould conſider before they ſpeak to the King of kings; for though ſet precompoſed forms of prayer are not to be uſed, yet the matter of prayer ſhould be thought of beforehand; what our wants are, and what we ſhould aſk for; whether for ourſelves or others; this rule I fear we often offend againſt: the reaſons follow. For God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; his throne is in the heavens, he dwells in the higheſt heavens, though they cannot contain him; this is expreſſive of his majeſty, ſovereignty and ſupremacy, and of his omniſcience and omnipotence; he is the high and lofty One, that dwells in the high and holy place; he is above all, and ſees and knows all perſons and things; and he ſits in the heavens and does whatever he pleaſes; and therefore all ſhould ſtand in awe of him, and conſider what they ſay unto him. Our Lord ſeems to have reſpect to this paſſage when he directed his diſciples to pray, ſaying, Our Father, which art in heaven; and when we pray to him we ſhould think what we ourſelves are, that we are on the earth, the footſtool of God; that we are of the earth earthly; dwell in houſes of clay, which have their foundation in the duſt; crawling worms on earth, unworthy of his notice; are but duſt and aſhes, who take upon us to ſpeak unto him. Therefore let thy words be few; of which prayer conſiſts; ſuch was the prayer of the publican, God be merciful to me a ſinner; and ſuch the prayer which Chriſt has given as a pattern and directory to his people; who has forbid vain repetitions and much ſpeaking in prayer, Matt. vi. 7, 8. not that all prolix prayers are to be condemned, or all repetitions in them; our Lord was all night in prayer himſelf, and Nehemiah, Daniel, and others, have uſed repetitions in prayer, which may be done with freſh affection, zeal, and fervency; but ſuch are forbidden as are done for the ſake of being heard for much ſpeaking, as the heathens; and who thought they were not underſtood unleſs they ſaid a thing a hundred times over [p]; or when done to gain a character of being more holy and religious than others, as the phariſees.

℣. 3. For a dream cometh through the multitude of buſineſs, &c.] Or, for as a dream [q], ſo Aben Ezra; as that comes through a multiplicity of buſineſs in the day-time, in which the mind has been buſied, and the body employed; and this brings on dreams in the night-ſeaſon, which are confuſed and incoherent; ſometimes the fancy is employed about one thing, and ſometimes another, and all unprofitable and uſeleſs, as well as vain and fooliſh. And a fool's voice is known by multitude of words; either his voice in converſation, for a fool is full of words, and pours out his fooliſhneſs in a large profuſion of them; or his voice in prayer, being like a man's dream, confuſed, incoherent, and rambling. The ſupplement, is known, may be left out.

℣. 4. When thou voweſt a vow unto God, &c.] Or if thou voweſt [r], as the Vulgate Latin verſion; for vows are free and indifferent things, which perſons may make or not; there is no precept for them in the word of God; inſtances and examples there are, and they may be lawfully made, when they are in the power of man to perform, and are not inconſiſtent with the will and word of God; they have been made by good men, and were frequent in former times; but they ſeem not ſo agreeable to the goſpel-diſpenſation, having a tendency to enſnare the mind, to entangle men, and bring on them a ſpirit of bondage, contrary to that liberty wherewith Chriſt has made them free; and therefore it is better to abſtain from them: holy reſolutions to do the will and work of God ſhould be taken up in the ſtrength of divine grace; but to vow this, or that, or the other thing, which a man previous to his vow is not obliged unto, had better be let alone: but however, when a vow is made that is lawful to be done, defer not to pay it; that is, to God, to whom it is made, who expects it, and that ſpeedily, as Hannah paid hers; no excuſes nor delays ſhould be made. For he hath no pleaſure in fools; that is, the Lord hath no pleaſure in them, he will not be mocked by them; he will reſent ſuch treatment of him, as to vow and not pay, or defer payment and dally with him. So the Targum, "for the Lord "hath no pleaſure in fools, becauſe they defer their "vows, and do not pay." Pay that which thou haſt vowed; preciſely and punctually; both as to the matter, manner, and time of it.

℣. 5. Better is it that thou ſhouldeſt not vow, &c.] For a vow is an arbitrary thing; a man is not bound to make it, and whilſt he vows not, it is in his own power, and at his option, whether he will do this or that or not; but when he has once vowed, he is then brought under an obligation, and muſt perform; ſee Acts v. 4. and therefore it is better not to vow; it is more acceptable to God, and it is better for a man. Than that thou ſhouldeſt vow and not pay; for this ſhews great weakneſs and folly, levity and inconſtancy, and is reſented by the Lord.

℣. 6. Suffer not thy mouth to cauſe thy fleſh to ſin, &c.] That is, himſelf, who is corrupt and depraved; either by making a raſh vow, which it is not in his power to keep; or ſuch is the corruption of his nature, and the weakneſs of the fleſh, that he cannot keep it; or by making ſinful excuſes after he has made the vow, and ſo is guilty of lying, or falſe ſwearing, or other ſins of the fleſh. Jarchi by fleſh underſtands his children, on whom his iniquity may be viſited and puniſhed; and the Targum interprets this puniſhment of the judgment or condemnation of hell; ſee Prov. xx. 25. Neither ſay thou before the angel that it was an error; that it was done ignorantly and through miſtake; that it was not intended, and that this was not the meaning of the vow; and therefore deſires to be excuſed performing it, or to offer a ſacrifice in lieu of it. Interpreters are divided about the angel before whom ſuch an excuſe ſhould not be made. Some think angel is put for angels in general, in whoſe preſence, and before whom, as witneſſes, vows are made; and who were ſignified by the cherubim in the ſanctuary, where they were to be performed, and who are preſent in the worſhipping aſſemblies of ſaints, where theſe things are done, 1 Tim. v. 21. 1 Cor. xi. 10. others think the guardian-angel is meant, which they ſuppoſe every man has; and others that Chriſt, the angel of the covenant, is deſigned, who is in the midſt of his people, ſees and knows all that is done by them, and will not admit of their excuſes; but it is moſt probable the prieſt is intended, called the angel or meſſenger of the Lord of hoſts, Mal. ii. 7. to whom ſuch who had made vows applied to be looſed from them, acknowledging their error in making them; or to offer ſacrifice for their ſin of ignorance, Lev. v. 4, 5. Wherefore ſhould God be angry at thy voice; either in making a raſh and ſinful vow, or in excuſing that which was made. And deſtroy the work of thine hands? wrought with ſucceſs, for which the vow was made; and ſo inſtead of its ſucceeding is deſtroyed and comes to nothing. Vows made by the Jews were chiefly about their houſes, or fields, or cattle; ſee Lev. xxvii. 28. and ſo the deſtruction ſuggeſted may ſignify the curſe that God would bring upon any of theſe, for excuſing or not performing the vow made.

℣. 7. For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are alſo divers vanities, &c] Or as in a multitude of dreams there are many vanities, ſo alſo in a multitude of words[s]; as dreams are vain things, or there are abundance of vain things that come into the mind in dreams; ſo vain and idle are the many excuſes which are made for the non-performance of vows; or there are many vain things which are uttered in making of them, or in long prayers to God, or in diſcourſes concerning him; to all which is oppoſed the fear of God. But fear thou God; give no heed to dreams, nor to the many words of men, which are vain and fooliſh; but keep cloſe to the word of God, and worſhip him internally and externally, in ſpirit and in truth; for herein lies the ſum and ſubſtance of religion; ſee chap. xii. 13. The Targum is, "for in the multitude of "the dreams of the falſe prophets believe not, nor "in the vanities of the authors of inchantments, and "the many ſpeeches of ungodly men; but ſerve "the wiſe and juſt, and of them ſeek doctrine, and "fear before the Lord;" ſee Jer. xxiii. 28.

℣. 8. If thou ſeeſt the oppreſſion of the poor, and violent perverting of juſtice in a province, &c.] Which is a very diſagreeable ſight, but often ſeen; the poor are oppreſſed, and judgment and juſtice perverted, and that in a very violent and flagrant manner, in open courts of judicature, in the ſeveral provinces and kingdoms of the world. Marvel not at the matter; as though it was ſome ſtrange and uncommon thing, when nothing is more common: or marvel not at the will or pleaſure[t]; that is, of God, who ſuffers ſuch things to be. So the Targum, Jarchi and Aben Ezra, interpret it; ſtumble not at it, nor arraign the wiſdom and juſtice of God; let not that temptation prevail in thee as it has done in ſome good men, who have been tempted from hence to think there was nothing in religion, nor no providence attending the affairs of this world; do not be frightened and aſtoniſhed, and hurried into ſuch a thought; nor be diſtreſſed at the calamities and oppreſſions of poor and innocent men. For he that is higher than the higheſt regardeth; that is, God, who is the moſt high in all the earth; higher than the kings of the earth, and all high and haughty oppreſſors; higher indeed than the heavens, and the angels there: he regards all his people, his eyes are on them, and he never withdraws them from them; he regards their cries, and hears and anſwers them; he regards their oppreſſors, and their oppreſſions; and will in his own time deliver them: or he keeps[u] his people as the apple of his eye, in the hollow of his hand, night and day, leſt any hurt them; he keeps them by his power through faith unto ſalvation. It may be rendered, the high one from on high obſerves[w]; God, who is the high and lofty one, looks down from the high heavens where he dwells, and takes notice of all the ſons of men, and conſiders all their works; ſee Pſal. xxxiii. 13—15. And there be higher than they; either the holy angels, who are higher than tyrannical oppreſſors, higher in nature, and excel in ſtrength and power; and theſe are on the ſide of the oppreſſed, have the charge of ſaints, and encamp about them; and whenever they have an order can deſtroy their enemies in a moment: or rather the three divine perſons are meant, by the plural expreſſion uſed, Father, Son, and Spirit; Jehovah the Father is above men, the greateſt of men, in the things in which they deal proudly; he is greater than all, and none can pluck his ſheep out of his hands and worry them: Chriſt, the Son of the higheſt, is higher than the kings of the earth; he is King of kings and Lord of lords, and able to deliver and ſave his people; and the holy Spirit is the power of the higheſt, and is greater than he or they that are in the world, the avowed enemies of the ſaints. Aben Ezra interprets it of the ſecret of the name of God, which he ſays is inexplicable. So the Midraſh underſtands it of the holy bleſſed God; and in another tract it is ſaid on mention of this paſſage, there are three ſuperiors above them in the way of emanation, and of them it is ſaid[x], there be higher than they.

℣. 9. Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all, &c.] Or the excellency of the earth in or above all things is this[y]; that God moſt high rules over all the earth, and is higher than the kings of it, and all oppreſſors in it; or in all reſpects there is a preference, a ſuperior excellency in the country as oppoſed to the city, eſpecially in this, that there are not ſo many tumults, riots, and oppreſſions there; though this is moſtly underſtood of the preference and ſuperior excellency of agriculture, or tillage of the earth. So the Targum, "the excellency of the "praiſe of tilling the earth is above all things;" and to the ſame purpoſe Jarchi and Aben Ezra; and the profit ariſing from it is enjoyed by all; it is for all, even the beaſts of the field have graſs from hence, as well as man has bread-corn, and all other neceſſaries. The king himſelf is ſerved by the field; his table is ſerved with bread-corn, and fleſh, and wine, and fruits of various ſorts, the produce of the earth, which ſpring from it, or are nouriſhed by it; were it not for huſbandry the king himſelf and his family could not ſubſiſt; and therefore it becomes kings to encourage it, and not oppreſs thoſe who are employed in it: or the king is a ſervant to the field[z]; ſome kings have addicted themſelves to huſbandry, and been great lovers of it, as Uzziah was, 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. and ſome of the Chineſe emperors, as their hiſtories[a] ſhew; and the kings of Perſia[b]: Vulcan, in the ſhield of Achilles, repreſented the reapers, gatherers, and binders of ſheaves at work in the field, and a king ſtanding among the ſheaves with a ſceptre in his hand, looking on with great pleaſure, whilſt a dinner is prepared by his orders for the workmen[c]; many of the Roman generals, and high officers, were called from the plow, particularly Cincinnatus[d]; and theſe encouraged huſbandry in their ſubjects, as well as took care of their own farms. There is another ſenſe of the words given, beſides many more; "and "the moſt excellent Lord of the earth, (that is, the "moſt high God) is the king of every field that is "tilled; (that is, the king of the whole habitable "world) or the king Meſſiah, lord of his field, the "church, and who is the moſt eminent in all the "earth[e]." The Midraſh interprets it of the holy bleſſed God.

[x] Tikkune Zohar Correct. 69. fol. 114. 1.

[y] ויתרון ארץ בכל היא & præſtantia terræ in omnibus ipſa, Montanus; porro excellentia terræ præ omnibus eſt, Vatablus; & præcellentia terræ in omnibus eſt, Gejerus.

℣. 10. He that loveth ſilver, ſhall not be ſatisfied with ſilver, &c.] The tillage of the earth is neceſſary, a very laudable and uſeful employment, and men do well to buſy themſelves in it; without this, neither the common people, nor the greateſt perſonages can be ſupplied with the neceſſaries of life; but then an immoderate love of money is criminal, which is here meant by loving ſilver, one ſpecies of money, which when loved beyond meaſure is the root of all evil; and beſides, when a man has got ever ſo much of it, he is not ſatisfied, he ſtill wants more, like the horſe-leach at the vein cries, Give, give: or he cannot eat ſilver, ſo Jarchi; or be fed with money, as Mr Broughton renders it; and herein the fruits of the earth, for which the huſbandman labours, have the preference to ſilver; for theſe he can eat and be filled, and ſatisfied with them, but he cannot eat his bags of gold and ſilver. Nor he that loveth abundance with increaſe; that is, he that coveteth a great deal of this world's things ſhall not be ſatisfied with the increaſe of them, let that be what it will; or he ſhall have no increaſe[f], be ever the better for his abundance, or enjoy the comfort and benefit of it: or he that loveth abundance from whence there is no increaſe[g]; that loves to have a multitude of people about him, as man-ſervants and maid-ſervants; a large equipage, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts, which are of very little uſe and ſervice, or none at all. This is alſo vanity; the immoderate love of money, coveting large eſtates and poſſeſſions, and to have a train of ſervants. Jarchi allegorically interprets ſilver and abundance, of the commands, and the multitude of them.

℣. 11. When goods increaſe, they are increaſed that eat them, &c.] When a man's ſubſtance increaſes by trade or otherwiſe, very often ſo it is, that his family increaſes, and he has more mouths to feed, and backs to clothe; or his eſtate growing larger, if he lives ſuitable to it, he muſt keep more ſervants; and theſe, as they have but little work to do, are deſcribed by their eating rather than by their working; and beſides, ſuch a growing man in the world has more friends and viſiters that come about him and eat with him, as well as the poor which wait upon him to receive his alms: and if his farms, and his fields, and his flocks are enlarged, he muſt have more huſbandmen, and labourers, and ſhepherds to look after them, who all muſt be maintained. So Pheraulas in Xenophon[h] obſerves, "that now he was poſſeſſed of much, that he neither eat, nor drank, nor ſlept the ſweeter for it; what he got by his plenty, was, that he had more committed to his keeping, and more to diſtribute to others; he had more care and more buſineſs, with trouble; for now, ſays he, many ſervants require food of me, many drink, many clothing, ſome need phyſicians, &c. it muſt needs be, adds he, that they that poſſeſs much muſt ſpend much on the gods, on friends, and on gueſts." And what good is there to the owners thereof, ſaving the beholding of them with their eyes? he can go into his grounds, his fields, and his meadows, to behold his flocks and his herds, and can ſay, All theſe are mine; he can go into his chambers and open his treaſures, and feed his eyes with looking upon his bags of gold and ſilver, his jewels, and other riches; he can behold a multitude of people at his table, eating at his expence, and more maintained at his coſt; and if a liberal man, it may be a pleaſure to him, if otherwiſe, it will give him pain: and excepting theſe, he enjoys no more than food and raiment; and often ſo it is, that even his very ſervants have in ſome things the advantage of him, as follows. The Targum is, "What profit is there to the owner "thereof who gathers it, unleſs he does good with "it, that he may ſee the gift of the reward with "his eyes in the world to come?" Jarchi interprets it after this manner, "When men bring many "free-will offerings, the prieſts are increaſed that "eat them; and what good is to the owner of "them, the lord, but the ſight of his eyes, who "ſays, and his will is done?"

℣. 12. The ſleep of a labouring man is ſweet, whether he eat little or much, &c.] Or of a ſervant[i], who enjoys ſleep equally as a king; a tiller of the ground, as Jarchi; who alſo interprets it of one that ſerves the Lord, as likewiſe the Targum; a beloved one of his, to whom he gives ſleep, Pſalm cxxvii. 2. A refreſhing ſleep is always reckoned a great mercy and bleſſing, and which labouring men enjoy with ſweetneſs[k]; for if they have but little to eat at ſupper, yet coming weary from their work, ſleep is eaſily brought on when they lie down, and ſound ſleep they have, and riſe in the morning, lively and active, and fit for buſineſs; or if they eat more plentifully, yet through their labour they have a good digeſtion, and their ſleep is not hindered: ſo that ſhould it be anſwered to the above queſtion, what has the maſter more than the ſervant, though he eats and drinks more freely, and of the beſt, and lives voluptuouſly? yet it may be replied, that in the buſineſs of ſleep, the labouring man has the preference to him; which muſt be owned to be a great bleſſing of life, and is often interrupted by exceſſive eating and drinking. But the abundance of the rich will not ſuffer him to ſleep; either the abundance of food which he eats, which loads his ſtomach, and fills his head with vapours, and makes him reſtleſs, ſo that he can get no ſleep, or what he does get is very uncomfortable: or the abundance of his riches fills him with cares, what he ſhall do with them, and how to keep and increaſe them; and with fears, leſt thieves ſhould break in and take them away from him, ſo that he cannot ſleep quietly [l]. The Targum is, "ſweet is "the ſleep of a man that ſerves the Lord of the "world with a perfect heart; and he ſhall have reſt "in the houſe of his grave, whether he lives a "few years or more, &c." and much to the ſame purpoſe Jarchi; and who ſays, it is thus interpreted in an ancient book of theirs, called Tanchuma.

℣. 13. There is a ſore evil which I have ſeen under the ſun, &c.] Or an evil ſickneſs [m]. A ſinful diſeaſe in the perſon with whom it is found, and very diſagreeable to others to behold; it is enough to make one ſick to ſee it; and what he is about to relate, he himſelf was an eye-witneſs of: Namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt; laid up in barns and granaries, as the fruits of the earth; or in cheſts and coffers, as gold and ſilver, for the uſe and ſervice of the owners of them; and which yet have been to their real injury; being either uſed by them in a luxurious and intemperate way, ſo have brought diſeaſes on their bodies, and damnation to their ſouls; or not uſed at all for their own good, or the good of others, which brings the curſe of God upon them, to their ruin and deſtruction, both here and hereafter: and oftentimes ſo it is, and which no doubt had fallen under the obſervation of Solomon; that ſome who have been great miſers, and have hoarded up their ſubſtance, without uſing them themſelves, or communicating them to others, have not only been plundered of them, but, for the ſake of them, their lives have been taken away in a moſt barbarous manner, by cut-throats and villains; ſometimes by their own ſervants, nay, even by their own children. Riches ill gotten and ill uſed, are very prejudicial to the owners; and if they are well got, but ill uſed, or not uſed at all, greatly hurt the ſpiritual and eternal ſtate of men; it is a difficult thing for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven, and a covetous man cannot; if a profeſſor, the word he hears, is choaked and made unprofitable; he errs from the faith, and pierces himſelf through with many ſorrows now, and is liable to eternal damnation hereafter. The Targum interprets it of a man that gathers riches, and does no good with them; but keeps them to himſelf, to do himſelf evil in the world to come.

℣. 14. But thoſe riches periſh by evil travail, &c.] Or, by an evil buſineſs or affair [n]. That is, ſuch riches as are not well got, or are not uſed as they ſhould be, theſe waſte away and come to nothing; either by the owner's bad management, and miſconduct in trade and buſineſs; or by fire, tempeſts, thieves and robbers, and many other ways and means: theſe are very uncertain things; and there are various ways by which they make themſelves wings and flee away, under the direction of a divine Providence. And he begetteth a ſon, and there is nothing in his hand; the riches he had hoarded up, he deſigned for his ſon; but being ſtripped of them by one means or another, when he comes to die, has nothing to leave his ſon: or if his riches do not periſh in his own life-time, yet they are quickly conſumed by his ſon, who, in a ſhort time, has nothing to live upon; and ſo being brought up a gentleman, and in no buſineſs, is in a worſe condition than ſuch who have been brought up to work for their living, and in no expectation of an eſtate after the deceaſe of their friends. The Targum underſtands it in this latter ſenſe, paraphraſing the words thus, "and thoſe "riches, which he ſhall leave his ſon after his death, "ſhall periſh, becauſe he hath gotten them in an "evil way; and they ſhall not remain in the hand "of the ſon whom he hath begotten; neither ſhall "any thing remain in his hand."

℣. 15. As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked ſhall he return to go as he came, &c.] This may be underſtood either of the covetous rich man, or of his ſon; and that ſuppoſing what is before ſaid, ſhould not be the caſe of either of them, but they ſhould poſſeſs their ſubſtance as long as they live; yet when they come to die, they will be ſtripped of them all; of their gold and ſilver, their plate and jewels, and rich houſhold-furniture; of their cattle and poſſeſſions, farms and eſtates, which are no longer theirs; and even of their very cloaths, and be as naked as they were when they came into the world; and which is indeed the caſe of every man, Job i. 21. and is uſed as an argument, and a very forcible one, againſt covetouſneſs. And ſhall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand; nothing of his ſubſtance, which he has got by his labour, and hoarded up with great care; not the leaſt portion of it can he carry away with him when he dies; not any of his jewels, nor bags of gold and ſilver; and if any of theſe ſhould be put into his grave, which has been ſometimes done at the interment of great perſonages; theſe are of no manner of uſe and ſervice to him, either to comfort and refreſh his body, or to ſave his ſoul from hell, and procure it an entrance into the heavenly glory; ſee 1 Tim. vi. 7. Prov. xi. 4. The Targum allegorizes this in a very orthodox way, not very uſual, in favour of original ſin, and againſt the doctrine of merit; "as "he goes out of his mother's womb, naked, with"out a covering, and without any good; ſo he "ſhall return to go to the houſe of his grave, in"digent of merit, as he came into this world; "and no good reward ſhall he receive by his "labour, to take with him into the world to "which he goes, that it may be for merit in his "hand."

℣. 16. And this alſo is a ſore evil, that in all points as he came, ſo ſhall he go, &c.] This ſeems not to be an evil or vanity, diſtinct from the former; but the ſame repeated and confirmed, and expreſſed, if poſſible, in ſtronger terms, that a man is in all reſpects alike, when he goes out of the world as when he came in. A man's birth is ſignified by coming, that is, out of his mother's womb, and into the world; and which is a deſcription of every man born into it, John i. 9. he is of the earth earthly; comes forth like a flower, and ſprings up as graſs; he comes not of himſelf, nor caſually, but by means of his parents; and according to the determinate will of God, and to anſwer ſome end or other: and his death is ſignified by going; a going the way of all fleſh; a going out of the world; a going to the grave, the houſe of all living, a man's long home; it is like going from one houſe to another; for death is not an annihilation of man, but a remove of him from hence elſewhere; and a man's birth and death are in all points alike. This is to be underſtood of natural and civil things; of riches and honours, which men cannot carry with them; and with reſpect to them, they are as they were born, naked and ſtripped of them; and with reſpect to the body, the parts of it then are the ſame, though more grown; it is as naked as it was born; and a man is as much beholden to his friends for his grave, as for his ſwadling cloaths; it becomes what it was at firſt, earth and duſt; and as a man comes not into the world at his own will and pleaſure, ſo neither does he go out of it at his will, but the Lord's. The Midraſh interprets it thus, "as a man comes into the world, with crying, weeping and ſighing, and without knowledge, ſo he goes out." Likewiſe this is only true of natural and unregenerate men as to moral things; as they are born in ſin, they die in ſin; with only this difference, an addition of more ſins; as they come into the world without the image of God, without a righteouſneſs, without holineſs, and without the grace of God, ſo they go out of it without theſe things: but this is not true of ſaints and truly gracious perſons; they come into the world with ſin, but go out of it without it; being waſhed in the blood of Chriſt, juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and all their ſins expiated and pardoned through his ſacrifice: they are born without a righteouſneſs, but do not die without one; Chriſt has wrought out an everlaſting righteouſneſs for them; this is imputed to them; is received by faith; given them; they are found in it, living and dying; and this introduces them into heaven and happineſs: they are born without holineſs, but do not live and die without it; they are regenerated and ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and at the moment of death made perfectly holy. This only therefore is true of men, as natural, and with reſpect to natural and civil things: the Targum interprets it, "as he comes into this world, void of "merit, ſo he ſhall go into that." And what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind? for riches, which are as unſatisfying as the wind; which are as ſhifting, and as ſwift to flee away as that; and can no more be held, when it is the will of God they ſhould go, and eſpecially at death, than the wind is to be held in the fiſt of men; and which are as unprofitable as that in the hour of death. Particularly, what profit has a man of all his riches, which he has got by labour, when he neither makes uſe of them in life, for his own good, nor the good of others; and when he comes to die, they leave him and ſtand him in no ſtead; and eſpecially having been unconcerned about his immortal ſoul; and having been wholly taken up in the purſuit of ſuch vain and tranſitory things? ſee Matt. xvi. 26.

[l] Ne noctu, nec diu, quietus unquam eam, Plauti Aulularia, act. 1. ſc. 1. v. 28. Aurea rumpunt tecta quietem, Senec. Hercul. Oet. v. 646. [m] רעה חולה morbus malus, Tigurine verſion, Vatablus. [n] בענין רע occupatione, negotio, vel caſu malo, Gejerus.

ỳ. 17. All his days alſo he eateth in darkneſs, &c.] To all that has been ſaid, is added another evil, that attends ſuch whoſe hearts are inordinately ſet on riches; that all their days, throughout the whole of their lives, they live a moſt uncomfortable life; for eating is here put for their whole manner of living: ſuch not only eat coarſe bread, and very mean food of any ſort, but wear ſordid apparel, and live in a poor cottage, in a very obſcure and miſerable manner. Aben Ezra underſtands it literally, of the night to which time ſuch a man defers eating, that he might loſe no time in his labour; and that it might not be ſeen what ſort of food he eats, and how ſparingly, and that others might not eat with him; and what he does eat, is not eaten freely, but grudgingly, and with anguiſh and diſtreſs of mind, without any real pleaſure and joy; and much leſs with the light of God's countenance, the diſcoveries of his love, and communion with him: the Targum is, "all his days he "dwelleth in darkneſs, that he may taſte his bread "alone." And he hath much ſorrow and wrath with his ſickneſs; either the ſickneſs of his mind, his covetouſneſs; or the ſickneſs of his body, emaciated by withholding from himſelf the neceſſaries of life: or when he comes upon a ſick bed, he is filled with ſorrow and indignation, that he muſt live no longer, to accumulate more wealth, and accompliſh his projects and deſigns; and that he muſt leave his wealth, he has been at ſo much pains to gather together. Or, and he is much angry [o]; when things do not anſwer in trade according to his wiſhes; when his ſubſtance diminiſhes, or however, does not increaſe as he deſires; when he is cheated by fraudulent men, or robbed by thieves: and he hath ſickneſs [p]; either of body or mind, or both, becauſe matters do not ſucceed, as he would have them; and through fretfulneſs at loſſes, and croſſes, and diſappointments; and through cares in getting and keeping what he has: and wrath; at all about him, whom he is ready to charge with ſlothfulneſs or unfaithfulneſs to him; and even at the providence of God, that does not give him the deſired ſucceſs; ſo that he has no manner of pleaſure and comfort in life.

ỳ. 18. Behold that which I have ſeen, &c.] Obſerved, conſidered and approved of, and which he recommended and excited attention to, and is as follows: It is good and comely for one to eat and to drink; to make uſe of the creatures God has given for ſervice, in a free and liberal manner, without exceſs, and with moderation; and not deprive a man's ſelf of thoſe things he may lawfully partake of, and are neceſſary for him: to do this is good for himſelf, and for the health of his body; and is right in the ſight of God, and is comely before men; it is not only lawful, but laudable. There is another verſion and ſenſe of the words, it is good to eat and drink him that is fair [q], or comely; Chriſt, who is fairer than the children of men; to live by faith on him, to eat his fleſh, and drink his blood; but this, however true, ſpiritual and evangelical, it ſeems foreign to the text. It follows, And to enjoy the good of all his labour, that he taketh under the ſun, all the days of his life, which God giveth him; this laſt clauſe, which God giveth him, is not to be connected with the good of all his labour; though it is true, that whatever good is got by labour, is the gift of God; but with all the days of his life; for the life of man, and all the days of it, be they more or fewer, are the gift of God, and according to his determinate will and pleaſure; and throughout this time a man ſhould enjoy, in a comfortable way, with thankfulneſs to God, the good things he has gotten by his labour and induſtry, through the bleſſing of God along with them. This Solomon frequently inculcates; Aben Ezra ſays, this is the third time, but it ſeems to be the fourth; ſee chap. ii. 24. and iii. 13, 22. For it is his portion; that is, in this life; for otherwiſe, if a good man, he has a better portion in another: this is the part which God has allotted to him here; and it is his duty, and for his good and comfort, to make uſe of it.

℣. 19. Every man alſo to whom God hath given riches and wealth, &c.] Which include the whole of a man's ſubſtance; all his eſtate, perſonal and real; and all his goods and poſſeſſions, moveable and immoveable, as gold, ſilver, cattle, fields and farms; which are all the gift of God, by whatſoever means they may be acquired or poſſeſſed. And hath given him power; or, cauſed him to have dominion[r], over his wealth and riches, and not be a ſlave to them, as many are: but to have ſo much command of them and of himſelf, as to eat thereof; comfortably enjoy them; and diſpoſe of them, to his own good, the good of others, and the glory of God. It follows, And to take his portion; which God hath allotted him; to take it thankfully, and uſe it freely and comfortably. And to rejoice in his labour; in the things he has been labouring for, in a chearful uſe of them; bleſſing God for them, and taking the comfort of them. This is the gift of God; to have ſuch power over his ſubſtance, and not be a ſlave to it, and to enjoy the fruits of his labour, in a chearful and comfortable manner; this is as much the gift of God as riches themſelves[s].

℣. 20. For he ſhall not much remember the days of his life, &c.] Be they more or fewer, as Jarchi: he will not think life long and tedious; nor dwell upon, and diſtreſs himſelf with the troubles he has met with, or is likely to meet with; but, being content with the good things God has given him, and freely and chearfully enjoying them, he paſſes away his time delightfully and pleaſantly. Some, as Aben Ezra obſerves, and which he approves of, and is agreeable to the accents, render the words, if he has not much, he remembers the days of his life[t]; if he has but little of the good things of this life, he remembers how few his days are he has to live; and doubts not he ſhall have enough to carry him to the end of his days, and therefore is quite eaſy and content; he calls to mind how he has been ſupplied all his days hitherto, and is perſuaded that that God, who has provided for him, will continue his goodneſs to him, and that he ſhall not want any good thing; and therefore does not diſtreſs himſelf with what is to come. Becauſe God anſwereth him in the joy of his heart; he calls upon God for a bleſſing on his labours, aſks of him his daily food, and deſires what may be proper and ſufficient for him, or what he judges is neceſſary and convenient; and God anſwers his prayers, and petitions, and good wiſhes, by filling his heart with food and gladneſs; and giving him that chearfulneſs of ſpirit, and thankfulneſs of heart, in the enjoyment of every bleſſing; and eſpecially, if along with it, he lifts up the light of his countenance, and grants him joy in the holy Ghoſt; he will go on ſo pleaſantly and comfortably, as to forget all his former troubles; and it will diſſipate his doubts and fears, about how he ſhall live for the future.

CHAP. VI.

THE wiſe man goes on to expoſe the vanity of riches, as poſſeſſed by a covetous man, who makes no uſe of them; an evil, and a common one under the ſun, ℣. 1. Who is deſcribed by the good things he has; which he has not a power to enjoy, but a ſtranger enjoys them, ℣. 2. by his numerous offspring and long life; yet neither is he ſatisfied with good in life, nor has he a burial at death; wherefore an abortive is preferred unto him, ℣. 3. For though many things may be ſaid of that which are diſagreeable, yet worſe of him, and that has more reſt than he; and beſides, they both go to one place, the grave, ℣. 4—6. and the vanity of an anxious labour for riches, is further argued from the uſe of them, at moſt and beſt, which is only for the body, and the ſuſtenance of it, but cannot ſatisfy the mind or ſoul, ℣. 7. and this uſe a fool can make of them, as well as a wiſe man; and a poor man, that is knowing, diligent and induſtrious, to live, as well as the rich, ℣. 8. Wherefore it is beſt to enjoy, and be content with preſent mercies, than to let looſe the wandering deſires after what may never be had, ℣. 9. and eſpecially it ſhould be conſidered, that let a man be in what circumſtances he will, he is but a man; and theſe circumſtances are determined and appointed by God, which he cannot alter; and therefore it is both vain and ſinful to contend with him, ℣. 10. And after all, a man is never the better for his carking cares and wandering deſires, ſince there are ſo many things that increaſe vanity, ℣. 11. and a man is ſo ignorant of what is good for him for the preſent, and of what ſhall be after him, ℣. 12.

℣. 1. There is an evil which I have ſeen under the ſun, &c.] The Vulgate Latin verſion reads it, another evil; but wrongly, for the ſame is conſidered as before, the evil of covetouſneſs; which is one of the evil things that come out of the heart of man; is abominable to the Lord, contrary to his nature and will, and a breach of his law, which forbids it, and is the root of all evil; this is an evil under the ſun, for there is nothing of this kind above it; and it fell under the obſervation of Solomon in various inſtances. And it is common among men; or, great over men[u]; or over the man, the covetous man: it ſpreads itſelf over them; few were free from it, even ſo long ago, in thoſe early times, and in ſuch times in which ſilver was made no account of, and was like ſtones in Jeruſalem, as common as they; and yet the ſin of covetouſneſs, of hoarding up money and making no uſe of it, for a man's own good, and the good of others, was very rife among men, 1 Kings x. 27.

℣. 2. A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, &c.] By riches may be meant gold and ſilver, things which a covetous man is never ſatisfied with; and by wealth, cattle, with which farms and fields are ſtocked: the wealth of men, eſpecially in former times, and in the eaſtern countries, lay very much in theſe, as did the wealth of Abraham and Job, Gen. xiii. 2. Job i. 3. and all theſe, as they are reckoned glorious and honourable in themſelves; ſo they create honour and glory among men, and raiſe to high and honourable places; and theſe, as they go, they are uſually put together, and are called by the name of honour and glory itſelf; ſee Prov. iii. 16. 2 Chron. i. 11, 12. Gen. xxxi. 1. And they are all the gifts of God, which he either as bleſſings beſtows upon men, or ſuffers men to attain unto, though a curſe may go along with them; which is the caſe here, for no man whatever is poſſeſſed of them, but by the will of God or his divine permiſſion; ſee 1 Chron. xxix. 12. and which a man may, and ſometimes has, ſuch a plentiful portion of. So that he wanteth nothing for his ſoul of all that he deſireth; he has not only for the ſupply of his wants, what is neceſſary for his daily uſe and ſervice, but even what is for delight and pleaſure; yea, as much as he could reaſonably wiſh for; nay, more than heart could wiſh, Pſal. lxxiii. 7. Yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof; the Targum adds, becauſe of his ſin; either he takes it away from him, he making no uſe of it; or his appetite is taken away, that he has no deſire to it; or rather, he has no heart to enjoy what he has, and ſcarce any part of it; not to eat and drink, and wear ſuitable to his circumſtances, but grudges whatever he lays out on his back or belly, or in houſe-keeping in his family; for tho' God gives him a large ſubſtance, yet not a heart to make uſe of it, without which he cannot enjoy it; and therefore it would have been as good, or better for him, to have been without it; ſee chap. v. 19. But a ſtranger eateth it; the Syriac verſion adds, after him; enjoys it, not only a part of it, but the whole; one that is not akin to him, and perhaps was never known by him; and yet, by one means or another, either in a lawful or unlawful way, comes into the poſſeſſion of all he has; this has been always reckoned a great unhappineſs, Lam. v. 2. Hoſ. vii. 9. Hence it follows, This is vanity, and it is an evil diſeaſe; it is a vain thing to be poſſeſſed of great ſubſtance, and not enjoy any thing of it in a comfortable way, through the ſin of covetouſneſs; which is a ſpiritual diſeaſe, and a very bad one; very prejudicial to the ſoul, and the ſtate of it, and is rarely cured. Juvenal[w] calls it, phrenzy and madneſs for a man to live poor, that he may die rich; he is like the aſs that Craſſus Agelaſtus ſaw, loaded with figs, and cropping thorns.

℣. 3. If a man beget an hundred children, &c.] Sons and daughters, a certain number for an uncertain. Some have had many children, and almoſt this number; Rehoboam had twenty eight ſons and threeſcore daughters; and Ahab had ſeventy ſons, how many daughters is not ſaid, 2 Chron. xi. 21. 2 Kings x. 1. this was reckoned a great honour and happineſs to have many children; happy was the man that had his quiver full of them, Pſal. cxxvii. 3. ſuch a caſe is here ſuppoſed. And live many years, ſo that the days of his years be many; or ſufficient, as Jarchi interprets it; he lives as long as life is deſirable; lives to a good old age, to the full age of men, threeſcore years and ten; yea, ſuppoſing he was to live to be as old as Methuſelah, And his ſoul be not filled with good; does not enjoy the good things he has; has no pleaſure nor ſatisfaction in the temporal good things of life, has not the comfort of them, and is always uneaſy, becauſe he has not more of them; and eſpecially if his ſoul is not filled with ſpiritual good things, the grace of God, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt. And alſo that he have no burial; as Jezebel, Jehoiakim, and others; who is either deſtroyed by robbers and cut-throats, for the ſake of his ſubſtance, and caſt into a ditch or a river, or ſome place, where he is never found to be interred; or elſe, being of ſuch a ſordid diſpoſition, he provides not for a decent burial, ſuitable to his circumſtances, or forbids one; or, being deſpiſed and diſeſteemed by all men, his heirs and ſucceſſors either neglect or refuſe to give him one; ſee Jer. xxii. 29. I ſay, that an untimely birth is better than he; an abortive is to be preferred unto him; it would have been better for him if he had never been born, or had been in ſuch a caſe.

℣. 4. For he cometh in with vanity, &c.] The Targum adds, into this world. Some underſtand this of the abortive, and render it, though he cometh in with vanity[x], yet is to be preferred to the covetous man; others interpret it of the covetous man himſelf; and ſome of both: or, however, they may be compared together in theſe inſtances; the abortive comes into the world in vain, for nothing, and anſwers no purpoſe, as can well be obſerved; and the ſame may be ſaid of a covetous rich man; he walks in a vain ſhew, and is altogether vanity, in his coming in, in his converſation, and going out. And departeth in darkneſs; or, into darkneſs[y]; goes out of the world without any notice taken of him; and goes down to the dark grave, where he lies in obſcurity. And his name ſhall be covered with darkneſs; the abortive has no name, and is never ſpoken of; and ſo the name and memory of ſuch a man, as is here deſcribed, rot and periſh: and in this reſpect the abortive has the preference to him; for though he is covered with darkneſs, yet no ill is ever ſpoken of him; whereas the name of the wicked covetous man, is curſed.

℣. 5. Moreover, he hath not ſeen the ſun, &c.] This muſt be ſpoken of the abortive, and ſeems to confirm the ſenſe of the former text, as belonging to it; and whereas it has never ſeen the light of the ſun, nor enjoyed the pleaſure and comfort of it, it is no ways diſtreſſing to it to be without it. The Targum is, "the light of the law he ſeeth "not; and knoweth not between good and evil, "to judge between this world and that to come:" ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, neither knows the difference of good and evil. Nor known any thing; not the ſun, nor any thing elſe: or experienced[z] and felt the heat of the ſun, and its comfortable influences; which a man may, who is blind, and has never ſeen it, but an abortive has not; and indeed has known no man, nor any creature, nor thing in this world, and therefore it is no concern to it to be without them; and beſides, has never had any knowledge or experience of the troubles of life, which every living man is liable to. Wherefore this is certain, this hath more reſt than the other; that is, the abortive, than the covetous man; having never been diſtreſſed with the troubles of life, and now not affected with the ſenſe of loſs.

℣. 6. Yea, though he live a thouſand years twice told, &c.] Or two thouſand years, which no man ever did, nor even one thouſand years; Methuſelah, the oldeſt man, did not live ſo long as that; this is more than twice the age of the oldeſt man: there is one ſort of the Ethiopians, who are ſaid[a] to live almoſt half the ſpace of time longer than uſual, called from thence Macrobii; which Pliny[b] makes to be one hundred and forty years, which is juſt double the common term of life. This here is only a ſuppoſition. Aben Ezra interprets it, a thouſand thouſand, but wrongly; ſo the Arabic verſion, tho' he lives many thouſand years. Yet hath he ſeen no good; not enjoyed the good of his labour, what he has been labouring for and was poſſeſſed of; and therefore has lived ſo long as he has, to very little purpoſe, and with very little comfort or credit; and eſpecially he has had no experience of ſpiritual good. Do not all go to one place? that is, the grave; they do, even all men; it is the houſe appointed for all living, Job xxx. 23. and hither go both the abortive, and the covetous rich man; ſo that he has in this no preeminence to it. Jarchi interprets it of hell, the one place, whither all ſinners go; but the former ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 7. All the labour of man is for his mouth, &c.] For the food of his mouth, as the Targum; for the ſuſtenance of his body, for food and cloathing, one part being put for the whole: all that a man labours for is to get this; and if he does not enjoy it, his labour is in vain; meats are for the belly, which are taken in by the mouth, and for theſe a man labours; and if he does not eat them, when he has got them, he labours to no purpoſe. And yet the appetite is not filled; even the bodily or ſenſual appetite; no, not even by thoſe who eat the fruit of their labour; for though their hunger is allayed for the preſent, and the appetite is ſatisfied for a while, yet it returns again, and requires more food, and ſo continually: or, the ſoul is not filled, or ſatisfied[c]; it is the body only that is filled or ſatisfied with ſuch things, at beſt; the mind of man graſps after greater things, and can find no contentment or ſatisfaction in earthly or ſenſual enjoyments. This ſeems to be a new argument, proving the vanity of riches, from the narrow uſe of them; which only reaches to the body, not to the ſoul.

℣. 8. For what hath the wiſe more than the fool? &c.] More delight and pleaſure, in gratifying his ſenſes, by eating and drinking: the wiſe man enjoys no more than the fool; the fool finds as much pleaſure in the labour of his hands, which is for his mouth, as the wiſe man does; and the wiſe man can get no more ſatisfaction to his mind, from theſe outward gratifications, than the fool. What hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living? either, what does the poor man want more than the rich man, that knows how to get his bread, and is diligent and induſtrious among men to live, and does get a livelihood for himſelf and family; he enjoys all the ſweets and comforts of life, as well as the rich man: or what hath the poor knowing man? as Aben Ezra interprets it, according to the accents; what has he more, or does he enjoy more, than the poor fooliſh man, provided he has but ſenſe enough to behave himſelf among men, ſo as to have bread to eat, and cloaths to wear; which is as much as any man can enjoy, be he ever ſo rich or ſo wiſe?

℣. 9. Better is the ſight of the eyes, than the wandering of the deſire, &c.] By the ſight of the eyes, is not meant the bare beholding outward riches, as in chap. v. 11. but the enjoyment of preſent mercies; ſuch things as a man is in the poſſeſſion of, and with which he ſhould be content, Heb. xiii. 5. and by the wandering of the deſire, the craving appetite and inſatiable luſt of the covetous mind, which enlarges its deſire, as hell, after a thouſand things, and every thing it can think of; ſuch a mind roves through the whole creation, and covets every thing under the ſun: now it is better to enjoy contentedly things in ſight and in poſſeſſion, than to let the mind looſe in vague deſires, after things that may never be come at, and if attained to, would give no ſatisfaction. This is alſo vanity and vexation of ſpirit; a moſt vain thing, to give the mind ſuch a looſe and liberty in its unbounded deſires after worldly things; and a vexation of ſpirit it is to ſuch a craving mind, that it cannot obtain what it is ſo deſirous of.

℣. 10. That which hath been is named already, and it is known that it is man, &c.] Which may be underſtood of the firſt man Adam, who has been, has exiſted, was produced by the immediate power of God, creating and forming him out of the duſt of the earth; was made after the image, and in the likeneſs of God, a wiſe and knowing creature, a rich and powerful one, the figure of him that was to come, being the head and repreſentative of all his poſterity; and he has been named already, he had his name from the Lord himſelf ſuitable to his nature and formation; he called his name Adam, from Adamah the earth, from whence he was taken; and though he was ſo wiſe and great, and even affected deity, which was the ſnare laid for him by his enemy, it is well known he was but a man, of the earth earthly, and returned to it again. Some have applied this to the ſecond man, the Lord from heaven, as the Ordinary Gloſs, and Jerom; and render it, that which ſhall be, ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion; as yet he was not man, though he had agreed to be and was propheſied of that he ſhould; however he was named already the ſeed of the woman, Shiloh, Ithiel, the Meſſiah, or Anointed; hence by Solomon, in alluſion to this name, his name is ſaid to be as ointment poured forth, Cant. i. 3. and as it was known that he ſhould be man, ſo it is now known that he is really and truly man; though not merely ſo, but God as well as man; yet as to his human nature his Father is greater and mightier than he; but this ſenſe ſome interpreters deſpiſe and laugh at: and indeed though the whole of it is truth, it does not ſeem to be the truth of the text, nor ſuitable to the context: rather the words are to be underſtood of mankind in general, of all men, not only that have been, but that are or ſhall be; theſe were all appointed to come into being by the Lord; they have been in his eternal purpoſes and decrees, and their names are written or not written in the Lamb's book of life; and they have all one common name, that of man, weak, frail, mortal, wretched man; they are, as is ſaid of the Egyptians, men and not God, Iſa. xxxi. 3. particularly this is true of perſons the moſt famous that have been in the world; ſuch who have been in ages paſt, and their names have been called, or they have obtained a name among men, men of renown, that are on the liſt of fame; ſuch who have been the moſt famous for wiſdom, for riches, for ſtrength, or for power and authority, and have even had deity aſcribed to them, and divine worſhip given them; yet it has been notorious that they were but men, and not God, ſo Jarchi; and died as ſuch; ſee Pſal. ix. 20. and lxxxii. 1, 6, 7. Ezek. xxviii. 2, 3, 9. Acts xii. 22, 23. Moreover this may be underſtood of all things relating to men; that all that has been, is, or ſhall be, has been already named of God, determined and appointed by him; ſo the Targum

[c] הנפש לא תמלא anima non implebitur, Pagninus, Montanus; anima non expletur, Mercerus, Gejerus; non impletur, Cocceius, ſo Broughton; non ſatiatur, Druſius.

Targum renders it, "all is the decree of the Word "of the Lord;" all things relating to the temporal affairs of men, as to their birth and place of abode, their callings and ſtations of life; ſo to their circumſtances of poverty or riches, which with all their craving deſires and carking cares it is impoſſible for them to alter, or make them otherwiſe than they are; which is obſerved to check the wandering and inſatiable deſires of men after worldly things. Neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he; the Lord of the world, as the Targum; not the angel of death, as Jarchi; the devil, which had the power of death, and is ſtronger than men; nor death itſelf, as others, againſt which there is no ſtanding, chap. viii. 8. Iſa. xxviii. 15, 18. but God himſelf, who is mightier than men, and with whom a creature ſhould not ſtrive or contend; either about his being and the make of it, or concerning his circumſtances in the world, that they are not greater and better than they be; or about God's decrees concerning theſe or other things; but quietly ſubmit to his will, and be content in whatſoever circumſtances they are, conſidering that he is the Creator and a ſovereign Being, they are creatures and dependent on him; and let their circumſtances be what they will, wiſe or unwiſe, rich or poor, they are but men, and can never riſe higher; ſee Job ix. 3, 4. and xxxiii. 12, 13. Iſa. xlix. 9, 10. Rom. ix. 19, 20. It is obſerved by the Maſoretes that this is juſt the middle of the book.

℣. 11. Seeing there be many things that increaſe vanity, &c.] As appears by all that has been ſaid in this and the preceding chapters; ſuch as wiſdom and knowledge, wealth and riches, pleaſure, power, and authority. Man is a poor vain creature himſelf, all he is and has is vanity; and theſe ſerve but to increaſe it, and make him vainer and vainer ſtill. What is man the better? for theſe things? not at all, rather the worſe, being more vain; there is no profit by them, no excellency ariſes to him from them, no happineſs in them, nothing that will be of any ſervice to him, eſpecially with reſpect to a future ſtate, or when he comes to die. It may be rendered, as it is in the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions, ſeeing there are many words that multiply vanity; as all ſuch words do that are uſed with God by way of murmur and complaint concerning a man's lot and condition in this world, and as expoſtulating and contending with him about it; theſe increaſe ſin, and by them men contract more guilt, and therefore are not the better for ſuch litigations, but the worſe; and ſo the words ſtand in connection with the preceding verſe: but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt, this being the concluſion of the wiſe man's diſcourſe concerning vanity. So the Targum and Jarchi underſtand it, of things, and not words.

℣. 12. For who knoweth what is good for man in this life? &c.] To be in a higher or lower ſtation of life, to live in grandeur or meanneſs, to be rich or poor, learned or unlearned; ſince that which ſeems moſt agreeable to human nature is attended with ſo much vanity, the occaſion of ſo much ſin, and often iſſues in ruin and miſery, that no man knows what is beſt for him; and therefore it is the wiſeſt way to be content with what a man has, and enjoy it in the moſt comfortable manner, and uſe it to the beſt ends and purpoſes he can. The Targum is, "for who is he that knows what is good "for a man in this world, but to ſtudy in the law, "which is the life of the world?" ſo the Midraſh. All the days of his vain life, which he ſpendeth as a ſhadow? or the number of the days of his vain life, which he makes as a ſhadow[d]; that is, which God makes as a ſhadow, as Cocceius obſerves; makes to paſs away ſwiftly: this is a deſcription of the vanity, brevity, and uncertainty of human life; it conſiſts of days, rather than of months and years; and thoſe ſuch as are eaſily numbered, and which paſs away ſuddenly and ſwiftly, like a ſhadow that has no ſubſtance and reality in it, and leaves nothing behind it; or like a bird that flies away, as Jarchi, and is ſeen no more; ſuch is the life of man, a moſt vain life, vanity itſelf; ſo it may be rendered, the number of the days of the life of his vanity[e]; ſince therefore he has ſo ſhort a time to enjoy any thing in, it is hard to ſay what is beſt for him to have, and the rather, ſince he is quite ignorant of what is to come. For who can tell a man what ſhall be after him under the ſun? he does not know himſelf, nor can any man inform him, what will become of his wealth and riches after his death, which he has got together; who ſhall enjoy them, and how long; and what uſe will be made of them, either to their own good, or the good of others.

CHAP. VII.

THE wiſe man having expoſed the many vanities to which men are ſubject in this life, and ſhewed that there is no real happineſs in all outward enjoyments under the ſun; proceeds to obſerve what are remedies againſt them, of which he had interſperſed ſome few hints before, as the fear and worſhip of God, and the free and moderate uſe of the creatures; and here ſuggeſts more, and ſuch as will protect from them, or ſupport under them, or teach and inſtruct how to behave whilſt attended with them, and to direct to what are proper and neceſſary in the purſuit of true and real happineſs; ſuch as care of a good name and reputation, ℣. 1. frequent meditation on mortality, ℣. 2—4. liſtening to the rebukes of the wiſe, which are preferable to the ſongs and mirth of fools, ℣. 5, 6. avoiding oppreſſion and bribery, which are very pernicious, ℣. 7. patience under provocations, and preſent bad times, as thought to be, ℣. 8—10. a purſuit of that wiſdom and knowledge which has life annexed to it, ℣. 11, 12. ſubmiſſion to the will of God, and contentment in every ſtate, ℣. 13, 14. ſhunning extremes in righteouſneſs and ſin, the beſt antidote againſt which is the fear of God, ℣. 15—18. ſuch wiſdom as not to be offended with every thing that is done, or word that is ſpoken, conſidering the imperfection of the beſt of men, the weakneſs of others, and our own, ℣. 19—22. and then the wiſe man acknowledges the imperfection of his own wiſdom and knowledge, notwithſtanding the pains he had taken, ℣. 23—25. and laments his ſin and folly in being drawn aſide by women, ℣. 26—28. and opens the cauſe of the depravity of human nature, removes it from God, who made man upright, and aſcribes it to man, the inventor of evil things, ℣. 29.

℣. 1. A good name is better than precious ointment, &c.] The word "good" is not in the text, but is rightly ſupplied, as it is by Jarchi; for of no other name can this be ſaid; that which is not good cannot be better. Some underſtand this of the name of God, which is God himſelf, who is the ſummum bonum, and chief happineſs of men, and take it to be an anſwer to the queſtion chap. vi. 12. this and this only is what is a man's good, and is preferable to all outward enjoyments whatever; intereſt in him as a covenant-God; knowledge of him in Chriſt, which has eternal life annexed to it; communion with him; the diſcoveries of his loving kindneſs, which is better than life; and the enjoyment of him to all eternity. This is true of the name of Chriſt, whoſe name Meſſiah, which ſignifies anointed, is as ointment poured forth, and is preferable to it, Cant. i. 3. John i. 41. ſo his other names, Jeſus, a Saviour; Jehovah, our righteouſneſs; Immanuel, God with us; are exceeding precious to thoſe who know the worth of him, and ſee their need of righteouſneſs and ſalvation by him; his perſon, and the knowledge of him; his goſpel, and the fame and report it gives of him, infinitely exceed the moſt precious and fragrant ointment; ſee 2 Cor. ii. 14—16. So the name or names given to the people of God, the new names of Hephzibah and Beulah, the name of ſons of God, better than that of ſons and daughters; and of chriſtians, or anointed ones, having received that anointing from Chriſt which teacheth all things, and ſo preferable to the choiceſt ointment, Iſa. lvi. 5. and lxii. 3, 4. and lxv. 15. Rev. ii. 17. Acts xi. 26. 1 John ii. 20, 27. Likewiſe to have a name written in heaven, in the Lamb's book of life, and to have one's name confeſſed by Chriſt hereafter before his Father and his holy angels; or even a good name among men, a name for a truly godly gracious perſon; for love to Chriſt, zeal for his cauſe, and faithfulneſs to his truths and ordinances; ſuch as the woman got, better than the box of ointment poured on Chriſt's head; and which the brother had, whoſe praiſe in the goſpel was throughout the churches; and as Demetrius, who had good report of all men, and of the truth itſelf, Matt. xxvi. 13. 2 Cor. viii. 18. 3 John 12. Such a good name is better than precious ointment for the value of it, being better than all riches, for which this may be put; ſee Iſaiah xxxix. 2. Prov. xxii. 1. and for the fragrancy of it, emitting a greater, and for the continuance of it being more laſting, Pſal. cxii. 6. Prov. x. 6. The Targum is, "better is a good name the righteous "get in this world, than the anointing oil which "was poured upon the heads of kings and prieſts." So Alſhech, "a good name is better than the great-"neſs of a king, though anointed with oil." And the day of death, than the day of one's birth; ſome render it in connection with the preceding clauſe, as a good name is better, &c. ſo the day of death than the day of one's birth[f]; that is, the day of a man's death than the day of his birth. This is to be underſtood not of death ſimply conſidered; for that in itſelf, abſtracted from its connections and conſequences, is not better than to be born into the world, or come into life, or than life itſelf; it is not preferable to it, nor deſirable; for it is contrary to nature, being a diſſolution of it; a real evil, as life, and long life, are bleſſings; an enemy to mankind, and a terrible one: nor of other perſons, with whom men have a connection, their friends and relations; for with them the day of birth is a time of rejoicing, and the day of death is a time of mourning, as appears from ſcripture and all experience; ſee John xvi. 21. Gen. xl. 20. Matt. xiv. 6. Gen. xxiii. 2. John xi. 31, 33. It is indeed reported[g] of ſome heatheniſh and barbarous people in Thrace, and who inhabited mount Caucaſus; that they mourned at the birth of their children, reckoning up the calamities they are entering into, and rejoiced at the death of their friends, being delivered from their troubles: but this is to be underſtood of the perſons themſelves that are born and die; not of all mankind, unleſs as abſtracted from the conſideration of a future ſtate, and ſo it is more happy to be freed from trouble than to enter into it; nor of wicked men, it would have been better indeed if they had never been born, or had died as ſoon as born, that their damnation might not have been aggravated by the multitude of their ſins; but after all, to die cannot be beſt for them, ſince at death they are caſt into hell, into everlaſting fire, and endleſs puniſhment: this is only true of good men, that have a good name living and dying; have a good work of grace upon them, and ſo are meet for heaven; the righteouſneſs of Chriſt on them, and ſo have a title to it; they are ſuch who have hope in their death, and die in faith and in the Lord: their death is better than their birth; at their birth they come into the world under the imputation and guilt of ſin, with a corrupt nature; are defiled with ſin, and under the power of it, liable in themſelves to condemnation and death for it: at the time of their death they go out juſtified from ſin through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, all being expiated by his ſacrifice, and pardoned for his ſake; they are waſhed from the filth of ſin by the blood of Chriſt, and are delivered from the power and being of it by the Spirit and grace of God; and are ſecured from condemnation and the ſecond death: at their coming into the world they are liable to ſin yet more and more; at their going out they are wholly freed from it; at the time of their birth they are born to trouble, and are all their days exerciſed with it, incident to various diſeaſes of the body, have many troubles in the world, and from the men of it; many conflicts with a body of ſin and death, and harraſſed with the temptations of Satan; but at death they are delivered from all theſe, enter into perfect peace and unſpeakable joy; reſt from all their labours and toils, and enjoy uninterrupted communion with God, Father, Son, and Spirit, angels, and glorified ſaints. The Targum is, "the day in which a man dies and de-"parts to the houſe of the grave, with a good name "and with righteouſneſs, is better than the day in "which a wicked man is born into the world." So the Midraſh interprets it of one that goes out of the world with a good name, conſidering this clauſe in connection with the preceding, as many do.

℣. 2. It is better to go to the houſe of mourning, &c.] For deceaſed relations or friends, who either lie unburied, or have been lately interred; for the Jews kept their mourning for their dead ſeveral days afterwards, when their friends viſited them in order to comfort them, as the Jews did Martha and Mary, John xi. 31. So the Targum here, "it "is better to go to a mourning man to comfort "him;" for at ſuch times and places the converſation was ſerious and intereſting, and turned upon the ſubjects of mortality and a future ſtate, and preparation for it; from whence uſeful and inſtructive leſſons are learned; and ſo it was much better to be there, Than to go to the houſe of feaſting; the Targum is, "than to the houſe of a feaſt of "wine of ſcorners;" where there is nothing but noiſe and clamour, luxury and intemperance, carnal mirth and gaiety, vain and frothy converſation, idle talk and impure ſongs, and a jeſt made of true religion and godlineſs, death and another world. For that is the end of all men; not the houſe of feaſting, but the houſe of mourning; or mourning itſelf, as Jarchi; every man muſt expect to loſe his relation and friend, and ſo come to the houſe of mourning; and muſt die himſelf, and be the occaſion of mourning: death itſelf ſeems rather intended, which is the end of all men, the way of all fleſh; for it is appointed for men to die; and ſo the Targum, "ſeeing upon them all is decreed the decree of "death." And the living will lay it to his heart; by going to the houſe of mourning, he will be put in mind of death, and will think of it ſeriouſly, and conſider his latter end, how near it is; and that this muſt be his caſe ſhortly, as is the deceaſed's he comes to mourn for. So the Targum interprets it of words concerning death, or diſcourſes of mortality he there hears, which he takes notice of and lays to his heart, and lays up in it. Jarchi's note is, "their thought is of the way of death."

℣. 3. Sorrow is better than laughter, &c.] Sorrow, expreſſed in the houſe of mourning, is better, more uſeful, and commendable than that fooliſh laughter, and thoſe airs of levity, expreſſed in the houſe of feaſting; or ſorrow on account of affliction and troubles, even adverſity itſelf, is oftentimes much more profitable, and conduces more to the good of men, than proſperity; or ſorrow for ſin, a godly ſorrow, a ſorrow after a godly ſort, which works repentance unto ſalvation, that needeth not to be repented of, is to be preferred to all carnal mirth and jollity. It may be rendered, anger is better than laughter [h]; which the Jews underſtand of the anger of God in correcting men for ſin; which is much better than when he takes no notice of them, but ſuffers them to go on in ſin, as if he was pleaſed with them; the Midraſh gives inſtances of it, in the generation of the flood and the Sodomites: and the Targum inclines to this ſenſe, "better is the anger, with which the Lord of "that world, is angry againſt the righteous in this "world, than the laughter with which he derides "the ungodly." Though it may be better, with others, to underſtand it of anger in men, expreſſed againſt ſin, in faithful, though ſharp rebukes for it; which, in the iſſue, is more beneficial than the flattery of ſuch who encourage in it; ſee Prov. xxvii. 5, 6. For by the ſadneſs of the countenance the heart is made better; when the ſadneſs is not hypocritical, as in the Scribes and Phariſees, but ſerious and real, ariſing from proper reflections on things in the mind; whereby the heart is drawn off from vain, carnal, and ſenſual things; and is engaged in the contemplation of ſpiritual and heavenly ones, which is of great advantage to it: or by the ſeverity of the countenance of a faithful friend, in correcting for faults, the heart is made better, which receives thoſe corrections in love, and confeſſes its fault, and amends.

℣. 4. The heart of the wiſe is in the houſe of mourning, &c.] When his body is not; when it does not ſuit him to go thither in perſon, his mind is there, and his thoughts are employed on the uſeful ſubjects, of the frailty and mortality of human nature, of death, a future judgment, and a world to come; which ſhews him to be a wiſe man, and concerned for the beſt things, even for his eternal happineſs in another ſtate. But the heart of fools is in the houſe of mirth; where jovial company is, merry ſongs are ſung, and the cup or glaſs paſſes briſkly round, and all is gay and brilliant: here the fool deſires to be oftener than he is, and when he cannot; which ſhews the folly of his mind, what a vain taſte he has, and how thoughtleſs he is of a future ſtate, and of his eternal welfare.

℣. 5. It is better to hear the rebuke of the wiſe, &c.] To liſten to it diligently, receive it cordially; and act according to it; though it may be diſagreeable to the fleſh, and give preſent pain, yet the effect and iſſue will be good, and ſhew that man to be wiſe that hears it, as well as he that gives it; ſee Pſal. cxli. 1. Prov. xv. 31, 32. and xvii. 10. Than for a man to hear the ſong of fools; the vain and impure ſongs that fooliſh men ſing in the houſe of mirth; or the flatteries of fooliſh men, which tickle and pleaſe the mind, as muſic and ſongs do: or, than a man that hears the ſong of fools [i], and is pleaſed with it.

℣. 6. For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, ſo is the laughter of the fool, &c.] As thorns are weak, uſeleſs and unprofitable; yea, hurtful and pernicious, and only fit for burning; ſo are fooliſh and wicked men, 2 Sam. xxiii. 6. Iſa. xxvii. 4. and as the noiſe and ſound of the one under a pot is very ſhort, they make a blaze for a while, and is ſoon over; ſo though the laughter of a fool is loud and noiſy, it makes no melody, no more than the noiſe of thorns; and is but for a moment, and will be ſoon changed for weeping and howling, which will laſt for ever; ſee Job xx. 5. This alſo is vanity; the carnal mirth of wicked men.

℣. 7. Surely oppreſſion maketh a wiſe man mad, &c.] Which is to be underſtood, either paſſively, when he is oppreſſed by others, or ſees others oppreſſed; it raiſes indignation in him, diſturbs his mind, and he is ready to paſs a wrong judgment on the diſpenſations of providence, and to ſay raſh and unadviſed things concerning them, Pſal. lxxiii. 2, 3, 12—14. or actively, of oppreſſion with which he oppreſſes others; when he gives into ſuch meaſures, his wiſdom departs from him, his mind is beſotted, he acts the part of a mad man, and pierces himſelf through with many ſorrows. Some underſtand this of wealth got in an ill way; or of gifts given to bribe men, to do injury to others; and which the following clauſe is thought to explain. And a gift deſtroyeth the heart; blinds the eyes of judges, otherways wiſe; perverts their judgment, and cauſes them to paſs a wrong ſentence, as well as perverts juſtice: or, and deſtroys the heart of gifts [k]; a heart that is poſſeſſed of the gifts of wiſdom and knowledge; or a munificent heart, a heart diſpoſed to give bountifully and liberally, that oppreſſion deſtroys and renders uſeleſs.

℣. 8. Better is the end of a thing, than the beginning thereof, &c.] If the thing is good, otherways the end of it is worſe; as the end of wickedneſs and wicked men, whoſe beginning is ſweet, but the end bitter; yea, are the ways of death, Prov. v. 4. and xvi. 25. and ſo the end of carnal profeſſors and apoſtates, who begin in the Spirit, and end in the fleſh, Gal. iii. 3. 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. but the end of good things, and of good men, is better than the beginning; as the end of Job was, both with reſpect to things temporal and ſpiritual, Job viii. 7. and xlii. 12. ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 37. Matt. x. 22. Luke xvi. 25. And the patient in ſpirit is better than the proud in ſpirit; patience is a fruit of the Spirit of God; and is of great uſe in the Chriſtian's life, and eſpecially in bearing afflictions, and tends to make men more humble, meek and quiet; and ſuch are highly eſteemed of God; on them he looks, with them he dwells, and to them he gives more grace; when ſuch who are proud, and elated with themſelves, their riches or righteouſneſs, are abominable to him; ſee Luke xvi. 15. and xviii. 14.

℣. 9. Be not haſty in thy ſpirit to be angry, &c.] With men, for every word that is ſaid, or action done, that is not agreeable; encourage not, but repreſs ſudden, angry emotions of the mind; be not quick of reſentment, and at once expreſs anger and diſpleaſure; but be ſlow to wrath, for ſuch a man is better than the mighty, James i. 19. Prov. xvi. 32. or with God, for his corrections and chaſtiſements; ſo the Targum, "in the time that correction from heaven comes upon thee, do not haſten in thy ſoul to be hot (or angry) to ſay words of rebellion (or ſtubbornneſs) againſt heaven:" that advice is good, "Do nothing in anger[l]." For anger reſteth in the boſom of fools; where it riſeth quick, and continues long; here it ſoon betrays itſelf, and finds eaſy admittance, and a reſting, dwelling place; it eaſily gets in, but it is difficult to get it out of the heart of a fool; both which are proofs of his folly, Prov. xii. 16. and xiv. 17. ſee Eph. iv. 26. the boſom, or breaſt, is commonly repreſented as the ſeat of anger, by other writers[m].

℣. 10. Say not thou, What is the cauſe that the former days were better than theſe? &c.] This is a common opinion that in all ages prevails among men, that former times were better than preſent ones; that trade flouriſhed more, and men got more wealth and riches, and lived in greater eaſe and plenty; and complain that their lot is caſt in ſuch hard times, and are ready to lay the blame upon the providence of God, and murmur at it, which they ſhould not do. For thou doſt not enquire wiſely concerning this; this is owing to ignorance of former times; which, if rightly enquired into, or the true knowledge of them could be come at, it would appear, that they were no better than the preſent; and that there were always bad men, and bad things done; frauds, oppreſſions and violence, and every thing that can be complained of now: or if things are worſe than they were, this ſhould be imputed to the badneſs of men; and the enquirer ſhould look to himſelf, and his own ways, and ſee if there is not a cauſe there, and ſtudy to redeem the time, becauſe the days are evil; and not arraign the providence of God, and murmur at that, and quarrel with it; as if the diſtributions of it were unequal, and juſtice not done in one age as in another.

℣. 11. Wiſdom is good with an inheritance, &c.] It is good of itſelf. Or, is as good as an inheritance[n], as it may be rendered; it is a portion of itſelf, eſpecially ſpiritual and divine wiſdom. The Targum interprets it, the wiſdom of the law, or the knowledge of that; but much more excellent is the wiſdom of the goſpel, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, the hidden wiſdom; the knowledge of which, in an experimental way, is preferable to all earthly inheritances: but this with an inheritance is good, yea, better than without one; for wiſdom, without riches, is generally overlooked and deſpiſed in men; ſee chap. ix. 16. when wealth, with wiſdom, makes a man regarded; this commands reſpect and attention; as well as he is in a better condition to do good, if willing to communicate, and ready to diſtribute. And by it there is profit to them that ſee the ſun; mortals in this preſent ſtate, who are deſcribed as ſuch that ſee the ſun riſe and ſet, and enjoy the heat and light of it, receive much advantage from men who are both wiſe and rich: or, and it is an excellency to them that ſee the ſun; it is an excellency to mortals; and what gives them ſuperiority to others, that they have both wiſdom and riches.

℣. 12. For wiſdom is a defence, and money is a defence, &c.] Or a ſhadow of refreſhment and protection, under which men ſit with pleaſure and ſafety; a man by his wiſdom, and ſo by his money, is able to defend himſelf againſt the injuries and oppreſſions of others, and eſpecially when both meet in one and the ſame man. Jarchi renders and interprets it, "he that is in the ſhadow of wiſdom, is in the ſhadow of money, for wiſdom is the cauſe why riches come;" and ſo the Targum, "as a man is hid in the ſhadow of wiſdom, ſo he is hid in the ſhadow of money, when he does alms with it;" compare with this Luke xvi. 9. ſee ℣. 19. and chap. ix. 16. Prov. xviii. 11. Theognis[o] has a ſaying much like this, "riches and wiſdom are always inexpugnable to mortals." But the excellency of knowledge is, that wiſdom giveth life to them that have it; or, the excellency of the knowledge of wiſdom giveth life[p], &c. not of natural wiſdom, or the knowledge of natural and civil things, the vanity of this is expoſed before by the wiſe man; but the knowledge of God in Chriſt; the knowledge of Chriſt, who is the wiſdom of God; and of the goſpel, and of all divine and ſpiritual things: this is a ſuperior excellency to riches, which often expoſe a man's life to danger, cannot preſerve him from a corporal death, much leſs from an eternal one. When this is the excellency of ſpiritual knowledge, that ſpiritual life goes along with it; ſuch as are ſpiritually enlightened, are ſpiritually quickened; live by faith on Chriſt, whom they know; and, through the knowledge of him, have all things pertaining to life and godlineſs, and have both a right and meetneſs for eternal life; yea, this knowledge is life eternal, John xvii. 3. ſee 2 Pet. i. 3. and this is the pure gift of wiſdom, or of Chriſt, and not owing to the merit of men, or works done in obedience to the law, which cannot give this life; ſee John xvii. 2. and x. 28. Rom. vi. 23. Gal. iii. 21.

℣. 13. Conſider the work of God, &c.] This is addreſſed to thoſe who thought the former days better than the preſent, and were ready to quarrel with the providence of God, ℣. 10. and are therefore adviſed to conſider the work of God; not the work of creation, but of providence; which is the effect of divine ſovereignty, and is conducted and directed according to the counſel of his will, and is always wiſely done to anſwer the beſt ends and purpoſes: every thing is beautiful in its ſeaſon; contemplate, adore, and admire the wiſdom, power and goodneſs of God, diſplayed therein; it is ſuch as cannot be made better, nor otherwiſe than it is. For who can make that ſtraight, which he hath made crooked? or which ſeems to be ſo, irregular and diſagreeable? No man can mend, or make that better, he finds fault with and complains of; nor can he alter the courſe of things, nor ſtay the hand, nor ſtop the providence of God: if it is his pleaſure, that public calamities ſhould be in the world, or in ſuch a part of it, as famine, peſtilence, or the ſword; or any affliction on families and particular perſons, or poverty and meanneſs in ſuch and ſuch individuals, there is no hindering it; whatever he has purpoſed and reſolved, his providence effects, and there is no fruſtrating his deſigns; it ſignifies nothing for a creature to murmur and complain; it is beſt to ſubmit to his will, for no alteration can be made but what he pleaſes. Some underſtand this of natural defects in human bodies, with which they are born, or which attend them, as blindneſs, lameneſs, &c. ſo the Targum, “ conſider the work “ of God and his ſtrength, who made the blind, “ the crooked, and the lame, to be wonders in the “ world; for who can make ſtrait one of them, “ but the Lord of the world, who made him “ crooked?” Others, of ſpiritual defects in ſuch who walk in crooked ways, and are hardened in them; who can correct them, and make them other ways, if God does not give them his grace to convert them, and ſoften their hard hearts? he hardens whom he will, and who hath reſiſted his will? Jarchi's paraphraſe is, “ Who can make “ ſtrait after death, what he has made crooked in “ life?” ſee the note on chap. i. 15. Alſhech interprets it of the firſt man Adam.

℣. 14. In the day of proſperity be joyful, &c.] Or, in a good day[q]. When things go well in the commonwealth, in a man's family, and with himſelf, health, peace and plenty, are enjoyed, a man's circumſtances are thriving and flouriſhing; it becomes him to be thankful to God, freely and chearfully to enjoy what is beſtowed on him, and do good with it: or, be in good[r]; in good heart, in good ſpirits, chearful and lively: or, enjoy good, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; for what God gives to men, is given them richly to enjoy, to make uſe of themſelves, and be beneficial unto others; ſo the Targum, “ in the day the Lord does “ well to thee, be thou alſo in goodneſs, and do “ good to all the world;” ſee Gal. vi. 10. Jarchi's paraphraſe is, “ when it is in thine hand to do “ good, be among thoſe that do good.” But in the day of adverſity conſider; or, in the day of evil[s]; conſider from whence affliction comes; not out of the duſt, nor by chance, but from God, and by his wiſe appointment; and for what it comes, that ſin is the cauſe of it, and what that is; and alſo for what ends it is ſent, to bring to a ſenſe of ſin, and confeſſion of it, and humiliation for it; to take it away, and make good men more partakers of holineſs: or, look for the day of adverſity[t]; even in the day of proſperity it ſhould be expected; for there is no firmneſs and ſtability in any ſtate; there are continual viciſſitudes and changes. The Targum is, “ that the evil day may not come upon “ thee, ſee and behold;” be careful and circumſpect, and behave in a wiſe manner, that ſo it may be prevented. Jarchi's note is, “ when evil comes “ upon the wicked, be among thoſe that ſee, and “ not among thoſe that are ſeen;” and compares it with Iſa. lxvi. 24. It may be obſerved, that there is a ſet time for each of theſe, proſperity and adverſity; and that the time is ſhort, and therefore called a day; and the one is good, and the other is evil; which characters they have according to the outward appearance, and according to the judgment and eſteem of men; otherwiſe, proſperity is oftentimes hurtful, and deſtroys fools, and adverſity is uſeful to the ſouls of good men. God alſo hath ſet the one over againſt the other; they are both by his appointment, and are ſet in their proper place, and come in their proper time; ſucceed each other, and anſwer to one another, as day and night, ſummer and winter, and work together for the good of men. To the end that man ſhould find nothing after him; ſhould not be able to know what will be hereafter; what his caſe and circumſtances will be, whether proſperous or adverſe; ſince things are ſo uncertain and ſo ſubject to change, and nothing permanent; and therefore can find nothing to truſt in and depend upon, nothing that he can be ſure of: and things are ſo wiſely managed and diſpoſed, that a man can find no fault with them, nor juſt reaſon to complain of them; ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, not find juſt complaints againſt him; and to the ſame purpoſe the Syriac verſion, that he may complain of him; the Targum is, “ not “ find any evil in this world.”

℣. 15. All things have I ſeen in the days of my vanity, &c.] Or, all theſe things[u]. What goes before and follows after, the various changes men are ſubject unto, both good and bad; theſe he had made his obſervations upon, throughout the courſe of his life, which had been a vain one, as every man's is, full of evil and trouble; ſee chap. vi. 12. perhaps the wiſe man may have ſome reſpect to the times of his apoſtaſy; and which might, among other things, be brought on by this; obſerving good men afflicted, and the wicked proſper, which has often been a ſtumbling to good men. There is a juſt man that periſheth in his righteouſneſs; not eternally; no truly juſt man ever periſhed, who is made ſo by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him; for though the righteous man is ſaid to be ſcarcely ſaved, yet he is certainly ſaved: it can be true only in this ſenſe of one that is only outwardly righteous, that truſts to his own righteouſneſs, in which he may periſh; but this is to be underſtood temporally and corporally; one that is really juſt, may periſh in his name, in his ſubſtance, as well as at death, and that on account of his righteouſneſs; he may loſe his good name, and character, and his ſubſtance, for righteouſneſs-ſake; yea, his life alſo, as Abel, Naboth, and others; this is the caſe ſometimes, as Aben Ezra obſerves, not always: or a juſt man, notwithſtanding his righteouſneſs, dies, and ſometimes lives but a ſhort time; which ſenſe the antitheſis ſeems to require. And there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedneſs; is very wicked, and yet, notwithſtanding his great wickedneſs, lives a long time in the world; ſee Job xxi. 7.

℣. 16. Be not righteous over-much, &c.] This is not meant of true and real righteouſneſs, even moral righteouſneſs, a man cannot be too holy or too righteous; but of a ſhew and oſtentation of righteouſneſs, and of ſuch who would be thought to be more righteous and holy than others, and therefore deſpiſe thoſe who, as they imagine, do not come up to them; and are very rigid and cenſorious in their judgment of others, and very ſevere in their reproofs of them; and that they may appear very righteous perſons will do more than what the law requires of them to do, even works of ſupererogation, as the phariſees formerly, and papiſts now pretend, and abſtain from the lawful uſe of things which God has given to be enjoyed; and macerate their bodies by abſtinence, faſtings, pilgrimages, penance, ſcourges, and the like, as the Eremites among the chriſtians, and the Turks, as Aben Ezra on the place obſerves; and many there be who by an imprudent zeal for what they judge right, and which ſometimes are mere trifles, and by unſeaſonable reproofs for what is wrong, expoſe themſelves to reſentment and danger. Some underſtand this of political and punitive juſtice, exerciſing it in too ſtrict and rigorous a manner, according to the maxim, ſummum jus ſæpe ſumma injuria eſt[w]; and Schultens[x] from the uſe of the word in the Arabic language renders it, be not too rigid; and others in a contrary ſenſe of too much mercy and pity to offenders. So the Midraſh and Jarchi illuſtrates it by the caſe of Saul, who had mercy on the wicked and ſpared Agag. The Targum is, "be not over-righteous at a time that a ſinner is "found guilty of ſlaughter in thy court of judica"ture, that thou ſhouldeſt ſpare and not kill him." Neither make thyſelf over wiſe; above what is written, or pretend to be wiſer than others. So the Arabic verſion, ſhew not too much wiſdom; do not affect, as not to be more righteous than others, ſo not more wiſe, by finding fault with preſent times, or with the diſpenſations of providence, or with the manners and conduct of men; ſetting up for a critic and a cenſurer of men and things; or do not pry into things, and ſeek after a knowledge of them, which are out of your reach, and beyond your capacity. Why ſhouldeſt thou deſtroy thyſelf? either by living too ſtrictly and abſtemiouſly, or by ſtudying too cloſely, or by behaving in ſuch a manner to men, as that they will ſeek thy deſtruction, and bring it on thee: or why ſhouldeſt thou, or whereby, or leſt, thou ſhouldeſt be ſtupid[y]; loſe thy ſenſe and reaſon, as perſons who ſtudy the knowledge of things they have not a capacity for: or why ſhouldeſt thou become fooliſh in the eyes of all men by thy conduct and behaviour? or why ſhouldeſt thou be deſolate[z]; alone, and nobody care to have any converſation and acquaintance with thee?

℣. 17. Be not over-much wicked, &c.] Not that a man ſhould be wicked at all; but ſome obſerving that wicked men prolong their days in wickedneſs, are encouraged to go into greater lengths in ſin than they have yet done, and give up themſelves to all iniquity; and run into exceſs of riot, into the groſſeſt and moſt ſcandalous enormities. Some render it, do not diſturb or fright thyſelf[a]; diſtreſs and diſtract thyſelf with the buſineſs of life, buſtling and ſtirring, reſtleſs and uneaſy, to get wealth and riches; but be eaſy and ſatisfied with what is enjoyed, or comes without ſo much ſtir and trouble; this is the original ſenſe of the word. The meaning ſeems to be, either do not multiply ſin, add unto it; and continue in it; or do not aggravate it, making ſins to be greater and more heinous than they are, and a man's caſe worſe than it is, and ſo ſink into deſpair; and thus it ſtands oppoſed to an oſtentatious ſhew of righteouſneſs. Neither be thou fooliſh; or give up thyſelf to a profligate life, to go on in a courſe of ſin, which will iſſue in the ruin of body and ſoul; or in aggravating it in an exceſſive manner. Why ſhouldeſt thou die before thy time? bring diſeaſes on thy body by a wicked courſe of living, which will iſſue in death; or fall into the hands of the civil magiſtrate, for capital offences, for which ſentence of death muſt paſs and be executed before a man comes to the common term of human life; ſee Pſal. lv. 23. and xc. 10. or as Mr Broughton renders it, before thy ordinary time; not before the appointed time[b]. The Targum is, "be the cauſe "of death to thy ſoul;" or through deſpair commit ſelf-murder.

℣. 18. It is good that thou ſhouldeſt take hold of this, &c.] This advice, as the Arabic verſion, in the ſeveral branches of it; neither to be over much righteous or wicked, and over much wiſe or fooliſh; to avoid the one and the other, to keep clear of extremes, and purſue the path that is ſafeſt; ſuch advice as this, it is right to lay hold on, embrace and hold faſt. Yea, alſo from this withdraw not thine hand; from what follows concerning the fear of God; or this and this may be rendered this and that[c], and the ſenſe be, lay hold on this, that is, the laſt part of the advice, not to be over much wicked or fooliſh, which is often the cauſe of an immature death; and do not ſlacken or be remiſs in regarding that other and firſt part of it, not to be overmuch righteous or wiſe. For he that feareth God ſhall come forth of them all; or eſcape them all; the phraſe is become Rabbinical, that is, he ſhall be free or exempt from them all; from over much righteouſneſs and over much wiſdom, and over much wickedneſs or over much folly; the fear of God, which is the beginning of wiſdom, is the beſt preſervative from, and antidote againſt theſe things; for a man that fears God is humble, and renounces his own righteouſneſs, and diſtruſts his own wiſdom; he fears to commit ſin, and ſhuns folly.

℣. 19. Wiſdom ſtrengtheneth the wiſe, &c.] Againſt ſuch extremes as before mentioned; it is a guard about him, as well as a guide unto him; it is a defence unto him, as before obſerved, ℣. 12. and is better than ſtrength of body, or weapons of war, chap. ix. 16, 18. and a wiſe man does greater things by it than a ſtrong man with them, and is ſafer with it than he can be by them. Some underſtand this of Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, without whom a good man can do nothing, but all things through him ſtrengthening him; and who being a ſtrong tower and place of refuge to him, he is ſafer in him than if he was in the ſtrongeſt garriſon, and under the protection of ever ſo large a number of valiant men: Chriſt, and grace from him, ſtrengthen more than ten mighty men which are in the city; that is, than many mighty men, or men of war, which guard a city; the city of Jeruſalem, or any other. The Targum applies this to Joſeph,

Joſeph, and paraphraſes it, "the wiſdom of Joſeph "the ſon of Jacob helped him to make him wiſer "than all his ten righteous brethren."

℣. 20. For there is not a juſt man upon earth, &c.] Or although, or notwithſtanding[d] wiſdom is ſo beneficial, and guards and ſtrengthens a good man, yet no man has ſuch a ſhare of it as to live without ſin; there was not then one on earth, there never had been one, nor never would be, nor has been, excepting the man Chriſt Jeſus; who indeed as man was perfectly juſt, whilſt here on earth, and went about doing good, and never ſinned in all his life; but this cannot be ſaid of any other, no not of one that is truly and really juſt; not externally and in his own opinion only, but who is made ſo by the obedience of Chriſt, or by his righteouſneſs imputed to him, whilſt he is here on earth; otherwiſe in heaven, where the ſpirits of juſt men are made perfect, there it may be ſaid of them what follows, but no where elſe. That doeth good, and ſinneth not; it is the character of a juſt man to do good, to do that which is according to the will of God, from a principle of love to him, through faith in him, in the name and ſtrength of Chriſt, and with a view to the glory of God; to do good in ſuch a ſenſe wicked men cannot; only ſuch who are made good by the grace of God, are regenerated and made new creatures in Chriſt, are quickened by his Spirit, and are true believers in him; who appear to be what they are, by the fruits of good works they bring forth; and this not in a mercenary way, or in order to obtain life and righteouſneſs, but as conſtrained by the grace of God, by which they are freely juſtified; and yet theſe are not free from ſin, as appears by their confeſſions and complaints, by their backſlidings, ſlips, and falls, and their petitions for freſh diſcoveries of pardoning grace; and even are not without ſin, and the commiſſion of it, in religious duties, or while they are doing good; hence their righteouſneſs is ſaid to be as filthy rags, and mention is made of the iniquity of holy things, Iſa. lxiv. 6. Exod. xxviii. 38. The Targum is, "that does good all "his days, and ſins not before the Lord." Aben Ezra juſtly gives the ſenſe thus, "who does good "always, and never ſins;" and obſerves that there are none but ſin in thought, word, or deed. The poet[e] ſays, "to ſin is common to all men;" no man though ever ſo good is perfect on earth, or free from ſin; ſee 1 Kings viii. 46. Prov. xx. 9. 1 John i. 8. Alſhech's paraphraſe is, "there is not a righteous "man on earth, that does good and ſins not; "בטוב ההוא in that good;" which is the true ſenſe of the words.

℣. 21. Alſo take no heed unto all words that are ſpoken, &c.] Seeing ſo it is, that imperfection attends the beſt of men, no man is wiſe at all times, fooliſh words and unguarded expreſſions will ſometimes drop from him, which it is better to take no notice of; they ſhould not be ſtrictly attended to, and cloſely examined, ſince they will not bear it. A man ſhould not liſten after every thing that is ſaid of himſelf or others; he ſhould not curiouſly enquire what men ſay of him; and what he himſelf hears, he ſhould take no notice of; it is often beſt to let it paſs, and not call it over again; to diſſemble the hearing of a thing, or make as if you did not hear it; for oftentimes by rehearſing a matter, or taking up words ſpoken, a deal of trouble and miſchief follows: a man ſhould not give his heart[f] to it, as it is in the Hebrew text; he ſhould not give his mind to what is ſaid of him, but be careleſs and indifferent about it; much leſs ſhould he lay it up in his mind, and meditate revenge for it. The Targum, Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions reſtrain it to words ſpoken by wicked men, whoſe tongues are their own, and will ſay what they pleaſe; among theſe may be ranked more eſpecially detractors, whiſperers, backbiters, and talebearers, who ſhould not be liſtened unto and encouraged; though there is no neceſſity of thus limiting the ſenſe, which is more general, and may include what is ſaid by any man, even good men, ſince they have their infirmities; it ſeems chiefly to have reſpect to defamatory words, by what follows. Leſt thou hear thy ſervant curſe thee; ſpeak ſlightly, ſcoffingly, and reproachfully of thee, as Shimei of David; which muſt be very diſagreeable and vexatious to hear from one ſo mean and abject, and who is dependent on him, earns his bread of him, and gets his livelihood in his ſervice; and to whom perhaps he has been kind, and ſo is guilty of baſe ingratitude, which aggravates the more; or if not, if what he ſays is juſt, to hear it muſt give great uneaſineſs.

℣. 22. For oftentimes alſo thine own heart knoweth, &c.] Or thy conſcience, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, which is as a thouſand witneſſes; which, if a man attends to, he will be convinced of his own faults, failings and infirmities, he is frequently in the commiſſion of. Particularly, that thou thyſelf likewiſe haſt curſed others; either in heart, or with the tongue; thought ill of them, wiſhed ill to them; ſpoke contemptibly of them, reviled and reproached them; called them by bad names, and abuſed them; and ſaid ſome very hard and ſevere words concerning them, in a paſſionate fit, being provoked; and afterwards repented of it, being better informed of the ſtate of the caſe, or being convinced of the evil of paſſion and raſh ſpeaking; and therefore ſuch ſhould conſider the like paſſions and infirmities of others, and paſs over them, and forgive them: ſo Alſhech, "if thou haſt curſed o-"thers, and doſt deſire men ſhould forgive thee, "ſo do thou alſo forgive;" ſee Matt. vi. 14, 15. The word oftentimes, in the firſt clauſe, is to be connected, not with the word knoweth, as if a man often knew this, but with the word curſed; ſuggeſting, that a man may be often guilty of this himſelf, and therefore ſhould be more ſparing of his cenſures of others; ſee Matt. vii. 1—5.

℣. 23. All this have I proved by wiſdom, &c.] Referring either to all that he had been diſcourſing of hitherto in this book, concerning the vanity of natural wiſdom and knowledge, of pleaſure, power and riches; or to the ſeveral uſeful inſtructions given in this chapter, particularly concerning patiently bearing every thing from the hands of God or men, ℣. 8—22. This, by the help and uſe of that wiſdom which God had given him, he had made trial of, and found it to be right, and therefore recommended it to others; though he acknowledges that, with all his wiſdom, he was far from perfection. I ſaid, I will be wiſe; but it was far from me; he determined, if poſſible, to attain to the perfection of wiſdom, and made uſe of all means to come at it; that he might know all the works of God in creation, the nature, uſe and excellency of them; in providence, his different diſpenſations towards the ſons of men, and the cauſes of them; and in grace, the redemption and ſalvation of men, and the myſteries thereof; but the more he knew, the more he was convinced of his own ignorance, and ſeemed further off from the ſummit of knowledge than he was before; and plainly ſaw, that perfection in wiſdom is not attainable in this life. The Targum reſtrains this to the wiſdom of the law; but it is better to underſtand it in a more general ſenſe.

℣. 24. That which is far off, &c.] Or, far off is that which has been [g]. That which has been done by God already, in creation and providence, is out of the reach of men, is far from their underſtandings wholly to comprehend or account for; and likewiſe that which is paſt with men, what has been done in former ages, the hiſtory of paſt times, is very difficult to come at: or rather, according to Schmidt, and Rambachius after him, what was of old, is now afar off or abſent; the image of God in man, which conſiſted of perfect wiſdom, and was concreated with him, is now loſt, and that is the reaſon why wiſdom is far from him. And exceeding deep, who can find it out? the primitive, perfect wiſdom is ſunk ſo deep and gone, that no man can find it to the perfection it was once enjoyed; ſee Job xxviii. 12—23. This may reſpect the knowledge of God, and the perfections of his nature; which are as high as heaven, and deeper than hell, Job xi. 7, 8. and of his thoughts, counſels, purpoſes and decrees, which are the deep things of God; as well as the doctrines of the goſpel, and the myſteries of grace, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. and even his providential diſpenſations towards the ſons of men, Rom. xi. 33. The Targum of the whole is, "Lo, now it is far off from the children "of men to know all that has been from the days "of old; and the ſecret of the day of death, and "the ſecret of the day in which the King Meſſiah "ſhall come; who is he that ſhall find it out by "his wiſdom?"

℣. 25. I applied mine heart to know, and to ſearch, and to ſeek out wiſdom, &c.] Or, I and my heart turned about [h]; took a circuit, a tour throughout the whole compaſs of things; looked into every corner, and went through the circle of knowledge, in order to ſearch and find out what true wiſdom is; which is no other than Chriſt, and a ſpiritual knowledge of him; a variety of words is uſed to expreſs his eager deſire after wiſdom, and the diligent ſearch he made, from which he was not diſcouraged by the difficulties he met with; ſee chap. i. 13. And the reaſon of things; either in nature or providence: or the eſtimation [i] of them; the excellency of them, how much they are to be accounted of, eſteemed and valued; as Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and all things relating to him, ſhould. And to know the wickedneſs of folly, even of fooliſhneſs and madneſs; the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, the folly and madneſs that are in it; ſin is the effect of folly, and the exceſs of it, and a ſpiritual madneſs; it is true of all ſin in general, but eſpecially of the ſin of uncleanneſs, which Solomon ſeems to have in view by what follows; ſee chap. i. 17. and ii. 12. and may chiefly intend the wickedneſs of his own folly, and the fooliſhneſs of his own madneſs.

℣. 26. And I find more bitter than death the woman, &c.] This was the iſſue of his diligent ſtudies and reſearches, and the obſervations he had made; this was what he found by ſad and woful experience, and which he choſe to take particular notice of; that he might not only expoſe this vanity among others, and caution men againſt it, even the love of women, which at beſt is a bitter ſweet, as the poet [k] calls it, though here adulterous love is meant; but having this opportunity, might expreſs his ſincere repentance for this folly of his life, than which nothing had been more bitter to him, in the reflection of his mind upon it: death is a bitter thing, and terrible to nature, 1 Sam. xv. 32. but to be enſnared by an adulterous woman, is worſe than that; it brings not only ſuch diſeaſes of body as are both painful and ſcandalous, but ſuch horrors into the conſcience, when awakened, as are intolerable, and expoſes to eternal death; ſee Prov. v. 3, 4. By the woman, is not meant the ſex in general, which was far from Solomon's intention to reflect upon and reproach; nor any woman in particular, not Eve, the firſt woman, through whom came ſin and death into the world; but an adulterous woman; ſee Prov. v. 4. Some interpret this of original ſin, or the corruption of nature, evil concupiſcence, which draws men into ſin, and holds them in it, the conſequence of which is death eternal; but ſuch who find favour in the eyes of God, are delivered from the power and dominion of it; but obſtinate and impenitent ſinners are held under it, and periſh eternally. Jarchi, by the woman, underſtands hereſy; and ſo Jerom and others interpret it of heretics and idolaters: it may very well be applied to that Jezebel, the whore of Rome, the mother of harlots, that deceives men, and leads them into perdition with herſelf, Rev. xvii. 4, 5, 8. and xviii. 23. and who is intended by the harlot, and fooliſh and ſtrange woman, in the book of Proverbs, as has been obſerved. Whoſe heart is ſnares and nets, and her hands as bands; all the ſchemes and contrivances of an harlot are to enſnare men, by her wanton looks and laſcivious geſtures; which are like ſnares laid for the beaſts, and like nets ſpread for fiſhes, to take them in; and when ſhe has got them, ſhe holds them faſt; it is a very difficult thing, and a very rare one, ever to get out of her hands; ſo Plautus [l] makes mention of the nets of harlots: the ſame holds true of error and hereſy, and of idolatry, which is ſpiritual adultery; the words uſed being in the plural number, ſhews the many ways the adulterous woman has to enſnare men, and the multitudes that are taken by her; ſee Rev. xiii. 3, 10, 14. Whoſo pleaſeth God, ſhall eſcape from her; or, who is good before God, or in his ſight [m]; ſee the note on chap. ii. 26. to whom he gives his grace, and is acceptable to him; ſuch an one as Joſeph was, ſhall eſcape the ſnares and nets, the hands and bands of ſuch a woman; or if fallen into them, as Solomon fell, ſhall be delivered out of them, as it is obſerved by various interpreters: nothing but the grace of God, the true fear of God, the power of godlineſs and undefiled religion, can preſerve a perſon from being enſnared and held by an impure woman; not a liberal nor religious education, not learning and good ſenſe, nor any thing elſe; if a man is kept out of the hands of ſuch creatures, he ought to eſteem it a mercy, and aſcribe it to the grace and goodneſs of God. But the ſinner ſhall be taken by her; a hardened and impenitent ſinner, that is deſtitute of the grace and fear of God; who is habitually a ſinner, and gives up himſelf to commit iniquity; whoſe life is a continued ſeries of ſinning; who has no guard upon himſelf, but ruſhes into ſin, as the horſe into the battle; he becomes an eaſy prey to an harlot; he falls into her ſnares, and is catched and held by her; ſee Prov. xxii. 14.

℣. 27. Behold, this have I found, &c.] That an harlot is more bitter than death; and which he found by his own experience, and therefore would have it obſerved by others for their caution: or one man among a thouſand, ℣. 28. (Saith the preacher) of which title and character, ſee chap. i. 1. it is here mentioned to confirm the truth of what he ſaid; he ſaid it as a preacher, and, upon the word of a preacher, it was true; as alſo to ſignify his repentance for his ſin, who was now the gathered ſoul, as ſome render it; gathered into the church of God by repentance. Counting one by one, to find out the account; not his own ſins, which he endeavoured to reckon up, and find out the general account of them, which yet he could not do; nor the good works of the righteous, and the ſins of the wicked, which are numbered before the Lord one by one, till they are added to the great account; as Jarchi, from the Rabbins, interprets it, and ſo the Midraſh: but rather the ſenſe is, examining women one by one, all within the verge of his acquaintance; particularly the thouſand women, that were either his wives or concubines; in order to take and give a juſt eſtimate of their character and actions. What follows is the reſult.

℣. 28. Which yet my ſoul ſeeketh, but I find not, &c.] He was very earneſt and diligent in his enquiry; he took a great deal of pains, and was exceedingly ſolicitous; he ſought with great intenſeneſs of mind, and with an eager deſire, to find out a chaſte and virtuous woman among them all, but could not. One man among a thouſand have I found; it is a great rarity to find a good man[n], truly wiſe and gracious; there are many that walk in the broad way, and but few that find the ſtrait gate and narrow way, and are ſaved; they are but as one to a thouſand; ſee Jer. v. 1. Matt. vii. 13, 14. Or rather, by this one of a thouſand, is meant the Meſſiah, the wiſdom of God, he ſought for, ℣. 25. and now ſays he found; to whom he looked for peace, pardon and atonement, under a ſenſe of his ſins; who is the meſſenger, an interpreter, one among a thouſand; yea, who is the chiefeſt among ten thouſands, Job xxxiii. 23. Cant. v. 10. who is ſuperior to angels and men, in the dignity of his perſon; in the perfection, purity and holineſs of his nature; in the excellency of his names; in his offices and relations; and in his concern in the affairs of grace and ſalvation; and who is to be found by every truly wiſe and gracious ſoul, that ſeeks him early and earneſtly, in the word and ordinances, under the illumination and direction of the bleſſed Spirit. If it is to be underſtood of a mere man, I ſhould think the ſenſe was this; of all the men that have been enſnared and taken by an adulterous woman, but one of a thouſand, have I obſerved, and perhaps Solomon has reſpect to himſelf, that was ever recovered out of her hands. But a woman among all thoſe have I not found; that is, among all the harlots and adulterous women I ever knew or heard of, I never knew nor heard of one that was ever reclaimed from her evil ways, and reformed or became a chaſte and virtuous woman: he may have reſpect to the thouſand women, that were either his wives and concubines, and, among all theſe, he found not one that deſerved the above character; for this is not to be underſtood of women in general, for Solomon muſt have known that there have been good women in all ages, and perhaps more than men; and that there were many in his days, tho' thoſe, with whom his more intimate acquaintance was, were not ſuch, which was his unhappineſs; and his criminal converſation with them, is what he lamented and repented of. It may be interpreted thus, One man, the Meſſiah, among all the ſons of men, have I found, free from original ſin; but one woman, among all the daughters of Eve, I have not found clear of it. The Targum is, "there is another thing which yet my ſoul ſeeketh, "and I have not found; a man perfect and inno"cent, without corruption, from the days of Adam, "till Abraham the righteous was born; who was "found faithful and juſt among the thouſand kings, "who were gathered together to build the tower of "Babel; and a woman among all the wives of thoſe "kings, as Sarah, I found not."

℣. 29. Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright, &c.] The firſt man Adam, as the Targum and Jarchi interpret it; and not Adam only, but Eve alſo with him; for theſe were both made by the Lord, and on the ſame day, and in the ſame image, and had the ſame common name of Adam given them, Gen. i. 27. and v. 2. And they were both made upright; which is to be underſtood, not of the erectneſs of their bodies, but of the diſpoſition of their minds; they were "right "and innocent before him," or in the ſight of God, as the Targum; which is beſt explained by their being made in the image and likeneſs of God, Gen. i. 26, 27. and which, according to the apoſtle, lay in knowledge, righteouſneſs and holineſs, Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 3. agreeable to which, Plato[o] makes likeneſs to God, to be righteous and holy with prudence: for this likeneſs of Adam and Eve to God, lay not in the ſhape of their bodies, for God is a ſpirit, and not a corporeal being, as the Anthropomorphites imagined, and ſo fancied men to be made like unto him in this reſpect; but in their ſouls, and it conſiſted of knowledge; of the knowledge of the creatures, their nature, uſe, and ends for which they were made, and put under their government; and of God, and his perfections, as made known in the creatures; and of his mind and will, and manner of worſhipping him, he revealed unto them; and they might know the Trinity of perſons in the godhead, who were concerned in the making of them, though they ſeem not to have known Chriſt, as Mediator and Saviour, which was not neceſſary previous to their fall; nor evangelical truths, ſuited to a fallen ſtate: alſo this image lay in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, which was original, natural, and created with them; it was with them as ſoon as they were; not acquired, but infuſed; not a habit obtained, but a quality given; and this not ſupernatural, but natural; it was perfect in its kind, and entirely agreeable to the holy, juſt and good law of God; it had no defects in it, yet was but the righteouſneſs of a creature, and loſeable, as the event ſhewed; and ſo very different from the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, man is juſtified by. Likewiſe, this uprightneſs is no other than the rectitude of human nature, of all the powers and faculties of the ſoul of man, as they were when he was created; his underſtanding clear of all errors and miſtakes, either about divine or human things; his affections regular and ordinate, no unruly paſſion in him, no ſinful affection, luſt, and deſire; he loved God with all his heart and ſoul, and delighted in him, and communion with him; the bias of his will was to that which is good; the law of God was written on his heart, and he had both power and will to keep it; and, during his ſtate of integrity, was pure and ſinleſs; yet he was not impeccable, as the confirmed angels and glorified ſaints are; nor immutable, as God only is; but being a creature, and changeable, he was liable to temptation, and ſubject to fall, as he did. Now Solomon, with all his diligent ſearch and ſcrutiny, could not find out the infinity of ſin, the boundleſs extent of it among mankind, the exceeding ſinfulneſs of it, which he ſought after, ℣. 25. yet this he found out, and this only, the fountain of all ſin, the origin of moral evil; namely, the corruption of human nature through the fall of Adam: this he found by reading the ſcriptures, the three firſt chapters of Geneſis; and by conſulting human nature, he found ſome remains of the image of God, and of the law that was in man's heart; whereby he perceived that man was once another man than he is now; and that this corruption is not owing to God, who is not the author of any thing ſinful, he made man upright; but to himſelf, his own ſin and folly: and this he found confirmed by ſad experience, in himſelf and others, and by obſerving the hiſtory of all ages, from the times of the firſt man; and as this was notorious, it was worth knowing and obſerving, and therefore he calls upon others to take notice of it; Lo, behold, conſider it, as well as what follows. But they have ſought out many inventions; that is, Adam and Eve, not content with their preſent knowledge and happineſs, they ſought out new ways and means of being wiſer and happier than God made them, or it was his will they ſhould be. They ſought out the inventions of the many, or great things, or of the mighty and great ones [p], as it may be rendered, the eternal Three in One; they ſought to be as wiſe as God himſelf; or however, as the great and mighty ones, the angels, who excelled them, as in ſtrength, ſo in knowledge; ſee Gen. iii. 5. or they ſought out thoughts of ſin, as Jarchi ſays, it is interpreted in the Midraſh. Sins are the inventions of men, and theſe are many and numerous; they ſought to gratify their ſenſes, on which followed innumerable evils; and then they ſought for ſhifts and evaſions to excuſe themſelves; the man ſhifting it from himſelf, and throwing the blame upon the woman, and the woman upon the ſerpent: and ſo ſinning, they loſt the knowledge they had; their righteouſneſs and holineſs, the rectitude of their nature; the moral freedom of their will to that which is good, and their power to perform it; and they loſt the preſence of God, and communion with him: and ſo their poſterity are not only inventors of evil things, of ſins, but of new ways of happineſs; ſome placing it in riches; others in honours; others in pleaſures; and ſome in natural wiſdom and knowledge; and ſome in their own works of righteouſneſs; the vanity of all which Solomon has before expoſed.

CHAP. VIII.

THE preacher begins this chapter with the praiſe of wiſdom, from its excellency and uſefulneſs, ℣. 1. and adviſes men, if they would live quietly and comfortably, to honour and obey the king that rules over them, and not be rebellious againſt him, ſince he has great power and authority, ℣. 2—5. and not be anxious about things to come; ſince there is a ſet time for every thing, and future things cannot be known nor fruſtrated; and particularly, there is no avoiding the hour and ſtroke of death, ℣. 6—8. Though there are times wherein wicked men rule over others, it is to their own hurt, and they muſt die; and though they may be pompouſly buried, yet are ſoon forgotten, ℣. 9, 10. and the reaſon of their inſolence is the delay of juſtice; yet there will come a time when it ſhall be well with them that fear God, and ill with the wicked, though they may live long in wickedneſs; and for the preſent it may befal good men, what wicked men deſerve, and wicked men may have that which might be thought more proper for good men, ℣. 11—14. wherefore this ſhould give no uneaſineſs; but men ſhould chearfully and freely enjoy what they have with thankfulneſs, there being nothing better than that under the ſun, ℣. 15. and the chapter is concluded with obſerving the unſearchableneſs of divine Providence, ℣. 16, 17.

℣. 1. Who is as the wiſe man? &c.] Who is as the firſt man, that was made upright, and was a wiſe man? not one of his ſons. Or who is as the wiſe man, meaning himſelf? no man; he was the wiſeſt of men; and yet he could not find out wiſdom, and the reaſon of things, and the wickedneſs of folly, chap. vii. 25—29. how therefore ſhould any other man? what can the man do that comes after the king? Or who is like to a wiſe man, to be compared to him for honour and dignity? none; not thoſe of the higheſt birth and blood, of the greateſt wealth and riches, or in the higheſt places of power and authority; a wiſe man is above them, they being without wiſdom; and eſpecially ſuch as are wiſe to ſalvation; theſe are the excellent in the earth, and the moſt worthy among men. Or who is a truly wiſe man? is there really ſuch a perſon in the world, that has got to the perfection of wiſdom? not one; and very few they are that can, in a true and proper ſenſe, be called wiſe men. The Targum is, "Who is a wiſe man, that can "ſtand againſt the wiſdom of the Lord?" And who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? or a word [q]? the word of God, which is not of private interpretation? none know it rightly, but ſuch who have the Spirit of God, the enditer of the word: Chriſt is the interpreter, one among a thouſand; and, next to him, are thoſe who have his mind, and rightly divide the word of truth. The Targum is, "and to know the interpretation of the "words in the prophets:" this may be underſtood of the ſolution of any difficulties in things natural or civil; and of the interpretation of any of the works of God, either in nature or providence, as well as of his word; and he is a wiſe man, that not only has wiſdom in himſelf, but is able to teach others, and make them wiſe; can ſolve doubts, remove difficulties, interpret nature, the works and word of God. Aben Ezra repeats the note of ſimilitude from the former clauſe, and ſo it may be rendered, Who is as he that knows the interpretation of a thing, or word? ſuch an one as Solomon was, Prov. i. 6. A man's wiſdom maketh his face to ſhine; as Moſes, when he came down from the mount, full fraught with the knowledge of the will of God, Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. and as Stephen, whoſe wiſdom and ſpirit by which he ſpoke were irreſiſtible, Acts vi. 10, 15. wiſdom, which diſcovers itſelf in a man's words and actions, gives comelineſs to his perſon, makes him look amiable and lovely in the eyes of others: or, it enlightens his face [r]; by it he is able to ſee the difference between truth and falſhood, and what is to be done and not done; what way he ſhould walk in, and what he ſhould ſhun and avoid. And the boldneſs of his face ſhall be changed; the ferocity and auſterity of his countenance, the impudence and inhumanity that appeared in him before, through his wiſdom and knowledge, are changed into meekneſs, gentleneſs, and humanity; of an impudent, fierce and ill-behaved man, he becomes meek, modeſt, affable, and humane: this effect natural wiſdom and knowledge has on men [s]; and much more ſpiritual and evangelical wiſdom, which comes from above, and is firſt pure, then peaceable and gentle, James iii. 17. Some read it, the ſtrength of his face ſhall be doubled, or renewed [t]; he ſhall be changed into the ſame image, from glory to glory; his ſpiritual ſtrength ſhall be renewed, and his light and knowledge increaſe yet more and more, 2 Cor. iii. 18. Iſa. xl. 31. Eccl. vii. 19. Prov. iv. 18. But Guſſetius [u] renders it, his boldneſs, or impudence, ſhall be hated.

ỿ. 2. I counſel thee to keep the king's commandment, &c.] Or, to obſerve the mouth of the king [w]; what he ſays, and do according to it, when it is agreeable to the law of God, and according to the laws of the kingdom by which he is to govern; for kings are to be honoured, obeyed, and ſubmitted to, in the lawful diſcharge of their office: and ſuch counſel and advice as this is wholſome; and, being taken, contributes much, as to the honour of kings, ſo to the good of kingdoms and ſtates, and to a man's own peace and comfort. Aben Ezra ſupplies it, "I command thee, or I admoniſh thee;" for it may be either a charge, or an advice, reſpecting this and what follows. Jarchi ſupplies and paraphraſes it thus, "I have need, and "am prepared, to obſerve the mouth (or keep the "commandment) of the King of the world;" and ſo Alſhech, "obſerve that which goes out of the "mouth of the King of the world." And indeed, to underſtand it, not of an earthly king, but of the King of kings, as it is underſtood by other interpreters alſo, ſuits better with what is ſaid of this King in the following verſes; whoſe commandments, which are not grievous, but to be loved above fine gold, ſhould be kept from a principle of love, without mercenary and ſelfiſh views, as they are delivered out by him, and to his glory; and ſuch a charge as this ſhould be attended to, and ſuch counſel be received. And that in regard of the oath of God; who has ſwore, that if his children forſake his law, and walk not in his ſtatutes, he will viſit their tranſgreſſions with a rod, and their iniquities with ſtripes; and therefore ſhould be careful to keep his commandments, Pſal. lxxxix. 30—35. Thoſe who interpret this of an earthly king, by the oath of God, underſtand the oath of allegiance and fidelity to him, taken in the name and preſence of God, and therefore for conſcience-ſake ſhould obey him: or render it, but ſo that thou obſerveſt the manner of the oath of God [x]; or takeſt care to obey him; or do nothing in obedience to kings, which is contrary to the will of God; for God is to be obeyed rather than men, Acts iv. 19. and v. 29. eſpecially, and above all things, that is to be regarded.

ỿ. 3. Be not haſty to go out of his ſight, &c.] Out of the ſight of the King of kings. Do not think to hide thyſelf from him, for there is no fleeing from his preſence, Pſal. cxxxix. 7. it is beſt, when under ſome conſternation, as the word [y] ſignifies, or under ſome fearful apprehenſion of his wrath and indignation, to fall down before him, acknowledge the offence, and pray for pardon: and to this purpoſe is the Targum, "and in the "time of the indignation of the Lord, do not ceaſe "to pray before him; being terrified (or troubled) "before him, go and pray, and ſeek mercy of "him;" and with which agrees the note of Jarchi, "be not troubled, ſaying, That thou wilt go and "flee from his preſence, to a place where he does "not rule, for he rules in every place." Such who interpret this of an earthly king, ſuppoſe this forbids a man going out from the preſence of a king in a pet and paſſion, withdrawing himſelf from his court and ſervice in a heat at once. Stand not in an evil thing; having done it, continue not in it; but repent of it, acknowledge and forſake it, whether againſt God, or an earthly king. For he doth whatſoever pleaſeth him; which beſt agrees with the King of kings, who does what he pleaſes, in heaven above and in earth below, both in nature, providence and grace; ſee Job xxiii. 13. Pſal. cxv. 3. though earthly kings indeed have long hands, as is uſually ſaid, and can reach a great way, and do great things, eſpecially deſpotic and arbitrary princes, and it is very difficult eſcaping their hands. The Targum is, "for the Lord of all worlds, the "Lord will do what he pleaſes."

ỿ. 4. Where the word of a king is, there is power, &c.] Or dominion [z]. Authority goes along with his word of command; and there is an inferior magiſtracy, a ſubordinate power under him, ready to execute his will upon the rebellious and diſobedient. Jarchi interprets it, the word of the holy, bleſſed God; and the Targum, the word of that King who rules over all the world; where his word of doctrine comes, not in word only, it is with power: his written word is quick and powerful, ful; the word of his goſpel preached is the power of God to ſalvation; or is accompanied with power, to enlighten dark minds, quicken dead ſinners, unſtop deaf ears, ſoften hard hearts, and deliver men from the ſlavery of ſin and Satan; it makes men, of enemies, friends to God, Chriſt, and good men; transforms them by the renewing of their minds, and comforts and eſtabliſhes ſaints; all which is attributed to the word; and are the effects of almighty power, Heb. iv. 12. Rom. i. 16. his word of command alſo comes with power, being cloathed with his authority; and is ſubmitted to by his people in the day of his power upon them, who readily and chearfully obey it. And who may ſay unto him, What doſt thou? call him to an account for, or complain of any of his works of creation, providence, or grace? This beſt agrees with God, than with any earthly king; and is ſaid of him elſewhere, Job ix. 12. and xxxiii. 14. Dan. iv. 35.

℣. 5. Whoſo keepeth the commandment, ſhall feel no evil, &c.] Either the commandment of an earthly king, which ſhould be kept, when agreeable to the laws of the nation, and not inconſiſtent with the commands of God; and ſuch as do obſerve it, know no evil [z], as it may be rendered, or no ſorrow; they live peaceably and quietly, and enjoy the favour and protection of the government under which they are, and have praiſe of men; ſee Rom. xiii. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 2. or the commandments of the heavenly King, the ſingular being put for the plural; ſo the Targum, "whoſo keepeth the "commandments of the Lord, ſhall know no evil "in the world to come." Nor in this world neither; no evil befals them; what may be thought to be ſo is for their good; though they know and are conſcious of the evil of ſin, and commit it, yet not willingly, and with love to it, and ſo as to make it the work of their lives; but lament it, repent of it, and forſake it, and do not feel the evil of puniſhment for it: yea, ſuch enjoy much good; have much communion with God; large diſcoveries of his love; dwell in him, and ſhall at laſt dwell with him in the heavenly city; ſee John xiv. 21, 23. 1 John iii. 22, 24. Rev. xxii. 14. And a wiſe man's heart diſcerneth both time and judgment; he knows not only what is his duty to do, both with reſpect to God and men, to a temporal prince or the King eternal; but he knows alſo the moſt fit and convenient time of doing it; and lays hold on every opportunity that offers, and which may be called redeeming time, Gal. vi. 10. Eph. v. 16. and he knows the right manner in which it ſhould be performed, with all the agreeable circumſtances of it, which he carefully obſerves; or he knows the judgment that will be paſſed, or the puniſhment that will be inflicted on delinquents, either by God or men; and therefore is careful to keep the commandment, and avoid it: and eſpecially he remembers there is a judgment to come, when every thing will be brought to an account; and though he does not know the preciſe day and hour, yet he knows there will be ſuch a time; ſo ſome render it, the time of judgment [a]: the Targum is, "and the time "of prayer, and of judgment, and of truth, is "known by the heart of the wiſe."

℣. 6. Becauſe to every purpoſe there is time and judgment, &c.] There is a fit ſeaſon, and a right and proper manner of doing every thing, that is to be done; ſee chap. iii. 1—8. which a wiſe man diſcerns; and which when a man hits upon, it prevents a great deal of miſchief, which for want of it comes upon men, as the following clauſe ſhews; ſome refer this to the puniſhment of the wicked, and to a future judgment. So the Targum, "to every bu"ſineſs there is a time good and evil, and accord"ing to the judgment of truth the whole world is "judged;" and to the ſame purpoſe Jarchi, "there is a time fixed for the viſitation of the "wicked, and there is judgment before the Lord; "this is vengeance or puniſhment." Therefore the miſery of man is great upon him; he not obſerving the right time and manner of doing what he ought, brings much trouble upon himſelf; his days are few and full of trouble, and every day has a ſufficiency of evil in it; becauſe of the evil of ſin, the evil of miſery preſſes upon him, and is an heavy burden on him. Jarchi's note is, "when the "wickedneſs of a man is great, then cometh his "viſitation."

℣. 7. For he knoweth not that which ſhall be, &c.] Or that it ſhall be [b]; that he ſhall ever have the opportunity again he has loſt, nor what is to come hereafter; what ſhall be on the morrow, or what ſhall befal him in the remaining part of his days; what troubles and ſorrows he ſhall meet with, or what will be the caſe and circumſtances of his family after his death. For who can tell him when it ſhall be? or how it ſhall be [c]? how it will be with him or his; no one that pretends to judicial aſtrology, or to the art of divination, or any ſuch devices, can tell him what is to come; future things are only certainly known by God; none but he can tell what will certainly come to paſs; ſee chap. iii. 22. and vi. 12. Jarchi interprets it of a man's not conſidering for what God will bring him to judgment, and that no man can tell him the vengeance and puniſhment that will be inflicted.

℣. 8. There is no man that hath power over the ſpirit to retain the ſpirit, &c.] Which is not to be underſtood of the wind, which the word uſed ſometimes ſignifies, and of mens having no power to reſtrain that, or hinder it from blowing; for to what purpoſe ſhould Solomon mention this? rather it may be conſidered as a check upon deſpotic and arbitrary princes, not to ſtretch their power too far; ſince they had none over the ſpirits or minds of men, and could not hinder them from thinking ill of them, and wiſhing ill to them, nor reſtrain their hatred of them; whatever power they had or exerciſed over their bodies and eſtates, they had none over their ſpirits, or their conſciences; no lawful power to reſtrain them from their duty to God, nor to oblige them to do that which he has forbidden; nor to compel them to any thing againſt conſcience; nor to bind their conſciences in matters indifferent: or as an argument with ſubjects to obey the commands of their ſovereign; ſince it is not in their power to reſtrain the ſpirit and wrath of princes, which is as the roaring of a lion, and as the meſſengers of death, Prov. xvi. 14. and xix. 12. particularly to be careful that they do not commit any capital offence, for which ſentence may be paſſed to take away life; when it will not be in their power to retain it, nor to reſcue themſelves out of the hands of juſtice and the civil magiſtrate, but muſt ſubmit. Or elſe it is to be underſtood of every man's ſpirit at the hour of death, and of the unavoidableneſs of it, as the next clauſe explains it; and by ſpirit is meant, either the ſenſitive ſoul, the ſame with the ſpirit of a beaſt, without which the body is dead, and is like the wind that paſſeth away, and ceaſeth when the breath is ſtopped; or the rational ſoul, the ſpirit that is committed to God, and returns to him at death, Luke xxiii. 46. Acts vii. 59. Eccl. xii. 7. This a man has not power over to diſmiſs or retain at pleaſure; he cannot keep it one moment longer when it is called for and required by the Father of ſpirits the Creator of it; he has not power to reſtrain[d] it, as in a priſon, as the word ſignifies, as Alſhech obſerves; whence Aben Ezra ſays, that the ſpirit or ſoul in the body is like a priſoner in a priſon; but nothing that attends a man in this life, or he is in poſſeſſion of, can keep the ſoul in this priſon, when the time of its departure is come; not riches, nor honours, nor wiſdom and learning, nor ſtrength and youth, nor all the force of medicine; the time is fixed, it is the appointment of God, the bounds ſet by him cannot be paſſed, Eccl. iii. 2. Heb. ix. 27. Gen. xlvii. 29. Job xiv. 5. The Targum is, "no man has power over the ſpirit of the ſoul to reſtrain the ſoul of life, that it might not ceaſe from the body of man;" and to the ſame ſenſe Jarchi, "to reſtrain the ſpirit in his body that the angel of death ſhould not take him." Neither hath he power in the day of death; or dominion[e]; death ſtrips a man of all power and authority, the power that the huſband has over the wife, or parents over their children, or the maſter over his ſervant, or the king over his ſubjects; death puts down all power and authority: it is an obſervation of Jarchi's, that David after he came to the throne is every where called king David, but when he came to die, only David, 1 Kings ii. 1. no king nor ruler can ſtand againſt death, any more than a beggar; no man is lord of death any more than of life, but death is lord of all; all muſt and do ſubmit to it, high and low, rich and poor; there is a day fixed for it, and that day can never be adjourned, prorogued, or put off to another; and as man has not power to deliver himſelf in the day of death, ſo neither his friend, as the Targum, nor any relation whatever. And there is no diſcharge in that war; death is a warfare as well as life, with which nature ſtruggles, but in vain; it is an enemy, and the laſt that ſhall be deſtroyed; it is a king, and a very powerful one; there is no withſtanding him, he is always victorious; and there is no eſcaping the battle with him, or fleeing from him; a diſcharge of ſoldiers in other wars is ſometimes obtained by intereſt, by the intreaty of friends, or by money; but here all cries and intreaties ſignify nothing; nor does he value riches, gold, or all the forces of ſtrength; ſee 2 Sam. xii. 18. Job xxxvi. 19. under the old law, if a perſon had built a new houſe, or married a wife, or was faint-hearted, he was excuſed and diſmiſſed; but none of theſe things are of any avail in this war, Deut. xx. 5, 6, 8. captives taken in war are ſometimes diſmiſſed by their conquerors, or they find ways and means to make their eſcape; but nothing of this kind can be done, when death has ſeized on the perſons of men. Some render it, there is no ſending to or in that war[f]; there is no ſending forces againſt death to withſtand him, it is to no purpoſe; there is no ſending a meſſage to him to ſue for a peace, truce or reprieve; he will hearken to nothing; there is no ſending one in the room of another, as Jarchi obſerves, "a man cannot ſay, I will ſend my ſon, or my ſervant;" no ſurrogation is allowed of in this caſe, as David wiſhed for, 2 Sam. xviii. 33. Aben Ezra interprets it, no armour, and ſo many interpreters; and ſo the Targum, "nor do inſtruments of armour help in war;" in this war: in other wars a man may put on an helmet of braſs and a coat of mail, to protect and defend him, or throw darts and arrows; but theſe ſignify nothing when death makes his approach and attack. Neither ſhall wickedneſs deliver thoſe that are given to it; or the maſters of it[g]; that is, from death; neither Satan the wicked one, as Jerom, who is wickedneſs itſelf, and with whom wicked men are confederate, can deliver them from death; nor ſinners the moſt abandoned deliver themſelves, who have made a covenant with it, and an agreement with hell, Iſa. xxviii. 15, 18. ſuch who are maſters of the greateſt wicked craft and cunning, and who deviſe many ways to eſcape other things, can contrive none to eſcape death; nor will riches gotten by wickedneſs, deliver the owners of them from death; ſee Prov. x. 2. and xi. 4. This ſenſe is mentioned by Aben Ezra, and not to be deſpiſed.

℣. 9. All this have I ſeen, &c.] Obſerved, taken notice of, and thoroughly conſidered; all that is ſaid above concerning the ſcarcity of good men and women, the fall of our firſt parents, the excellency of wiſdom, the neceſſity and advantage of keeping the king's commandment, the time and manner of doing it, the evil conſequences that follow an inattention to theſe things, ignorance of what is to come, and the unavoidableneſs of death. And applied my heart unto every work that is done under the ſun; not ſo much to mechanic works and manual operations performed by men, as to moral or immoral works, and chiefly the work of providence with reſpect to good and bad men, the conſequence of which were the following obſervations. There is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt; or the man ruleth over men[h]; for this is not to be underſtood of private rule in families, of the parent over his children, or maſter over his ſervant, but of a king over his ſubjects; who is the man, the principal man in the kingdom; and ſuch a man ruling in an arbitrary and tyrannical way, is to his own detriment in the iſſue. So Rehoboam, by his oppreſſive government, loſt ten tribes out of twelve. Some have loſt their whole kingdoms, and come to an untimely end; as well as ruined their immortal ſouls. Some render it to his hurt[i]; to the hurt of thoſe that are ruled, when it ſhould be for their good, the protection of their perſons and properties; but inſtead of that they lay heavy burdens upon them, take away their property, and injure and inſult their perſons. So the Targum, "to do ill to him." But Jarchi interprets it of the king himſelf. Some take it in both ſenſes; and ſo it is uſually in fact, that wicked princes rule to their own hurt, and the hurt of their ſubjects.

℣. 10. And ſo I ſaw the wicked buried, &c.] Or truly[k], verily, as the Targum, this is matter of fact; or then I ſaw, as Aben Ezra and others, upon applying his heart to every work; or when he obſerved particularly wicked magiſtrates, he took notice that ſome of them continued in their power until death, and died in their beds, and were carried to their graves in great pomp and ſtate, and interred in a very magnificent manner, when they deſerved no burial at all, but as king Jeconiah to be buried with the burial of an aſs. Who had come and gone from the place of the Holy; which moſt underſtand of the ſame perſons, of wicked magiſtrates buried, who kept their poſts of honour and places of power and authority as long as they lived; and went to and came from the courts of judicature and tribunals of juſtice, in great ſtate and ſplendor; where they preſided as God's vicegerents, and therefore called the place of the holy, Pſalm lxxxii. 1, 6. or though they were ſometimes depoſed, yet they were reſtored again to their former dignity; or though they died and were buried, yet in a ſenſe roſe again in their children that ſucceeded them, ſo Aben Ezra: but it ſeems better to underſtand it of other perſons, and render the words thus, and they came, and from the place of the Holy, or the holy place they walked[l]; that is, multitudes came to attend the funeral of ſuch rich and mighty men, and walked after or followed the corps; and even the prieſts and Levites from the temple made a part of the funeral-proceſſion, and walked in great ſolemnity from thence to the place of interment, which was uſually without the city. And they were forgotten in the city where they had ſo done; all their evil deeds were forgotten, their acts of oppreſſion and injuſtice, as if they had never been done by them. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions are, and they were praiſed in the city; panegyricks upon them were written and rehearſed, monuments were erected to their honour, with large encomiums of them; and ſo it may be read by the change of a letter; and Jarchi ſays, do not read forgotten, but praiſed; and ſo he ſays it is interpreted by their Rabbins. The whole may be conſidered in a very different view thus, but then I ſaw, &c. ſuch arbitrary rulers die and laid in the grave, one after another, and their names have been buried in oblivion and never remembered more in the city, where they have exerciſed ſo much power and authority. The latter part of the text is by many underſtood of good men, and rendered thus, and or but on the contrary they were forgotten in the city where they had done right[m]; their perſons and their good deeds were remembered no more; but this ſeems contrary to Pſal. cxii. 6. Prov. x. 7. The Targum paraphraſes the whole thus; "and in truth I have ſeen ſinners "that are buried and deſtroyed out of the world, "from the holy place where the righteous dwell, "who go to be burned in hell; and they are for-"gotten among the inhabitants of the city; and "as they have done, it is done to them." This is alſo vanity; the pompous funeral of ſuch wicked magiſtrates.

℣. 11. Becauſe ſentence againſt an evil work is not executed ſpeedily, &c.] Any evil work done by magiſtrates, or others, againſt which the wrath of God is revealed from heaven, and is threatned with his vengeance; the decree is gone forth, the ſentence is paſſed, God is determined upon puniſhment; but there is a delay of it, he exerciſes patience and long-ſuffering to anſwer ſome end of his, both towards his own people and the wicked; as well as to diſplay ſome of his own perfections; but becauſe ſo it is, the judgment comes not at once. Therefore the heart of the ſons of men is fully ſet in them to do evil; or their heart is full to do evil[n]; they have not only a fulneſs of ſin in them naturally, as is in every man's heart; but they are filled with reſolution, boldneſs, and courage, to commit ſin, promiſing themſelves impunity from the ſeeming delay of juſtice; ſuch an abuſe do they make of the patience and forbearance of God; they become more and more hardened in ſin, and bent upon the commiſſion of it.

℣. 12. Though a ſinner do evil an hundred times, &c.] That is, ever ſo many times, a certain number for an uncertain; though he lives in a continued courſe of ſin, being reſolved upon the above conſideration to give himſelf a ſwing to his luſts. The Targum renders it a hundred years; though he ſhould live ſo long in ſin, yet at laſt ſhould be accurſed, Iſa. lxv. 20. This and what follows are ſaid to check the boldneſs and preſumption of the ſinner upon the patience of God; and to make the people of God eaſy under the delay of juſtice, and the proſperity of the wicked. And his days be prolonged; or rather, and he prolongs unto him[o]; that is, God prolongs unto him, not days only, but the execution of the ſentence againſt his evil works; or defers his wrath and puniſhment; ſo Jarchi, "and "the holy bleſſed God prolongs to him, and does "not take vengeance on him;" and to this purpoſe is the Targum, "and from the Lord is given "to him ſpace to return." Yet ſurely I know; from the word and promiſe, and from experience, having obſerved it in a multitude of inſtances, which have abundantly confirmed the truth. That it ſhall be well with them that fear God; not with a ſervile but filial fear, with a holy, humble, fiducial, affectionate, and an obediential fear; not thro' any terrible apprehenſion of his majeſty, his judgment, his wrath now and hereafter; but under a ſenſe of his being and perfections, and eſpecially his mercy, grace, and goodneſs: it is well with ſuch perſons in all things, with reſpect to things temporal they ſhall not want what is proper for them; and with reſpect to things ſpiritual they are intereſted in the love, grace, and mercy of God; have much made known to them; are remembered by him; the ſun of righteouſneſs riſes upon them; the eye of God is on them, and his heart towards them, and his hand communicates every needful ſupply to them; and they are guarded, not only by his angels, but by himſelf; and it is well with them at all times; in times of public calamity they are either taken from it beforehand, or preſerved in it; all afflictions are for their good; it goes well with them at death and judgment; and they will be happy both in the millennium-ſtate, and in the ultimate glory. So the Targum, "it ſhall be well in "the world to come with them that fear the Lord;" ſee Pſal. xxxiv. 7—9. and xxxi. 15. Rev. xi. 18. with this compare Iſa. iii. 10, 11. It is added, which fear before him; whoſe fear is not hypocritical, but ſincere and hearty; not in ſhew only, but in reality; not taught by the precepts of men, and as before them, but as in the ſight of God; having always a ſenſe of his omniſcience and omnipreſence before them; and eſpecially this fear is exerciſed by them when they are in his houſe, in the aſſembly of his ſaints, attending on his word and ordinances: or which fear at his preſence; which fills them with an holy awe, as well as with joy and gladneſs, gladneſs. The Targum is, "which fear before him, "and do his will."

℣. 13. But it ſhall not be well with the wicked, &c.] It ſhall be ill with him; more is deſigned than is expreſſed, Iſa. iii. 11. in life they have no ſolid peace and comfort; at death they will be turned into hell; at judgment they will hear the awful ſentence, Go, ye curſed, and will be in torment to all eternity. Neither ſhall he prolong his days which are as a ſhadow; wicked men ſometimes do not live out half their days, which, according to the courſe of nature, and common term of life, they might be thought to live; or if they do prolong their days in wickedneſs, as ſometimes they do, chap. vii. 15. yet their days at longeſt are but as a ſhadow which declines, and is quickly gone; or however, they do not attain to eternal life, which is ſometimes meant by prolonging days, and is length of days for ever and ever, Iſa. liii. 10. Pſal. xxi. 4. this they never enjoy; but when the righteous go into life everlaſting, they go into everlaſting puniſhment. The reaſon of this is, becauſe he feareth not before God; the fear of God is not before his eyes, nor in his heart; he goes on in ſin without fear of him, boldly and openly commits it, and inſtead of taking ſhame for it, or repenting of it, glories in it; ſtretches out his hand againſt God, and bids defiance to him, and deſires not the knowledge of him, and refuſes to obey him. The Targum of the whole is, "and it ſhall not be well with "the wicked, and he ſhall have no ſpace in the "world to come; and in this world his days ſhall "be cut off, and they ſhall flee and paſs away as "a ſhadow, becauſe he fears not God."

℣. 14. There is a vanity which is done upon the earth, &c.] Tranſacted in this lower world under the ſun, through the permiſſion and direction of divine providence; not that it is a vanity on the part of God, who has wiſe ends to anſwer by it, for the good of his people, the trial of their graces, &c. or to bring ſinners to repentance, or harden them in ſin; but this ſhews the vanity and uncertainty of all worldly things, and that there is no happineſs to be had in them. That there be juſt men unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; to whom evil comes, as the Targum and Jarchi; who are treated as if they were wicked men, and dealt with in providence as profane ſinners would be, if they had the juſt deſert of their wicked works; being attended with poverty, ſickneſs, and diſgrace, and other calamities of life, as Job, Aſaph, Lazarus, and others, and yet truly righteous and good men. Again, there be wicked men to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous; to whom good things come, as the Targum and Jarchi; who have an affluence of good things, all the outward bleſſings of life, as health, wealth, honour, long life, &c. as if they had lived the beſt of lives, and were the moſt righteous perſons upon earth; ſee Job xxi. 7—13. Pſal. lxxiii. 4, 5, 7. Luke xvi. 19. I ſaid, that this alſo is vanity; this is ſaid, as ſome think, according to the judgment of corrupt nature; or as it is apprehended by ſuch who do not rightly conſider the judgments of God and the wiſdom of providence in the ordering of things to anſwer good purpoſes; or rather the ſenſe is, this is one of the miſeries and infelicities of this life, and which demonſtrates the emptineſs of all things here below, and that the chief good and ſupreme happineſs is not to be had here; but there is and muſt be a future ſtate, when all things will be ſet right, and every one will have and enjoy his proper portion.

℣. 15. Then I commended mirth, &c.] Innocent mirth, a chearfulneſs of ſpirit in whatſoever ſtate and condition men are; ſerenity and tranquillity of mind, thankfulneſs for what they have, and a free and comfortable uſe of it; this the wiſe man praiſed and recommended to good men, as being much better than to fret at the proſperity of the wicked, and the ſeemingly unequal diſtribution of things in this world, and becauſe they had not ſo much of them as others; who yet had reaſon to be thankful for what they had, and to lift up their heads and be chearful, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God in another world. The Targum interprets it of the joy of the law. Becauſe a man hath no better thing under the ſun than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry; of earthly things there is nothing better than for a man freely and chearfully, with moderation and thankfulneſs, to enjoy what God has given him; this is what had been obſerved before, chap. ii. 24. and iii. 22. and v. 18. and is not the language of an epicure, or a carnal man, who obſerving that no difference is made between the righteous and the wicked, that it is as well or better with the wicked than the righteous, determines to give up himſelf to ſenſual luſts and pleaſures; but it is the good and wholeſome advice of the wiſe man, for men to be eaſy under every providence, ſatisfied with their preſent condition and circumſtances, and be chearful and pleaſant, and not diſtreſs themſelves about things they cannot alter. For that ſhall abide with him of his labour the days of his life which God giveth him under the ſun; man's preſent life is under the ſun, and is continued as long as it pleaſes God; though it is but ſhort, rather to be counted by days than years, and is a laborious one; and all that he gets by his labour enjoyed by him, is to eat and drink chearfully; and this he may expect to have and continue with him as long as he lives, even food and raiment, and with this he ſhould be content.

℣. 16. When I applied mine heart to know wiſdom, &c.] The nature and cauſes of things; the wiſdom of God in his providence, and the grounds and reaſons of his various diſpenſations towards the children of men: the Targum interprets it, the wiſdom of the law. And to ſee the buſineſs that is done upon the earth; either the buſineſs of providence, in dealing ſo unequally with the righteous and the wicked, before obſerved; and which is a buſineſs very afflictive and diſtreſſing for curious perſons to look into, not being able to account for it: or the labour and toil of men to get wealth and riches, and to find happineſs in them. (For alſo there is that neither day nor night ſeeth ſleep with his eyes;) or has any ſleep in his eyes, through his eager purſuit after worldly things, or however, has but little; he riſes early, and ſits up late at his buſineſs, ſo cloſe and diligent is he at it, ſo induſtrious to obtain riches, imagining an happineſs in them there is not: or elſe, this deſcribes perſons curious and inquiſitive into the affairs of providence, and the reaſons of them; who give themſelves no reſt, day nor night, being ſo intent upon their ſtudies of this kind; and perhaps the wiſe man may deſign himſelf.

℣. 17. Then I beheld all the work of God, &c.] Not of creation, but of providence; took notice of it, contemplated on it, conſidered it, and weighed it well; viewed the various ſteps and methods of it, to find out, if poſſible, at leaſt, ſome general rule by which it proceeded: but all ſo various and uncertain, That a man cannot find out the work that is done under the ſun; he can find out that it is done, but not the reaſon why it is done: the ways of God are in the deep, and not to be traced; they are unſearchable and paſt finding out; there is a βαθος, a depth of wiſdom and knowledge in them, inſcrutable by the wiſeſt of men, Pſal. lxxvii. 19. Rom. xi. 33. Becauſe, though a man labour to ſeek it out, yet he ſhall not find it; Noldius and others render it although; not only a man that, in a ſlight and negligent manner, ſeeks after the knowledge of the works of divine providence, and the reaſons of them; but even one that is diligent and laborious at it, is not able to find them out; they being purpoſely concealed by the Lord, to anſwer ſome ends of his. Yea further, though a wiſe man think to know it, yet ſhall he not be able to find it; a man of a great, natural capacity, ſuch an one as Solomon himſelf, though he propoſes to himſelf, and determines within himſelf to find it out, and ſets himſelf to the work, and uſes all the means and methods he can deviſe, and imagines with himſelf he ſhall be able to find out the reaſons of the divine procedure, in his diſpenſations towards the righteous and the wicked; and yet, after all, he is not able to do it. The Targum is, "what ſhall "be done in the end of days;" wherefore it is beſt for a man to be eaſy and quiet, and enjoy what he has in the beſt manner he can, and ſubmit to the will of God.

CHAP. IX.

THOUGH the wiſe man, with all his wiſdom, ſearch and labour, could not find out the cauſes and reaſons of divine providence, in all the branches and methods of it; yet ſome things he did find out, and obſerve, in making this enquiry, and which he declares; as, that good and wiſe men, more eſpecially their perſons and their affairs, were in the hand of God, under his guidance, government, and direction; and that an intereſt in his love and hatred, was not to be known by the outward eſtate of men, ℣. 1. That the ſame events happen to good and bad men, who are variouſly deſcribed; that the hearts of wicked men are full of ſin and madneſs as long as they live, and that they all muſt and do die, ℣. 2, 3. and then the ſtate of ſuch dead is deſcribed, as being without hope, knowledge, reward or memory; and without love, hatred or envy, or any portion in the things of this life, ℣. 4—6. Wherefore good men are adviſed to live chearfully, in a view of acceptance with God, both of perſons and ſervices; and eat, and drink, and clothe well, according to their circumſtances, and enjoy their friends and families; ſince nothing of this kind can be done in the grave, ℣. 7—10. Then the wiſe man obſerves another vanity; that ſucceſs in undertakings is not always to perſons who bid fair, and might hope for it, but looks like the effect of chance, ℣. 11. which want of ſucceſs is often owing to their ignorance of the proper time of doing things, and to their want of foreſight, thought and care, to prevent evils; for which reaſon they are compared to fiſhes and birds, taken in a net or ſnare, ℣. 12. And concludes with a commendation of wiſdom, illuſtrated by an example of it, in a certain perſon that delivered a city by it, ℣. 13—15. and though the man's wiſdom was deſpiſed, yet it is preferable to ſtrength, or weapons of war, or the noiſe of a fooliſh ruler, who deſtroys much good, ℣. 16—18.

℣. 1. For all this I conſidered in mine heart, &c.] What goes before, in the latter end of the preceding chapter, concerning the various providences of God, the difficulty of finding out the reaſons of them, and the fruitleſſneſs of attempting it; and alſo what follows, the work of providence: Solomon gave his mind unto, attended it with great application, and ſtrictly conſidered and examined it, in order to find it out, but could not; and if he could not, no other man could. And he had a good intention in all; his views were, Even to declare all this; for the end of ſearch and enquiry ſhould be, to make known what is found for the good of others, Job v. 27. and as the wiſe man had done before, chap. vii. 25—29. or to purge, or purify, as the word [p] ſignifies; to make dark providences clear, and conſiſtent with the perfections and promiſes of God; to free and vindicate them from all charges of unrighteouſneſs and partiality, and to ſet them in a clear light to others: now though he failed in his attempt, yet having made ſome diſcoveries, he imparted them, as follows: and the obſervations he made were, That the righteous, and the wiſe, and their works, are in the hand of God; that thoſe who are truly righteous in the ſight of God, are ſo, in an evangelical ſenſe, made ſo by the obedience of Chriſt; and who believe in him for righteouſneſs, and live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly: and who are wiſe, not for the things of this world, but another; who are wiſe unto ſalvation; and are concerned for the truth of grace, as well as an outward profeſſion, and walk wiſely in the world; theſe, their perſons, are under the ſpecial care of divine providence; they receive from the hand of God what is needful and proper for them, and they are preſerved and protected by him, 1 Tim. iv. 8, 10. and their works, or affairs; all events relating to them, are all appointed, ordered, and directed by the hand of God, and all for their good. In a more evangelic ſenſe, their perſons are in the hands of God, Father, Son and Spirit; in the hands of the Father of Chriſt, being engraven there: he looks at them, and upon them, with delight and pleaſure, and never forgets them; he has an high and honourable eſteem of them, they are a crown of glory, and a royal diadem in his hand; he directs and guides them, holds them, and upholds them with his right hand; and keeps them, by his power, through faith unto ſalvation, John x. 29. Iſa. xlix. 16. and lxii. 3. and xli. 10. Pſal. lxxiii. 23, 24. 1 Pet. i. 5. They are in the hands of Chriſt; put there by his Father, as the effect of his love, care and wiſdom; where they are in his poſſeſſion, the objects of his delight; and are under his guidance and direction, his care and protection, Deut. xxxiii. 3. Cant. viii. 6. Pſal. xcv. 7. Rev. ii. 1. John x. 28. And they are in the hands of the Spirit, who begins and carries on his own work in them; leads them to Chriſt, and into all truth, and guides them ſafe to glory, John xvi. 8, 13, 14. Pſal. cxliii. 10. And ſo their works alſo are in the hands of God; the work of grace upon the ſoul, is in the hand of the Spirit, to carry it on and finiſh it; good works done by them, are done by the aſſiſtance of divine grace, the ſtrength of Chriſt, and the aid of the bleſſed Spirit; are received and accepted with God through Chriſt; and will not be forgotten, but are retained, and will be remembered another day; ſee ÿ. 7. Heb. vi. 10. Rev. xiv. 13. No man knoweth either love or hatred, by all that is before them; no man knows his own love and hatred, his paſſions are ſo fickle and inconſtant; what he loves now, he preſently hates, as may be ſeen in the inſtances of Amnon, Ahaſuerus, and others: or he knows not that what he loves and hates ſhall befal him, all depending on divine providence; or he does not know the love and hatred of others, who are his friends or his foes, there is ſuch deceitfulneſs in men: or rather, he does not know the love and hatred of God, with reſpect to himſelf or others, by the outward conduct of providence; ſince the ſame things happen to one as to another; as health and ſtrength, wealth and riches, honour and fame, wiſdom and learning, long life, and the like: good men may know that they are loved of God, by his love being ſhed abroad in them, by the bleſſings of grace beſtowed on them, and the witneſſings of the Spirit to them; and know that ſin is abominable to God, and wicked men are hated by him; and living and dying in ſin, will be eternally damned; but who is an elect perſon, and who a reprobate, is not to be known by the outward eſtate of men, as to the things of life. Some render it, even love and hatred [q], in connection with the preceding clauſe; that is, theſe are in the hands of God alſo; his love to his people is purely ſovereign, according to his own will; not through any motives in them, as their love, lovelineſs, or good works; and his hatred of others, or the puniſhment of them for ſin, and appointment of them to it; for the ſame is alſo as he pleaſes; ſee Rom. ix. 11—22. or the love and hatred of men; for God has the hearts and paſſions of all men in his hand, and at his command, and can raiſe or reſtrain them at his pleaſure, Prov. xxi. 1. the love and hatred of good men; he works in them, love to himſelf and all divine things, and hatred of that which is evil; and alſo of bad men, he can make them love his people, and he can reſtrain their wrath when he pleaſes, Prov. xvi. 7. Pſal. lxxvi. 10 and then the laſt clauſe is rendered, no man knoweth all that is before them [r]; either before Elohim, the three divine perſons, to whom all things are manifeſt, or that were before decreed, as Aben Ezra; the purpoſes and decrees of God, which are the ſecret and deep things of God, and cannot be known, but by his promiſes or providences: or man is ſo ſhort-ſighted, that he cannot diſcern the things that are plain and manifeſt before him; and much leſs things future, that are yet to come. But the words, according to the accents, may be better rendered, as by Munſter, Neither love nor hatred man knows; whether the love profeſſed to him is ſincere, and what ſecret hatred is bore to him: but all things are before them; Elohim, the three divine perſons.

ÿ. 2. All things come alike to all, &c.] That is, all outward things in this life, good and bad men ſhare in alike; which proves that neither love nor hatred can be known by them: ſo the emperor Mark Antonine, in ſpeaking of life and death, of honour and diſhonour, of pain and pleaſure, riches and poverty, ſays [s], all theſe things happen alike to good men and bad men. There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; the ſame proſperous ones happen to one as to another, as riches, honour, health, wiſdom and learning, fame and reputation: if Abraham was rich in cattle, gold and ſilver, ſo was Nabal, and the rich fool in the goſpel; if Joſeph was advanced to great dignity in Pharaoh's court, ſo was Haman, in the court of Ahaſuerus; if Caleb was as hearty and ſtrong at fourſcore and five as ever, it is true of many wicked men, that there are no bands in their death, and their ſtrength is firm to the laſt; if Moſes, Solomon and Daniel, were wiſe men, and of great learning, ſo were the idolatrous Egyptians, and ſo are many God is not pleaſed to call by his grace; if Demetrius had a good report of all men, ſo had the falſe prophets of old: and the ſame adverſe things happen to one as to another; as the inſtances of Job, Lazarus, and the good figs, the Jews carried into captivity, ſhew; of whom the Midraſh, and Jarchi from that, interpret this and the following clauſes: to the righteous and to the wicked; to Noah the righteous, and to Pharaoh, not Necho, as Jarchi, but he whoſe daughter Solomon married, who, the Jews ſay, were both lame. To the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean; who are good, not naturally and in and of themſelves, but by the grace of God; and who are clean, not by nature, nor by their own power, but through the clean water of divine grace being ſprinkled on them, and through the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt applied to them; and who are unclean, through the corruption of nature, and the pollution of actual ſins, they live in. Some underſtand this of a ceremonial cleanneſs and uncleanneſs. The above Jews apply theſe characters to Moſes, who was good; to Aaron, who was clean; and to the ſpies, who were unclean; and the ſame thing happened to them all, excluſion from the land of Canaan. To him that ſacrificeth, and to him that ſacrificeth not; that ſerves and worſhips the Lord, and who does not, one branch of ſervice and worſhip being put for all; and whether they offer themſelves, their contrite hearts and ſpiritual ſacrifices, or not. The Jews exemplify this in Joſiah, who ſacrificed to the Lord; and in Ahab, who made ſacrifice to ceaſe; and both were ſlain with arrows. As is the good, ſo is the ſinner; alike in their outward condition and circumſtances, whether as to proſperity or adverſity. And he that ſweareth, as he that feareth an oath; the common ſwearer, or he that is perjured, and has no reverence of God, nor regard to truth, nor any concern to make good his oath; and he that is cautious about taking one, does it with an awe and reverence of the divine Being, and is careful of keeping it, even to his own hurt. The Jews inſtance in Zedekiah and Samſon; the former broke his oath with the king of Babylon, and the latter was a religious obſerver of an oath; and yet both had their eyes put out; but it does not appear, that Samſon ever took an oath: the oppoſition in the text ſeems to lie between one that is ready to take an oath on every occaſion, without conſidering the ſolemnity of one, and without due care of what he ſwore to; and one that is cautious about taking an oath, and chooſes to be excuſed from taking one, on any account, could he be excuſed; preferring ſuch advice as is given, Matt. v. 34. James v. 12. Swear not at all: the counſel about ſwearing, which Iſocrates [t] gives, ſeems worthy of notice; "Take an oath required on two accounts; either to purge thyſelf from a foul crime charged with, or to ſave friends in danger, and deliver them out of it; but on account of money (or goods) ſwear not by any deity, no, not even if thou canſt take an oath ſafely; for by ſome thou wilt be thought to be perjured, and by others to be covetous." The word in Hebrew for ſwearing is always paſſive, becauſe a man ſhould not ſwear, unleſs obliged; and the ſame form of language is uſed by Latin writers[u]; and the Hebrew word for it comes from a root, which ſignifies ſeven, in alluſion, as ſome think, to ſeven witneſſes required to an oath; the Arabians, when they ſwore, anointed ſeven ſtones with blood, and, whilſt anointing them, called on their deities[w]; ſee Gen. xxi. 30. It may be obſerved, that all men are here divided into good and bad; this has been the diſtinction from the beginning, and continues, and ever will.

[t] Paræneſ. ad Demonic. p. 10.

℣. 3. This is an evil among all things that are done under the ſun, that there is one event unto all, &c.] A very great evil, a very ſore one, the worſt of evils. Not an evil, as the providence of God is concerned with it, who does no evil; nor is there any unrighteouſneſs in him; he is righteous in all his ways: but this is an evil, and diſtreſſing thing, to the minds of good men; ſee Pſal. lxxiii. 2, 12—14. Jer. xii. 1. and is what bad men make an ill uſe of, to harden themſelves in ſin, and to deſpiſe religion as an unprofitable thing, Job xxi. 14, 15. Yea, alſo the heart of the ſons of men is full of evil; they are naturally full of evil, of all unrighteouſneſs and wickedneſs, what comes out of them ſhew it; and becauſe the ſame things happen to good and bad men, and the wicked paſs with impunity, and are outwardly happy as others, or more ſo, their hearts are fully ſet in them to do evil, chap. viii. 11. And madneſs is in their heart while they live; or madneſſes[x]: every ſin is madneſs; for who, but a mad man, would ſtretch out his hand againſt God, and ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Almighty, and run upon him? who but a mad man would ruſh into ſin in the manner he does, and expoſe himſelf to dangers and death, even eternal death? Wicked men are mad upon their luſts, and mad againſt the ſaints, and all that is good; this inſanity is in their hearts, and ſhews itſelf in their lives, and continues with them as long as they live, unleſs called by grace. And after that they go to the dead; after all the madneſs of their lives, they die and go into the ſtate of the dead, and are among them; which refers not ſo much to the interment of their bodies in the grave, as the company with which their ſeparate ſpirits are; they go, not to the righteous dead, but to the wicked; ſee Prov. ii. 18. and ix. 18. ſo Alſhech, they go to the dead; not to the righteous, who, in their death, or when dead, are called living; but, as Jarchi obſerves, at their end they go down to hell. The Targum is, "after "the end of a man, it is reſerved for him that he "be corrected with the dead, according to the judg"ment (or deſert) of ſins."

℣. 4. For to him that is joined to all the living, there is hope, &c.] That is, who is among the living, is one of them, and, as long as he is, there is hope, if his circumſtances are mean, and he is poor and afflicted, that it may be better with him in time; ſee Job xiv. 7. or of his being a good man, though now wicked; of his being called and converted, as ſome are at the eleventh hour, even on a death-bed; and eſpecially there is a hope of men, if they are under the means of grace, ſeeing perſons have been made partakers of the grace of God after long waiting. There is here a keri and a cetib, a marginal reading and a textual writing; the former reads, that is joined, the latter, that is choſen; our verſion follows the marginal reading, as do the Targum, Jarchi, Aben Ezra, the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic verſions: ſome, following the latter, render the words, Who is to be choſen[y], or preferred, a living, or a dead man? not a dead, but a living man: to all the living there is hope; of their being better; and, as Jarchi obſerves, there is hope, while alive, even though he is a wicked man joined to the wicked; yea, there is hope of the wicked, that he may be good before he dies. For a living dog is better than a dead lion; a proverbial ſpeech, ſhewing that life is to be preferred to death; and that a mean, abject, and contemptible perſon, living, who for his deſpicable condition may be compared to a dog, is to be preferred to the moſt generous man, or to the greateſt potentate, dead; ſince the one may poſſibly be uſeful in ſome reſpects or another, the other cannot: though a living ſinner, who is like to a dog for his uncleanneſs and vileneſs, is not better than a dead ſaint or righteous man, comparable to a lion, who has hope in his death, and dies in the Lord.

℣. 5. For the living know that they ſhall die, &c.] Death is certain, it is the demerit of ſin, the appointment of God, and the time of it is fixed; it may be known that it will be, from the word of God that aſſures it, from all experience which confirms it, and from the decline of nature, and the ſeeds of death in men. This the living know that live corporally, even the wicked themſelves, tho' they put the evil day far from them; and ſo good men, that live ſpiritually, being quickened by the Spirit and grace of God, and live a life of faith and holineſs; they know they ſhall die, though Chriſt died for them, and has aboliſhed death, as a puniſhment and a curſe, and took away its ſting, and made it a bleſſing; wherefore it is deſirable to them, as being for their good: but there are ſome things about death, they ordinarily know not; they do not know the time of their death; nor the place where they ſhall die; nor of what death they ſhall die; nor in what circumſtances, both outward and inward: of theſe, the Targum underſtands the paſſage; "for the righteous know that if they ſin, they "ſhall be reckoned as dead men in the world to "come, therefore they keep their ways, and ſin "not; but if they ſin, they return by repentance." But the dead know not any thing; this is not to be underſtood of their ſeparate ſpirits, and of the things of the other world; for the righteous dead know much, their knowledge is greatly increaſed; they know, as they are known; they know much of God in Chriſt, of his perfections, purpoſes, covenant, grace and love; they know much of Chriſt, of his perſon, offices and glory, and ſee him as he is; they know much of the goſpel, and the myſteries of it; and of angels, and the ſpirits of juſt men, they now converſe with; and of the glories and happineſs of the heavenly ſtate; even they know abundantly more than they did in this life: and the wicked dead, in their ſeparate ſpirits, know there is a God that judgeth; that their ſouls are immortal; that there is a future ſtate; indeed they know and feel the torments of hell, the worm that never dies, and the fire that is not quenched: but this is to be interpreted of their bodily ſenſes now extinct, and of worldly things they have now nothing to do with; they know not any thing that is done in this world, nor how it fares with their children and friends they have left behind them; ſee Job xiv. 21. Iſa. lxiii. 16. nor therefore are they to be prayed unto, and uſed as mediators with God. The Targum is; "and ſinners know not any good, "ſo that they do not make their works good while "they live; and they know not any good in the "world to come." Neither have they any more a reward; not but that there will be rewards in a future ſtate, in which every one ſhall have his own reward; there will be a reward for the righteous; they will receive the reward of the inheritance, though it will be, not of debt, but of grace; and particularly in the millennium-ſtate, Pſal. lviii. 11. Col. iii. 24. Rev. xxii. 12. and xi. 18. and every tranſgreſſion of the wicked will receive a juſt recompence of reward; to whom the reward of their hands will be given them, Heb. ii. 2. Iſa. iii. 11. but the ſenſe is, that after death there will be no enjoyment of a man's labours; he will not have the uſe, profit and advantage of them, but his heirs that ſucceed him, chap. iv. 9. and ii. 18, 19, 21, 22. For the memory of them is forgotten; not the memory of the righteous with God, for whom a book of remembrance is written, and whoſe names are written in heaven; theſe are had in everlaſting remembrance, and their memory bleſſed: but the memory of wicked men; who, though they take pains to perpetuate their names, which they give to their lands, yet the Lord cauſes their memory to ceaſe, and they are forgotten in the place where they lived; not only among the righteous, as the Targum, but among others, Iſa. xxvi. 14. Eccl. viii. 10. even among thoſe that enjoy the fruit of their labour; they will ſcarce think of them any more, or however, in a little time they will be quite forgotten by them.

℣. 6. Alſo their love and their hatred and their envy is now periſhed, &c.] Not that the ſeparate ſpirits of the dead are without their affections, or theſe unexerciſed; the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect will love God and Chriſt, and angels, and good men, and all that is good, more intenſely; love will continue after this life, and be in its heighth, and therefore ſaid to be the greateſt grace, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. they will hate ſin, Satan, and all the enemies of Chriſt, and be filled with zeal for his glory; ſo the word[z] for envy may be rendered; ſee Rev. vi. 9, 10. and the ſpirits of the wicked dead will ſtill continue to love ſin, and hate the Lord, and envy the happineſs of the ſaints; and will riſe again with the ſame ſpite and malice againſt them; ſee Ezek. xxxii. 27. Rev. xx. 8, 9. but this reſpects perſons and things in this world; they no more love perſons and things here, nor are loved by any; death parts the beſt friends, and the moſt endearing and loving relations, and puts an end to all their mutual friendſhip and affection; they hate their enemies no more, nor are hated by them; they no more envy the proſperity of others, nor are envied by others; all ſuch kind of love and hatred, enmity and envy, active or paſſive, ceaſe at death; out of the world, as the Targum adds. Neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is under the ſun; the worldly man's portion is only in this life, and when he dies, he carries nothing of it with him; whoſe ever his poſſeſſions will be at death, they are no more his, nor will he ever return to enjoy them any more; his houſes, his lands, his eſtates, his gold and ſilver, and whatever of worth and value he had, he has no more lot and part in them: but the good man has a portion above the ſun; God is his portion, heaven is his inheritance for ever and ever. The Targum underſtands it of the wicked; "and they have no good "part with the righteous in the world to come; "and they have no profit of all that is done in this "world under the ſun."

℣. 7. Go thy way, &c.] Thou righteous man, as Jarchi paraphraſes it; and indeed epicures and voluptuous perſons have no need of the following exhortation, and the reaſon annexed is not ſuitable to them; but the whole agrees better with religious perſons, who under diſtreſſing views of providence, and from gloomy and melancholy apprehenſions of things, and miſtaken notions of mortification, deny themſelves the free and lawful uſe of the good things of life; and ſeeing there is no enjoyment of them in the grave, and after death, therefore let the following advice be taken, than which of worldly things nothing is better for a man to do. Eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; which includes all things neceſſary and convenient, and which ſhould be uſed and enjoyed freely and chearfully; not barely for refreſhment, but recreation; not for neceſſity only, but for pleaſure; yet with moderation, not to exceſs; and with thankfulneſs to God; and the rather joy and mirth ſhould mix with theſe things, ſince to a good man they are in love. It may be obſerved that it is ſaid thy bread and thy wine, thine own and not another's; what is got by labour, and in an honeſt way, and not by rapine and oppreſſion, as Alſhech obſerves; what God in his providence gives, our daily food, what is convenient for us, or is our portion and allotment. The Targum interprets it figuratively of the joys of heaven; "Solomon ſaid, by a ſpirit of prophecy from the Lord, "the Lord of the world will ſay to all the righteous, in the face of every one; Eat thy bread with "joy, which is laid up for thee, for thy bread "which thou haſt given to the poor and needy that "were hungry; and drink thy wine with a good "heart, which is laid up for thee in paradiſe, for "the wine which thou haſt mingled for the poor "and needy that were thirſty;" ſee Matt. xxv. 34, 35. For God now accepteth thy works; both the perſons of righteous and good men are accepted of God in Chriſt, and their works done in faith and love, and with a view to his glory; and ſince they are acceptable in his ſight, as appears by his bleſſing on their labours, and beſtowing the good things of life upon them, ſo it is well-pleaſing in his ſight to make a free and chearful uſe of them.

℣. 8. Let thy garments be always white, &c.] That is, neat and clean, not vile and ſordid; what is comely and decent, and ſuitable to a man's circumſtances; this colour is particularly mentioned becauſe much uſed in the eaſtern countries, and in Judea; hence we ſo often read of waſhing garments, and of fullers that whitened them; and eſpecially on feſtival days and days of rejoicing, to which Horace[a] refers; and here it ſignifies that every day ſhould be like a feſtival or day of rejoicing to a good man, to whom God has given the garment of praiſe for the ſpirit of heavineſs, Iſa. lxi. 3. and though there may be times for mourning, and ſo of putting on other apparel, yet in common and ordinarily this ſhould be the habit, decent and comely apparel. The ancient Jews in Aben Ezra, and ſo Jarchi, interpret it of an unblemiſhed converſation; and Kimchi[b] of repentance and good works; and ſo the Targum, "let thy garments be "white (or waſhed) from all filth of ſin;" or be without any ſpot of ſin, as Alſhech; the converſation-garments of the ſaints are made white in the blood of Chriſt, and his righteouſneſs is fine linen, and white; and even eternal glory and happineſs is ſignified by walking with him in white, Rev. vii. 14. and xix. 8. and iii. 4, 18. And let thy head lack no ointment; which uſed to be poured plentifully on the heads of gueſts at feaſts[c] for the refreſhment of them, which gave pleaſure, and a ſweet odour and fragrancy, and was much in uſe in thoſe hot countries; ſee Pſal. xxiii. 5. Luke vii. 46. and is oppoſed to a gloomy and melancholy carriage and deportment, Matt. vi. 17. hence we read of the oil of joy and gladneſs, Pſal. xlv. 7. Iſa. lxiii. 1. The Jews before mentioned interpreted this of a good name better than ointment, chap. vii. 1. So the Targum; "and a good name, which is like to "anointing oil, get; that bleſſings may come upon "thy head, and thy goodneſs fail not."

℣. 9. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou loveſt, &c.] Or ſee, or enjoy life[d]; this is one of the ways of enjoying life comfortably, and one of the principal ones; that if a man has a wife whom he ought to love as himſelf, as his own fleſh, to take delight in her company, be pleaſant with her, and rejoice in her, Prov. v. 18, 19. and this here may be put for all that pleaſure and ſatisfaction which may be lawfully had in the enjoyment of all other relations and friends; which adds no ſmall part to the comfort of a man's life. All the days of the life of thy vanity; a wife is for life, and not after a while to be divorced; and to be lived joyfully with, not for a ſhort time only, but all the days of life. Which he hath given thee under the ſun; that is, either which wife God has given thee; for a wife is the gift of God, Gen. iii. 12. and which is a gift under the ſun; for above it, or in heaven, and in a future ſtate, there is no marrying nor giving in marriage, Luke xx. 35. or which days he hath given thee, ſo the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions. It is added, all the days of thy vanity; which is repeated that it might be obſerved that the life of man is but a vain life, a vapour that ſoon vaniſhes away, and man in it at his beſt eſtate is vanity; and that notwithſtanding all the enjoyments of life in the moſt comfortable manner here directed to, yet ſtill the doctrine he ſet out with muſt be remembered, that all is vanity, chap. i. 2. For that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takeſt under the ſun; this is all the outward happineſs of a man in this life, and all the uſe, profit, and advantage of his labours to eat and drink chearfully, to clothe decently, to debar himſelf of nothing of lawful pleaſure, particularly to live joyfully with his wife, and enjoy his friends; this is the utmoſt of outward felicity he can partake of, and this he ſhould not deny himſelf. Ben Melech reſtrains this portion to a wife, and joyful living with her; but it is beſt to include all that goes before.

℣. 10. Whatſoever thy hand findeth to do, &c.] Not any thing that is evil, which is near at hand, and eaſy to be found, and is in the power of mens hands to do, Rom. vii. 21. Mic. ii. 1. for this is forbidden of God, abominable to him, and hurtful to men; but whatſoever is good; ſo the Targum, "to do good and alms to the poor;" even all good works in general, which God requires of men, and it is their duty to do; though they are not meritorious of any thing at his hands, nor is there juſtification or ſalvation by them; yet ſhould be done in obedience to the will of God, in gratitude to him for mercies received, and for his glory; as alſo for the profit of men, and for our own good; for the evidence of grace, and to preſerve our characters from the inſults and reproaches of men. Whatever is found written in the book of God ſhould be done; not what is of a ceremonial kind, and now aboliſhed, but every thing of a moral nature, and of poſitive inſtitution, under goſpel-times; as all goſpel-ordinances, and whatever falls within a man's calling: for every man has a work to do; in every ſtation, as magiſtrates and ſubjects; in every relation, as huſband and wife, parents and children, maſters and ſervants; in every buſineſs of life men are called to; which they ſhould attend, for the good of themſelves and families, the relief of the poor, and the ſupport of the intereſt of religion: and in religious things, every one has his work to do; the miniſter, in preaching and adminiſtering ordinances; the deacon, in taking care of the poor; private Chriſtians, in praying in their cloſets and families, in hearing the word, making a profeſſion of religion, and attending on ordinances; and, as opportunity ſerves, ſhould do good to all men, eſpecially to the ſaints, Gal. vi. 10. and whatſoever is in the power of their hands, as this phraſe ſignifies, Lev. xii. 8. 1 Sam. xxv. 8. Aben Ezra refers it to the delights and pleaſures of life, ſuch as before mentioned; which may be allowed, when uſed in a lawful and moderate manner. Do it with thy might; or ſtrength; for though men have no might or ſtrength of their own to do good, which is loſt by ſin; yea, even good men, of themſelves, and without Chriſt, his Spirit and grace, can do nothing ſpiritually good; yet there is ſtrength in him, and to be had from him; and who ſhould be applied to for it, and who gives it, Iſa. xl. 29—31. and xlv. 24. Phil. iv. 13. the phraſe denotes intenſeneſs of ſpirit, vigour of mind, activity and fervency; doing that which is good, chearfully and diligently, and not in a negligent, careleſs manner; ſee Deut. vi. 5. Jer. xlviii. 10. For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wiſdom, in the grave, whither thou goeſt; this, and not then, is our working time; good men at death ceaſe from their labours in the grave, as the night in which no man can work, Rev. xiv. 13. John ix. 4. then the liberal man can no more deviſe liberal ways and means of doing good; his purpoſes of doing good are broken of; and no more plans can be laid, or deſigns formed, for the glory of God and the good of fellow-creatures: and no more knowledge of objects to do good unto; nor any improvement in any kind of knowledge, natural or ſpiritual: nor wiſdom and prudence in the management of affairs, to anſwer ſome good ends and purpoſes; nor opportunity of attaining that wiſdom by the ſcriptures, and by the miniſtry of the word, which make men wiſe unto ſalvation: and now, ſince every man is going to the grave, his long home, the place appointed for all living, and this is the way of all fleſh; and every ſtep he has taken, and does take, is a ſtep to the grave; therefore it is incumbent on him to do all the good he can in life.

ꝟ. 11. I returned, and ſaw under the ſun, &c.] The wiſe man returned to his former ſubject, concerning the ſame events happening to all ſorts of perſons, righteous and wicked, wiſe and unwiſe, ꝟ. 1, 2. and enlarged upon it in his mind; and took notice of various things done under the ſun, and made the following remarks: and whereas he had exhorted men to uſe all their might in doing the duties of their calling while they lived here; he ſuggeſts, that they ſhould not depend upon, and promiſe themſelves any thing from their own ſtrength and wiſdom; but have a regard to the providence of God, that ſuperintends all affairs, and gives or withholds ſucceſs as he pleaſes; ſince it may be obſerved, That the race is not to the ſwift; ſwiftneſs oftentimes is of no ſervice to a man to eſcape dangers, as may be ſeen in the caſe of Aſahel and others, 2 Sam. ii. 18, 23. Amos ii. 14, 15. ſo the Targum; "men who are ſwift as eagles, "are not helped by running, to eſcape from death "in battle." Or the ſenſe may be, that the ſwift are not always made uſe of in running a race; or if they are, they do not always win the prize, ſomething or other happens to hinder them; they fall, or become lame, when one more ſlow gets the advantage of them, 1 Cor. ix. 24. and ſo in ſpiritual things, one that is ready to halt, as David ſays of himſelf, gets to heaven, and is ſaved, Pſal. xxxviii. 17. Zeph. iii. 19. when others at firſt ſtarting, or ſetting out in a profeſſion, run well for a while, as the Galatians did, chap. v. 7. but afterwards drop and fall ſhort; for it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that ſheweth mercy, Rom. ix. 16. Nor the battle to the ſtrong; as not to the Midianites, nor to Goliath, nor to Abner, in whom Jarchi inſtances; victory is not always on the ſide of the mighty and the many, but oftentimes on the ſide of the weak and few; ſee 2 Chron. xiv. 9—15. Pſal. xxxiii. 16, 17. ſo in ſpirituals, ſuch who go forth in their own ſtrength againſt an enemy, truſting in it, fall; whilſt weak believers, depending on the grace and ſtrength of Chriſt, wreſtle with principalities and powers, and come off victorious. Neither yet bread to the wiſe; the Targum adds, in a time of famine; when their wiſdom cannot help them: but the ſenſe rather is, that ſkilful artificers, in any trade or buſineſs, do not always get the beſt livelihood, yea, ſometimes want the neceſſaries of life, or eat the bread of ſorrow, when perſons of meaner capacities ſhall thrive and flouriſh; and even the wiſeſt of men ſometimes have been obliged to others for bread, as was the caſe of David, 1 Sam. xxi. 3. and xxv. 8. and even of a wiſer than he, our Lord himſelf, Luke viii. 2. and as for the wiſe men of this world, the bread of life, Chriſt Jeſus, is neither enjoyed nor ſought after by them. Nor yet riches to men of underſtanding; mention is afterwards made of a wiſe man that was poor, Jarchi inſtances in Job; and, on the other hand, ſometimes fools are rich, as Nabal and others; and as for the riches of grace, and treaſures of ſpiritual knowledge, they are not uſually given to the wiſe and prudent, Matt. xi. 25. Nor yet favour to men of ſkill; to men of knowledge and learning, whoſe genius and abilities might be thought ſufficient to recommend them to the favour, affection and applauſe of men, and yet oftentimes fail herein; ſuch who have the art of addreſs and perſuaſion, are not always able to ingratiate themſelves, and gain the eſteem of men: Jarchi interprets it of the favour of God, and inſtances in Moſes; than whom there was not a more knowing and underſtanding man in Iſrael, yet could not by his prayer find grace and favour to enter into the land: but the Targum is better; "neither they that know underſtanding, are helped "by their knowledge to find favour in the eyes of "a king." But time and chance happeneth to them all; to the ſwift and ſtrong, the wiſe, underſtanding, and ſkilful; or to the ſwift and ſlow, to the ſtrong and weak, to the wiſe and unwiſe; every thing befals them, juſt as it is ordered by divine providence; for there is a certain time fixed by the Lord for every event; and whatever ſeems caſual and contingent to man, and which he is ready to call chance, is nothing but decree with God, firm and unalterable; Plato[e] has the ſame expreſſion. The word ſignifies occurrence[f], or event, which is under the wiſe direction and order of the providence of God, with reſpect to whom nothing comes by chance; and it is rendered occurrent, 1 Kings v. 4. and ſo it is here by the Septuagint verſion, occurrence or event; and in the Targum, event by their ſtar, which is fate: and Aben Ezra interprets it, המערכת עליונה the ſuperior ordination; it is ſomething we meet, or meets us, by divine appointment. Aben Ezra and Kimchi, who are followed by others, think, that from ꝟ. 4. to this, Solomon is ſpeaking in the perſon of epicures and atheiſts; which is not likely, ſince it is not in character for ſuch perſons to talk of God's acceptance of mens works; of living joyfully with a wife; of this life being a life of vanity; and of death and the grave; and of diligence in working whilſt the preſent life laſts.

ꝟ. 12. For man alſo knoweth not his time, &c.] Though it is fixed and ſettled by the Lord, yet times and ſeaſons are kept in his own power, and not known by men; not the time of his death, nor of any calamity and diſtreſs coming upon him, nor the proper ſeaſon and opportunity of doing himſelf good, and avoiding evil. As the fiſhes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the ſnare; as fiſhes are ſuddenly taken in a net, unhappy for them, which is at once caſt over them, while they are ſporting and playing in the water, and catching at the bait; and as birds, being decoyed, are unawares taken in a ſnare; that is, both of them know not the time of their being caught. So are the ſons of men ſnared in an evil time, when it falleth ſuddenly upon them; they are no more able to guard againſt a time of adverſity and calamity, and the evil of it, which comes at once upon them, than the poor fiſhes or ſilly birds are to avoid the net and ſnare; and are like them at ſuch a time, in the utmoſt ſecurity, indulging themſelves in eaſe and pleaſure: ſo the day of death, and of judgment, will come like a thief in the night; or like a ſnare upon men, when they think nothing of it, but are giving up themſelves to their luſts and pleaſures; ſee 1 Theſſ. v. 2, 3. Luke xxi. 34, 35. and xvii. 26, 30. for pleaſure, as Plato ſays, is the bait of evils, with which men are catched, as fiſhes with the hook [g].

℣. 13. This wiſdom have I ſeen alſo under the ſun, &c.] Or, this alſo I have ſeen under the ſun, even wiſdom [h]: beſides thoſe things he had juſt now obſerved, he took notice that there was ſuch a thing as wiſdom among men; though ſucceſs did not always attend the wiſe, the underſtanding and ſkilful; and though there was ſo much ignorance in men, of their own time, and were ſo eaſily and ſuddenly enſnared in an evil time. And it ſeemed great unto me; Solomon had a high value for wiſdom, and he ſtill retained the ſame ſentiments of it he had before, in chap. ii. 13. and vii. 11,12,19. of which he gives the following inſtance.

℣. 14. There was a little city, and few men within it, &c.] Which ſome take to be a piece of hiſtory, a real matter of fact; that as the city of Abel, when beſieged by Joab, was delivered by the counſel of a wiſe woman, 2 Sam. xx. 15—22. ſo there was a city which Solomon had knowledge of, which was delivered from the ſiege of a powerful king, by the wiſe counſel of a poor wiſe man: though others think it is only a fiction, fable or parable; the moral of which is, that political wiſdom, even in a poor, mean perſon, is ſometimes very uſeful and ſerviceable, though it does not meet with its proper merit. Many of the Jewiſh writers underſtand the whole allegorically and figuratively; ſo the Targum, by the little city, underſtands the body of man; by few men in it, the little righteouſneſs there is in the heart of man; though, according to the Midraſh, Jarchi and Alſhech, they are the members of the body; by the great king, the evil imagination, or corruption of nature, which is great to oppreſs, and beſieges the heart to cauſe it to err; and by the poor wiſe man, the good imagination or affection, which prevails over the other, and ſubdues it, and delivers the body from hell, and yet not remembered; and ſo the Midraſh, and the ancient Jews in Aben Ezra, though he himſelf underſtands it according to its literal ſenſe. Some Chriſtian interpreters explain it to better purpoſe, concerning the church attacked by Satan, and delivered by Chriſt, who, notwithſtanding, is unkindly and ungratefully uſed: the church is often compared to a city, it is the city of God, and of which ſaints are fellow-citizens; it is but a little one in compariſon of the world, and, in ſome periods and ages of the world, leſſer than in others; it is little and contemptible in the eyes of the world, and the inhabitants of it are mean and low in their own eyes; they are a little flock, Luke xii. 32. and few in number that are within it: ſome are only of it, but not in it, or are external members only, which ſometimes are many; or outward, not inward court-worſhippers; they are few, comparatively, that belong to the inviſible church, that are choſen, redeemed, called and ſaved, Matt. xx. 16. and vii. 13,14. Rev. iii. 4. Luke xiii. 23. there are but few able men, eſpecially ſuch as are capable of defending the church againſt its enemies. And there came a great king againſt it; Satan, the prince of devils and of the poſſe of them in the air, the god and prince of the world of the ungodly, who works in their hearts, and leads them captive at his will; who may be ſaid to be great with reſpect to the numbers under him, legions of devils, and the whole world that lies in wickedneſs, or in or under the wicked one; and on account of the power he exerciſes, by divine permiſſion, over the bodies and minds of men; and in compariſon of the little city, and few men in it, being ſtronger than they, Matt. xii. 24. John xii. 31. Jer. xxxi 11. he comes from the region of the air, where his poſſe are; or from going to and fro in the earth; or from hell, into which he is caſt down: he comes, by divine permiſſion; in the manner evil ſpirits do, by temptation; in an hoſtile way, againſt the church and people of God, to deſtroy and devour them, if poſſible. And beſieged it; ſurrounded it on all ſides, as the Gog and Magog-army under him will encompaſs the camp of the ſaints, and the beloved city, Rev. xx. 9. And built great bulwarks againſt it; ſuch as are called ſtrong-holds, 2 Cor. x. 4. Satan's firſt attack was upon the elect of God, in Adam; when he brought them, through ſin, under a ſentence of condemnation and death, though then they were preſerved in Chriſt; and ever ſince he has been attacking the church by perſecution, in order to take it by ſtorm; and by ſpreading errors and hereſies, ſuch as tend to raze the foundation, and to pull down the ſuperſtructure of grace; and by promoting ſchiſms, and laying ſuch large principles of church-communion, as tend to take away ordinances and diſcipline, the fence of the city; and by throwing in hand-granados of ſtrife and contention, to raiſe an inteſtine war among the citizens themſelves; and, by various temptations to ſin, to gain deſerters: theſe are ſome of his bulwarks, batteries and engines.

℣. 15. Now there was found in it a poor wiſe man, &c.] Chriſt, who is man, though not a mere man, but God as well as man; who was ſo in purpoſe, covenant and promiſe, before his incarnation, ſince truly and really ſo; and poor, as it was foretold he ſhould be, and who became ſo for the ſake of his church and people, Zech. ix. 9. 2 Cor. viii. 9. yet wiſe, even as man, being filled with wiſdom, in which he increaſed, and gave ſuch evident proofs of; on whom the Spirit of wiſdom reſted, and in whom the treaſures of it were hid, Luke ii. 40, 46, 47, 52. Iſa. xi. 2. Col. ii. 3. he was found here by God his Father, who exalted one choſen out of the people, and made him Head over the church, who is the firſt-born among many brethren, Pſal. lxxxix. 19, 20. Or and, or but, he found in it [i]; that is, Satan, the great King, found him here, contrary to his expectation, and to his great regret. And he by his wiſdom delivered the city; the church, from all enemies; from Satan, and all his principalities and powers; from the world, the men and things of it; from ſin, and all its ſad conſequences; from the law, its curſe and condemnation; and from the ſecond death, ruin and deſtruction: and tho' this deliverance was both by power and by price, yet alſo by wiſdom; for the deliverance and redemption of the church by Chriſt, is the fruit of infinite wiſdom; it is a wiſe ſcheme to glorify all the divine perfections; to mortify Satan, and ſave ſinners, and yet condemn ſin; ſee Eph. i. 7, 8. Yet no man remembered that ſame poor man; before the deliverance wrought, as Aben Ezra and others; it never once entered into their thoughts, that he could ever be their deliverer; they never imagined he had a capacity to adviſe, direct or aſſiſt, in ſuch ſervice, or bring about ſuch an affair: ſo Chriſt, when he appeared in the world, the Jews ſaw nothing that was promiſing in him; they could not believe that he was ſent to be the Saviour and deliverer of them, and therefore rejected him, Iſa. liii. 2, 3. John i. 10, 11. Or, after it, ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, no man hereafter remembered, &c. took no notice of him after he had wrought this deliverance; beſtowed no honour upon him, nor returned him thanks for what he had done; but he continued to live and die in obſcurity and meanneſs: thus Chriſt, though he ought to be remembered and ſpoken well of, and the glory of ſalvation ſhould be aſcribed unto him, and thanks ſhould be given him for it; yet there are none comparatively, or but a few, who, like the Samaritan, glorify him on account of it. But if any chooſe to underſtand theſe words of political wiſdom, and the uſe of it, by which ſometimes a mean and obſcure perſon does more good than others can by their power and ſtrength, though he meets with no reward for it; I am not averſe to it; and which agrees with what follows.

ỳ. 16. Then ſaid I, Wiſdom is better than ſtrength, &c.] Wiſdom of mind, even in a poor man, is better than ſtrength of body, even of the moſt potent prince and powerful army, as may be concluded from the above inſtance; ſince the poor wiſe man could do more by his wiſdom, than the great king with his mighty army; who was obliged to break up the ſiege, in conſequence of the counſel given, or the methods directed to, or taken, by the poor man. Nevertheleſs, the poor man's wiſdom is deſpiſed, and his words are not heard; notwithſtanding ſuch a flagrant inſtance and example as this juſt mentioned; yet men ſtill retain their prejudices againſt a poor man, and deſpiſe his wiſe counſels and advice, for no other reaſon but becauſe he is poor, and will not attend to what he ſays: or, though the poor man's wiſdom, &c.[k] as Aben Ezra; Solomon drew the above concluſion from that inſtance; though this is uſually the caſe, that men deſpiſe the wiſdom of a poor man, and will not liſten to his advice, this did not leſſen the wiſe man's opinion of it. The words may be rendered, even the poor man's wiſdom deſpiſed, and his words not heard[l]; theſe are better than outward force and ſtrength, and more ſerviceable and uſeful; which the Septuagint verſion favours: the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, how is the poor man's wiſdom deſpiſed! &c. as wondering at it, that ſo it ſhould be, when ſo much profit and advantage aroſe to the city from it.

ỳ. 17. The words of wiſe men are heard in quiet, &c.] That is, by ſome perſons and at ſome times, though not by all perſons and always; or they are to be heard, or ſhould be heard, though they ſeldom be, even the words of wiſe men that are poor: theſe are to be heard quietly and patiently, without any tumult and contradiction; or ſhould be heard, being delivered with a low and ſubmiſſive voice, without any noiſe, or bluſtering pride or paſſion, ſedately and with great humility, ſubmitting them to the judgment of others; which ſenſe the compariſon ſeems to require. More than the cry of him that ruleth among fools; more than the noiſy words of a fooliſh governor; or than the dictates of an imperious man, delivered in a clamorous and bluſtering way; by which he obtains authority among ſuch fools as himſelf, who are influenced more by the pomp and noiſe of words, than by the force of true wiſdom and reaſon; but all right judges will give the preference to the former. The Targum interprets it, of the ſilent prayer of the wiſe being received by the Lord, more than the clamour of the wicked.

ỳ. 18. Wiſdom is better than weapons of war, &c.] And does what they cannot do; of which the wiſdom of the poor wiſe man is a full proof, which delivered the city from a potent prince, when weapons of war could not; ſee chap. vii. 19. But one ſinner deſtroyeth much good; his own ſoul by his ſins, and the ſouls of others by his counſels, example and converſation, which corrupt good manners; ſo does one ſinner in a family, neighbourhood and town; as one poor wiſe man does much good, one ſinner mars much; one Achan in a camp or army, one bad counſellor in a cabinet, one falſe teacher in the church, will do a great deal of miſchief, as well as one debauchee in a town or city. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, who ſins in one; offends or ſins in one, as in James ii. 10. ſo the Syriac verſion, one ſin deſtroys much good, or many good things; and to the ſame purpoſe the Arabic verſion, he that committeth one ſin.

CHAP. X.

THIS chapter treats of the difference between wiſdom and folly; and of the preferableneſs of the one to the other, eſpecially in civil government: folly is compared to a dead or deadly fly; a little of which as much hurts a wiſe man's reputation, as that does the moſt precious ointment, ỳ. 1. A wiſe man and a fool differ in the ſituation of their heart; which is in the one on the right hand, in the other on the left, ỳ. 2. the folly of the latter lies not only in his heart, but betrays itſelf throughout the whole of his converſation, ỳ. 3. And it is one part of wiſdom in a ſubject, to bear patiently the anger of his prince, and not in a paſſion and at once leave his ſervice, ỳ. 4. And, among the follies of princes, this is a great one; to beſtow their honours and favours on improper perſons, to the neglect of ſuch as are deſerving, ỳ. 5—7. And ſeveral proverbial expreſſions are uſed, as cautions to a wiſe man, againſt plotting miſchief to others; breaking in upon the conſtitution and laws of a commonwealth; weakening the ſtrength of the ſtate by any methods, and making diſcord in it, and carrying things by mere ſtrength and force; when, if wiſdom was uſed, it would direct to proper ways and means, by which things would be managed to the beſt advantage, ỳ. 8—10. Then the babbling of fools againſt a government is expoſed, which is like the ſecret bite of a ſerpent, ỳ. 11. and the difference between the words of wiſe men, which expreſs grace and kindneſs, and are amiable and acceptable to men; and thoſe of fools, which deſtroy themſelves, begin in folly, and end in miſchief; are noiſy, and without meaning; do not direct to things moſt plain and eaſy, but weariſome and fatiguing to themſelves and others, ỳ. 12—15. Next the unhappineſs of a land a land is obſerved, when the governors of it are childiſh, intemperate, ſlothful and prodigal; the happineſs of a country when it is the reverſe, ℣. 16—19. and the chapter is concluded with advice, not to curſe a king or any great perſonage; no, not in the moſt private and ſecret manner; ſince, by one means or another, it will be diſcovered, ℣. 20.

[l] Et pauperis ſapientiam contemptam, &c. Tigurine verſion.

℣. 1. Dead flies cauſe the ointment of the apothecary to ſend forth a ſtinking ſavour, &c.] Such as Jarchi obſerves, are in the winter-ſeaſon, which are weak and near to death, and get into precious ointment, prepared after the beſt manner, where they die, and corrupt and ſpoil it: or, flies of death[m]; deadly ones, which have ſomething in their nature poiſonous and pernicious; which, when they light upon the moſt ſweet and ſavoury ointment, give it an ill ſmell. So doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wiſdom and honour; a good name is like precious ointment, valuable and fragrant; ſin, which is folly, is like a dead fly; not only light and mean, and baſe and worthleſs, but hurtful and pernicious, deadly, and the cauſe of death; and what may ſeem little, a peccadillo, or however, one ſingle act of ſin, may injure the character of a wiſe and honourable man, and greatly expoſe him to ſhame and contempt, and cauſe him to ſtink in the noſtrils of men, Gen. xxxvi. 20. and to be reproached by men, and religion and government to be reproached for his ſake. Thus the affair of Bathſheba and Uriah, what a ſlur did it bring on the character of David, ſo famous for wiſdom and honour, for religion and piety? and the idolatry of Solomon, the wiſeſt of men; Jehoſhaphat, that good king, entering into affinity with Ahab; and pious Joſiah, going to war with the king of Egypt, contrary to the word of the Lord; with many other inſtances. This teaches how careful, men, eminent for gifts and grace, ſhould be of their words and actions; ſince the leaſt thing amiſs in them is eaſily diſcerned, and ſoon taken notice of, as the leaſt ſpeck in a diamond, or ſpot in fine linen, clean and white; and there are wicked and envious perſons enough watching for their halting, glad to have an occaſion againſt them, and improve every thing to the uttermoſt: this is a caution to wiſe magiſtrates, honourable miniſters of the word, and eminent profeſſors more eſpecially. The Targum is, "evil concupiſcence, which dwells "at the gates of the heart, is as a fly, and is the "cauſe of death in the world; and corrupts a good "name, which was before like to anointing oil, "perfumed with ſpices:" and to the ſame purpoſe the Midraſh. One of the names of Satan is Beelzebub, the lord of a fly; who, by his temptations, ſolicits to ſin and folly, which produce the effect here mentioned, and therefore to be ſhunned as a deadly fly in the ointment, Matt. xii. 24. Guſſetius[n] renders it, "that which is precious and "worthy of honour, proceeds from wiſdom; and "folly comes from glory, worldly glory, in a little "time."

℣. 2. A wiſe man's heart is at his right hand, &c.] This is not deſigned to expreſs the direct poſition and ſituation of the heart of man, wiſe or fooliſh, which is the ſame in both; and which, according to anatomiſts, is in the middle of the body, inclining to the left ſide; but the underſtanding and wiſdom of men, as Aben Ezra obſerves; which, with a wiſe man, is ready at hand to direct and aſſiſt him in any affair; and which, under the influence of it, he goes about with great readineſs and dexterity, and performs it with great eaſe and facility, without ſiniſter ends and ſelfiſh views; it inclines him to purſue the true way to honour, heaven and happineſs, which lies to the right; to ſeek things that are above, at the right hand of God; and, in all, his honour and glory. But a fool's heart is at his left; he is at a loſs for wiſdom and underſtanding to direct him, when he has an affair of any moment upon his hand; which he goes about in an aukward manner, as left-handed perſons do, and has ſiniſter ends in what he does; and he is to every good work reprobate and unfit, and ſeeks earth and earthly things, which lie to the left, and in all, himſelf. The Targum is, "the heart of "a wiſe man is to get the law, which was given by "the right hand of the Lord; and the heart of a "fool to get the goods of gold and ſilver:" ſo Jarchi, "his wiſdom is ready to incline him (the "wiſe man) to the right-hand-way for his good; "but the heart of a fool to pervert him from it." The ancients[o] uſed to call things wiſe and prudent the right hand, and things fooliſh the left hand.

℣. 3. Yea, alſo when he that is a fool walketh by the way, &c.] The king's high-way, the common road; as he paſſeth along the ſtreets, going to any place, or about any buſineſs: His wiſdom faileth him; or his heart[p]; he appears by his gait, his manner of walking, to want a heart, to be a fool; walking with a froward mouth, winking with his eyes, ſpeaking with his feet, and teaching with his fingers; all which ſhews the frowardneſs and folly of his heart, Prov. vi. 12—14. or he diſcovers it throughout his converſation, in all the actions of it, in whatſoever buſineſs he is concerned, and in all the affairs of life. The Targum is, "when he "walketh in a perplexed way;" then his wiſdom fails him; he does not know which way to take, whether to the right or left: this can never be underſtood of the high-way of holineſs, in which men, though fools, ſhall not err, Iſa. xxxv. 8. And he ſaith to every one that he is a fool; his folly is manifeſt to all; he betrays it, by his words and actions, to every man he has to do with; his ſins and tranſgreſſions, which are his folly, he hides not, they are evident to all; and, as the Targum expreſſes it, "all ſay he is a fool:" though indeed he himſelf ſays this of every other man, that he is a fool; for, according to the Vulgate Latin verſion, he being a fool himſelf, thinks every body elſe is ſo.

℣. 4. If the ſpirit of the ruler riſe up againſt thee, &c.] The wrath of the civil magiſtrate, the chief ruler of the land, the ſovereign prince or king, to whom men are and ſhould be ſubject: if his wrath on any occaſion breaks out in a furious manner, and, like a ſtorm and tempeſt, is very bluſtering and threatening, Leave not thy place; at court; thine office under the prince, do not throw it up in a paſſion, and quit his ſervice upon it; and much leſs forget thy duty and allegiance to him, and go into diſloyalty and rebellion; ſee chap. viii. 3. For yielding pacifieth great offences; bearing his anger patiently, ſubmitting to his diſpleaſure quietly, making no returns, or at leaſt giving ſoft anſwers, and behaving in a modeſt and humble manner; in time his wrath will ſubſide, and he will be pacified, and forgive the offences committed; or be convinced that there were none, or however not ſo great, as to require ſuch reſentment; ſee Prov. xv. 1. and xxv. 15. The Targum is, "if a ſpirit of "evil concupiſcence rules over thee; thy good "place, in which thou wert uſed to ſtand, leave "not:" ſome underſtand this of a man's having a ſpirit of rule and government coming upon him, or of his being advanced to power and authority, that then he ſhould not forget the low eſtate in which he had been. Jarchi interprets it of the Spirit of the governor of the world, ſtrictly enquiring into the actions of men; and healing their ſins by chaſtiſements, which cauſe them to leave them.

℣. 5. There is an evil which I have ſeen under the ſun, &c.] Which Solomon had obſerved in the courſe of his life, practiſed in ſome kingdoms and by ſome princes on earth, under the ſun; for there is nothing of the like kind, as after mentioned, done in heaven, above the ſun. As an error which proceedeth from the ruler; from the ſupreme ruler of a nation, the king of it; and it is not only as an error, or like one, a ſeeming one; but it is a real error, beſtowing places of honour and profit on undeſerving perſons: which error proceeds from ignorance of the perſons; or from affection to them, and from friendſhip cultivated with them in the younger time of life, being educated with them; or through the miſrepreſentation and impoſition of thoſe about him, who have ends to ſerve by their promotion; or through his own luſts and paſſions, which theſe men indulge him in. It may be underſtood of God, the ſupreme ruler, who ſuffers ſuch things to be; and which may ſeem to ſome an error in providence, though it is not: but the other ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 6. Folly is ſet in great dignity, &c.] Or in great heights [q]; in high places of honour and truſt; even fooliſh and wicked men; men of poor extraction, of low life, and of mean abilities and capacities; and, which is worſe, men vile and vicious, as Doeg the Edomite, Haman the Amalekite, and others. And the rich ſit in low places; men, not only of fortune and eſtates, and above doing mean and little actions, and ſo more fit for ſuch high places; but men, rich in wiſdom and knowledge, of large capacities and of great endowments of mind, and ſo abundantly qualified for poſts in the adminiſtration of government; and, above all, men rich in grace, fearing God, and hating covetouſneſs, as rulers ought to be, Exod. xviii. 21. and yet theſe ſometimes are neglected, live in obſcurity, who might otherwiſe be very uſeful in public life. The Targum interprets this and the following verſe, of the Iſraelites in exile and poverty among the Gentiles for their ſins; ſo Jarchi.

℣. 7. I have ſeen ſervants upon horſes, &c.] Which being ſcarce in Judea, were only rode upon by princes and great perſonages, or ſuch as were in affluent circumſtances; and therefore it was an unuſual and diſagreeable ſight to ſee ſervants upon them, which was a token of their being advanced upon the ruin and deſtruction of their maſters; a reigning ſervant is not only uncomely, but one of the things by which the earth is diſquieted, and it cannot bear, Prov. xxx. 21, 22. the Parthians and Perſians diſtinguiſhed their nobles and the vulgar, freemen and ſervants by this; the ſervants went on foot, and the freemen rode on horſes [r]. And princes walking, as ſervants upon the earth; degraded from their honour; baniſhed from their thrones and palaces, or obliged to leave them, and reduced to the loweſt ſtate and condition: ſo David, when his ſon rebelled againſt him, and he was forced to flee from him, and walk on foot, 2 Sam. xv. 30. Alſhech thinks it may be a prophecy of the captivity of Iſrael, when they walked as ſervants on the earth, and the Gentiles rode on horſes.

℣. 8. He that diggeth a pit, ſhall fall into it, &c.] This, and the three following clauſes, are proverbial expreſſions, teaching men to be wiſe and cautious, leſt by their conduct they bring miſchief upon themſelves; as it often is, the one that digs a pit for another, falls into it himſelf, as the wiſe man's father before him had obſerved, Pſalm vii. 15, 16. and ix. 15, 16. as kings that lay ſnares for their people, and ſubjects that plot againſt their ſovereign; or courtiers that form ſchemes for the ruin of thoſe that are in their way; or any man that deviſes miſchief againſt another, frequently ſo it is, that the ſame befals them; as Haman, who prepared a gallows for Mordecai, was hanged on it himſelf. And whoſo breaketh an hedge, a ſerpent ſhall bite him; which often lies hid in fences, in old walls, and rotten hedges [s], Amos v. 19. Acts xxviii. 3. ſo he that breaks down the hedges and fences of kingdoms and commonwealths, and breaks through the fundamental laws of a civil conſtitution; and eſpecially that tranſgreſſes the laws of God, moral or civil, may expect to ſmart for it. Jarchi interprets this hedge of the ſayings of their wiſe men, which thoſe that tranſgreſs, ſhall ſuffer death by the hand of heaven: but it would be much better to apply it to the doctrines contained in the word of God, which are a hedge and fence to the church of God, and whoever tranſgreſs them will ſuffer for it; ſee 2 John 8, 9. The Targum, by the ſerpent, underſtands an ungodly king, who bites like a ſerpent, into whoſe hands ſuch tranſgreſſors ſhall be delivered: and ſome have thought of the old ſerpent the devil, as Alſhech, who deceived Adam and Eve.

℣. 9. Whoſo removeth ſtones, ſhall be hurt therewith, &c.] That carries them from the quarry, where they are dug; or takes them from an heap, where they lie; or that attempts to pull them out of a building, where they are put; or removes them from places, where they are ſet as boundaries and land-marks; all which is troubleſome, and by which men get hurt; the ſtones fall upon them, or are too heavy for them, or they do what they ſhould not do, and ſo bring themſelves into trouble: as do all ſuch perſons who are for removing the boundaries of commonwealths and communities, and for changing laws, and altering conſtitutions. And he that cleaveth wood, ſhall be endangered thereby; of cutting himſelf: ſo he that ſoweth diſcord among brethren, that makes diviſions in families, neighbourhoods, kingdoms and churches; ſee Prov. vi. 16, 19. Rom. xvi. 18. Jarchi renders it, ſhall be warmed or heated, according to the ſenſe of the word, as he thinks, in 1 Kings i. 2. though he underſtands it of being profited by ſtudying in the law and the commandments; of which he interprets the clauſe; and Ben Melech obſerves, that the word ſo ſignifies in the Arabic language; and Mr Broughton renders it, ſhall be heated thereby. The Targum paraphraſes it, "ſhall be burnt with fire, "by the hand of the angel of the Lord:" or however, he may be overheated and do himſelf hurt, as men, that kindle the flame of contention and ſtrife, often do.

℣. 11. Surely, the ſerpent will bite without enchantment, &c.] See Jer. viii. 17. Or rather, without a whiſper [t]; without hiſſing, or any noiſe, giving no warning at all: ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, in ſilence; ſome ſerpents bite, others ſting, ſome both; ſee Prov. xxiii. 32. ſome hiſs, others not, as here. And a babbler is no better; a whiſperer, a backbiter, a buſy, tattling body, that goes from houſe to houſe, and, in a private manner, ſpeaks evil of civil governments, of miniſters of the word, and of other perſons; and, in a ſecret way, defames men, and detracts from their characters: ſuch an one is like a venomous viper, a poiſonous ſerpent or adder; and there is no more guarding againſt him, than againſt ſuch a creature that bites ſecretly.

4 ℣. 12. The words of a wiſe man's mouth are gracious, &c.] Or grace [u]. He ſpeaks kind and good things in favour of the characters of men, and not as the babbling detractor: he ſpeaks well of civil magiſtrates and rulers in the ſtate; of the miniſters of the word in the church; and of all his fellow-creatures, as far as can with truth be ſaid: and a truly good and gracious man, who is Solomon's wiſe man, in oppoſition to a fool and wicked man; his diſcourſe will run upon the grace of God, upon the doctrines of grace, and upon the experience of the truth of grace on his heart: upon the grace of God the Father, in loving and chooſing men; in contriving their ſalvation; in making a covenant of grace with them in Chriſt; in ſending him to die for them, and in accepting his ſatisfaction and righteouſneſs for them: and on the grace of the Son, in becoming their ſurety; aſſuming their nature, dying in their room and ſtead, interceding for them, taking care of them, and ſupplying them with grace out of his fulneſs: and on the grace of the Spirit, in regeneration and ſanctification; working in them faith, hope and love; applying precious promiſes to them, and ſealing them up to the day of redemption: of theſe things they ſpeak often one to another, and cannot but talk of the things they have felt and ſeen: and ſuch words and diſcourſes are gracious, graceful, and grateful to truly pious ſouls, and miniſter grace unto them; and are alſo well pleaſing and acceptable to God and Chriſt, as well as gain them favour among men; ſee Prov. xxii. 11. Eph. iv. 29. But the lips of a fool will ſwallow up himſelf; his words are not only diſagreeable and diſpleaſing to others, but bring ruin upon himſelf; by talking too freely of rulers and others, he brings himſelf into trouble, and plunges himſelf into difficulties, out of which he cannot eaſily get; yea, is ſwallowed up in them, and deſtroyed. Or, his lips ſwallow up him [w]; the wiſe man, whoſe words are gracious; and, by his calumny and detraction, his deceit and lies, brings him into diſgrace and danger: or, ſwallows it up, or that [x]; the grace of the wiſe man, or his gracious words; and hinders the edification of others by them, and the good effects of them. Though the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt.

℣. 13. The beginning of the words of his mouth is fooliſhneſs, &c.] As ſoon as ever he opens his mouth, he betrays his folly; the firſt word he ſpeaks is a fooliſh one; or it is from the abundant folly in his heart that he ſpeaks, which is the ſource and ſpring of all his fooliſh talk. And the end of his talk is miſchievous madneſs; to himſelf and others; as he goes on, he appears more and more fooliſh, and yet more confident of his own wiſdom; and is reſolutely ſet on having his own way and will; grows warm, and is violently hot, to have his own words regarded; and, if contradicted, is like a mad man, ſcattering arrows, firebrands and death; his talk from firſt to laſt is a circle of folly; and, though it begins with ſomething weak, and may ſeem innocent, yet it ends and iſſues in wickedneſs and madneſs, in rage and wrath, in oaths and curſes.

℣. 14. A fool alſo is full of words, &c.] Or multiplies words [y]. Is very talkative, ſays the ſame thing over and over again; uſes an abundance of waſte words, that have no meaning in them; utters every thing that comes uppermoſt, without any order or judgment; affects to talk on every ſubject, whether he knows any thing of it or no; and will engroſs all the converſation to himſelf, though of all in company the moſt unfit for it. A man cannot tell what ſhall be; and what ſhall be after him, who can tell him? what the fool is talking of; what is the drift of his diſcourſe; or where it will end, and what he will bring it to, it is ſo noiſy, confuſed, and incoherent: or no man can tell future things, or what will come to paſs; nor can any man inform another of future events; and yet a fool boaſts and brags of what he ſhall do, and what he ſhall have, as if he was maſter of futurity, and knew for certain what would come to paſs, which the wiſeſt of men do not.

℣. 15. The labour of the fooliſh wearieth every one of them, &c.] The labour of fools, both in ſpeaking and doing, weary thoſe who have any concern with them, and themſelves likewiſe, ſince all their labour is vain and fruitleſs. Becauſe he knoweth not how to go to the city; to any city, the road to which is uſually broad, and plain and eaſy to be found, and yet cannot be found by the fooliſh man; ſhewing, that he that talks of abſtruſe things, things too high and wonderful for him, which he affects to know, muſt needs be a ſtranger to them, ſince things the moſt eaſy to be underſtood, he is ignorant of, and wearies himſelf to find; or he does not know how to behave himſelf in a city, among citizens, in a civil and polite manner. The Targum is, "he learns not to go to the city, where "wiſe men dwell, to learn inſtruction from it." Some interpret it of the city of Jeruſalem, where were the temple, ſanhedrim, ſynagogues, ſchools, &c. but it may be better applied to the heavenly city, the new Jeruſalem, which fools or wicked men know not the way unto, nor do they ſeek after it; ſee Pſal. cvii. 7. Matt. vii. 13, 14. ſo Alſheeh interprets it of heaven.

ẏ. 16. Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, &c.] Not ſo much in age, though it is ſometimes an unhappineſs to a nation to be governed by a minor, eſpecially if the young king has not good tutors, guardians, miniſters and counſellors, about him; but if otherwiſe, a nation may be very happy under a minority, or the government of a young prince; ſuch were Solomon, Joaſh, Uzziah, Joſiah, and our Edward the VIth: but it rather reſpects one that is a child in underſtanding and judgment, in manners and conduct; that minds his pleaſures, as children their play; is fickle and changeable, paſſionate and ſelf-willed, unſkilful in government, and yet will not be adviſed. The Targum applies this to the land of Iſrael, and inſtances in wicked Jeroboam, who made the morning-ſacrifice to ceaſe; ſee Iſa. iii. 12. From conſidering the bad effects of folly in men in general, in private perſons and in ſubjects, the wiſe man proceeds to obſerve the ill conſequences of it to a nation, in kings and princes, in civil magiſtrates: Jerom or Bede interprets this allegorically; Wo to the land, whoſe king is the devil, who is always deſirous of new things, 2 Cor. iv. 4. And thy princes eat in the morning; as ſoon as they are up, children-like; and not only eat, which may be convenient and lawful to do; but eat to exceſs, in a riotous and intemperate manner, and ſo unfit themſelves for any ſervice all the day: the morning is particularly obſerved, becauſe the fitteſt time for conſultation about the affairs of government; and was the uſual time of ſitting in judgment and trying cauſes, Jer. xxi. 12. and alſo for acts of religion and devotion. And ſo the Targum, "and thy princes eat bread "before they offer the daily morning-ſacrifice." Sad is the caſe of a nation, when not only their king is a minor, or a fooliſh one; but when his tutors and guardians, or his miniſters of ſtate and counſellors, give up themſelves to ſenſual pleaſures, and neglect public affairs; and, inſtead of being in the council-chamber, or in a court of judicature, or at their early devotions, are indulging themſelves in riotous eating and drinking.

ẏ. 17. Bleſſed art thou, O land, when thy king is the ſon of nobles, &c.] Or heroes [z], called Hhorim in the Hebrew, which ſignifies white; either from the white garment they wore, or rather, from the purity and ingenuity of their minds and manners; being illuſtrious perſons, not only by birth and education, but in their lives and actions. Now a land is happy when it is governed by a king, that is not only deſcended from a race of heroes and illuſtrious men, and has a princely and liberal education; but that imitates his anceſtors, and treads in their ſteps, and is famous himſelf for wiſdom, virtue, and real piety, in which true nobility conſiſts: and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, whoſe king is noble; who is of an ingenuous mind, has princely virtues and qualifications; who is wiſe and prudent, ſkilful in the affairs of government, and aſſiduous and induſtrious therein; for as, on the one hand, kings may, as they commonly do, deſcend from illuſtrious progenitors, and yet be baſe and wicked, ignoble and infamous in their adminiſtration; and, on the other hand, perſons may be raiſed from a low eſtate to royal dignity, as David and others, and yet behave with great prudence and ingenuity. The Targum applies this to the land of Iſrael alſo, and inſtances in Hezekiah, a man mighty in the law. And thy princes eat in due ſeaſon, for ſtrength, and not for drunkenneſs; that is, eat their meals at proper times, and that after they have been at buſineſs; to refreſh nature, and recruit their ſtrength, that they may be fit for further ſervice; and do not indulge themſelves, and ſpend their time in rioting and drunkenneſs; which would render them very unfit for public buſineſs, to ſit in council, or in any court of judicature: according to the Targum, the time was four o'clock, i. e. ten o'clock in the morning. Or, not unto drinking or drunkenneſs [a]; they do not eat ſo as to cauſe an appetite, or eager deſire for drinking to exceſs: or, not with drinking [b]; their eating is not attended with exceſſive drinking; they eat and drink moderately. The Egyptians had a law, which fixed ſuch a meaſure of wine to be allowed their kings daily, and no more [c]; and it was Solon's law, given to the Athenians, that if a prince was found drunk, death was his puniſhment [d]; and, with the Indians, if a woman killed a drunken king, her reward was to marry his ſucceſſor [e]: all which ſhew how odious drunkenneſs was with the heathens, and eſpecially in their kings and princes; ſee Prov. xxxi. 4, 5. So Plato obſerves [f], that "drunkenneſs ought to be abſtained from; and rather it ſhould be allowed to any, than to a keeper, (i. e. of a city and its laws, a civil magiſtrate) for it would be ridiculous for a keeper to need a keeper." Jerom, as before obſerved, interprets this figuratively, bleſſed is the land, of the church; whoſe king is Chriſt, the ſon of nobles, Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob; and whoſe princes are the apoſtles, who ſeek not pleaſure in this world, but ſhall eat in the world to come.

ẏ. 18. By much ſlothfulneſs the building decayeth, &c.] Or, by ſlothfulneſſes [g]. The word is in the dual number, and ſo may ſignify the ſlothfulneſs of the hands, as Aben Ezra, of both hands, and of both feet; or the various kinds of ſlothfulneſs, as the Arabic verſion, ſlothfulneſs both of body and mind; or of all ſorts of perſons, ſuperiors and inferiors, princes and ſubjects; and with reſpect to all things preſent and future: and, as through ſlothfulneſs, a material building decays; or a beam, as the word ſignifies, the raftering of an houſe, the roof, which conſiſts of rafters and beams joined together; when the tiling is decayed by winds and rains, or any breaches made in the rafters, and no care taken to repair, the whole falls in, and the houſe is in ruins: ſo figurative buildings, families, churches and kingdoms, come to nothing, through the ſluggiſhneſs of maſters of families, miniſters of the word, and civil magiſtrates; to the latter of which more eſpecially this is to be applied, who give up themſelves to luxury and ſloth. And, through idleneſs of the hands, the houſe droppeth through; or, through the letting or hanging down of the hands [h]; the remiſſneſs of them, as is to be obſerved in idle perſons, who will not lift them up to work; particularly to repair a breach in an houſe, by means of which the rain drops through it, and makes it uncomfortable and unſafe being in it; and, in proceſs of time, that itſelf drops to the ground: and this expreſſes the ſame thing, how through the neglect of the civil magiſtrate, a commonwealth comes to nothing; or however, the members of it become wretched and miſerable.

℣. 19. A feaſt is made for laughter, &c.] Or, who make bread for laughter [i]. Not bakers, who make bread for common uſe, and for all ſorts of perſons, ſorrowful ones as others; but luxurious men, particularly ſuch princes as are before deſcribed; they make bread, that is, a feaſt, as the phraſe is uſed, Dan. v. 1. not for mere refreſhment, but to promote mirth and gaiety to an exceſſive degree; being attended with rioting and drunkenneſs, chambering and wantonneſs, with revellings and dancing. And wine maketh merry; or, and they prepare wine [k]; which is provided in plenty at feaſts; and which is ſometimes put for a feaſt itſelf, and called a banquet of wine, Eſther vii. 2. which wine makes merry, and men drink of it till they become drunk with it, at ſuch profuſe feaſts: or, which maketh life chearful [l]; as it does, when moderately uſed: or, chears the living; ſo Aben Ezra. But money anſwereth all things; is in the room of all things, and by it men obtain every thing they want and wiſh for; it anſwers the requeſts of all, and ſupplies them with what they ſtand in need of, or can deſire: particularly ſuch expenſive feaſts, and ſumptuous entertainments, are made by means of money; and, in this luxurious way, the coffers of princes are drained, and they are obliged to raiſe new levies, and impoſe new taxes upon their ſubjects, to the oppreſſion of them. Or elſe the ſenſe may be, that princes ſhould conſider, and not be ſo profuſe in their manner of living, but be more frugal and careful of the public money, and lay it up againſt a time of need; ſince it is that that anſwers all things, is the ſinew of war when that ariſes, and will procure men and arms, to ſecure and protect them from their enemies, and obtain peace and ſafety for them and their ſubjects, which otherwiſe they cannot expect.

℣. 20. Curſe not the king, no, not in thy thought, &c.] Though he is a child, and unſkilful in government, gives himſelf to his paſſions and pleaſures, and neglects the affairs of the kingdom; yet be ſo far from rebelling againſt him, and doing him any injury, or ſpeaking ill of him, as not even to wiſh him any ill; or, within thine own breaſt, imprecate any evil upon him, but rather pray for him, wiſh him well, and do every thing to promote the welfare of his perſon and government, and this both for the Lord's ſake, and for conſcience-ſake; and therefore curſe him not in thy conſcience [m], as ſome render it. Jarchi interprets this of God, the King of the world; ſee Job ii. 9. and Jerom, of Chriſt; who ſhould not be blaſphemed, leſt the angels, that go about the earth, ſhould carry it to heaven. And curſe not the rich in thy bed-chamber; ſubordinate rulers and magiſtrates, the king's miniſters and counſellors, who are commonly rich; even thoſe luxurious princes, before deſcribed, who give up themſelves to eating and drinking, and ſpend the public money in profuſe feaſts and entertainments: yet a man ſhould be careful how he ſpeaks againſt them; and not only be cautious of what he ſays about them, in a vilifying way, in companies and clubs, where diſaffected perſons ſpeak their minds freely; but even in his own houſe, where his ſervants may hear him; nay, even in his bed-chamber, where only his wife and children are. For a bird of the air ſhall carry the voice, and that which hath wings ſhall tell the matter; an hyperbolical expreſſion; ſhewing, that by ſome ſtrange and unthought-of ways and means, treaſon, though ſo very ſecret, ſhould be brought to the knowledge of the king and his miniſters; as if a bird, ſitting at the window, or flying by at the ſame time, ſhould hear and carry it to them: ſometimes this is by means of ſpies and informers, that kings have in all places, to bring them news of the behaviour and ſentiments of men, of whom ſome underſtand the paſſage; or by means of ſuch, that bear an ill-will to them, or are faithful ſubjects to the king. With the Perſians were certain officers, called the king's ears, and the emperor's eyes; by means of whom the king was believed to be a god, ſince, by the ears and eyes of others, through thoſe ſpies, he knew all that was done every where [n]. Some interpret it of angels, good or bad: Jarchi, of the ſoul of man, which at laſt flies to heaven, which, he thinks, is the bird of the air; and of an angel that is aſſociated to him, his guardian-angel; meant, as he ſuppoſes, by that which hath wings, or the maſter of wings [o].

CHAP. XI.

THIS chapter begins with an exhortation to liberality to the poor, enforced by ſeveral reaſons and arguments, and the objections to it removed; and the whole illuſtrated by various ſimilies, ℣. 1—6. and then it is obſerved, that a life attended with outward proſperity and inward peace, and ſpent in doing good, is very delightful, and very deſirable it is to have it continued; yet it ſhould be remembered this will not be always, that many days of darkneſs in the grave will come; and after all the whole of a man's life is vanity, as is often inculcated, ℣. 7, 8. and the chapter is cloſed with an ironical addreſs to young men, deſigned to ſhew them the folly and danger of ſinful courſes, to reform them from them, and to put them in mind of a future judgment, ℣. 9, 10.

℣. 1. Caſt thy bread upon the waters, &c.] As the wiſe man had often ſuggeſted, that nothing was better for a man than to enjoy the good of his labour himſelf, he here adviſes to let others, the poor, have a ſhare with him; and as he had directed in the preceding chapter, how men ſhould behave towards their ſuperiors, he here inſtructs them what notice they ſhould take of their inferiors; and as he had cautioned againſt luxury and intemperance, he here guards againſt tenacity and covetouſneſs, and exhorts to beneficence and liberality: that which is to be given is bread, which is put for all the neceſſaries of life, food and raiment; or money that anſwers all things, what may be a ſupply of wants, a ſupport of perſons in diſtreſs; what is uſeful, profitable, and beneficial; not ſtones or ſcorpions, or what will be uſeleſs or hurtful: and it muſt be thy bread, a man's own; not independent of God who gives it him; but not another's, what he owes another, or has fraudulently obtained; but what he has got by his own labour, or he is through divine providence in lawful poſſeſſion of; hence alms in the Hebrew language is called righteouſneſs: and it muſt be ſuch bread as is convenient and fit for a man himſelf, ſuch as he himſelf and his family eat of: and this he muſt caſt, it muſt be a man's own act, and a voluntary one; his bread muſt not be taken and forced from him; it muſt be given freely, and in ſuch a manner as not to be expected again; and bountifully and plentifully, as a man caſts ſeed into the earth: but here it is ſaid to be upon the waters; bread is to be given to ſuch as are in diſtreſs and affliction, that have waters of a full cup wrung out unto them, whoſe faces are watered with tears, and foul with weeping, from whom nothing is to be expected again, who can make no returns; ſo that what is given them ſeems to be caſt away and loſt, like what is thrown into a river, or into the midſt of the ſea; and even it is to be given to ſuch who prove ungrateful and unthankful, and on whom no mark or impreſſion of the kindneſs is made and left, no more than upon water; yea it is to be given to ſtrangers never ſeen before nor after, like gliding water; ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, paſſing waters: or elſe to ſuch who may be compared to well watered ground, or moiſt ground, as Mr Broughton renders it; where the ſeed caſt will grow up again and bring forth fruit, and redound to the advantage of the ſower, as what is given to the poor does; they are a good ſoil to ſow upon, eſpecially Chriſt's poor, who are partakers of his living water, grace; ſee Iſa. xxxii. 20. though it may be, the multitude of perſons to whom alms is to be given are here intended, which are ſometimes ſignified by waters, Rev. xvii. 15. as the next verſe ſeems to explain it. The Targum is, "reach out the bread "of thy ſuſtenance to the poor that go in ſhips "upon the face of the water;" and ſome think the ſpeech is borrowed from navigation, and is an alluſion to merchants who ſend their goods beyond ſea, and have a large return for them. For thou ſhalt find it after many days; not the identical bread itſelf, but the fruit and reward of ſuch beneficence; which they ſhall have unexpectedly, or after long waiting, as the huſbandman for his ſeed; it ſuggeſts that ſuch perſons ſhould live long, as liberal perſons oftentimes do, and increaſe in their worldly ſubſtance; and if they ſhould not live to reap the advantage of their liberality, yet their poſterity will, as the ſeed of Jonathan did for the kindneſs he ſhewed to David: or however, if they find it not again in temporal things, yet in ſpirituals; and ſhall be recompenſed in the reſurrection of the juſt, and to all eternity. So the Targum, "for after the "time of many days, then thou ſhalt find the re"ward of it, in this world; (ſo it is in the king's "Bible) and in the world to come;" ſee Luke xii. 12, 13, 14. Jarchi inſtances in Jethro. Noldius [p] renders it, within many days, even before many days are at an end; for ſeed ſown by waters in hot climates ſoon ſprung up and produced fruit; ſee Dan. xi. 20.

ỳ. 2. Give a portion to ſeven, and alſo to eight, &c.] Or a part [q]; not the whole of a man's ſubſtance, for he muſt have to ſupport himſelf and his family; he that does not take care of that is worſe than an infidel; a man may beſtow all his goods on the poor, and not have charity; though no doubt there was true charity, or love, in the poor widow that threw in all her ſubſtance into the treaſury, which was an extraordinary caſe, 1 Tim. v. 8. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Mark xii. 44. but a man is to give of ſuch things that he has, ordinarily, and not all that he has, Luke xi. 41. he is to give according to his ability, and what he can ſpare from the ſervice of himſelf and family; and this is to be diſtributed and given in parts to the poor according to their neceſſities; not all to one, but ſomething to every one, to ſeven, and alſo to eight: if ſeven perſons apply, give them every one a part; and if an eighth perſon comes, ſend him not away empty; give to every one that aſketh, Luke vi. 30. compare with this phraſe Micah v. 5. Some think this reſpects time, ſo Aben Ezra; that a man ſhould give conſtantly and continually, ſhould be daily giving, all the ſeven days of the week, and when the eighth day comes, or the week begins again, go on in the ſame courſe. The Targum is, "put "a good part of ſeed in thy field in Tiſri (the ſe"venth month) and do not ceaſe from ſowing even "in Caſleu," the eighth month. For thou knoweſt not what evil ſhall be upon the earth; what calamities ſhall come upon it, which may ſweep away all a man's ſubſtance; it may be deſtroyed by fire, or waſhed away by a deluge of water, or plundered by an enemy; or however, the day of death may quickly come, as it certainly ſhall, and then it will be no longer in a man's power to do good with what he has. Moreover the arguments which covetous men uſe againſt liberality, the wiſe man uſes for it; they argue that bad times may come, and they may ſuſtain great loſſes; or have a greater charge upon them, a growing family; or they may live to old age, and want it themſelves: be it ſo, theſe are reaſons why they ſhould give liberally while they can; that when theſe things they fear ſhall come upon them, they may be relieved and ſupplied by others; for thoſe that ſhew mercy ſhall find mercy; and this is the way to make themſelves friends in a time of need, and againſt it; ſee Luke xvi. 9.

ỳ. 3. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themſelves upon the earth, &c.] They do not retain it; ſad would it be for the earth if they did; but they let it down ſoftly and gently, in plentiful ſhowers upon the ſeveral parts of the earth without diſtinction, by which it is refreſhed and made fruitful; nor are they loſers by it, for they draw up great quantities again out of the ocean, and ſo conſtantly anſwer the ends for which they are appointed. And ſo rich men, who are full of the good things of this world, ſhould not keep them to themſelves, and for their own uſe only; but ſhould conſider they are ſtewards under God, and for others, and ſhould be like the full clouds, empty themſelves; and give to thoſe who want of what God has given them, freely and chearfully, bountifully and plentifully, and that without reſpect of perſons, imitating their God and Creator, who ſendeth rain upon the juſt and the unjuſt, Matt. v. 45. and ſuch in the iſſue are no loſers, but gainers; they fill again as faſt as they empty. And if the tree fall towards the ſouth, or toward the north; in the place where the tree falleth, there it ſhall be; where the ſeed falls, and it grows up into a plant, and to a tree, there it continues, whether to the north or to the ſouth; and ſo accordingly brings forth fruit, and ſuch as it is men partake of it; to which purpoſe Jarchi, and who applies it to the diſciple of a wiſe man, who is profitable in the place where he is, not only in life but after death: or where the fruit of a tree fall, there they are, ſo Aben Ezra reads the laſt clauſe in the plural number; that is, there are perſons enough to gather the fruit; and ſo where a rich man is, there are poor enough about him to partake of his bounty: or as when a tree is cut down, let it fall where it will, there it abides, and is no more fruitful; ſo when a man is cut off by death, as he was then, ſo he remains; if a gracious and good man, and has done good, he is like a tree that falls to the ſouth, he enters into the paradiſe of God, the joys of heaven; and if not a good man, and has not done good, he is like a tree that falls to the north, he goes into a ſtate of darkneſs, miſery, and diſtreſs; ſee Rev. xxii. 11, 14, 15. or however, be this as it will, he is no more uſeful in this world; and therefore it becomes men to do all the good they can in health and life, for there is none to be done in the grave where they are going: or elſe the ſenſe is, that as when a tree falls, whether it be to the ſouth or to the north, it matters not to the owner, there it lies, and is of the ſame advantage to him; ſo an act of beneficence, let it be done to what object ſoever, a worthy or an unworthy one, yet being done with a view to the glory of God and the good of men, it ſhall not loſe its reward: and ſo this is an anſwer to the objection of ſome againſt giving, becauſe they do not know whether the object propoſed is deſerving: tho' ſome think the ſame thing is intended by theſe metaphorical expreſſions, as is ſuggeſted in the latter part of the preceding verſe, that evils or calamities may come upon men like heavy ſhowers of rain, which waſh away things; or like ſtorms and tempeſts of rain, thunder and lightening, which break down trees, and cauſe them to fall to the north or to the ſouth; and thus in like manner by one judgment or another men may be ſtripped of all their ſubſtance, and therefore it is right to make uſe of it while they have it.

℣. 4. He that obſerveth the wind ſhall not ſow, &c.] Who before he ſows his ſeed is careful to obſerve where the wind is, from what corner it blows, and forbears ſowing until it is down or changes, leſt it ſhould be troubleſome unto him in ſowing, or blow away his ſeed, and waits for a better ſeaſon; ſuch a man may loſe his ſeeds-time and never ſow at all, and his corn in his barn may be devoured by vermin, or be deſtroyed by one accident or another, and ſo he may loſe both his ſeed and his crop. And he that regardeth the clouds ſhall not reap; which are uncertain ſigns of weather; and if a man gives heed to them, and puts off his ſowing from time to time, for the ſake of better weather, as he may never ſow, ſo it is impoſſible that he ſhould reap; and if he ſows, and when his corn is ripe and forbears to reap becauſe of the clouds, leſt his grain ſhould be wet, may never reap at all: and ſo it is with reſpect to liberality; if a man will raiſe difficulties, and make objections, and attend unto them; if he puts off giving till ſuch an affliction is removed from him, and his family, or that is grown up; or ſuch an eſtate is obtained, or he has got to ſuch a pitch of riches, or till more proper and deſerving objects preſent, with twenty things more of the like kind; if he defers giving on ſuch accounts, or through fear of want, which may poſſeſs his mind for various reaſons, he may never give nor get, yea never do any good work; for if nothing is done till all difficulties are removed, no good thing will ever be done.

℣. 5. As thou knoweſt not what is the way of the ſpirit, &c.] If indeed a man could foreſee and be aſſured of ſeaſonable weather for ſowing and reaping, or a proper opportunity for doing good, all circumſtances agreeing, it would be right to wait for it, and take it; but as theſe things are not in our power, nor within the compaſs of our knowledge, we ſhould take the firſt opportunity of doing good, and leave the iſſue to divine providence; as in many things in nature we are and ſhould be content to be ignorant of them, and leave them with God, who brings them about by his ſecret power and providence: as for inſtance, we know not the way of the ſpirit, or of the wind[r], as ſome render it; from whence it comes and whither it goes, where and when it will ſubſide, or what wind will blow next; or of the ſpirit, or ſoul of man, how it enters into the body. So the Targum, "how the "ſpirit of the breath of life goes into the body of "an infant;" whether it is by traduction, as ſome, which is not likely; or by transfuſion, or by creation out of nothing, or by formation out of ſomething preexiſtent, and by an immediate infuſion of it: or, what is the way of the breath; of the breath of a child in the womb, whether it breathes or not; if it does, how? if not, how does it live? or what is the way of the ſoul out of the body, how it goes out of it when the body dies. Nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child; or is full, pregnant, big with child: or in the womb that is full[s]; full of liquids, and yet bones are ſeparated from them, grow out of them, and in them, and are hardened; all which how it ſhould be is unknown: bones are mentioned becauſe they are the more ſolid and ſubſtantial parts of the body, the baſis and ſtrength of it; and becauſe it may ſeem more difficult how any part of the ſeed ſhould harden into them, whilſt other parts are converted into ſkin and fleſh. Even ſo thou knoweſt not the works of God who maketh all; the Targum adds, in wiſdom; as men are ignorant of many of the works of nature, ſo of thoſe of providence, eſpecially which are future; as whether men ſhall be rich or poor, have days of proſperity or adverſity; what their latter end will be, whether they ſhall not ſtand in need of the aſſiſtance of others, it may be of them or theirs to whom they now give; or what will be the iſſue of preſent acts of beneficence and liberality; theſe, with many other things of the like kind, ſhould be left with God. Some underſtand this of the work of grace and converſion, which is a ſecret and difficult work, only wrought by the power and grace of God; and may be begun, or ſhortly will, in a poor perſon judged an unworthy object of charity for ſuppoſed want of it, a thing unknown.

℣. 6. In the morning ſow thy ſeed, &c.] Do all good works early and diligently, which is expreſſed by ſowing in righteouſneſs, Hoſea x. 12. particularly alms-deeds, often ſignified by ſowing ſeed, Pſalm cxii. 9. 2 Cor. ix. 6—10. this ſhould be in the morning of youth, that perſons may be inured to it betimes, as Obadiah was; and in the morning of proſperity, as ſoon as ever providence ſmiles on men, and puts it into the power of their hands, who ſhould honour the Lord with the firſt-fruits of their increaſe. And in the evening withhold not thine hand; from ſowing ſeed, from doing good, particularly acts of charity, in the evening of old age, as Jarchi, like old Barzillai; an age in which men are apt to be more tenacious and covetous, and withhold more than is meet; yea in the evening of adverſity do not leave off doing good as much as can be; but do as the Macedonian churches, whoſe deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality in a great trial of affliction, 2 Cor. viii. 2. in ſhort, good is to be done at all times, as opportunity offers, throughout the whole of life, and in all conditions and circumſtances. For thou knoweſt not whether ſhall proſper, either this or that; the ſeed ſown in the morning or in the evening, which good work ſhall beſt ſucceed; therefore do both, try all ways, make uſe of all opportunities. Or whether they both ſhall be alike good; acceptable to God, and uſeful to men; and if ſo, a man will have no occaſion to repent of what he has done both in youth and old age.

℣. 7. Truly the light is ſweet, &c.] Here begins a new ſubject, as moſt think; and ſome here begin the twelfth and laſt chapter, and not improperly. This is true of natural light, which is exceeding pleaſant, uſeful and beneficial; by which men diſcern objects, behold the things of nature with pleaſure, walk in the way without ſtumbling, and do the work and buſineſs of life: and alſo of civil light or proſperity; for, as afflictions are expreſſed by darkneſs, and adverſity by night; ſo the comforts and good things of life, by light and day, which are very deſirable and delectable: and here life itſelf may be meant, for light is ſometimes put for life, which is the light of the living; and what ſweeter and more deſirable than that, eſpecially a life attended with proſperity and peace? ſee Job xxxiii. 28, 30. and iii. 20. and ii. 4. Pſalm xxxiv. 12. The Targum and Jarchi interpret it, of the light of the law; and which is indeed a light, and ſo is the whole word of God, Prov. vi. 23. Pſalm cxix. 105. 2 Pet. i. 19. but may be better applied unto the goſpel, which is a great and glorious light, Iſa. ix. 2. 2 Cor. iv. 4. and a means of enlightening dark minds; not only of ſhewing men their ſinfulneſs, as the law does; but the inſufficiency of their righteouſneſs, of all their own goodneſs and good works to juſtify; it reveals Chriſt, and the glories of his perſon; it ſets him forth evidently, as crucified and ſlain, for the worſt of ſinners; it makes manifeſt his fulneſs, ability and willingneſs, as a Saviour, righteouſneſs, peace, pardon, and ſalvation by him; it makes known things not to be diſcerned by the light of nature, even things wonderful and marvellous, as well as what is the way a man ſhould walk in: and this light is ſweet and pleaſant, not to a blind and carnal man, who deſpiſes it, and reckons it fooliſhneſs, but to thoſe who are enlightened by the Spirit of God; and to theſe it is very delightful, even to all their ſenſes; it is ſweet to their taſte, a joyful ſound to their ears, and beautiful to their ſight, are the feet of them that bring its good tidings. The light of grace, which appears in firſt converſion, and comes from God ſuddenly, which at firſt is ſmall, but increaſes, is exceeding pleaſant, ſtrikes the ſoul with delight and wonder; it is marvellous light, 1 Pet. ii. 9. and ſo is the light of joy and gladneſs to believers, when it ariſes to them after a time of darkneſs, or the light of God's countenance, Pſalm iv. 6, 7. and ſuch will be the light of the latter-day-glory, and more eſpecially the light of the heavenly ſtate. And a pleaſant thing it is for the eyes to behold the ſun; the natural ſun, ſhining at noon-day, which is a luminous and glorious body, communicating light and heat to all the world: which is ſo glorious and ſo pleaſant to behold, that Anaxagoras, the philoſopher, being aſked, what he was born for? anſwered, "to ſee the heavens, the ſun, and the moon[t];" and Eudoxus, another philoſopher, said, "he could be content to periſh, could he get ſo near to the ſun, as to learn the nature of it[u]." To ſee the ſun, in the language of this book, is to live in this world, and to enjoy the light of the ſun, and the comforts of life; ſee chap. vii. 11. and now a life, attended with outward proſperity and inward peace, that is ſpent in doing and enjoying good, is a very deſirable and delightful one; though ſuch a man ſhould not think of living always, but of death, and the days of darkneſs, as in the following verſe. This may be applied to Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, Pſalm lxxxiv. 11. Mal. iv. 2. the fountain of all ſpiritual light and heat; the brightneſs of his Father's glory; and who is ſuperior to angels and men; and is to be beheld by faith, and in his own light, as the ſun is; and whom to look upon with an eye of faith, is exceeding pleaſant and delightful, and fills with joy unſpeakable and full of glory, 1 Pet. i. 8.

℣. 8. But if a man live many years, &c.] Enjoying light and life, and beholding the ſun with much delight and pleaſure. The days of men on earth, or under the ſun, are but few at moſt; but ſome live many days, in compariſon of others; they come to a good old age, as Abraham did; and to their graves, like a ſhock of corn fully ripe; and arrive to, or beyond, the common term of human life. And rejoice in them all; in and throughout the many years he lives, even all his days; that is, is bleſſed with a plentiful portion of the good things of life, and enjoys them in a free and comfortable manner, with moderation and thankfulneſs; partakes of the good of his labour, and rejoices in his works, in the fruit and effects of them, through the bleſſing of divine providence; not only is bleſſed with many days, but thoſe days good ones, days of proſperity: ſuch a man is in a happy caſe; and eſpecially if he is poſſeſſed of ſpiritual joy, of joy in the holy Ghoſt; if he rejoices in Chriſt, and in what he is to him, and has done for him; and having profeſſed him, and ſubmitted to his ordinances, goes on his way rejoicing. Some render it, let him rejoice in them all[w]; a good man has reaſon to rejoice always, throughout the whole courſe of his life; becauſe of the goodneſs of divine providence to him; becauſe of the bleſſings of grace beſtowed on him; and becauſe of his good hope of eternal glory and happineſs. The Targum is; "in all theſe it becomes him to rejoice, and to ſtudy in the law of the Lord." Yet let him remember the days of darkneſs, for they ſhall be many; or, they may be[x]; meaning either, that though perſons may live long, and enjoy much health and proſperity; yet, in the midſt of all, they ſhould conſider, that it is poſſible that days of adverſity and diſtreſs may come upon them, and continue; and therefore ſhould not pleaſe themſelves, as Job did, that they ſhall die in their neſt in the height of their proſperity, ſince they know not what days of evil may come, and how long they will laſt; or however, they ſhould remember the night of death that is haſtening, the land of darkneſs, and the ſhadow of death, they are going to; the dark grave, they will ſoon be laid in, where they will remain many days; many more than thoſe in which they have lived, enjoying the light of the ſun, even till the heavens ſhall be no more; though theſe days will not be infinite, they will have an end, and there will be a reſurrection from the dead: and particularly, if a man is a wicked man, that has lived a long and proſperous life, he ſhould not only remember the above things; but alſo, that outer darkneſs, that blackneſs of darkneſs, reſerved for him, the darkneſs of eternal death, which will be his portion for evermore. The Targum is; "he ſhall remember the days of "the darkneſs of death, and ſhall not ſin; for many "are the days that he ſhall lie dead in the houſe of "the grave." All that cometh is vanity; Aben Ezra interprets this of every man that comes into the world, as in chap. i. 2, 4. whether high or low, rich or poor, in proſperity or adverſity; man, at his beſt eſtate, is vanity: let a man therefore be in what circumſtances he will, he ſhould not take up his reſt here; all that comes to him, every thing that befals him, is vanity. The wiſe man keeps in view the main thing he propoſed, to prove that all is vanity, all in this life; for what is to come hereafter, in a future ſtate of happineſs, cannot come under this name and character.

℣. 9. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, &c.] This advice may be conſidered as ſerious; and either as relating to natural, corporal, and temporal delight and pleaſure, under due limitations; that as mirth and chearfulneſs, or a free uſe of the creatures of God, with moderation and temperance, is allowable to all men in common, and is ſpoken of throughout this book as commendable, and is healthful and profitable to men; ſo it is particularly ſuitable to the youthful age, whoſe natural deſires may be enjoyed, and their outward ſenſes may be gratified, in a lawful way, ſo far as is conſiſtent with the fear of God, and the expectation of a future judgment: or it may be conſidered with reſpect to religious and ſpiritual exerciſes; as young men ſhould remember their Creator in the days of their youth, as it follows; ſo they ſhould rejoice in God their Maker, Pſalm cxlix. 2. they ſhould rejoice, not to do evil, to which human nature is inclined, eſpecially in youth, but to do good; ſhould rejoice, not in the ways of ſin, but in the ways of wiſdom; not in any outward attainment of beauty, wit, ſtrength or riches, but in the grace of God; not in themſelves, or their boaſtings, but in Chriſt, his perſon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation; not in the things of time and ſenſe, but in hope of the glory of God. And let thy heart chear thee in the days of thy youth; here is a different word for youth than the former, which Alſhech diſtinguiſhes thus; the firſt deſigns the time to the age of thirteen, and this from thence to twenty. Or, let thine heart do thee good, ſo the Septuagint. The Targum is, "and let thine heart be good in thee." Symmachus renders it, and let thine heart be in good; the thoughts of thine heart be employed about that which is good, ſpiritual, heavenly, and divine; the affections of thine heart ſet thereon; and the will and deſires of thine heart be drawn out after ſuch things: let thine heart prompt and put thee on doing that which is good, with delight and pleaſure; but, in order to all this, the heart muſt be made good by the Spirit and grace of God. And walk in the ways of thy heart; being created a clean one, ſprinkled, purged, and purified by the blood of Chriſt; in which the fear of God is put; the laws of God are written; where Chriſt is formed, and his word dwells richly, and he himſelf by faith; where the Spirit of God and his graces are: and then to walk in the ways of ſuch an heart, is to walk in the fear of God, according to his word, as Chriſt is an example; and to walk after the Spirit, and not after the fleſh. The Septuagint and Arabic verſions are; and walk in the ways of thine heart unblameable: the Targum, "and walk in humility in the ways of thine heart;" which all agree with the ſenſe given: ſo Alſhech interprets the ways of the heart, of the ways of the good imagination of good men. And in the ſight of thine eyes; as enlightened by the Spirit of God, directing and guiding in the way in which a man ſhould walk; looking unto Jeſus, all the while he is walking or running his chriſtian race; and walking in him, as he has received him; preſſing towards him, the mark, for the prize of the high calling. The Targum is, "and be cautious of the "ſight of thine eyes, and look not upon evil." The Septuagint and Arabic verſions inſert the negative; and not in the ſight of thine eyes. Moſt interpreters underſtand all this as an ironical conceſſion to young men, to indulge themſelves in carnal mirth, to take their ſwing of ſinful pleaſures, to do all their corrupt hearts incline them to; and to gratify their outward ſenſes and carnal luſts to the uttermoſt; even the luſt of the fleſh, the luſt of the eye, and the pride of life, which young men are moſt addicted to: do all this, as if it was ſaid, and ſee what will be the iſſue of it; or, do all this if you can, with this one thing bore in mind, a future judgment; like thoſe expreſſions in 1 Kings xxii. 15. Matt. xxvi. 45. Lam. iii. 21. and to this ſenſe the following clauſe is thought moſt to incline; and the rather, as the above phraſes are generally uſed in a bad ſenſe. But know thou, that for all theſe things God will bring thee into judgment; not temporal, but eternal; not in this preſent life, but in the world to come; the judgment that will be after death, the laſt and awful judgment; and which is certain, may be known; of which a man may be aſſured, from the light of nature, and from divine revelation; ſee the note on chap. iii. 17. into which all men will be brought, even whether they will or no; and every work ſhall be brought into it, good or bad, open or ſecret, chap. xii. 14. Wherefore theſe things may reſpect either; and the conſideration of a future judgment ſhould influence the lives of men, and engage them both to perform acts of piety and religion in youth, and throughout the whole of life, and to ſhun and avoid every thing that is evil. Herodotus [y] ſpeaks of a cuſtom among the Egyptians, at their feaſts; that, juſt at the cloſe of them, one carries about in a coffin the image of a dead man, exactly like one, made of wood, the length of a cubit or two, ſhewing it to all the gueſts; ſaying, Look upon it, drink, and take pleaſure, for ſuch ſhalt thou be when dead.

[y] Euterpe, ſive l. 2. c. 78.

℣. 10. Therefore remove ſorrow from thy heart, &c.] Worldly ſorrow, as oppoſed to lawful mirth and chearfulneſs, and eſpecially to ſpiritual joy: or anger [z], as the word may be rendered, and often is; either at the providence of God, or at the correction of friends; all perturbations of the mind; all fierceneſs of ſpirit, and fiery paſſions, to which youthful age is ſubject: or all thoſe things, as Jarchi obſerves, that provoke God to anger; ſinful luſts and pleaſures, the end and iſſue of which alſo is ſorrow to men; and which agrees with our verſion. And put away evil from thy fleſh; or body; ſuch as intemperance and uncleanneſs, to which young men are addicted: the advice is much the ſame, in both clauſes, with that of the apoſtle's, flee youthful luſts, 2 Tim. ii. 22. Jarchi interprets this of the evil concupiſcence. For childhood and youth are vanity; which quickly paſs away; come into manhood, and ſoon ſlide into old age, and are gone preſently, and all things within that compaſs: all actions done in that age, are for the moſt part vain and fooliſh; and all the delights, joys and pleaſures thereof, vaniſhing and tranſitory. The laſt word [a], uſed to expreſs the juvenile age, either is akin to a word which ſignifies the morning; youth being the morning and dawn of man's age, and increaſes as that; and as ſoon as it is peep of day with him, or he enters into life, he poſſeſſes vanity: or as having the ſignification of blackneſs; becauſe, as Jarchi obſerves, the head of a young man is black: and ſo the Targum; "childhood, and the days of blackneſs of hair, are vanity;" whereas the hair of an aged man is grey.

CHAP. XII.

THIS chapter begins with advice to young men, which is continued from the preceding; and particularly, to remember their Creator in the days of their youth; enforced from the conſideration of the troubles and inconveniencies of old age, ℣. 1. which, in an allegorical way, is beautifully deſcribed, ℣. 2—6. and from the certainty of death, when it would be too late, ℣. 7. And then the wiſe man returns to his firſt propoſition, and which he kept in view all along, that all is vanity in youth or old age, ℣. 8. and recommends the reading of this book, from the diligence, pains and labour, he uſed in compoſing it; from the ſententious matter in it; from the agreeable, acceptable and well-choſen words, in which he had expreſſed it; and from the wiſdom, uprightneſs, truth, efficacy, and authority of the doctrines of it, ℣. 9—11. and from its preference to other books, which were weariſome both to author and reader, ℣. 12. And it is concluded with the ſcope and deſign, the ſum and ſubſtance of the whole of it, reducible to theſe two heads; the fear of God, and obedience to him, ℣. 13. and which are urged, from the conſideration of a future judgment, into which all things ſhall be brought, ℣. 14.

℣. 1. Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, &c.] Or Creators [b]; as makers, Job xxxv. 10. Pſal. cxlix. 2. Iſa. liv. 5. for more than one were concerned, as in the creation of all things in general, ſo of man in particular, Gen. i. 26. and theſe are neither more nor fewer than Three; and are Father, Son, and Spirit; the one God that has created men, Mal. ii. 10. the Father, who is the God of all fleſh, and the Father of ſpirits; the former, both of the bodies and ſouls of men, Jer. xxxi. 27. Heb. xii. 9. the Son, by whom all things are created; for he that is the Redeemer and Huſband of his church, which are characters and relations peculiar to the Son, is the Creator, Iſa. xliii. 1. and liv. 5. and the holy Spirit not only garniſhed the heavens, and moved upon the face of the waters, but is the Maker of men, and gives them life, Job xxxiii. 4. Now this God, Creator, ſhould be remembered by young men; they ſhould remember there is a God, which they are apt to be forgetful of; that this God is a God of great and glorious perfections, omniſcient, omnipreſent, omnipotent, holy, juſt and true; who judgeth in the earth, and will judge the world in righteouſneſs, and them alſo; and that he is in Chriſt a God gracious, merciful, and pardoning iniquity, tranſgreſſion and ſin: they ſhould remember him under this character, as a Creator, who has made them, and not they themſelves; that they are made by him out of the duſt of the earth, and muſt return to it; that he has brought them into being, and preſerved them in it, and favoured them with the bleſſings of his providence, which are all from him that has made them: and they ſhould remember the end for which they are made, to glorify him; and in what ſtate man was originally made, upright, pure and holy; but that he now is a fallen creature, and ſuch are they, impure and unrighteous, impotent and weak, abominable in the ſight of God, unworthy to live, and unfit to die; being tranſgreſſors of the laws of their Creator, which is deſerving of death: they ſhould remember what God their Creators, Father, Son, and Spirit, muſt have done or muſt do for them, if ever they are ſaved; the Father muſt have choſen them in Chriſt unto ſalvation; muſt have given his Son to redeem, and muſt ſend his Spirit into their hearts to create them anew; the Son muſt have been ſurety for them, aſſumed their nature, and died in their room and ſtead; and the Spirit muſt regenerate and make them new creatures, enlighten their minds, quicken their ſouls, and ſanctify their hearts: they ſhould remember the right their Creator has over them, the obligations they are under to him, and their duty to him; they ſhould remember, with thankfulneſs, the favours they have received from him, and, with reverence and humility, the diſtance between him as Creator, and them as creatures: they ſhould remember to love him cordially and ſincerely; to fear him with a godly fear; to worſhip him in a ſpiritual manner; to ſet him always before them, and never forget him. And all this they ſhould do in the days of their youth; which are their beſt and choiceſt days; in which to ſerve him is moſt deſirable by him, and acceptable to him; who ordered the firſt of the ripe fruits and creatures of the firſt year to be offered to him: and then are men beſt able to ſerve him, when their bodies are healthful, ſtrong and vigorous; their ſenſes quick, and the powers and faculties of their ſouls capable of being improved and enlarged: and to delay the ſervice of him to old age, as it would be very ungrateful and exceeding improper, ſo no man can be ſure of arriving to it; and if he ſhould, yet what follows is enough to determine againſt ſuch a delay. While the evil days come not; meaning the days of old age; ſaid to be evil, not with reſpect to the evil of fault or ſin; ſo all days are evil, or ſin is committed in every age, in infancy, in childhood, in youth, in manhood, as well as in old age: but with reſpect to the evil of affliction and trouble, which attend it, as various diſeaſes; yea, that itſelf is a diſeaſe, and an incurable one; much weakneſs of body, decay of intellects, and many other things, which render life very troubleſome and uncomfortable [c], as well as unfit for religious ſervices. Nor the years draw nigh, when thou ſhalt ſay, I have no pleaſure in them; that is, corporal pleaſure; no ſenſual pleaſure; ſight, taſte and hearing, being loſt, or in a great meaſure gone; which was Barzillai's caſe, at eighty years of age: though ſome ancient perſons have their ſenſes quick and vigorous, and ſcarce perceive any difference between youth and age; but ſuch inſtances are not common: and there are alſo ſome things that ancient perſons take pleaſure in, as in fields and gardens, and the culture of them, as Cicero [d] obſerves; and particularly, learned men take as much delight in their ſtudies, in old age as in youth, and in inſtructing others; and, as the ſame writer [e] ſays, "What is more pleaſant, than to ſee an old man, attended and encircled with youth, at their ſtudies under him?" and eſpecially, a good man, in old age, has pleaſure in reflecting on a life ſpent in the ways, work, and worſhip of God; and in having had, through the grace of God, his converſation in the world, in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity; as alſo, in preſent communion with God, and in the hopes and views of the glories of another world: but if not religious perſons, they are ſtrangers to ſpiritual pleaſure, which only is to be had in wiſdom's ways; ſuch can neither look back with pleaſure on a life ſpent in ſin; nor forward with pleaſure, at death and eternity, and into another world; ſee 2 Sam. xix. 35. Pſal. xc. 10.

℣. 2. While the ſun, or the light, or the moon, or the ſtars be not darkened, &c.] The wiſe man proceeds to deſcribe the infirmities of old age, and the troubles that attend it; in order to engage young men to regard God and religion, before theſe come upon them, which greatly unfit for his ſervice. This, the Targum and Midraſh, and, after them, Jarchi, interpret of the ſplendour of the countenance of man, of the light of his eyes, and the beauty of his cheeks, and other parts of his face; which decreaſe and go off at old age, and paleneſs and wrinkles ſucceed: and others, of the adverſities and calamities which attend perſons at ſuch years; which are ſometimes in ſcripture ſignified by the darkening of the ſun, moon and ſtars, Iſa. xiii. 10. but ſome chooſe to underſtand this, more literally, of the dimneſs of ſight in old men; by whom the light of the ſun, moon and ſtars, is ſcarcely diſcerned: but as this infirmity is afterwards deſcribed; I rather think, with others, that, by the ſun, light, and moon, are meant the ſuperior and inferior faculties of the ſoul, the underſtanding, mind, judgment, will and affections; and, by the ſtars, thoſe bright notions and ideas, raiſed in the fancy and imagination, and fixed in the memory; all which are greatly impaired or loſt in old age: ſo Alſhech interprets the ſun and moon, of the ſoul and ſpirit, and the ſtars of the ſenſes; light is not in the Syriac verſion. Nor the clouds return after the rain; which ſome underſtand of catarrhs, defluxions and rheums, flowing at the eyes, noſe and mouth, one after another, which frequently attend, and are very troubleſome, to perſons in years; but may be more generally applied to the perpetual ſucceſſion of evils, afflictions and diſorders, in old age; as ſoon as one is got over, another follows, billow after billow; or, like ſhowers in April, as ſoon as one is gone, another comes. The Targum paraphraſes it of the eye-brows diſtilling tears, like clouds after rain.

℣. 3. In the day when the keepers of the houſe ſhall tremble, &c.] By the houſe, is meant the human body; which is an houſe of clay, the earthly houſe of our tabernacle, in which the ſoul dwells, Job iv. 19. 2 Cor. v. 1. The Targum interprets the keepers of the houſe, of the knees and the trembling of them; but the Midraſh and Jarchi, much better, of the ribs; man being fenced with bones and ſinews, as Job ſays, chap. x. 11. though trembling cannot be well aſcribed to them, they being ſo fixed to the back-bone: rather therefore, as Aben Ezra, the hands and arms are meant; which work for the maintenance of the body, and feed it with food, got and prepared by them; and which protect and defend it from injuries; for all which they are fitted, and made ſtrong, by the God of nature. The Arabic verſion renders it, both keepers; and, doubtleſs, reſpects both hands and arms; and which, in old age, are not only wrinkled, contracted and ſtiff, but attended with numbneſs, pains and tremor. Some, not amiſs, take in the head; which is placed as a watch-tower over the body, the ſeat of the ſenſes; which overlooks, guards and keeps it, and which often, through paralytic diſorders, and even the weakneſs of old age, is attended with a ſhaking. And the ſtrong men ſhall bow themſelves; it is ſtrange the Targum and Midraſh ſhould interpret this of the arms, deſigned in the former clauſe; Jarchi and Aben Ezra, more rightly, of the thighs; it takes in thighs, legs and feet, which are the baſis and ſupport of the human body; and are ſtrengthened for this purpoſe, having ſtronger muſcles and tendons than any other parts of the body; but theſe, as old age comes on, are weakened and diſtorted, and bend under the weight of the body, not being able, without aſſiſtance, to ſuſtain it. And the grinders ceaſe becauſe they are few; the Targum is, "the teeth of the mouth:" all agree, the teeth are meant; only the Midraſh takes in the ſtomach alſo, which, like a mill, grinds the food. There are three ſorts of teeth; the fore-teeth, which bite the food, and are called inciſores; the eye-teeth, called canini, which bruiſe and break the food; and the double teeth, the hindermoſt, which are called dentes molares, the grinding teeth; and which, being placed in the upper and nether jaw, are like to millſtones, broad and rough, and rub againſt each other and grind the food, and prepare it for the ſtomach: theſe, in old age, rot and drop out, and become few and ſtraggling, one here and another there; and, not being over againſt each other, are of no uſe, but rather troubleſome. And thoſe that look out of the windows be darkened; the eyes, as the Targum and Ben Melech; and all agree, that thoſe that look out are the eyes, or the viſive rays: the windows they look through are not ſpectacles; for it is queſtionable, whether they were in uſe in Solomon's time, and however, they are not parts of the houſe; but either, the holes in which the eyes are, and ſo the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions render it, to which the Targum agrees, paraphraſing it, the ſtrong bounds of the head; and which are no other than what oculiſts call the orbits of the eye: or elſe, the eye-lids, which open and ſhut like the caſement of a window, and through which, being opened, the eyes look; or the humours of the eye, the watry, cryſtalline and glaſſy, which are tranſparent, and through which the viſive rays paſs; or the tunics, or coats of the eye, particularly the tunica aranea and cornea; as alſo the optic nerves, and eſpecially the pupilla, or apple of the eye, which is perforated or bored for this purpoſe: now theſe, in old age, become weak or dim, or thick or contracted, or obſtructed by ſome means or another; by which the ſight is greatly hindered, and is a very uncomfortable circumſtance; this was Iſaac's caſe, Gen. xxvii. 1. but Moſes is an exception to the common caſe of old men, Deut. xxxiv. 7.

℣. 4. And the doors ſhall be ſhut in the ſtreets, &c.] The Midraſh and Jarchi interpret theſe of the holes of the body; in which they are followed by our learned and ingenious countryman, Dr Smith; who, by them, underſtands the inlets and outlets of the body; and, by the ſtreets, the ways and paſſages through which the food goes, and nouriſhment is conveyed; and which may be ſaid to be ſhut, when they ceaſe from their uſe: but it ſeems much better, with Aben Ezra and others, to interpret them of the lips; which are ſometimes called the doors of the mouth, or lips, Pſalm cxli. 3. Micah vii. 5. which are opened both for ſpeaking and eating; but, in aged perſons, are much ſhut as to either; they do not chooſe to ſpeak much, becauſe of the diſagreeableneſs of their voice, and difficulty of ſpeech, through the ſhortneſs of breath, and the loſs of teeth; nor do they open them much to eat, through want of appetite; and while eating, are obliged, for want of teeth, to keep their lips cloſe, to retain their food from falling out; they mumble with their lips both in ſpeaking and eating; and particularly in public, aged perſons care not to ſpeak nor eat, for the reaſon following: though ſome underſtand it, more literally, of their having the doors of their houſes ſhut, and keeping within, and not caring to go abroad in the ſtreets, becauſe of their infirmities; ſo the Targum, "thy feet ſhall "be bound from going in the ſtreets." When the ſound of the grinding is low; which the above Jewiſh writers, and, after them, Dr Smith, underſtand of the ſtomach, grinding, digeſting and concocting food, and of other parts through which it is conveyed, and the offices they perform; but ſound or voice does not ſeem ſo well to agree with that; rather therefore this is to be underſtood, as before, of the grinding of the teeth, through the loſs of which, ſo much noiſe is not heard in eating as in young men, and the voice in ſpeaking is lower; the Targum is, "appetite of food ſhall de"part from thee." And he ſhall riſe up at the voice of the bird; that is, the aged perſon, the leaſt noiſe awakes him out of ſleep; and, as he generally goes to bed ſoon, he riſes betimes, at cock-crowing, or with the lark, as ſoon as the voice of that bird or any other is heard; particularly the cock, which crows betimes, and whoſe voice is heard the moſt early, and is, by ſome writers [f], emphatically called the bird that calls men to their work. And all the daughters of muſic ſhall be brought low; either thoſe that make muſic, and are the inſtruments of it, as the lungs, the throat, the teeth, mouth and lips, ſo the Targum and Midraſh; or thoſe that receive muſic, as the ears, and the ſeveral parts of them, the cavities of them, particularly the tympanum and auditory nerve; all which, through old age, are impaired, and become very unfit to be employed in making muſic, or in attending to it; the voice of ſinging men and ſinging women could not be heard with pleaſure by old Barzillai, 2 Sam. xix. 36. Theſe clauſes are expreſſive of the weakneſs which generally old age brings on men; very few inſtances are there to the contrary; ſuch as of Caleb, who, at eighty five years of age, was as ſtrong as at forty; and of Moſes, whoſe natural force abated not at an hundred and twenty; nor indeed as of Cyrus, who, when ſeventy years of age, and near his death, could not perceive that he was weaker then, than in his youth [g].

℣. 5. Alſo when they ſhall be afraid of that which is high, &c.] Not of the moſt high God, before whoſe tribunal they muſt ſhortly appear, as ſome; but rather, of high places, as high hills, mountains, towers, &c. which aged perſons are afraid to go up, becauſe of the feebleneſs and weakneſs of their limbs, their difficulty of breathing, and the dizzineſs of their heads. And fears ſhall be in the way; they do not care to go abroad, being afraid of every little ſtone that lies in the way, leſt they ſhould ſtumble at it, and fall: ſome underſtand this of their fears of ſpirits, good or bad; but the former ſenſe is beſt. And the almond-tree ſhall flouriſh; which moſt interpret of the hoary head, which looks likes an almond-tree in bloſſom; and which, as it comes ſoon in the ſpring, whence it has its name of haſte in the Hebrew language; ſee Jer. i. 11, 12. and is a ſure ſign of its near approach; ſo grey hairs, or the hoary head, ſometimes appear very ſoon and unexpected, and are a ſure indication of the approach of old age; which Cicero [h] calls, ætas præcipitata, "age that comes haſtily on;" though the hoary head, like the almond-tree, looks very beautiful, and is venerable, eſpecially if found in the way of righteouſneſs, Lev. xix. 32. Prov. xvi. 31. And the graſhopper ſhall be a burden; meaning either, ſhould a graſhopper, which is very light, leap upon an aged perſon, it would give him pain, the leaſt burden being uneaſy to him; or, ſhould he eat one of theſe creatures, the locuſts being a ſort of food in Judea, it would not ſit well on his ſtomach: or the graſhopper, being a crumpled and lean creature, may deſcribe an old man; his legs and arms emaciated, and his ſhoulders, back and lips, crumpled up and bunching out; and the locuſt of this name has a bunch on its back-bone, like a camel [i]: Bochart [k] ſays, that the head of the thigh, or the huckle-bone, by the Arabians, is called chagaba, the word here uſed for a locuſt or graſhopper; which part of the body is of principal uſe in walking, and found very troubleſome and difficult to move in old men; and Aben Ezra interprets it of the thigh: the almond-tree, by the Rabbins, as Jarchi ſays, is interpreted of the huckle-bone, which ſtands out in old age: and the Targum, of this and the preceding clauſe, is, "and the top of thy back-bone ſhall bunch out, through leanneſs, like the almond; and the ancles of thy feet ſhall be ſwelled." Some, as Ben Melech obſerves, underſtand it of the genital member, and of coitus, ſlighted and rejected, becauſe of the weakneſs of the body; all deſires of that kind being gone, as follows. And deſire ſhall fail; the appetite, for food, for bodily pleaſures, and carnal delights; and particularly for venery, all the parts of the body for ſuch uſes being weakened. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions, render it, the caper-tree ſhall be diſſipated or vaniſh, or its fruit ſhall ſhrink; ſo Dr Smith, who underſtands it of the decreaſe of the fluids, as he does the former clauſe of the ſolid parts of the body; and the berries of this tree are ſaid to excite both appetite and luſt[l]: and ſo Munſter[m] interprets the word, of the berries of the caper-tree. Becauſe man goeth to his long home; the grave, as the Targum, the houſe appointed for all living, where he muſt lie till the reſurrection-morn; his eternal houſe, as Cicero calls it[n]; and ſo it may be rendered here, the houſe of the world, common to all the world, where all mankind go: or, to the houſe of his world[o]; whether of bliſs or wo, according as his ſtate and character be, good or bad: Theognis[p] calls it the dark houſe of Hades, or the inviſible ſtate; and then this muſt be underſtood with reſpect to his ſeparate ſoul, and the manſion of it; and Alſhech ſays, every righteous man has a manſion to himſelf; ſee John xiv. 2. And the mourners go about the ſtreets; the relations of the deceaſed; or thoſe that go to their houſes to comfort them; or the mourning men and women, hired for that purpoſe.

℣. 6. Or ever the ſilver cord be looſed, &c.] As the above are the ſymptoms and infirmities of old age; theſe in this verſe are the immediate ſymptoms of death, or what attend it, or certainly iſſue in it. Some by the ſilver cord underſtand the ſtring of the tongue; and to this purpoſe is the Targum, "before thy tongue is dumb from ſpeaking;" and it is obſerved[q] in favour of this ſenſe, that the failing of the tongue is no fallacious ſign of death, of which there is no mention at all in this account, unleſs here; and the tongue may not unfitly be called a cord, both from the notation of the word, becauſe it binds, and becauſe it ſcourges like a cord, Job v. 21. and is compared to ſilver, Prov. x. 20. and in this verſe rather the head than the back is treated of. But beſt, the bond of union between ſoul and body is meant: the Midraſh and Jarchi, and the Jewiſh writers in general, interpret it of the ſpina dorſi, or back-bone; or rather of the marrow of it, which deſcends like a cord from the brain through the neck, and down the back bone to the bottom of it; from whence ſpring the nerves, fibres, tendons, and filaments of the body, on which the life of it much depends: this ſpinal marrow may be called a cord for the length of it, as well as what ariſe from it; and a ſilver cord from the colour of it[r], this being white even after death; and for the excellency of it: and this may be ſaid to be looſened, when there is a ſolution of the nerves, or marrow; upon which a paralyſis, or palſy, follows, and is often the immediate forerunner of death. Or the golden bowl be broken; the Targum renders it the top of the head; and the Midraſh interprets it the ſkull, and very rightly; or rather the inward membrane of the ſkull, which contains the brain, called the pia mater, or meninx, is intended, ſaid to be a bowl, from the form of it; a golden one, becauſe of the preciouſneſs of it, and the excellent liquor of life it contains, as alſo becauſe of its colour; now when this runs back, as the word[s] ſignifies, dries, ſhrinks up and breaks, it puts a ſtop to all animal motion, and hence death. Or the pitcher be broken at the fountain; not the gall at the liver, as the Targum, which the ancients took to be the fountain of blood; but by the fountain is meant the heart, the fountain of life, which has two cavities, one on the right ſide the other on the left, from whence come the veins and arteries, which carry the blood through the whole body; and here particularly it ſignifies the right ventricle of the heart, the ſpring and original of the veins, which are the pitcher that receives the blood and tranſmits it to the ſeveral parts of the body; but when theſe are broke to ſhivers, as the word[t] ſignifies, or ceaſe from doing their office, the blood ſtagnates in them, and death follows. Or the wheel broken at the ciſtern; which is the left ventricle of the heart, which by its diaſtole receives the blood brought to it through the lungs, as a ciſtern receives water into it; where ſtaying a while in its ſyſtole, it paſſes it into the great artery annexed to it; which is the wheel or inſtrument of rotation, which together with all the inſtruments of pulſation, cauſe the circulation of the blood, found out in the laſt age by our countryman Dr Harvey; but it ſeems by this it was well known by Solomon; now whenever this wheel is broken the pulſe ſtops, the blood ceaſes to circulate, and death follows. For this interpretation of the ſeveral preceding paſſages, as I owe much to the Jewiſh writers, ſo to Rambachius and Patrick on theſe paſſages, and to Witſius's Miſcellanies, and eſpecially to our countryman Dr Smith, in his Portrait of Old Age, a book worthy to be read on this ſubject; and there are various obſervations in the Talmud[u] agreeable hereunto.

℣. 7. Then ſhall the duſt return to the earth as it was, &c.] The body, which is made of duſt, and is no other in its preſent ſtate than duſt refined and enlivened; and when the above things take place, mentioned in the preceding verſe, or at death, it returns to its original earth; it becomes immediately a clod of earth, a lifeleſs lump of clay, and is then buried in the earth, where it rots, corrupts, and turns into it; which ſhews the frailty of man, and may ſerve to humble his pride, as well as proves that death is not an annihilation even of the body; ſee Gen. iii. 19. Job i. 21. And the ſpirit ſhall return unto God who gave it; from whom it is, by whom it is created, who puts it into the bodies of men, as a depoſitum they are entruſted with, and are accountable for, and ſhould be concerned for the ſafety and ſalvation of it; this was originally breathed into man at his firſt creation, and is now formed within him by the Lord; hence he is called the God of the ſpirits of all fleſh; ſee Gen. ii. 4. Zech. xii. 1. Numb. xvi. 22. Now at death the ſoul, or ſpirit of man returns to God; which if underſtood of the ſouls of men in general, it means that at death they return to God the judge of all, who paſſes ſentence on them, and orders thoſe that are good to the manſions of bliſs and happineſs, and thoſe that are evil to hell and deſtruction. So the Targum adds, “that it may ſtand in judgment “before the Lord;” or if only of the ſouls of good men, the ſenſe is, that they then return to God, not only as their Creator, but as their covenant-God and Father, to enjoy his preſence evermore; and to Chriſt their Redeemer, to be for ever with him, than which nothing is better and more deſirable; this ſhews that the ſoul is immortal, and dies not with the body, nor ſleeps in the grave with it, but is immediately with God. Agreeable to all this Ariſtotle[w] ſays, the mind, or ſoul, alone enters θυραθεν, from without, (from heaven, from God there) and only is divine; and to the ſame purpoſe are the words of Phocylides[x], “the body we have “of the earth, and we all being reſolved into it, “become duſt, but the air or heaven receives the “ſpirit.” And ſtill more agreeable to the ſentiment of the wiſe man here, another heathen[y] writer obſerves, that the ancients were of opinion that ſouls are given of God, and are again returned unto him after death.

[u] T. Bab. Sabbat, fol. 151. 2. & 152. 1.

℣. 8. Vanity of vanities, ſaith the preacher, &c.] The wiſe man, or preacher, ſet out in the beginning of the book with this doctrine, or propoſition, which he undertook to prove; and now having proved it by an induction of particulars, inſtanced in the wiſdom, wealth, honours, pleaſures, and profit of men, and ſhewn the vanity of them, and that the happineſs of men lies not in theſe things, but in the knowledge and fear of God; he repeats it, and moſt ſtrongly aſſerts it, as an undoubted truth, beyond all diſpute and contradiction, that all things under the ſun are not only vain, but vanity itſelf, extremely vain, vain in the ſuperlative degree. All is vanity; all things in the world are vain; all creatures are ſubject to vanity; man in every ſtate, and in his beſt eſtate, is altogether vanity: this the wiſe man might with great confidence affirm, after he had ſhewn that not only childhood and youth are vanity, but even old age; the infirmities, ſorrows, and diſtreſſes of which he had juſt expoſed, and obſerved that all iſſue in death, the laſt end of man, when his body returns to the earth, and his ſoul to God the giver of it.

℣. 9. And moreover, &c.] Or beſides[z] what has been ſaid; or as to what remains[a]; or, but what is better, or more excellent[b], is to hear the concluſion of the whole matter, the ſum and ſubſtance of the whole book in a few words, ℣. 13. to which ℣. 9—12. are a preface; and in which the wiſe man recommends the reading of this book, and other writings of his, and of other wiſe men inſpired of God; and his own he particularly recommends, from his character as wiſe and induſtrious, in this verſe; and from the ſubject-matter of them, their nature, uſe, and excellency, and their efficacy and authority in the two next. Becauſe the preacher was wiſe; he was a preacher, a royal one, an extraordinary preacher, and to be regarded; he urges not his title as a king, but his character as a preacher, to recommend what he had written: every good preacher ſhould be regarded; not ſuch who are ignorant preachers of the law, but faithful miniſters of the goſpel, who are ſent of God, and have felt and experienced what they deliver to others; and eſpecially who are wiſe as well as faithful, as Solomon was; he had much wiſdom given him at firſt, 1 Kings iii. 12. and iv. 29—31. and in which he improved; and though he turned to folly in his old age, he recovered from that, and gained more wiſdom through his fall, and to which he here ſeems to have reference; for koheleth, which ſome render the gatherer, becauſe he gathered much wiſdom, and much people to hear it; others render gathered, that is, into the flock and fold again, the church of God, from which he had ſtrayed; ſee the note on chap. i. 1. and having ſeen through the follies and vanities of life, and being recovered and reſtored, was a fitter perſon to teach and inſtruct others; ſee Pſal. li. 12, 13. Luke xxii. 32. He ſtill taught the people knowledge; or again, as the Targum; after his fall and recovery he was communicative of his knowledge; he did not hide his talent in the earth, nor in a napkin; but having freely received, he freely gave, and kept back nothing from his people, the people of the houſe of Iſrael, as the Targum, that might be profitable to them; he taught them the knowledge of themſelves, as fallen men, impure, impotent, and unrighteous; the knowledge of the creatures, and the vanity of them, of riches, honours, and pleaſures; and of works of righteouſneſs to ſave men; the knowledge of Chriſt the wiſdom of God, the antiquity of his perſon, his glories, excellencies, and beauties, as in the books of Proverbs and Canticles; the knowledge of God, his fear and worſhip, mind and will; and the knowledge of a future ſtate, and of the general judgment, as in this book; and in proportion to his own knowledge ſo he taught; for thus the words with the preceding may be rendered, that the more that the preacher was wiſe, the more he taught the people knowledge[c]; he taught according to the abilities he had received, as preachers ſhould; the more he grew in grace and knowledge, the more largely he communicated to others; and this he did daily, as Aben Ezra renders the words, conſtantly, continually, inceſſantly, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, as faithful goſpel-miniſters do. Yea, he gave good heed; to what he heard, and to what he read, to which the apoſtle's advice agrees, 1 Tim. iv. 13. or he cauſed others to hear, and give good heed to what is ſaid, as Aben Ezra; he engaged their attention by his enlivening diſcourſes; or as Kimchi, he weighed things in his own mind, and in the balance of the ſanctuary; and thoroughly conſidered and digeſted them before he delivered them to others. And ſought out; was very diligent in inveſtigating truth, he ſearched into the mines of knowledge for it, the ſacred writings, as one would for gold and ſilver, and as he himſelf directs, Prov. ii. 4, 5. And ſet in order many proverbs; three thouſand of them, 1 Kings iv. 32. particularly thoſe which are in the book of that name, penned by him; he ſelected the moſt choice, pithy, and ſententious ſayings of his own and others; and theſe he huddled not up, or threw them together in a diſorderly and confuſed manner; but put them together in proper order and method, under proper heads, as well as in a correct ſtile, that they might be more received, and more eaſily retained. The Targum is, “he attended to the voice of the wiſe “men, and ſearched the books of wiſdom; and by “a ſpirit of prophecy from the Lord compoſed “books of wiſdom, and very many proverbs of “underſtanding.”

℣. 10. The preacher ſought to find out acceptable words, &c.] Not mere words, fine and florid ones, the words which man's wiſdom teacheth, an elegant ſtile, or eloquent language; not but that it is proper for a preacher to ſeek out and uſe words ſuitable and apt to convey right ideas to the minds of men of what he ſays; but doctrines are rather here meant, words of deſire, delight, and pleaſure[d], as the phraſe may be rendered; even of God's good will and pleaſure, ſo Alſhech; for the ſame word is ſometimes uſed of God in this book and elſewhere; ſee chap. iii. 1. and viii. 6. Iſa. liii. 10. and ſo may take in the doctrine of God's everlaſting love to his people, and his delight and pleaſure in them; of his good will towards them in ſending Chriſt to ſuffer and die for them, and ſave them; in pardoning their ſins through his blood, in which he delights; in regenerating and calling them by his grace, and revealing the things of the goſpel to them, when he hides them from others, which is all of his own will and pleaſure, and as it ſeems good in his ſight: or words and doctrines, which are deſirable, pleaſing, and acceptable unto men; not that Solomon did, or preachers ſhould, ſeek to pleaſe men, or ſeek to ſay things merely for the ſake of pleaſing men, for then they would not be the ſervants of Chriſt; nor are the doctrines of the goſpel pleaſing to carnal men, but the reverſe; they gnaſh their teeth at them, as Chriſt's hearers did at him; the preaching of a crucified Chriſt is fooliſhneſs, and the things of the ſpirit of God are inſipid things to natural men; they are enemies to the goſpel; but to ſenſible ſinners they are very delightful, ſuch as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation by Chriſt, 1 Tim. i. 15. for the worth of them they are more deſirable to them than gold and ſilver, and are more delightful to the ear than the beſt of muſic, and more acceptable to the taſte than honey or the honey-comb, Pſal. xix. 10. and cxix. 72, 103. And that which was written was upright; meaning what was written in this book, or in any other parts of ſcripture, which the preacher ſought out and inculcated; it was according to the mind and will of God, and to the reſt of the ſacred word; it was ſincere, unmixed, and unadulterated with the doctrines and inventions of men; it ſhewed that man had loſt his uprightneſs, had none of himſelf, and where it was to be had, even in Chriſt; and was a means of making men ſound, ſincere, and upright at heart; and of directing them to walk uprightly, and to live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly, in the world. Even words of truth; which come from the God of truth, that cannot lie, as all ſcripture does; of which, Chriſt, who is the truth, is the ſum and ſubſtance; and which are inſpired by the Spirit of truth, and led into by him, and made effectual to ſaving purpoſes; and which holds good of the whole ſcripture, called the ſcripture of truth, Dan. x. 21. and of the goſpel, which is the word of truth, and of every doctrine of it, John xvii. 17. Eph. i. 13.

℣. 11. The words of the wiſe are as goads, &c.] As the goad teacheth the ox, ſo the Targum. Not the words of the wiſe philoſophers of that age, or of ages before, or ſince; but of the inſpired penmen of the ſcriptures, as Moſes, David, Solomon, and of others ſince; and of all good men, whoſe doctrines are agreeable to them; theſe are like goads or pricks, ſharp-pointed ſticks or ſtaves, with which men puſh and prick their cattle, when driving them from place to place, or plowing with them: and of a ſimilar uſe are the doctrines of the word, when attended with a divine efficacy; theſe are a means of pricking ſinners to the heart; and of laying open their vileneſs and ſinfulneſs to them; and of repentance and contrition; and of awakening them from a ſleep in ſin, to a ſenſe of their danger; and even of killing them, as to their own ſenſe and apprehenſion of things, and with reſpect to their hopes of life by their own works; as the Philiſtines were ſlain by Shamgar with an ox-goad, Judg. iii. 31. ſee Acts ii. 37. Hoſ. vi. 5. and theſe are alſo of uſe to the ſaints, as goads, to ſtir them up, when ſlothful, to the diſcharge of duty; and to awaken them, when drowſy, out of their carnal ſecurity; and to correct them for their faults, by ſharp reproofs and rebukes; as well as to excite them to go on to perfection, who are apt to ſit ſtill and lie down; and to direct them to walk ſtraight on, without turning to the right hand or left. And as nails faſtened by the maſters of aſſemblies; like theſe are the truths and doctrines of the word, when they have a place in the heart, and become the engrafted word there; when they are planted[e] in the ſoul, as the word ſignifies; when they are fixed in the mind and memory, and dwell and abide there: and when as nails driven into any thing, faſten what they are drove into; ſo theſe are the means of faſtening ſouls; of cauſing them to cleave to God and Chriſt; to the church, and his people, and to one another; and to the goſpel, and their profeſſion of it; hence they are not like children, toſſed to and fro, wavering and unſtable: of all which the maſters of the aſſemblies are the inſtruments; that is, miniſters and paſtors of churches. As there were aſſemblies for religious worſhip under the law, in which the prophets, prieſts, and Levites aſſiſted; ſo there are aſſemblies or churches under the goſpel-diſpenſation, which are gathered and meet together for the ſervice of God, and over theſe the miniſters of the word preſide; theſe are ſet over the churches in the Lord, and have the rule of them; though they are not to lord it over God's heritage, or have the dominion over their faith; but are helpers of their joy, and uſeful in the above things, through their miniſtry. Some chooſe to render it, maſters of collections, or gatherings[f]; and think it may reſpect their gathering truths out of the ſacred writings, as the bee gathers honey out of the flowers; in alluſion to thoſe that gathered together the choice and pithy ſentences and ſayings of others, like the men of Hezekiah, Prov. xxv. 1. or to under-ſhepherds, gathering the ſheep into the fold[g], by the order of the principal one; who made uſe of goads, to drive away thieves or wild beaſts, and nails, to preſerve the ſheepfold whole. And others think that, not the words, but the maſters of the aſſemblies themſelves, are compared to nails, and read them, and the maſters of the aſſemblies are as nails faſtened[h]; are well eſtabliſhed, firm and ſure; ſee Iſa. xxii. 23. and others take it to be no other than an epithet of the nails themſelves, and render it, as nails fixed, which are binders; that is, great binding nails, which being fixed in boards, bind, compact, and hold them together; to which the words of the wiſe may be compared, being the means of compacting and holding together the church of God, comparable to a ſheepfold; hence mention is made of the ſhepherd in the next clauſe: or of fixing the attention of the minds of men unto them, and of retaining them in memory, and to which they advert as firſt principles, and never ſwerve from them [i]: but that not miniſters the inſtruments, but the principal and efficient cauſe may have the glory, it is added, which are given from one ſhepherd; not Zorobabel, as Grotius; nor Moſes, as the Targum, Jarchi, and Alſhech; but Chriſt, the one ſhepherd, ſet over the flock; and under whom, the maſters of aſſemblies, or paſtors of churches are, Ezek. xxxvii. 23. John x. 16. from whom they have their gifts and qualifications, their miſſion and commiſſion; and are given to the churches, as paſtors and teachers, to feed them, Eph. iv. 10, 11. Jer. iii. 15. and from whom they have their food, the goſpel and the doctrines of it, to feed the flocks with, aſſigned to their care, John xvii. 8. and xxi. 15—17. though this is to be underſtood, not to the excluſion of God, the Father of Chriſt, by whom all ſcripture is inſpired; nor of the Spirit, by whom holy men of God ſpake as they were moved, 2 Tim. iii. 16. 2 Pet. i. 21.

℣. 12. And further, by theſe, my ſon, be admoniſhed, &c.] Rehoboam, the ſon of Solomon, may be intended, for whoſe ſake more eſpecially this book might be written; though it may take in every hearer of this divine preacher, every diſciple of this teacher, every ſubject of his kingdom, as well as every reader of this book, whom he thus addreſſes, and for whom he was affectionately concerned as a father for a ſon; that they might be enlightened with divine knowledge, warned of that which is evil, and admoniſhed and adviſed to that which is good; by theſe words and writings of his own, and other wiſe men; and by theſe maſters of aſſemblies, who, and their words, are from the one and chief Shepherd; to theſe they would do well to take heed, and to theſe only or chiefly. It may be rendered, and what is the more excellent of theſe, be admoniſhed [k]; to obſerve what is mentioned in the next verſe, and lies in a few words, Fear God, &c. and eſpecially Jeſus Chriſt, the alpha and omega, the ſum and ſubſtance of the whole Bible; of what had been written in Solomon's time, and has been ſince; he is the moſt excellent part of it; or that which concerns him, in his perſon, offices and grace: or thus; and what is above, or more than theſe, beware of [l]; do not trouble thyſelf with any other writings; theſe are ſufficient, all that is uſeful and valuable is to be found in them; and as for others, if read, read them with care and caution, and only as ſerving to explain theſe, and to promote the ſame ends and deſigns, or otherwiſe to be rejected. Of making many books there is no end; many books, it ſeems, were written in Solomon's time; there was the ſame itch of writing as now, it may be; but what was written was not to be mentioned with the ſacred writings, were comparatively uſeleſs and worthleſs. Or the ſenſe is, ſhould Solomon, or any other, write ever ſo many volumes, it would be quite needleſs; and there would be no end of writing, for theſe would not give ſatisfaction and contentment; and which yet was to be had in the word of God; and therefore that ſhould be cloſely attended to: though this may be underſtood, not only of making or compoſing books, but of getting them, as Aben Ezra; of purchaſing them, and ſo making them a man's own. A man may lay out his money, and fill his library with books, and be very little the better for them; what one writer affirms, another denies; what one ſeems to have proved clearly, another riſes up and points out his errors and miſtakes; and this occaſions replies and rejoinders, ſo that there is no end of theſe things, and ſcarce any profit by them; which, without ſo much trouble, may be found in the writings of wiſe men, inſpired by God, and in which we ſhould reſt contented. And much ſtudy is a wearineſs of the fleſh; the ſtudy of languages, and of the ſeveral arts and ſciences, and of various ſubjects in philoſophy and divinity, particularly in writing books on any of theſe ſubjects; which ſtudy is as fatiguing to the body, and brings as much wearineſs on it, as any manual and mechanic operation; it dries up the moiſture of the body, conſumes the ſpirits, and gradually and inſenſibly impairs health, and brings on weakneſs, as well as wearineſs. Some render it, much reading, as Jarchi, and ſo Mr Broughton; and Aben Ezra obſerves, that the word in the Arabic language ſo ſignifies: the Arabic word Lahag ſignifies to deſire any thing greedily, or to be greedily given and addicted to any thing [m]; and ſo may denote ſuch kind of reading here, or ſuch a perſon who is helluo, a glutton at books, as Cato is ſaid to be. And now reading books with ſuch eagerneſs, and with conſtancy, is very weariſome, and is to little advantage; whereas reading the ſcripture, chears and refreſhes the mind, and is profitable and edifying. Guſſetius [n] interprets it of much ſpeaking, long orations, which make weary.

℣. 13. Let us hear the concluſion of the whole matter, &c.] Or the end [o] of it. The ſum and ſubſtance of it, what it all tends to and iſſues in; even the whole of what is contained in this book, and in all other divinely-inſpired writings of Solomon or others; of all that were now written, or before, or ſince: this the preacher calls upon himſelf, as well as his hearers, to attend unto. Or it may be rendered, the end of the whole matter is heard [p]; here ends this book; and you have heard the whole of what deſerves regard, and it lies in theſe few words, Fear God, and keep his commandments: the fear of God includes the whole of internal religion, or powerful godlineſs; all the graces of the Spirit, and the exerciſe of them; reverence of God, love to him, faith in him, and in his Son Jeſus Chriſt; hope of eternal life from him; humility of ſoul, patience and ſubmiſſion to his will, with every other grace; ſo the heathens call religion, metum deorum [q], the fear of God: and keeping of the commandments, or obedience to the whole will of God, is the fruit, effect, and evidence of the former; and takes in all the commands of God, moral and poſitive, whether under the former or preſent diſpenſation; and an obſervance of them in faith, from a prina principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God. For this is the whole duty of man; or, this is the whole man [r]; and makes a man a whole man, perfect, entire, and wanting nothing; whereas, without this, he is nothing, let him have ever ſo much of the wiſdom, wealth, honour and profits of this world. Or, this is the whole of every man [s]; either, as we ſupply it, the duty, work and buſineſs of every man, of every ſon of Adam, be he what he will, high or low, rich or poor, of every age, ſex and condition; or this is the happineſs of every man, or that leads to it; this is the whole of it; this is the ſummum bonum, or chief happineſs of men: Lactantius [t] ſays, the ſummum bonum of a man lies in religion only; it lies in this, and not in any outward thing, as is abundantly proved in this book: and this ſhould be the concern of every one, this being the chief end of man, and what, as Jarchi ſays, he is born unto; or, as the Targum, ſuch ſhould be the life of every man. The Maſoretes begin this verſe with a larger letter than uſual, and repeat it at the end of the book, though not accentuated, to raiſe the attention of the reader [u]; that he may make a particular obſervation of what is ſaid in it, as being of the greateſt moment and importance.

℣. 14. For God ſhall bring every work into judgment, &c.] Not in this life, but in the day of the great judgment, as the Targum explains it; that is, whatever has been done by men, from the beginning of the world, or will be to the end; all being obſerved and taken notice of by the omniſcient God, who has regiſtered them in the book of his remembrance, and, being Judge, will be able to bring them all into account at that awful day; which is here given as a reaſon, why men ſhould fear God, and keep his commandments. With every ſecret thing; that has been committed in ſecret by men, and is unknown to others, even every ſecret thought of the heart; ſee 1 Cor. iv. 5. or, with every ſecret or bidden man [w]; whoſe works are hidden from men, and are not known to be what they are, and who thought to hide themſelves from God; but theſe, with their works, ſhall be brought into open court in judgment. Whether it be good, or whether it be evil; it ſhall then be examined according to the rule of the word, and be judged, and declared to be what it truly is, good or evil; and ſo be either rewarded in a way of grace, or puniſhed: or, whether the man, the hidden man, be good or evil [x], ſo Alſhech; all mankind, every one, will he bring into judgment, whether he be good or evil. This is the laſt end of all things, and in which every man will be concerned. This ſhews, as well as many other things in this book, Solomon's belief of a future ſtate and judgment; and that there is nothing in it to encourage the epicure and atheiſt: which being obſerved by the ancient Jews, they readily admitted it into the canon of ſcripture.

The SONG of SONGS.

THIS book is intitled, in the Hebrew copies, Shir Haſhirim, the Song of Songs. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions call it, the Song; and the title of it in the Syriac verſion, is, "the Wiſdom of Wiſdoms of "the ſame Solomon;" that is, the ſame who wrote the two preceding books. It has always been received and eſteemed by the ancient Jews, as a valuable part of the ſacred writings, calling it, the Holy of Holies[a]; forbidding their children to read it, becauſe of the ſublimity and myſteriouſneſs of it, until they were at years to underſtand it: nor was there ever any controverſy among them about the authenticity of it; but all their writers[b], ancient and more modern, agree, that it was written by the inſpiration of the holy Spirit. The ancient chriſtian fathers and councils have held it as a part of the holy ſcriptures, and have continued it in the canon of them; and it has been received as canonical by Chriſtians in all ages, except a very few, as Theodore of Mopſueſt, condemned for calling it in queſtion by the ſecond council at Conſtantinople, in 553; and Caſtalio, in later times, who for the ſame was cenſured and exiled by the ſenate at Geneva; and Mr Whiſton, in our age, whoſe objections to it, I have attempted to anſwer, in my larger Commentary on this book, publiſhed in 1728, and ſince republiſhed: and I am very ſorry I am obliged to take notice of an objection to the antiquity of it, and to its being Solomon's, made by a learned[c] man, very lately; who obſerves, that the word David, from its firſt appearance in Ruth, where it is written דוד without the yod, continues to be ſo written through the books of Samuel, Kings, Pſalms, Proverbs, Iſaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel; but appears with a yod דויד in the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Zechariah; wherefore he ſuggeſts, that if it was cuſtomary to write this word without a yod till the captivity, and with one after it; then he thinks a ſtrong argument may be drawn from hence againſt the antiquity of the Canticles, and its being made by Solomon, ſince this name is written with a yod in Cant. iv. 4. the only place in it in which it is uſed: but in anſwer to this, it muſt be ſaid, that it is not fact, that the word is invariably without a yod in the books mentioned, particularly the book of Kings: for the authors of the Maſorah have obſerved, on 1 Kings iii. 14. that it is five times written in that book full, as they call it, that is, with a yod דויד three of the places I have traced out, 1 Kings iii. 14. and xi. 4, 36. and have found it ſo written in all the printed copies I have ſeen; and ſo it is read by the Eaſtern Jews, in Ezek. xxxvii. 24. This learned man is aware that it is ſo written, once in Hoſea, and twice in Amos, books written two hundred years before the captivity; but then he obſerves, that in the two laſt places, in Bomberg's edition, it has a little circle (o) to mark it for an error, or a faulty word, though none over the word in Hoſea: but it ſhould be known, that that circle, in hundreds of places, is not uſed to point out any thing faulty in the copy; but is only a mark referring to the margin, and what is obſerved there; and be it, that it does point out an error, or a faulty word, the ſame circle is over the word in Canticles, and conſequently ſhews it to be faulty there, and to be corrected and read without the yod, as it was originally without it there; which obſervation deſtroys the argument from it: and ſo it is read in that place in the Talmud[d] without it, and in the ancient book of Zobar[e]; and indeed it ſeems as if it was read without the yod, in the copies ſeen by the authors of the Little Maſorah; ſince in their note on 1 Kings iii. 14. beſides the five places in the Kings, where it is written full, or with the yod, they ſay, it is ſo written throughout the Chronicles, the twelve minor prophets, and Ezra, which includes Nehemiah; but make no mention of Solomon's Song, which, one would think they would have done, had it been ſo written there in the copies before them: ſo that, upon the whole, the argument, if it has any force in it, turns out for, and not againſt, the antiquity of Solomon's Song. This book of Canticles has plain marks of a divine original, and proofs of its being of divine inſpiration: it was written by one that was inſpired of God, as appears by the books of Proverbs and Eccleſiaſtes, written by him; the greatneſs of the matter contained in it, the dignity, ſublimity and majeſty of its ſtile, ſhew it to be no human compoſure; the power and efficacy which it has had over the hearts of men, in reading it, and hearing it explained, is another evidence of its being the word of God, which is quick and powerful; the impartiality of it, the bride, who is introduced ſpeaking in it, confeſſing and proclaiming her own failings and infirmities, is no inconſiderable proof of the ſame; to which may be added, the agreement between this and other portions of ſcripture, as particularly Pſalm xlv. and there ſeem to be many alluſions and references to various paſſages of this book, in the New Teſtament; ſee Matt. ix. 13. and xiii. 52. and xxi. 38. and xxv. 1, &c. John iii. 8, 29. and vi. 44. 2 Cor. xi. 3. Eph. v. 27. Col. ii 17. Rev. iii. 20. and xix. 7, 8. compared with Cant. i. 3, 4. and ii. 17. and iv. 7, 16. and v. 1, 2. and vii. 13. and viii. 11, 12. In what time of Solomon's life this book was written, is not agreed on: ſome of the Jewiſh writers ſay, the book of Proverbs was written firſt, then the Song of Songs, and laſt of all Eccleſiaſtes; others, that the Song was wrote firſt, then Proverbs, and then Eccleſiaſtes [f]; though their chronologer [g] ſays, they were all written in his old age, as indeed the laſt book ſeems to be; but the Song rather ſeems to have been written in the middle part of his life, when in the moſt flouriſhing circumſtances, as to body, mind and eſtate. Dr Lightfoot [h] is of opinion, it might be written in the thirtieth year of his reign, about ten years before his death, after he had built his ſummer-houſe in Lebanon, to which he ſuppoſes reſpect is had in chap. iv. 8. and vii. 4. and upon his bringing Pharaoh's daughter to the houſe prepared for her, 1 Kings ix. 24. but be this as it may, it was not a celebration of the amours between Solomon and her, ſince the literal ſenſe, in many places, would be monſtrous and abſurd; and beſides, it muſt be written twenty years at leaſt after that, if the houſe of the foreſt of Lebanon is referred to in the above places; nor does it ſet forth their amours, and the marriage between them, as typical of the inexpreſſible love and marriage-union between Chriſt and his church; though there is a reſemblance between natural and ſpiritual marriage, and the love of perſons in ſuch a relation to one another, and to which there may be an alluſion in ſome paſſages. Nor is this book hiſtorical and prophetic, expreſſing either the ſtate of the people of Iſrael, from the times of Abraham to Solomon, and ſo to the Meſſiah; in which way go many Jewiſh interpreters, as the Targum, Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and others: nor is it to be conſidered as deſcribing the ſtate of the church of God, whether legal, from the times of David and Solomon, and before, in and after the captivity, to the birth and death of Chriſt; or the goſpel-church, in its beginning, progreſs, various changes, and conſummation, as Brightman and Cotton: nor as ſetting forth the ſeveral ages and periods of the chriſtian church, in agreement with the ſeven churches of Aſia, as Cocceius, and thoſe that follow him, Horchius, Hofman, and Heuniſchius; which latter, particularly, makes this diſtribution of them: 1. The Epheſian church, Cant. i. 5—17. from the aſcenſion of Chriſt to heaven, A.C. 33, to 370. 2. The Smyrnæan church, Cant. ii. 1—17. from A.C. 371, to 707. 3. The church at Pergamus, Cant. iii. 1—11. from A.C. 708, to 1045. 4. The Thyatirian church, Cant. iv. 1—chap. v. 1. from A.C. 1046, to 1383. 5. The Sardian church, Cant. v. 2—chap. vi. 8. from A.C. 1384, to 1721. 6. The church at Philadelphia, Cant. vi. 9—chap. vii. 14. from A.C. 1722, to 2059. 7. The Laodicean church, Cant. viii. 1—14. from A.C. 2060, and onwards. But theſe ſenſes are very arbitrary, uncertain and precarious, and limit the ſeveral parts of it to certain periods; whereas it is applicable to believers, in all ages of time. The whole is figurative and allegorical; expreſſing, in a variety of lively metaphors, the love, union and communion between Chriſt and his church; ſetting forth the ſeveral different frames, caſes and circumſtances of believers, in this life; ſo that they can be in no caſe and condition ſpiritual whatever, but there is ſomething in this Song ſuitable to them; and which ſerves much to recommend it, and ſhews the excellency of it; and that it juſtly claims the title it bears, the Song of Songs, the moſt excellent. M. Boſſuet [i] is of opinion, that whereas the nuptial feaſt with the Hebrews was kept ſeven days, this Song is to be diſtributed into ſeven parts, a part to be ſung, one each day, during the celebration: The firſt day, chap. i—ii. 16. The ſecond day, chap. ii. 7—17. The third day, chap. iii.—v. 1. The fourth day, chap. v. 2—vi. 9. The fifth day, chap. vi. 10—vii. 11. The ſixth day, chap. vii. 12—viii. 3. The ſeventh day, chap. viii. 4—14. The thought is ingenious, but ſeems too fanciful, and without foundation.

CHAP. I.

IN this chapter, after the general title of the book, ℣. 1. the church expreſſes her ſtrong deſires, and moſt ardent wiſhes, for ſome freſh diſcoveries of the love of Chriſt to her, and for communion with him; having taſted of his love, ſmelt a ſweet ſavour in his grace, and enjoyed fellowſhip with him in his houſe, ℣. 2—4. She obſerves her blackneſs and uncomelineſs in herſelf; the trials and afflictions ſhe met with from others; and her careleſſneſs and negligence of her own affairs, ℣. 5, 6. and intreats her beloved to direct her where ſhe might meet with him, feeding his flocks, and giving them reſt: to which he returns a kind and gracious anſwer; gives her proper inſtructions where to find him, ℣. 7, 8. and commends her beauty; ſets forth her amiableneſs and lovelineſs, by various metaphors; and makes promiſes of more grace, and good things to her, ℣. 9—11. And then ſhe declares what a value ſhe had for Chriſt, her beloved; and how precious he was unto her, like a bundle of myrrh, and a cluſter of camphire, ℣. 12—14. Chriſt again praiſes her beauty; and particularly takes notice of her eyes, and her modeſt look, ℣. 15. and ſhe returns the encomium back to him, and expreſſes her pleaſure and ſatisfaction in the houſe he had built for her, and the furniture of it, ℣. 16, 17.

℣. 1. The ſong of ſongs, which is Solomon's.] Wrote by Solomon, king of Iſrael, as the amanuenſis of the holy Ghoſt; and not by Hezekiah and his men, as the Jews ſay [k]: or, concerning Solomon [l]; Chriſt, of whom Solomon was a type; ſee chap. iii. 7. of his perſon, excellencies, love to his church, care of her, and concern for her; and of the nearneſs and communion he admitted her to, and indulged her with. The Jews have a ſaying [m]; that wherever the word Solomon is uſed in this ſong, the holy One is meant, the holy God, or Meſſiah: it is called the ſong of ſongs, becauſe the moſt excellent, as the Holy of holies, King of kings, &c. which, with the Hebrews, expreſs a ſuperlative; this being more excellent than the One hundred and Five ſongs, written by Solomon, or than any human compoſure whatever; yea, preferable to all ſcriptural ſongs, as to ſubject, manner of ſtile, and copiouſneſs of expreſſion, and the comprehenſiveneſs of it.

℣. 2. Let him kiſs me with the kiſſes of his mouth, &c.] That is, Solomon; Chriſt, the antitype of Solomon, the church's beloved: or it is a relative without an antecedent, which was only in her own mind, let him; him, whom her thoughts were ſo much employed about; her affections were ſo ſtrongly after; and whoſe image was as it were before her, preſent to her mind: and the kiſſes of his mouth, ſhe deſires, intend ſome freſh manifeſtations and diſcoveries of his love to her; by ſome precious word of promiſe from his mouth, applied to her; and by an open eſpouſal of her, and the conſummation of marriage with her. It may be rendered, with one of the kiſſes of his mouth [n]; kiſſes with the ancients were very rare, and uſed but once when perſons were eſpouſed, and as a token of that; and then they were reckoned as huſband and wife [o]: on which account, it may be, it is here deſired; ſince it was after this we hear of the ſpouſe being brought into the nuptial chamber, and of the keeping of the nuptial feaſt, ℣. 4, 12. For thy love is better than wine; or loves [p]; which may denote the abundance of it; the many bleſſings of grace which flow from it; and the various ways in which it is expreſſed; as well as the high eſteem the church had of it. This is ſaid to be better than wine; for the antiquity of it, it being from everlaſting; and for the purity of it, being free from all dregs of diſſimulation and deceit on the part of Chriſt, and from all merit, motives and conditions, on the part of the church; for its plenty, being ſhed plenteouſly in the hearts of believers, and who may drink abundantly of it; and for its freeneſs and cheapneſs, being to be had without money and without price: and it is preferable to wine for the effects of it; which not only revives and chears heavy hearts, but quickens dead ſinners, and comforts diſtreſſed ſaints; and of which they may drink plentifully, without hurt, yea, to great advantage.

℣. 3. Becauſe of the ſavour of thy good ointments, &c.] It was uſual for lovers to anoint themſelves, their hair, garments, &c. to recommend themſelves to each other; and it was common to commend each others ointments, and the grateful ſmell of them [q], none being like them, or ſo agreeable as theirs: by theſe ointments may be meant the grace of Chriſt, the fulneſs of it, the oil of gladneſs with which he is anointed above his fellows, and without meaſure; and which ſo greatly recommends him to his church and people, Pſal. xlv. 7. John i. 14. Thy name is as ointment poured forth; which emits the greater odour for its being poured forth out of the box. The very names of lovers are dear to one another, ſweeter than nectar itſelf [r]; the very mention of them gives an inexpreſſible pleaſure. This may reſpect not merely the fame of Chriſt ſpread abroad in the world through the miniſtry of the word; nor the goſpel only, which is his name, Acts ix. 15. and is like a box of ointment broke open, which diffuſes the ſavour of his knowledge every where; but ſome precious name of his, as Immanuel, God with us; Jeſus, a Saviour; but more particularly his name Meſſiah, which ſignifies Anointed, the anointed prophet, prieſt, and king of his church. Therefore do the virgins love thee; for the preciouſneſs of his perſon, the fulneſs of grace in him, and the truths of his goſpel: and which love ſhews itſelf in a deſire of his preſence, and communion with him; in a regard to his word and worſhip, to his truths and ordinances; and to his people, to converſation and communion with them. By theſe virgins are meant either congregational churches that ſtrictly adhere to Chriſt, and to his pure worſhip; or particular believers, for their inviolate attachment to him; for the ſingleneſs and ſincerity of their love to him; for their incorruptneſs in the doctrine of faith; for the truth and ſpirituality of their worſhip; for the purity of their lives and converſations; for their beauty and comelineſs through Chriſt; for their gay and coſtly attire, being clothed with his righteouſneſs; and for their modeſt behaviour, having the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit.

℣. 4. Draw me, &c.] With the cords of love, for what draw lovers to each other more ſtrongly? under the influence of that they cannot bear to be without each others company. Aben Ezra takes theſe words to be ſpoken by the virgins, who every one of them ſaid this, promiſing upon it to follow after the drawer; but they are rather the requeſt of the church, deſirous of nearer and more intimate communion with Chriſt; for this is not to be underſtood of drawing at firſt converſion, as the fruit of love, and under the influence of grace, Jer. xxxi. 3. John vi. 44. but of being brought nearer to Chriſt, and to enjoy more of him. We will run after thee; the church and the virgins, ſhe and her companions, or particular believers; every one of them in their reſpective ſtations would act with more vigour upon ſuch drawings; would run in a way of duty, follow Chriſt, and walk in his ſteps; and as they had him for an example, and according to his word, and in the ways of his commandments: or that we may run after thee [s]; intimating that there is no running without drawing; no following Chriſt, at leaſt no running after him with alacrity and chearfulneſs, without being drawn by his love, and influenced by his grace. The king hath brought me into his chambers; the bleſſing ſhe ſought after, and was ſo ſolicitous for in the preceding verſes; namely, to have the marriage conſummated, to be owned by Chriſt as his ſpouſe and bride, by taking her home and introducing her into the nuptial chamber; by putting her into the enjoyment of himſelf, and the poſſeſſion of his ſubſtance: and this being done by him as king of ſaints, yea of the world, ſhewed great condeſcenſion on his part, and great honour beſtowed on her; ſince by this act, as he was king, ſhe was declared queen! We will be glad and rejoice in thee; ſhe and her bride-maids, the virgins that attended her; that is, when he ſhould introduce her into his chambers, as ſome[t] render the words; then they ſhould expreſs their joy and gladneſs on that occaſion; and that in the greatneſs, glory, and fitneſs of his perſon; in the fulneſs of grace in him; in the bleſſings of grace from him; in what he has done for, and is to his church and people; in the offices he bears, and in the relations he ſtands in to them; and particularly that of an huſband, now declared. We will remember thy love more than wine; which upon the introduction of the bride to the bridegroom might be plentifully drank; of the preferableneſs of Chriſt's love to wine, ſee the note on ℣. 2. it may deſign more particularly the love of Chriſt, expreſſed at this time of ſolemnizing the marriage between him and his church in an open manner, Hoſea ii. 19. and which would never be forgotten: Chriſt's love is remembered when thought of, and meditated upon; when faith is exerciſed on it, and the deſires of the ſoul are drawn after it, and the affections ſet upon it; and when it is often ſpoken of to others, being uppermoſt in the mind; ſaints under the goſpel-diſpenſation have an ordinance for this purpoſe, to commemorate the love of Chriſt. The upright love thee; or uprightneſſes[u]; men of upright hearts and converſations, who have right ſpirits renewed in them; or Iſraelites indeed, in whom there is no guile; who have the truth of grace in them, walk uprightly according to the rule of God's word and the goſpel of Chriſt; and do all they do ſincerely, from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God; ſuch love Chriſt ſuperlatively, ſincerely, fervently, and conſtantly; and love him rightly, or moſt uprightly, as ſome[w] render the phraſe.

℣. 5. I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jeruſalem, &c.] The church having obtained of Chriſt what ſhe wanted, turns to the daughters of Jeruſalem, the ſame perhaps with the virgins her companions; they ſeem to be young converts, it may be not yet members of the viſible church, but had a great reſpect for the church, and ſhe for them; and who though they had but a ſmall knowledge of Chriſt her beloved, yet were deſirous of knowing more of him, and ſeeking him with her; ſee chap. iii. 9—11. and v. 8. 9. and vi. 1. to theſe ſhe gives this character of herſelf, that ſhe was black in herſelf[x] through original ſin and actual tranſgreſſion; in her own eyes through indwelling ſin, and many infirmities, ſpots, and blemiſhes in life; and in the eyes of the world, through afflictions, perſecutions, and reproaches, ſhe was attended with, and ſo with them the offſcouring of all things: but comely in the eyes of Chriſt, called by him his fair one, the faireſt among women, and even all fair, ℣. 8, 15. and chap. iv. 7. through his comelineſs put upon her, the imputation of his righteouſneſs to her; thro' the beauties of holineſs upon her; thro' the ſanctifying influences of his Spirit; and being in a church-ſtate, walking in goſpel-order, attending to the commands and ordinances of Chriſt; and ſo beautiful as Tirzah, and comely as Jeruſalem, chap. vi. 4. and upon all accounts deſirable[y] to Chriſt, and to his people, as the word may be rendered. As the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon; each of which are thought by ſome to refer to both parts of her character; and ſuppoſe that the tents of Kedar, though they might look mean without, were full of wealth and riches within; and Solomon's curtains, or hangings, might have an outward covering not ſo rich and beautiful as they were within ſide; but rather the blackneſs of the church is deſigned by the one, and her comelineſs by the other. With reſpect to her blackneſs ſhe compares herſelf to the tents of Kedar, to the inhabitants of thoſe tents, who were of a black or ſwarthy complexion; Kedar ſignifies the name of a man whoſe poſterity theſe were, that dwelt in tents, even of Kedar the ſecond ſon of Iſhmael, and who inhabited ſome part of Arabia; and their employment being to feed cattle, moved from place to place for the ſake of paſturage, and ſo dwelt in tents, which they could eaſily remove, and hence were called Scenites; and the tents they dwelt in being made of hair-cloth, and continually expoſed to the ſun and rain, were very black, and yet a number of them made a fine appearance, as Dr Shaw relates[z]; though black yet were beautiful to behold; he ſays, "the Bedoween Arabs at this day live in tents called hhymes, from the ſhelter which they afford the inhabitants; and beet el ſhaar, i. e. houſes of hair, from the materials or webs of goats-hair whereof they were made; and are ſuch hair-cloth as our coal-ſacks are made of; the colour of them is beautifully alluded to Cant. i. 5. for nothing certainly can afford, ſays he, a more delightful proſpect than a large extenſive plain, whether in its verdure, or even ſcorched up by the ſun-beams, than theſe moveable habitations pitched in circles upon them; of which, he ſays, he has ſeen from three to three hundred." And for her comelineſs the church compares herſelf either to the curtains of Solomon, about his bed, or to the rich hangings of tapeſtry in the ſeveral apartments of his palace, which no doubt were very coſtly and magnificent.

℣. 6. Look not upon me, &c.] Meaning not with ſcorn and diſdain becauſe of her meanneſs; nor as prying into her infirmities to expoſe her; nor with joy at her trials and afflictions; neither of theſe can be ſuppoſed in the daughters of Jeruſalem addreſſed by her: but rather, not look on her as amazed at her ſufferings, as though ſome ſtrange thing had befallen her; nor at her blackneſs only, on one account or another, leſt they ſhould be ſtumbled; but at her beauty alſo. Becauſe I am black; or blackiſh; ſomewhat black[a], but not ſo black as might be thought, or as ſhe was repreſented: the radicals of the word being doubled, ſome underſtand it as diminiſhing; but rather it increaſes the ſignification; ſee Pſal. xlv. 2. Prov. viii. 31. and ſo it may be rendered very black[b], exceeding black; and this ſhe repeats for the ſake of an opportunity of giving the reaſon of it, as follows. Becauſe the ſun hath looked upon me; and had burnt her, and made her black; which effect the ſun has on perſons in ſome countries, tries, and eſpecially on ſuch who are much abroad in the fields, and employed in rural ſervices[c]; as ſhe was, being a keeper of vineyards, as in this verſe, and of flocks of ſheep, as in the following. This may be underſtood of the ſun of perſecution that had beat upon her, and had left ſuch impreſſions on her, and had made her in this hue, and which ſhe bore patiently; nor was ſhe aſhamed of it, nor ſhould ſhe be upbraided with it, nor ſlighted on account of it; ſee Matt. xiii. 6, 21. My mother's children were angry with me; by whom may be meant carnal profeſſors, members of the ſame ſociety, externally children of the ſame mother, pretend to godlineſs, but are enemies to it: theſe were angry with the church for holding and defending the pure doctrines of the goſpel; for keeping the ordinances as they were delivered; and for faithful reproofs and admonitions to them and others, for their diſagreeable walk: and theſe grieved the church, and made her go mourning and in black; and more blackened her character and reputation than any thing elſe whatever: though it may be underſtood of any carnal men, who deſcend from mother Eve, or ſpring from mother earth, angry with the church and her members for preciſeneſs in religion; and particularly violent perſecutors of her, who yet would be thought to be religious, may be intended. They made me the keeper of the vineyards; this is another thing that added to her blackneſs, lying abroad in the fields to keep the vineyards of others, by which may be meant falſe churches, as true ones are ſometimes ſignified by them; and her compliance with their corrupt worſhip and ordinances, which was not voluntary but forced; they made me, obliged her, and this increaſed her blackneſs; as alſo what follows. But mine own vineyard have I not kept; which made her blacker ſtill; her church-ſtate, or the ſpiritual affairs of her own, her duty and buſineſs incumbent on her[d], were ſadly neglected by her: and this ſin of hers ſhe does not pretend to extenuate by the uſage of her mother's children; but ingenuouſly confeſſes the fault was her own, to neglect her own vineyard and keep others, which was greatly prejudicial to her, and was reſented by Chriſt; upon which it ſeems he departed from her, ſince ſhe was at a loſs to know where he was, as appears from the following words. With the Romans neglect of fields, trees, and vineyards, came under the notice of the cenſors, and was not to go unpuniſhed[e].

℣. 7. Tell me, O thou whom my ſoul loveth, &c.] With all her heart, cordially and ſincerely; for, notwithſtanding her ſinful compliance with others, and neglect of her own affairs, ſhe had not loſt her love to Chriſt; and, being ſenſible of her ſin and folly, whereby ſhe was deprived of his company, and communion with him, applies to him to guide, direct and reſtore her wandering ſoul; and particularly inform her, Where, ſays ſhe, thou feedeſt; that is, his flock, like a ſhepherd: for this phraſe ſuppoſes him to be a ſhepherd, as he is, of God's chooſing, appointing, and ſetting up, the chief, the good, the great, and only ſhepherd of the ſheep; and that he has a flock to feed, which is but one, and a little one, is his property, given him by God, purchaſed by his blood, called a flock of ſlaughter, and yet a beautiful one, he has undertook to feed; and feeding it, includes the whole buſineſs of a ſhepherd, in leading the ſheep into paſtures, protecting them from all enemies, reſtoring them when wandering, healing their diſeaſes, watching over them in the night-ſeaſons, and making all neceſſary proviſions for them. Or, tell me, how thou feedeſt[f]? the manner of it, and with what; which he does by his miniſters, word and ordinances; with himſelf, the bread of life; with the doctrines and promiſes of the goſpel, and with the diſcoveries of his love. Where thou makeſt thy flocks to reſt at noon; either at the noon of temptation, when Satan's fiery darts fly thick and faſt; when Chriſt is a ſhadow and ſhelter in his perſon, grace, blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, Iſa. xxv. 4, 5. or the noon of affliction, when he makes their bed in it, and gives them reſt from adverſity; or the noon of perſecution, when Chriſt leads his flocks to cooling ſhades, and gives them reſt in himſelf, when troubled by others: the alluſion is to ſhepherds, in hot countries, leading their flocks to ſome ſhady place, where they may be ſheltered from the ſcorching heat of the ſun; which, as Virgil ſays[g], was at the fourth hour, or ten o'clock, two hours before noon: we read of προβατια μεσημβριαζοντα[h], ſheep nooning themſelves, or lying down at noon, under a ſhade, by a fountain, aſleep. For why ſhould I be as one that turneth aſide by the flocks of thy companions? not real aſſociates with Chriſt, that keep company with him, and are attached to his word and ordinances; but falſe friends, hypocrites and heretics[i], rivals with him, who ſet up ſchemes of worſhip and doctrine in oppoſition to his; ſuch as Papiſts, Socinians, &c. now ſuch falſe teachers have had their flocks in all ages, ſuch as have followed them, and have formed ſeparate ſocieties; and therefore the church, ſenſible of their craftineſs, and her own weakneſs, and liableneſs to go aſtray, deſires ſhe might not be under, and left to ſuch a temptation, as to apoſtatize from Chriſt, and join to ſuch perſons and their flocks, or ſeem to do ſo: or, be as one that covereth herſelf, or is covered[k]; as a harlot; ſo Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 14. or as a widow in mourning; ſhe choſe not to be, or to be thought to be, either as one that left her huſband, an unchaſte woman; or had loſt her huſband, or as if ſhe had none, when neither was the caſe: or, as one that ſpreads the tent[l]; by the flocks of ſuch; as if in communion with them, and joining with them in feeding their flocks; and therefore deſires ſhe might ſpeedily know where Chriſt was, and repair to him, that ſuch an aſperſion or ſuſpicion might at once be wiped from her.

℣. 8. If thou know not, &c.] Or ſeeing thou knoweſt not[m]; the ſaints in this imperfect ſtate know but in part, are ignorant of many things, and in ſome meaſure of themſelves; for though they know much of the ſinfulneſs and deceitfulneſs of their hearts, yet they know not all; and of their imperfection and weakneſs, yet not the whole of it; and ſome render the words, if thou know not to thee, or for thyſelf, as Ainſworth; or know not thyſelf[n], as others; hence Ambroſe[o] obſerves that noſce teipſum was not originally from the Pythian oracle; Solomon had it before that, and he from Moſes, Deut. iv. 9.

Saints have not a perfect knowledge of Chriſt and his truths, and are ſometimes at a loſs to know where he is, his word is purely preached, and his ordinances faithfully adminiſtered. O thou faireſt among women; theſe are not the words of the daughters of Jeruſalem, as ſome think, who were not capable of giving her the following advice and directions; but of Chriſt himſelf, to whom the church applied for it; who though black in her own eyes, and in the eyes of others, yet was fair, ſurpaſſingly fair, fairer than all others in his eye, even notwithſtanding her late ſinfulneſs and negligence; which ſhews the invariableneſs and unalterableneſs of his love; who directs her as follows. Go thy way forth by the footſteps of the flock; not from the footſteps[p]; as if it was an exhortation to depart from falſe teachers, their doctrine and worſhip, and the abettors of them, ſhe was tempted to turn aſide to; but the footſteps are the rule and mark by which ſhe was to go, and on which ſhe was to keep her eye, and ſteer her courſe by, in ſeeking after Chriſt: for by the flock is meant the flock of Chriſt; and by the footſteps of it the ways and ordinances in which ſaints walk in obedience to Chriſt; and who are to be followed ſo far as they follow him; their ſteps are to be trod in; and this is the readieſt and moſt likely way to find Chriſt, even where ſaints meet together, the word is preached, and ordinances adminiſtered. And feed thy kids beſide the ſhepherds tents; the faithful miniſters of the word, who are Chriſt's under-ſhepherds, have their miſſion and commiſſion from him, and are qualified by him to feed his flocks, and do feed them by the pure adminiſtration of the word and ordinances; and by the tents are meant the places of public worſhip, where they uſually preach the goſpel, and adminiſter ordinances. The alluſion is to the tents of ſhepherds pitched for the convenience of feeding their flocks; and by or near[q] theſe the church is directed to feed her kids, young converts weak in the faith; men of little faith, as Aben Ezra interprets it; called kids, or young goats, laſcivious[r], and of an ill ſmell; becauſe of ſin in them, of an ill ſmell to themſelves and others; and of whom the world have an ill opinion; and ſuch on all accounts need encouragement from the church and miniſters. It was common in the eaſtern countries, as Philo ſays[s] of the Arabs, not for men only to keep flocks, but women alſo, and young virgins; and not the common people only, but nobles; of women keeping flocks ſee Gen. xxix.9. Exod. ii.16. This and the preceding verſe ſhew this ſong to be a paſtoral; ſince the bridegroom and bride, the principal perſons in it, are repreſented in it as a ſhepherd and ſhepherdeſs.

℣. 9. I have compared thee, O my love, &c.] The church having taken the direction of Chriſt, had now found him, and was with him; and when for her encouragement and comfort he ſalutes her as his love, an appellation very uſual among lovers; and in the chaſteſt ſenſe between huſband and wife; the church was Chriſt's love, being both the object and ſubject of it; to whom he had ſhewed love, and whoſe love was ſhed abroad in her heart: or my friend[t], another name uſed among lovers; there is a mutual friendſhip between Chriſt and his people; they are Chriſt's friends, and he is theirs, chap. v. 1, 16. The Septuagint render it my neighbour, whom Chriſt loves as himſelf; and they dwell near each other; he dwells in them, and they in him, John vi. 56. and here are compared by him to a company of horſes in Pharaoh's chariots; or I have likened thee, or reckoned thee like[u]; formed ſuch an image of thee in my mind, with regard to ſome peculiar excellencies in her which agreed therewith: or to my mare[w], as ſome tranſlate the word, which ran in one of his chariots, called Pharaoh's chariot; becauſe perhaps it was made a preſent of to him by Pharaoh king of Egypt, his father-in-law, for which he had a particular regard, as Alexander for his Bucephalus; nor is ſuch a compariſon of a woman a diſagreeable one, ſince, as Marckius obſerves, many women have had their names from the horſe, becauſe of ſome celebrated excellency in them[x]; and Theocritus[y] compares queen Helena to a Theſſalian horſe in a chariot; and it is thought he took the hint from this ſong, as admiring it; ſo by others[z], perſons are compared to mares for their beautiful form. Chriſt's church and people may be compared to the horſe for their ſtrength, courage, majeſty, and comelineſs; they are ſtrong in Chriſt, and in his grace, and of an undaunted courage in bearing hardſhips, reproaches, and perſecutions for his ſake, and in fighting the Lord's battles; and are ſtately and majeſtic, eſpecially a company of them in goſpel-order, chap. vi. 4. and are very comely and beautiful in their trappings, clothed with the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and the graces of his Spirit; and to a company of them, a collection of goodly ones, as Egyptian ones, reckoned the beſt; and thoſe in Pharaoh's chariot beſt of all; choice, coſtly, well fed, and well taken care of; and not wild and looſe, but coupled and joined together in a chariot, all drawing one way. Chriſt's church and people are a choice and ſelect company, diſtinguiſhed from others by the grace of God; coſt a great price, the blood of Chriſt; are well fed with the fineſt of the wheat; and are under the care both of angels and goſpel-miniſters; and look very beautiful as under the yoke of Chriſt, and joined together in goſpel-bonds, being of the ſame faith and judgment; drawing one way, ſtriving together for the faith of the goſpel, and endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

℣. 10. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, &c.] Or beautiful as turtle doves, as the Septuagint; or it may be rendered with turtles, ſince the word jewels is not in the text; not with images of turtles on the bridles of the horſes before mentioned, as Aben Ezra; but rather ſome ornaments of women having ſuch images on them may be meant, called turtles, or turturellas; they ſeem to me to be the ſame with the earings, which being faſtened to a thin plate of gold or ſilver, which went croſs the forehead, or to a ribbon bound on it, as Aben Ezra on Gen. xxiv. 22. obſerves; hung down by the ears in rows on both ſides of the cheeks, and made but one ornament; as they did when another jewel from the ſame plate or ribbon hung down from the forehead to the noſe, called a noſe-jewel, Ezek. xvi. 12.[a] and ſuch an ornament conſiſting of theſe ſeveral parts Abraham's ſervant is ſaid to put upon the face or cheeks of Rebekah, Gen. xxiv. 47. and theſe may reſpect the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God, with which the church is ornamented; and are many and various, and are orderly and regularly diſpoſed, and make very comely and lovely, and may be farther deſcribed in the next clauſe. Thy neck with chains of gold; the word gold not being in the text, the chains may be underſtood, as they commonly are by the Jewiſh writers, of precious ſtones; as pearls bored and ſtrung, which make a necklace; ſo Stockius[b] interprets it of an ornament of pearls and precious ſtones, orderly diſpoſed and put about the neck, in uſe with great perſonages; ſo the eldeſt daughter of Priamus had, collo monile baccatum[c], a pearl-necklace, which Æneas made a preſent of to Dido; ſuch was the chain of gold beſet with amber, preſented to Penelope by her ſuitors, which ſhone like the ſun[d]. The church has her golden chain, or pearl-necklace; which are either the graces of the Spirit, ſo linked together, that where there is one there are all; and which conſiſts of thoſe ten links, or pearls, faith, hope, love, repentance, humility, patience, ſelf-denial, contentment in every ſtate, ſpiritual knowledge, long-ſuffering, or forbearance; ſincerity goes through them all. Or elſe the ſpiritual bleſſings of the covenant of grace, with which the church and all the ſaints are bleſſed in Chriſt at once, and with one and all; and which golden chain of ſalvation, one link of which cannot be broken, is excellently deſcribed by the apoſtle in Rom. viii. 30.

℣. 11. We will make thee borders of gold with ſtuds of ſilver.] Chriſt here in his own name, and in the name of the other two divine perſons, promiſes to the church a greater glory than as yet ſhe had enjoyed; and ſeems to have reſpect to the goſpel-diſpenſation: for by golden borders ſtudded with ſilver may be meant the ordinances of the goſpel, preferable to thoſe under the law; and therefore ſaid to be of gold and ſilver for their glory, ſplendor, and durableneſs: or elſe the doctrines of the goſpel, being of more worth than thouſands of gold and ſilver; and being called borders, or rather rows[e], may denote their orderly diſpoſition and connection, their harmony and agreement with and dependence on each other: and the goſpel is full of ſilver ſpecks or ſtuds of exceeding great and precious promiſes; a variety of them uſeful and pleaſant; a greater meaſure of the grace of the Spirit may be here promiſed: or the borders may intend the ground-work of the church's faith and hope, the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, more clearly revealed; and the ſtuds of ſilver the curious work of ſanctification, more enlarged and increaſed; and ſo take in both Chriſt's righteouſneſs imputed to her, and his grace implanted in her; but perhaps theſe phraſes may be beſt of all underſtood of the new Jeruſalem-ſtate, and of the ultimate glory of the ſaints in heaven, ſometimes ſet forth by ſuch ſimilies, Iſa. liv. 11, 12. Rev. xxi. 18, 19, 21. Both grace and glory are given by Chriſt, and in which all the Three divine Perſons are concerned; for not angels, nor the daughters of Jeruſalem, are here the ſpeakers, to whom ſuch things promiſed cannot agree; nor God, ſpeaking after the manner of men, and for honour's ſake, is deſigned: but the Trinity of Perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit, are meant; the ordinances are of their inſtitution, and adminiſtered in their name, Matt. xxviii. 19. they have all a concern in the goſpel and the doctrines of it, which is called the goſpel of God, and the goſpel of Chriſt, and the miniſtration of the Spirit; the grace of God, in regeneration and converſion, is ſometimes aſcribed to one, and ſometimes to another; and an increaſe of it in the heart, is wiſhed for from all Three, Rev. i. 4. and they have an hand in all the glory the ſaints ſhall enjoy hereafter: the Father has prepared the kingdom from the foundation of the world; the Son has made way for it by his obedience, ſufferings and death; and the Spirit is the earneſt of it, makes meet for it, and introduces into it.

℣. 12. While the king ſitteth at his table, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church, relating what influence the preſence of Chriſt, her Lord and King, had upon the exerciſe of her graces, while he was keeping the nuptial feaſt, on account of his marriage with her. He was anointed King of ſaints from eternity, before his incarnation, when he was rejoicing before God his Father, as if at a feaſt; and while he was thus diſtant, the faith, hope, deſire, and expectation of the ſaints, were exerciſed on him, as their Lord and King that was to come: when he did come, he came as a King, as was foretold of him, though his kingdom was not of this world; and while he was here, the goſpel of the kingdom of heaven was preached, and emitted a ſweet ſavour in Judea: and when he went up to heaven, after his reſurrection, he was declared Lord and Chriſt, and ſat down at the right hand of God, in his circuit[f], or at his round table; alluding to ſuch the ancients uſed, and great perſonages fed on, peculiar to themſelves[g]; being encircled by angels and glorified ſaints: and in the mean while, before his ſecond coming as King, when he will appear as ſuch in a more glorious manner, he ſits down at his table, in the ordinance of the ſupper, feaſting with, entertaining, and welcoming his church and people. When, as follows, ſhe ſays, My ſpikenard ſendeth forth the ſmell thereof; or nard, of which there are many ſorts; but that which grows in ſpikes is reckoned the beſt, and from thence is called ſpikenard; it was a chief ingredient in ointments, as Pliny ſays[h]; ſee John xii. 3. and was much uſed at feſtivals to anoint gueſts with; and with which their head and hair being anointed, gave a fragrant ſmell, and therefore uſed to make them acceptable[i]: in Syria, at royal banquets, as this here was, it was uſual to go round the gueſts, to ſprinkle them with Babylonian ointment[k]. This may have reſpect to the grace of the Spirit in the church, comparable to the moſt excellent ointment; and which grace being in exerciſe in her, both before and after the incarnation of Chriſt, and ſince his aſcenſion to heaven, and whilſt he grants his preſence in goſpel-ordinances, is very delightful and acceptable to Chriſt: or this ſpikenard, according to ſome[l], may be meant of Chriſt himſelf, juſt as he is ſaid to be in the following verſes, a bundle of myrrh, and a cluſter of camphire; and as ointments were uſed at feaſts, and the church was at one with Chriſt, and as he was both maſter and feaſt, ſo he was the ointment of ſpikenard to her; and it is as if ſhe ſhould ſay, my beloved is at table with me; he is my food, and he is my ſpikenard [l]; I need no other; he is inſtead of ſpikenard, myrrh, cypreſs, or any unguents made of theſe: his perſon is exceeding precious; his graces, or ointments, have a delightful ſavour in them; his ſacrifice is of a ſweet odour; his garments of righteouſneſs and ſalvation ſmell of myrrh, aloes and caſſia; he is all in all.

℣. 13. A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church continued; expreſſing her great delight in Chriſt, and her ſtrong love and affection for him, and therefore calls him, my well-beloved; which is expreſſive both of the greatneſs of Chriſt's love to her, and of the ſtrength of her affection to him, as well as of her faith of intereſt in him; hence ſhe ſays, he was as a bundle of myrrh to her. Some think [m], ſweet marjoram is meant, or an herb of a ſweet ſmell, very much like it, called marum; but myrrh is commonly underſtood; and not twigs or branches of it, but ſprigs, or the flowers of it, bound up as a noſegay, and carried in the boſom; or better, liquid myrrh, or ſtacte, as the Septuagint render it, put in a bag [n] or bottle, as the word is rendered, Job xiv. 7. Hag. i. 6. the alluſion being to perſons that carry ſmelling-bottles in their boſoms, for refreſhment or for pleaſure. Now what theſe were to ſuch, that, and much more, is Chriſt to his church; like ſweet-ſmelling myrrh, exceeding delightful and reviving, and make him very acceptable; his very garments ſmell of myrrh: and a bundle of this, or a bag of it, denotes the abundance of the odours of divine grace in Chriſt, who is full of it, which he communicates in great plenty: and now Chriſt is all this, not to any and every one; but to his church and people, to whom alone he is precious, my beloved is unto me; which expreſſes not only the ſtrength of her affection to Chriſt, and the value ſhe had for him, and the delight ſhe had in him; but the particular application of him to her own ſoul by faith. He ſhall lie all night betwixt my breaſts; it or he; the bundle of myrrh, or Chriſt, which comes to the ſame ſenſe: by her breaſts are meant her heart, where Chriſt dwells by faith, which is the beſt room the church has, and where ſhe deſires Chriſt might lodge; ſo Alſhech explains it of being in her heart: and the time in which ſhe would have him continue here is all night; meaning the night of affliction, temptation, &c. or rather, the whole time of this life, until the everlaſting day breaks; and ſo it is a deſire of Chriſt's preſence with her, and of her having communion with him, as long as ſhe lived in the world; and between her breaſts, and in her boſom, ſhe deſires he might be for an ornament to her, like ſweet flowers, and for her delight and pleaſure, refreſhment and comfort; and that he might be always in her ſight, and never be forgotten by her.

℣. 14. My beloved is unto me as a cluſter of camphire, in the vineyards of En-gedi.] En-gedi was a place near Jericho, and famous for palm-trees, as that was, hence called Hazzazon-tamar, 2 Chron. xx. 2. Pliny [o], ſpeaking of this place, which he calls Engadda, ſays, it is ſecond to Jeruſalem for fertility and groves of palm-trees; and Joſephus [p] obſerves, that there grew the beſt palm-trees and opobalſam; wherefore Aben Ezra, and other Jewiſh writers, think that dates, the fruit of the palm-trees, which grow in cluſters, are here meant: and becauſe the balſam-tree alſo grew in this place, as obſerved before from Joſephus, and grew in the manner of vines, as others [q] aſſert; and this being ſaid to be in vineyards, ſome have thought, that that might be intended; but what is valuable in it is, a gum or tear, that drops from it, and not fruit in cluſters, which it bears not: nor can it be ſuppoſed that what we call camphire, ſhould be meant, which grows not in cluſters, and was unknown to the ancients; nor the cyperus, or cypirus, as Cocceius and others. The Septuagint verſion renders it, cyprus; and there was a tree of this name, which grew in Aſcalon in Judea, which, according to Pliny [r], bore a white flower, of a ſweet ſmell; and which, in Italy, was called liguſtrum, the privet-tree, commended by the poets [s] for its peculiar whiteneſs; and the cypreſs-tree is reckoned by Joſephus [t], among the odoriferous trees which grew about Jericho, near to which En-gedi was. The word here uſed is to be found in the Miſnah [u]; and the commentators [w] on it ſay, it is the ſame which, in Arabic, is called albena, the cypreſs-tree, and refer to this place; of which Dr Shaw [x] ſays, "this beautiful and odoriferous plant, albenna, if it is not annually cut, and kept low, grows ten or twelve feet high, putting out its little flowers in cluſters, which yield a moſt grateful ſmell, like camphire." But after all, perhaps the Cyprus-vine is here meant, which, according to Pliny [y], was the beſt and largeſt of vines; and which, though it grew in Cyprus, from whence it had its name, yet ſome plants of it might be obtained by Solomon, and planted in the vineyards of En-gedi; or there were ſuch there like them, and were called by the ſame name: Jarchi, from an ancient expoſition of theirs, relates, that the vineyards of this place brought forth fruit four or five times a year; Alſhech ſays, ſeven. Now as Chriſt compares himſelf to a vine, John xv. 1. the church may compare him to a cluſter of the grapes of the Cyprus-vine, reckoned the beſt; there being a cluſter of all perfections, divine and human, in him; and of all the ſpiritual bleſſings of the everlaſting covenant, and of all the precious promiſes in it; and of all the grace of the Spirit, and the fulneſs of it, which is in him. The Jews calls a man, eminent for virtue, and a large ſhare of knowledge, cluſters [z]; and they interpret eſhcol, a cluſter, by איש שהכל בו a man that has all things in him [a]: ſuch an one is Chriſt, in the higheſt ſenſe, having all perfections, excellencies and virtues, in him. Some leave the word untranſlated, copher [b], and which has the ſignification of atonement and propitiation; and ſo well agrees with Chriſt, who is the propitiation for ſin, and has made atonement for it. Biſhop Patrick obſerves, that the ancient Hebrew doctors, by dividing the firſt word eſhcol, found out the myſtery of the Meſſiah; conſidering it as if thus read, איש כל כופר my beloved is unto me, the man that propitiates or expiates all things; that is, all ſins and tranſgreſſions: in the Talmud[c] it is explained, "he, whoſe all things are, "has atoned for my iniquity;" which Chriſt has done for his church and people; and which makes him precious, and is matter of joy and gladneſs to them, Rom. v. 11. and iii. 25. 1 John ii. 2. and iv. 10.

℣. 15. Behold, thou art fair, my love, &c.] Theſe are the words of Chriſt, commending the beauty and comelineſs of the church, expreſſing his great affection for her, and his high eſteem of her; of her fairneſs and beauty, ſee the note on ℣. 5, 8. of the title of Chriſt's love, as given her by him, ſee the note on ℣. 9. a behold, is prefixed to this account of her, as a note of attention, to conſider her complete comelineſs in Chriſt, and not pore on her own blackneſs; and as a note of admiration, that ſhe who was ſo black and uncomely in herſelf, ſhould be ſo fair and beautiful in his eyes, through his blood, righteouſneſs and grace; and as a note of aſſeveration, aſſuring her of the truth of it, which ſhe might be apt to call in queſtion; and to prevent which, it is alſo repeated, Behold, thou art fair; exceeding fair, really ſo, both inwardly and outwardly; both with reſpect to juſtification and ſanctification. Thou haſt doves eyes; or, eyes like doves[d]; theſe are taken notice of, becauſe much beauty lies in the eyes, either in the ſize or colour of them[e]: ſimilies taken from doves, are frequently uſed in this ſacred poem, both with reſpect to the bride and bridegroom; ſee chap. ii. 14. and iv. 1. and v. 2, 12. and vi. 9. and it may eaſily be obſerved, that this creature furniſhes much matter for poets[f], which they apply to lovers: and here the eyes of the bride are compared to the eyes of doves; meaning either the miniſters of the goſpel, who are to the church what eyes are to the body; are ſet in the more eminent part in the church, to order, guide, and direct the members of it; to watch over them, leſt any hurt come to them, and give warning of danger; to hold forth the word of light to them, and inſtruct them how to behave in the church and in the world: and they may be compared to the eyes of doves, for their clearneſs and perſpicuity in diſcerning goſpel-truths; and for their ſincerity and ſimplicity, uprightneſs and faithfulneſs, in preaching them; and for the dove-like gifts of the Spirit, whereby they are qualified for it; and for their meekneſs and humility: or rather, the eyes of her underſtanding are meant, being ſpiritually enlightened; and particularly the eye of faith, by which believers take a view of Chriſt, of his glory, fulneſs and ſuitableneſs, and look to him alone for life and ſalvation. And it may be compared to the eyes of doves, for the clearneſs and quickneſs of it, being the evidence of things not ſeen; and for its ſingleneſs and chaſtity, the dove looks only to its mate, and deſtroys thoſe that look with luſtful eyes on others[g]; believers, being eſpouſed as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt, look only to him, as their beloved, to him only for acceptance, righteouſneſs, pardon, and eternal life; and for its modeſty and humility, excluding all boaſting in the creature, and giving all glory to Chriſt; and for its beautifulneſs in the ſight of Chriſt, ſo that he is even raviſhed with it, chap. iv. 9.

℣. 16. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church, giving back to Chriſt his commendation of her, and much in the ſame words as more properly belonging to him than her; he calls her, my love, ſhe calls him, my beloved: he ſays that ſhe was fair; the ſame ſhe ſays of him, with a like note of wonder, attention and aſſeveration, he had prefixed to the commendation of her; ſuggeſting, that his fairneſs and beauty were eſſential, original, and underived, but her's was all from him; and therefore he only ought to have the character: he, as man, is fairer than the children of men; as Mediator, is full of grace and truth, which makes him look lovely in the eyes of his people; and, as a divine perſon, is the brightneſs of his Father's glory. To which ſhe adds, Yea, pleaſant; looks pleaſantly, with a ſmiling countenance, on his people, being the image of the inviſible God; pleaſant to behold, as the Sun of righteouſneſs, and Saviour of men; pleaſant in all his offices and relations; the doctrines of his goſpel are pleaſant words; his ways, his ordinances, are ways of pleaſantneſs; and eſpecially having his preſence, and communion with him in them; and which may be deſigned in the next clauſe. Alſo our bed is green; the ſame with his bed which is Solomon's; his by gift and purchaſe; the church's, by having a right through him, and an admittance to all the privileges of it: where the word is preached, ordinances adminiſtered, ſouls are begotten and born again, there Chriſt and his church have fellowſhip with each other; ſaid to be green, in alluſion to the ſtrewing of beds with green herbs and leaves, and branches of trees[h]; particularly the nuptial bed, called from thence thalamus[i]: and it may denote the fruitfulneſs of the ſaints in grace and holineſs, like green olive-trees, in the houſe of God; or elſe, numerous converts in the church, a large ſpiritual ſeed and offspring of Chriſt and the church, as were in the firſt times of the goſpel, and will be in the latter day: a green bed is an emblem of fruitfulneſs in the conjugal ſtate; ſo the Targum and Jarchi interpret it.

℣. 17. The beams of our houſe are cedar, &c.] Or houſes[k]; where their bed was, and where they had fellowſhip and communion together. By which may be meant, particular congregations or churches, in which houſes Chriſt has a property, being of his building and beautifying; where he takes up his reſt and reſidence, and where he feeds and feaſts with his people; and, to the privileges of which, all the ſaints have a right: and by the beams of theſe houſes, may be intended the miniſters of the word, who are pillars here, as James, John, and Cephas were; and who are the means of ſupporting and ſtrengthening ſuch communities, by their excellent doctrines and exemplary lives: or common ſaints may be meant, who are alſo beams and pillars in the churches of Chriſt; and ſerve greatly to ſupport, ſtrengthen and cement the ſpiritual building, fitly framed together: and theſe being of cedar-wood, of a pleaſant ſmell, and durable, may denote their gratefulneſs and acceptableneſs to Chriſt and his church, in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; and of their continuance and perſeverance therein, having in them the incorruptible and immortal ſeed of divine grace; ſee Pſalm xcii. 12. And our rafters of fir; which Pliny ſays[l], is the beſt and ſtrongeſt wood for roofing and raftering: by theſe may be meant the ordinances of the goſpel, which are that to the churches as rafters are to an houſe, the means of ſupporting and ſtrengthening it; ſo by the ordinances, ſaints are ſupported in their ſpiritual ſtate, and by them their ſpiritual ſtrength is renewed; and theſe being ſaid to be of fir, which is a pleaſant and laſting wood, may ſignify the delight that is had in ordinances, and the continuance of them. Some render the word by cypreſs[m]; which is alſo of a pleaſant ſmell[n], and very durable, never admits of worms, nor ever rots, nor is ever ſenſible of old age[o]; and ſo may denote the pleaſure that ſaints take in ordinances, and the long continuance of them, as of the preſent ones, which will remain until the ſecond coming of Chriſt. Some think the brutine tree[p] is meant, which Pliny calls bruta[q]; and is near in ſound to the word here uſed, is much like the cypreſs, and of a ſweet ſmell, like cedar; it grows beyond Paſitigris, on mount Zagras. Some will have it to be the tree of paradiſe; and, ſo applied to ordinances, may ſignify the ſame as before. The word for rafters, is elſewhere rendered gutters and troughs for water; and ſome[r] render it ſo here, and are ſo called from water running in them: and as the grace of God is often expreſſed by water, this is commonly conveyed in the uſe of ordinances; theſe are the canals in which it runs. Moreover, the ſame word is tranſlated galleries, in chap. vii. 5. which, as Kimchi and Ben Melech obſerve, were buildings in high houſes, in which men walked from houſe to houſe, or from one end of the houſe to the other; and might be called by this name, from their running along the ſides of houſes, and ſeem to be like our balconies: now ordinances are the galleries or walking-places[s], where Chriſt and his people walk and converſe together.

CHAP. II.

HERE begins a new colloquy between Chriſt and his church; in which they alternately ſet forth the excellencies of each other; and expreſs their mutual affection for, and delight and pleaſure they take in, each other's company. Chriſt ſeems to begin, in an account of himſelf and his own excellencies, and of the church in her preſent ſtate, ℣. 1, 2. then ſhe, in her turn, praiſes him, and commends him above all others; relates ſome choice proofs ſhe had had of his love to her, and of communion with him in his houſe and ordinances, to ſuch a degree as to overcome her, ℣. 3—6. and then either he or ſhe gives a charge to the daughters of Jeruſalem, not to diſturb either the one or the other in their ſweet repoſe, ℣. 7. Next the church relates, how ſhe heard the voice of Chriſt, and had a ſight of him on the hills and mountains, at ſome diſtance; then more nearly, behind her wall, and through the lattices, ℣. 8, 9. and expreſſes the very words in which he ſpake to her, and gave her a call to come away with him; making uſe of arguments from the ſeaſon of the year, the ſigns of which are beautifully deſcribed, ℣. 10—13. and requeſts that ſhe would come out of her ſolitude, that he might enjoy her company, whoſe countenance and voice are ſo delightful to him; and gives a charge to her and her friends, to ſeize on ſuch as were hurtful and prejudicial to their mutual property, ℣. 14, 15. And ſhe cloſes the chapter, with expreſſing her faith of intereſt in Chriſt; and with a petition for his ſpeedy approach to her, and continued preſence with her, ℣. 16, 17.

℣. 1. I am the roſe of Sharon, and the lily of the vallies.] Whether Chriſt, or the church, is here ſpeaking, is not certain: moſt of the Jewiſh writers[t], and ſome Chriſtian interpreters[u], take them to be the words of the church, expreſſing the excellency of her grace, lovelineſs and beauty, ſhe had from Chriſt; and intimating alſo, her being in the open fields, expoſed to many dangers and enemies, and ſo needed his protection. The church may be compared to a roſe, for its beautiful colour and ſweet odour[w], and for its delight in ſunny places, where it thrives beſt, and is moſt fragrant. This figure is exceeding juſt; not only the beauty of women is expreſſed by the colour of the roſe[x], as is common in poems of this kind; to give inſtances of it would be endleſs[y]; ſome have had the name of Rhoda from hence; ſee Acts xii. 13. No roſe can be more beautiful in colour, and delightful to the eye, than the church is in the eyes of Chriſt, as cloathed with his righteouſneſs, and adorned with the graces of his Spirit: nor is any roſe of a more ſweet and fragrant ſmell, than the perſons of believers are to God and Chriſt, being conſidered in him; and even their graces, when in exerciſe, yea, their duties and ſervices, when performed in faith; and, as the roſe, they grow and thrive under the warming, comforting and refreſhing beams of the Sun of righteouſneſs, where they delight to be. The church may alſo be compared to a lily of the vallies, as ſhe is, in the next verſe, to one among thorns. This is a very beautiful flower; Pliny[z] ſays, it is next in nobleneſs to the roſe; its whiteneſs is ſingularly excellent; no plant more fruitful, and no flower exceeds it in height; in ſome countries, it riſes up three cubits high; has a weak neck or body, inſufficient to bear the weight of its head. The church may be compared to a lily, for her beauty and fragrance, as to a roſe; and the redneſs of the roſe, and the whiteneſs of the lily, meeting in her, make her ſomewhat like her beloved, white and ruddy; like the lily, being arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, the righteouſneſs of the ſaints; and like it for fruitfulneſs, as it is in good works, under the influence of divine grace, and grows up on high into her head, Chriſt Jeſus; and though weak in herſelf, yet ſtrong in him, who ſupports her, and not ſhe him: and the church may be compared to a lily of the vallies; which may not deſcribe any particular lily, and what we now call ſo; but only expreſſes the place where it grows, in low places, where plants are in danger of being plucked and trodden upon; though they may have more moiſture and verdure than thoſe in higher places: ſo the church of Chriſt is ſometimes in a low eſtate, expoſed to enemies, and liable to be trampled and trodden under foot by them, and to be carried away with the flood of perſecution, were it not guarded by divine power; and, being watered with the dews of grace, it becomes flouriſhing and fruitful. But the more commonly received opinion is, that theſe are the words of Chriſt concerning himſelf; and which indeed beſt become him, and are more agreeable to his ſtile and language, John xiv. 6. and xv. 9. and ſuit beſt with the words in the following verſe, as one obſerves [a]; nor is it unfitly taken by the bridegroom to himſelf, ſince it is ſometimes given by lovers to men [b]. Chriſt may be compared to a roſe for its colour and ſmell; to the roſe for its red colour; and which may be expreſſive of the truth of his humanity, and of his bloody ſufferings in it; and this, with the whiteneſs of the lily, finiſhes the deſcription of him for his beauty, chap. v. 10. and for its ſweet ſmell; which denotes the ſame things for which he is before compared to ſpikenard, myrrh and camphire. The roſe, as Pliny ſays [c], delights not in fat ſoils and rich clays, but in rubbiſh, and roſes that grow there, are of the ſweeteſt ſmell; and ſuch was the earth about Sharon [d]; and to a roſe there Chriſt is compared, to ſhew the excellency and preferableneſs of him to all others. The word is only uſed here and in Iſa. xxxv. 1. where it is in many verſions rendered a lily; it ſeems to be compounded of two words; one which ſignifies to cover and hide, and another which ſignifies a ſhadow; and ſo may be rendered, the covering ſhadow: but for what reaſon a roſe ſhould be ſo called, is not eaſy to ſay; unleſs it can be thought to have the figure of an umbrella; or that the roſe-tree in thoſe parts was ſo large, as to be remarkable for its ſhadow; like that Montfaucon [e] ſaw, in a garden at Ravenna, under the ſhadow of the branches of which, more than forty men could ſtand: Chriſt is ſometimes compared to trees for their ſhadow, which is pleaſant and reviving, as in ℣. 3. Hoſ. xiv. 7. Some render it, the flower of the field [f]; which may be expreſſive of the meanneſs of Chriſt in the eyes of men; of his not being of human production; of his being acceſſible; and of his being liable to be trampled upon, as he has been. And as he is compared to a roſe, ſo to a lily, for its colour, height and fruitfulneſs; expreſſive of his purity in himſelf, of his ſuperiority to angels and men, and of his being filled with the fruits and bleſſings of grace; and to a lily of the vallies, denoting his wonderful condeſcenſion in his low eſtate of humiliation, and his delight in dwelling with the humble and lowly: ſome render the words, I am the roſe of Sharon, with the lily of the vallies [g]; by the former epithet meaning himſelf; and by the latter, his church, his companion, in ſtrict union and communion with him; of whom the following words are ſpoken.

℣. 2. As the lily among thorns, ſo is my love among the daughters.] Theſe are manifeſtly the words of Chriſt concerning his church, whom he calls my love, as in chap. i. 9. ſee the note there; and was his love ſtill, though in ſuch company, and in ſuch an uncomfortable condition. In what ſenſe ſhe is comparable to a lily, has been ſhewn in the preceding verſe; but here ſhe is compared to one among thorns: by which may be meant wicked men, comparable to thorns for their unfruitfulneſs and unprofitableneſs; for their being hurtful and pernicious to good men; and for their end, which is to be burned; eſpecially perſecutors of religion, who are very diſtreſſing to the ſaints who dwell among them; ſee 2 Sam. xxiii. 6. and her being among ſuch ſerves for a foil, to ſet off her excellency the more: and the ſimile is deſigned, not ſo much to obſerve that Chriſt's lily grows among thorns, as to ſhew that the church is as preferable to ſuch perſons, as a lily is to thorns; which is juſtly remarked by Carolus-Maria de Veil; and which ſenſe the compariſon requires, as appears by the reddition, ſo is my love among the daughters; the nations and men of the world, and even carnal profeſſors, members of the viſible church, whom ſhe as much exceeds in beauty, grace and fruitfulneſs, as the lily exceeds thorns. Ainſworth thinks, the woodbind or honey ſuckle is meant, which grows in thorn-hedges, and is ſometimes called lilium inter ſpinas, as Mercer obſerves; this is indeed of a ſweet ſmell, yet very weak, and cannot ſupport itſelf; and therefore twiſts and wraps itſelf about other trees, their twigs and branches, convolvens ſe adminiculis quibuſcunque, as Pliny [h] ſays; hence we call it woodbind, and for the ſame reaſon its name in Greek is periclymenon: ſo ſaints are of a ſweet fragrance to Chriſt, and weak in themſelves, cannot ſupport themſelves; yet they twine about Chriſt, lean on him, and are upheld by him, and depend on him for all good things. But it is the ſame word as in the preceding verſe, and may be rendered lily here as there; and not a roſe, as it is in the Targum, from which it is there diſtinguiſhed. The lily is often mentioned in this love-ſong; it is ſaid to be the delight of Venus [i]. Some call it ambroſia.

℣. 3. As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, &c.] As the apple-tree, in a garden or orchard, excels and is preferable to the wild, barren trees of a foreſt [k], eſpecially it appears ſo when laden with choice fruit; ſo the church, who here returns the commendation to Chriſt, aſſerts, that he as much excels all the ſons, the creatures of God, angels or men: angels, as the Targum; who, tho' ſons of God by creation, Chriſt is the Son of God in a higher ſenſe; he is their Creator, and the object of their worſhip; they are confirmed by him in the eſtate they are, and are miniſtering ſpirits to him; and he is exalted above them in human nature: men alſo, the greateſt princes and monarchs of the earth, are ſometimes compared to large and lofty trees; but Chriſt is higher than they, and is poſſeſſed of far greater power, riches, glory, and majeſty. All the ſons of Adam in general may be meant; wicked men, who are like foreſt-trees, wild, barren and unfruitful; yea, even good men, Chriſt has the pre-eminence of them, the ſons of God by adopting grace; for he is ſo in ſuch a ſenſe they are not; he is their Creator, Lord, Head, Huſband and Saviour, and they have all their fruit from him; and ſo miniſters of the word have their gifts and grace from him, and therefore Chriſt excels all that come under this appellation of ſons. Chriſt may be compared to an apple-tree, which is very fruitful; and when full of fruit, very beautiful; and whoſe fruit is very cooling, comforting and refreſhing. Chriſt is full of the fruits and bleſſings of grace, which are to be reached by the hand of faith, and enjoyed; and as he is full of grace and truth, he looks very beautiful and glorious in the eye of faith; and which bleſſings of grace from him, being applied to a poor ſenſible ſinner, inflamed by the fiery law, and filled with wrath and terror, ſweetly cool, refreſh, and comfort him. The apple-tree has been accounted an hieroglyphic of love, under which lovers uſed to meet, and ſit under its delightful ſhade, and entertain each other with its fruit; to which the alluſion may be; ſee chap. viii. 5. the apple was ſacred to love[l]. The Targum renders it, the pome-citron, or citron-apple-tree; which is a tree very large and beautiful; its fruit is of a bitter taſte, but of a good ſmell; has always fruit on it; is an excellent remedy againſt poiſon, and good for the breath, as naturaliſts[m] obſerve; and ſo is a fit emblem of Chriſt, in the greatneſs of his perſon, in the fulneſs of his grace, in the virtue of his blood, and righteouſneſs and grace, which are a ſovereign antidote againſt the poiſon of ſin; and whoſe preſence, and communion with him, cure panting ſouls, out of breath in ſeeking him; and whoſe mediation perfumes their breath, their prayers, whereby they become grateful to God, which otherwiſe would be ſtrange and diſagreeable. I ſat down under his ſhadow with great delight; under the ſhadow of the apple-tree, to which Chriſt is compared; whoſe perſon, blood and righteouſneſs, caſt a ſhadow, which is a protecting one, from the heat of divine wrath, from the curſes of a fiery law, from the fiery darts of Satan, and from the fury of perſecutors, Iſa. xxv. 4, 5. and is a cooling, comforting and refreſhing one, like the ſhadow of a great rock to a weary traveller, Iſa. xxxii. 2. and though the ſhadow of ſome trees, as Pliny[n] obſerves, is hurtful to plants that grow under them, others are fructifying; and ſuch is Chriſt; they that dwell under his ſhadow, ſhall revive and grow, &c. Hoſ. xiv. 7. Sitting here, ſuppoſes it was her choice; that ſhe preferred Chriſt to any other ſhadow, looking upon him to be a ſuitable one in her circumſtances, chap. i. 6, 7. it intimates that peace, quietneſs, ſatisfaction and ſecurity, ſhe enjoyed under him; it denotes her continuance, and deſire of abiding there, Pſalm xci. 1. for the words may be rendered, I deſired, and I ſat down[o]; ſhe deſired to ſit under the ſhade of this tree, and ſhe did; ſhe had what ſhe wiſhed for; and ſhe ſat with great delight; having the preſence of Chriſt, and fellowſhip with him in his word and ordinances, where Chriſt is a delightful ſhade to his people. And his fruit was ſweet to my taſte; the fruit of the apple-tree, to which the alluſion is. Solon[p] adviſed the bride to eat a quince-apple, before ſhe went into the bridegroom, as leaving an agreeable ſavour; and intimating, how graceful the words of her mouth ſhould be. By his fruit here, are meant the bleſſings of grace, which are Chriſt's in a covenant-way, come through his ſufferings and death, and are at his diſpoſe; ſuch as peace, pardon, juſtification, &c. and freſh diſcoveries and manifeſtations of his love, of which the apple is an emblem: and theſe are ſweet, pleaſant and delightful, to thoſe that have taſted that the Lord is gracious; whoſe vitiated taſte is changed by the grace of God, and they ſavour the things of the Spirit of God.

℣. 4. He brought me to the banqueting-houſe, &c.] Or into it[q]. The houſe of wine[r], as it is literally in the original; either the wine-cellar[s], as ſome, where ſtores of it were kept; or, the place of feaſting[t], as others, and, as we render it, a banqueting-houſe; where it was diſtributed and drank; a banquet of wine being put for a feaſt, and here the nuptial feaſt; and may deſign the goſpel-feaſt in the houſe of God, where there is plenty of the wine of goſpel-truths, and proviſions of rich food, with which believers are ſweetly refreſhed and delightfully regaled: and to be brought hither, under the drawings and influences of divine grace, is a ſpecial privilege, a diſtinguiſhing favour; and ſhews great condeſcenſion in Chriſt, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, to take his people by the hand, as it were, and introduce them into his houſe, ſo well furniſhed, and to a table, ſo well ſpread: and ſo the church relates it as an inſtance of divine favour, and as a freſh token of Chriſt's love to her; which further appears by what follows: the covenant of grace, and the ſcriptures of truth may be thought of as a banqueting-houſe, well ſtored with bleſſings, and promiſes, and rich proviſions; which, to be led and let into, is a ſingular kindneſs. And his banner over me was love; ſignifying, that ſhe was brought into the banqueting-houſe in a grand, ſtately and majeſtic manner, with flying colours; the motto on which inſcribed was love: the alluſion may be to the names of generals being inſcribed on the banners of their armies; ſo Veſpaſian's name was inſcribed on the banners throughout his armies[u]. Chriſt's name, inſcribed on his, was love, his church's love; and by which, his company or band was diſtinguiſhed from all others, even by electing, redeeming, calling love. It may ſignify the ſecurity and protection of the ſaints, whilſt in the houſe of God, and enjoying communion with him, being under the banner of love, with which they are encompaſſed as a ſhield; and it may denote the very manifeſt and viſible diſplays of it, which the church now experienced.

℣. 5. Stay me with flagons, &c.] Of wine, which is a ſupporter of the animal ſpirits[w]. The church was now in an houſe of wine, where was plenty of it; even of the love of Chriſt, compared to wine, and preferred unto it, chap. i. 2, 4. the church, though ſhe had had large diſcoveries of it, deſired more; and ſuch that have once taſted of this love, are eagerly deſirous of it, and cannot be ſatisfied until they have their fill of it in heaven: the flagons, being veſſels in which wine is put, and from thence poured out, may ſignify the word and ordinances, in which the love of Chriſt is diſplayed and manifeſted; the church deſires ſhe might be ſtayed and ſupported hereby, whilſt ſhe was attending on Chriſt in them. Comfort me with apples; with exceeding great and precious promiſes; which, when fitly ſpoken and applied, are like apples of gold in pictures of ſilver, Prov. xxv. 11. and are very comforting: or rather, with freſh and greater manifeſtations of his love ſtill; for the apple is an emblem of love, as before obſerved; for one to ſend or throw an apple to another, indicated love [x]. It may be rendered, ſtrew me with apples [y]; in great quantities, about me, before me, and under me, and all around me, that I may lie down among them, and be ſweetly refreſhed and ſtrengthened: the words, both in this and the former clauſe, are in the plural number; and ſo may be an addreſs to the other Two divine perſons, along with Chriſt, to grant further maniſeſtations of love unto her, giving the following reaſon for it: For I am ſick of love; not as loathing it, but as wanting, and eagerly deſirous of more of it; being, as the Septuagint verſion is, wounded [z] with it; love's darts ſtuck in her, and ſhe was inflamed therewith: and languiſhed [a], as the Vulgate Latin verſion is; with earneſt deſires after it; nor could ſhe be eaſy without it, as is the caſe of lovers.

℣. 6. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me.] The church, having deſired to be ſtayed, ſupported, ſtrengthened and comforted, preſently found her beloved with her, who with both hands ſuſtained her; which ſhews his tender love to her, care of her, and regard for her; and is expreſſive of the near and intimate communion ſhe had with him, as the effect of union to him, often enjoyed in his houſe and ordinances; likewiſe of bleſſings of every kind ſhe received from him; temporal mercies, or left-hand-bleſſings, which are neceſſary to ſupport and carry through this wilderneſs; and ſpiritual, or right-hand-bleſſings, as juſtification, pardon, adoption, &c. and moreover, may denote the ſafety and ſecurity of the church, being encircled in the arms of her beloved, ſuſtained by Chriſt's left hand, and embraced by his right hand, out of whoſe hands none can pluck. Some read the words prayerwiſe, let his left hand be, &c. [b] ſtill deſiring further tokens of his love to her, and more and nearer communion with him: others read it in the future, his left hand will be, &c. [c] his right hand ſhall embrace, &c. expreſſing the ſtrength of her faith, that ſhe ſhould for the future enjoy his gracious preſence; and that he would ſupport her, that ſhe ſhould not ſink and faint.

℣. 7. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jeruſalem, &c.] Of whom, ſee chap. i. 5. There is ſome difficulty in theſe words, whether they are ſpoken by the church, or by Chriſt: according to our verſion, they are the words of the church, and bids fair to be the ſenſe; ſince they are ſpoken to the virgins, her companions, that waited on her; and the manner of ſpeech is not by way of command, as by way of adjuration; and the matter, ſtile and language of it, Chriſt being the church's love; and the phraſe, till he pleaſe, beſt agrees with his ſovereignty and authority, who is at liberty to ſtay with, and remove from, his people at pleaſure; and the context, and ſcope of the place, ſeem to confirm it; the church, enjoying communion with Chriſt, chooſes not that he ſhould be diſturbed, and by any means be cauſed to depart from her. Others think, they are the words of Chriſt, and not without reaſon; ſince it was the church that was in Chriſt's arms, and fallen aſleep in them; and the phraſe, my love, is uſed by Chriſt concerning his church, chap. vii. 6. and not this, but another is uſed by her concerning him; and beſides, both the word for my love, and that which is rendered he pleaſe, are feminine, and beſt agree with her, that ye ſtir not up, the or this love, until ſhe pleaſe: ſo Michaelis [d] interprets and renders the word for love, by this lovely one; the word is very emphatical, the love, the famous love, the well known love [e]: add to which, the following words ſeem to confirm this ſenſe, the voice of my beloved! which ſhe had heard, adjuring the daughters of Jeruſalem. This charge is made, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field; not that either Chriſt or his church ſwore by them; but the words may be deſcriptive of the perſons addreſſed by the creatures, among whom they were feeding their flocks, or whom they delighted to hunt [f]; or were loving and lovely creatures, as they: and the charge is, that they would continue among them, and mind their buſineſs, and give no diſturbance to Chriſt or the church; or theſe creatures are called as witneſſes to this charge, which, if not obſerved, would be brought againſt them: or the charge is made by all that is dear, theſe being pleaſant and lovely creatures, that they would not interrupt the mutual communion of Chriſt and his church; or it may be a ſevere threatening, that, ſhould they diſregard the charge, they ſhould become food as common as roes and hinds; and that they ſhould be as cautious of ſtirring up and awaking the perſon meant, as they would be of ſtarting thoſe timorous creatures. The charge is, That ye ſtir not up, nor awake my love, till he or ſhe pleaſe; if it is the charge of the church, it may lead to obſerve, that Chriſt is the object of the church's love; and that ſhe is his reſting-place; that he may not be diſturbed and raiſed up from it by an unfriendly carriage to him, or by animoſities among themſelves; that ſaints ſhould be very careful that they do not provoke Chriſt to depart from them; and that communion with him is entirely at his pleaſure, when and how long it ſhall continue; it depends as much upon his ſovereign will, as the firſt acts of his grace towards them. But if this is the charge of Chriſt, not to diſturb his church, then it may be obſerved, that the church is the object of Chriſt's love, and always continues ſo; that the church ſleeps and takes her reſt in Chriſt's arms; which is not to be underſtood of a criminal drowſineſs and ſleep, but of comfortable repoſe and reſt, Chriſt gives his beloved ones, in communion with himſelf; that he loves and delights in the company of his people, and would not have them diſturbed in their fellowſhip with him; and though, whilſt grace is in exerciſe, ſaints are deſirous of enjoying Chriſt's preſence always; yet, when it is otherwiſe, they become indifferent to it, which provokes Chriſt to depart from them; and therefore it is ſaid, till ſhe pleaſe: and as this charge is given to the daughters of Jeruſalem, young converts, or weak believers; it ſuggeſts, that they are apt to diſturb both Chriſt and his church; to diſturb Chriſt by their impatience and frowardneſs, like children; hence the church acts the part of a mother, charging her children to be quiet, and not diſturb her loving huſband, whilſt ſhe enjoyed his company; and to diſturb the church, through their weakneſs, not being able to bear the ſublime doctrines of the goſpel, and through their ignorance of goſpel-order.

ỳ. 8. The voice of my beloved! &c.] So ſays the church, who well knew Chriſt her beloved's voice; which is known by all believers in him, and is diſtinguiſhed by them from the voice of others; by the majeſty and authority of it; by the power and efficacy of it; by its directing them to himſelf, and by the pleaſure it gives them: and ſhe ſpeaks of it, as being very delightful to her; it being the voice of him whom ſhe loved, and a voice of love, grace and mercy, of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation; and, being obſerved before, what follows ſhews that Chriſt is heard before he is ſeen; he is firſt heard of in the goſpel, before he is ſeen, by an eye of faith: and ſuch would have others obſerve the voice of Chriſt as well as they, for here the church ſpeaks to the daughters of Jeruſalem; and it ſeems by this, that, by ſome means or another, Chriſt had been diſturbed, and had departed from the church for a while, and was now upon the return to her, which made his voice the more joyful to her. Behold, he cometh, leaping upon the mountains, ſkipping upon the hills; this may be underſtood, either of Chriſt's firſt coming in the fleſh, much propheſied of, long expected, and was very welcome: this was attended with many difficulties, comparable to mountains and hills; that the Son of God ſhould become man; that he ſhould obey, ſuffer and die for men, fulfil the law, ſatisfy juſtice, atone for ſin, and ſave from all enemies; but thoſe which ſeemed inſuperable, were eaſily ſurmounted by Chriſt: or of his ſpiritual coming; ſometimes he withdraws himſelf, and then returns again, and faith, ſpying him at a diſtance, rejoices at his nearer approach; for impediments in his way, occaſioned by the unbelief, carnality, lukewarmneſs, backſlidings, and ingratitude of his people, are removed and got over by him, nothing being able to ſeparate from his love; and his coming, either way, is with all readineſs, ſwiftneſs, ſpeed, and haſte. And a behold, is prefixed to this, as a note of admiration and attention; and is ſo, whether applied to the one or the other. Chriſt's incarnation was matter of wonder, behold, a virgin, &c. Iſa. vii. 14. and ſo his manifeſtation of himſelf to his people, and not to others, is marvellous, Lord, how is it, &c. John xiv. 22. and both comings are viſible, glorious, and delightful. Ambroſe [g] has theſe remarkable words, by way of paraphraſe, on this paſſage, "Let us ſee him leaping; he leaped out of heaven into the virgin, out of the womb into the manger, out of the manger into Jordan, out of Jordan to the croſs, from the croſs into the tomb, out of the grave into heaven." The alluſion is to the leaping of a roe, or a young hart, as in the next verſe, which is remarkable for its leaping, even one juſt yeaned [h]; ſo a young hart is deſcribed by the poet [i], as leaping to its dam; the leap of one of theſe creatures is very extraordinary [k].

ỳ. 9 My beloved is like a roe, or a young hart, &c.] The church, upon the ſwift and ſpeedy approach of Chriſt unto her, compares him to theſe creatures; which are well known for their ſwiftneſs [l] in running, and agility in leaping, as before obſerved: and, beſides theſe things, Chriſt may be compared to them on other accounts; they are pleaſant and lovely, choice and valuable; bear an antipathy to ſerpents, which they eaſily overcome; are very good for food, and very agreeable, and are long-lived creatures [m]; Chriſt is lovely and amiable in his perſon, and high in the eſteem of his divine Father, angels and men; is choice and excellent in his nature, offices and grace; bears an antipathy to the old ſerpent, the devil, whoſe works and powers he came to deſtroy, and has got an entire victory over them; and is very agreeable food to faith; his fleſh is meat indeed, and the more ſo through his ſufferings and death; as the fleſh of thoſe creatures is ſaid to be the more tender and agreeable, by being hunted; and Chriſt, though dead, is alive, and lives for evermore. Behold, he ſtandeth behind our wall; not the middle wall of the ceremonial law, behind which, Chriſt, under the Old Teſtament-diſpenſation, ſtood, ſhewing himſelf to believers; nor the wall of our humanity he partook of, when he came in the fleſh, and under which, his glorious deity was in ſome meaſure covered and hid; but rather, the wall of our hearts, Jer. iv. 19. the hardneſs, infidelity, and carnal reaſonings of it, which are ſo many walls of ſeparation between Chriſt and his people; behind which he ſtands, ſhewing his reſentment of them, and in order to demoliſh them, and get admittance: he is repreſented here, as nearer than when ſhe firſt ſaw him, even at her very home. He looketh forth at the windows; this is coming nearer ſtill; for by the manner of the expreſſion, it ſeems that he was within doors, ſince he is ſaid, not to look through the windows, but to look forth at them, meaning the ordinances; which are that to the church as windows to an houſe, the means of letting in light into the ſouls of men; and where Chriſt ſhews himſelf, in his glory and beauty, as kings and great perſonages look out at windows to ſhew themſelves to their people: though Chriſt may alſo be ſaid to look in at thoſe windows, to obſerve the behaviour of his people in his houſe and ordinances, with what attention, affection, faith and reverence, they wait upon him in them. Shewing himſelf through the latteſs; by which may be meant the ſame things, only a larger and clearer diſcovery of Chriſt in them, of which ordinances are the means; and yet, unleſs Chriſt ſhews himſelf through them, he cannot be ſeen in them: and a behold, being prefixed to theſe gradual diſcoveries of himſelf, ſhew them to be wonderful! a glance of him behind the wall is ſurpriſing; his looking in at the windows ſtill more ſo; but his ſhewing himſelf, in all his glories and excellencies, through the latteſs, is enough to throw into the greateſt rapture, to fill with joy unſpeakable and full of glory! Some render the word, flouriſhing [n], like a roſe or lily, or like a vine, or jeſſamine; mine; which grow up by a window or lattefs, and ſeen through them, look very pleaſant and delightful. But the alluſion is rather to the quick-ſighted roe, or young hart; which, as it is remarkable for its ſwiftneſs, referred to, ỳ. 8. ſo for the ſharpneſs of its ſight; Pliny[o] ſays, it is never dim-ſighted; it has its name dorcas in Greek, from its ſight.

ỳ. 10. My beloved ſpake, and ſaid unto me, &c.] Chriſt, the church's beloved, being ſo near her, ſhe could diſtinctly hear and underſtand what he ſpoke, and relate the very words: or, he anſwered to me[p]; to a ſecret petition, put up to him for a more full enjoyment of him; for there is mental as well as vocal prayer, which Chriſt, as God omniſcient, knows full well, and gives anſwer to: or this may be an anſwer to her petitions in ỳ. 5. and as ſome in ỳ. 6. however, Chriſt ſaid ſomething after related, that ſhe well knew he ſpake, and not another, and to her in particular. What he ſaid, follows: Riſe up, my love, my fair one, and come away; the affectionate and endearing titles of love and fair one, have been met with and explained, on chap. i. 5, 8, 9. and are repeated to ſhew his ardent love to her, notwithſtanding the frame ſhe was in, which was very probably a ſlothful one, by the exhortations given; and to remove her diſcouragements, ariſing from her preſent ſtate; and to prevail upon her to get up from her bed of carnal ſloth and ſecurity, at leaſt to ſhake off her indolence; and to quit her ſeat and company, and go along with him, or where he ſhould direct, ſince it would be to her own advantage: for the words may be rendered, riſe up for thyſelf, and come away for thyſelf[q]; it will turn to thy account, and to do otherwiſe will be detrimental to thee. The arguments follow.

ỳ. 11. For lo, the winter is paſt; the rain is over and gone.] A ſeaſon of the year which keeps perſons within doors, makes going abroad unſafe, unpleaſant, and uncomfortable; very unfit for travelling, roads bad, rivers unpaſſable, and journeying very difficult; but now this ſeaſon being over, and the ſpring come, the weather fair, and every thing gay and pleaſant, it is inviting to be abroad; winter is by ſome writers[r] uſed not for the ſeaſon of the year, but for a ſtorm or tempeſt. Thus the winter and rain may be deſcriptive of the ſtate and condition of Jews and Gentiles before the coming of Chriſt[s], and which then ceaſed; it having been a ſtormy diſpenſation with the one, and a time of darkneſs and ignorance with the other, Heb. xii. 18—27. Acts xvii. 30. or rather it may in general repreſent the ſtate of God's people both before and after converſion; before converſion it is a time of darkneſs, coldneſs, barrenneſs, and unfruitfulneſs; and which are removed by the powerful and efficacious grace of Chriſt: and after converſion it is often a winter-ſeaſon with them, through the bluſtering winds of Satan's temptations; the ſtorms of impending wrath for ſin, as they imagine; the nipping blaſts of perſecution, and ſharp and ſevere afflictions they are at times expoſed unto: moreover they are often in great darkneſs of ſoul, clouds interpoſe between Chriſt and them; a great deal of coldneſs attends them, their hearts are frozen up and hard, and no impreſſion made on them by the preaching of the word, or by the providences of God; there is a chillneſs in their love to God and Chriſt, his people, ordinances, cauſe, and intereſt; great barrenneſs and unfruitfulneſs in them, they look like trees in winter, and no appearance of fruit on them; their hands are ſealed up from working, and they become indolent and inactive; and by all theſe fellowſhip with Chriſt is greatly interrupted: but when the ſpring returns again, light breaks in upon them, and their hearts are melted with a ſenſe of love; they become lively in their frames, and in the exerciſe of grace, and are fruitful in good works; and enjoy much calmneſs and ſerenity, peace and joy in the holy Ghoſt: ſometimes they think the winter is not over when it is, and fear more ſtorms are behind, even of divine wrath and vengeance, though without reaſon; ſince Chriſt has bore all wrath for them, and has ſatisfied law and juſtice, and has delivered them from wrath to come; and he that has done this, ſays, the winter is paſt, &c.

ỳ. 12. The flowers appear on the earth, &c.] One of the firſt ſigns of the ſpring being come[t]; and make the ſeaſon delightful and pleaſant; the ſun returning with its warming influences, herbs and plants are quickened and ſpring up; fields and meadows, as well as gardens, are covered with a variety of beautiful flowers, which make walking abroad very delightful. By theſe flowers may be meant either the graces of the Spirit in the ſaints, which when a winter-time with them ſeem to be dead, at leaſt are hid; but upon a return of the ſun of righteouſneſs, revive and are ſeen again: or the ſaints themſelves, when in a flouriſhing condition, and in the exerciſe of grace; who may be compared to the flowers of the field for the production of them in the ſpring, which is a kind of re-creation of them, Pſal. civ. 30. and fitly expreſſes the renovation of the holy Ghoſt, to which the revival of them is owing; and for the fragrancy of them, their perſons and ſervices being of a ſweet ſavour through the grace and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and for their beauty and ornament to the fields in which they grow, as ſaints are through Chriſt in themſelves, and to the churches and intereſt of Chriſt; and for the gaiety and chearfulneſs in which the flowers appear in the ſpring-ſeaſon, and ſo a proper emblem of the joy and conſolation of the ſaints; when grace revives, Chriſt returns, and they are favoured with communion with him. It may not be improper to obſerve, that this may repreſent the large converſions of ſouls to Chriſt, and the numerous appearance of ſo many beautiful flowers in the church of Chriſt in the firſt ages of chriſtianity, after a long winter of Jewiſh and Gentile darkneſs. The time of the ſinging of birds is come; another ſign of ſpring, and ſuits the goſpel-diſpenſation, in which the churches of Chriſt, and the members of them, ſing the praiſes of the Lord in pſalms, hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs; and particularly young converts, thoſe little birds that ſing in warbling notes and tuneful lays the ſongs of electing, redeeming, calling, juſtifying, pardoning, and adopting grace, to the glory of God, and to their mutual comfort and edification. Some render it, the time of the branch; branch [u], of the vine putting forth its branches; or the time of cutting [w], of pruning vines, of lopping trees, and cutting off unfruitful branches; as in the goſpel-diſpenſation, when the Jewiſh branches were broken off, and the Gentiles were engrafted in, and being pruned brought forth more fruit; and this agrees with the ſeaſon of the year, the ſpring being the time of cutting and pruning vines [x]; though this is by ſome objected to as unſeaſonable. And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; ſo one part of rural pleaſures is deſcribed by the poet [y], not only by the ſinging of birds of various kinds, but particularly by the note of the turtle; which is a kind of dove that lies hid in the winter-time, or is gone, being a bird of paſſage, and appears and returns at the ſpring, when its voice is heard again [z]; ſee Jer. viii. 7. for its voice is never heard in winter, unleſs on a fine day [a]; by which may be meant, not the voice of the law, as the Jewiſh writers [b], rather of the goſpel, the joyful ſound, which for a while was heard only in the land of Judea, called by way of ſpecialty our land; but either of the voice of the Meſſiah himſelf [c], preaching the everlaſting goſpel in the land of Iſrael when here on earth; or of John the Baptiſt his forerunner; and ſo Alſhech interprets it of Elijah, who was to come before the Meſſiah, and refers to Mal. iv. 5. It may deſign the voice of all the apoſtles of Chriſt, and firſt miniſters of the goſpel [d]; or of the holy Ghoſt, as the Targum, who appeared as a dove at Chriſt's baptiſm; and whoſe voice in the hearts of his people, ſpeaking peace and pardon, and witneſſing their adoption, cauſes joy and gladneſs; or of the church itſelf, compared to a turtle-dove for its harmleſſneſs, meekneſs, chaſtity, &c. whoſe voice in prayer and praiſe is heard, and is acceptable to Chriſt, ℣. 14.

℣. 13. The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, &c.] Another ſign of ſpring being come, nay of its being pretty much advanced, ſince Chriſt makes this a token of ſummer being at hand, Matt. xxiv. 32. Theopompus [e] ſpeaks of figs in the middle of the ſpring. This tree puts forth its fruit at once, and does not flower or bloſſom [f], wherefore Hab. iii. 17. is wrongly tranſlated; ſee the note there: though Arrianus [g] ſpeaks of its flowering: Aben Ezra thinks the word ſignifies the ſweetening of the figs, and ſo points at the time when they are ſweet and eatable. By the fig-tree may be meant the ſaints putting forth their grace in exerciſe on Chriſt, who may be compared to fig-trees for their leaves and fruit, and for the putting forth the latter before the former [h]; for the fig-tree is a tree full of large leaves, which may be an emblem of a profeſſion of religion, and of a converſation agreeable to it, which yet are no covering, only the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is that, yet ought to be and are ornamental; and for the fruit of it, which is wholſome, pleaſant, and delightful, as are the fruits of the Spirit, the fruits of grace and righteouſneſs, fruits meet for repentance, which ought to appear before a profeſſion of religion is made. If the Egyptian fig-tree is meant, that is a very fruitful tree; it is ſaid to bear fruit ſeven times a year, but ripens no other way than by ſcratching it with iron hooks [i]; and its wood cut down and caſt into water, being dry, ſinks, but when thoroughly wet will ſwim. Saints ſhould bear fruit always, and ever continue to do ſo, even to old age; nor do any ever become fruitful until their hearts have been pricked and cut by the word of God; and they never grow better, or are more fruitful, than when attended with afflictions and tribulations; when they firſt enter into the waters of affliction, like Peter, they ſink, but when more uſed to them, they lift up their heads above them, and bear up with great courage and reſolution. By the green figs may be meant the beginnings of grace in the ſoul, ſome ſtirrings of affection to Chriſt, deſires of knowledge of him, pantings and breathings after his ordinances, love to his people; all which appear ſoon, are very imperfect, and like unripe figs liable to be ſhaken off; and it is a miracle of grace that the firſt impreſſions of it are not deſtroyed by the force of corruption and temptation; and it may be obſerved, that grace in its firſt appearance, though but ſmall, is not deſpiſed, but taken notice of by Chriſt; yea he makes uſe of it as exerciſed by young converts to ſtir up old profeſſors, as here the church, to be more active and vigorous in it. And the vines with the tender grape give a good ſmell; or being in flower give a good ſmell [k], as the word is uſed in the Targum in Iſa. xviii. 5. and that vines do flower appears from the ſame place, and from Gen. xl. 10. as well as is obſerved by naturaliſts and others [l]; and theſe flowers, and not the tender grapes, emit a ſweet ſmell; and as ſome ſay [m], not in the vineyards only, but in the country round about; and theſe are fitly mentioned next to figs, ſince the black fig is by ſome called the ſiſter of the vine [n]. By the vines may be intended diſtinct congregated churches of Chriſt, or particular believers; vines are very weak, and cannot bear up of themſelves, muſt be fixed to ſome place, and be ſupported by ſomething elſe; and being ſupported, will run up a great height, and bring forth much fruit. So ſaints are weak in themſelves, and cannot ſupport themſelves; their ſtrength is in Chriſt, and they are upheld by him, and have their dependence on him; and being ſupported by him they grow up to the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt; and through their engrafture into him, and abiding in him the true vine, bring forth much fruit to the glory of God, and ſuch as is not to be found in others. The wood of the vine is of very little worth or uſe, Ezek. xv. 2, 3. and yet is very laſting. Pliny [o] aſcribes a ſort of an eternity to it. Believers in Chriſt, however weak and worthleſs they are in themſelves, as are their beſt works and ſervices, yet being in Chriſt they ſhall abide in him for ever, and never periſh, but have everlaſting life. And by the tender grapes, or flowers, may be deſigned either the graces of the Spirit, as before; or rather young converts, the fruit of Chriſt's vines, the churches; churches, who, though weak and tender, yet are dear to Chriſt; and when there is a large appearance of them, it is a great encouragement to churches, and promiſes a glorious vintage. And the ſmell of theſe vines, with their grapes and flowers, may intend the fragrancy of believers through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt on them, and the odour of their graces as exerciſed on him; and the ſweet ſavour of their godly converſation, obſerved by all about them. Ariſe, my love, my fair one, and come away; repeated from ℣. 10. which ſhews ſluggiſhneſs on the part of the church, that ſhe needed one exhortation after another; and great love on the part of Chriſt, that notwithſtanding this he perſiſts in calling her; and even importunity in him, that he will have no denial[p]: and it may be obſerved, that what is entertaining to moſt of the ſenſes is mentioned to engage the church to ariſe and go along with her beloved; the flowery fields would be pleaſing to her eye, the chirping birds to her ear, the ſweet and ripening figs to her taſte, and the refreſhing odour of the vines to her ſmell.

℣. 14. O my dove, &c.] An epithet ſometimes uſed by lovers[q], and is a new title Chriſt gives to his church, to expreſs his affection for her and intereſt in her; and to draw her out of her retirement, to go along with him. The dove is a creature innocent and harmleſs, beautiful, cleanly, and chaſte; ſociable and fruitful, weak and timorous, of a mournful voice, and ſwift in flying; all which is ſuitable to the church and people of God: they are harmleſs and inoffenſive in their lives and converſations; they are beautiful through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt on them, and the grace of the Spirit in them; they are clean through the word Chriſt has ſpoken, and having their hearts purified by faith; they are as chaſte virgins eſpouſed to Chriſt, and their love to him is ſingle and unfeigned; they cleave to him, are fruitful in grace and good works; and the church being eſpouſed to Chriſt brings forth many ſouls unto him in regeneration; ſaints carry on a ſocial worſhip and delight in each others company; they are weak and timorous, being perſecuted and oppreſſed by the men of the world; and mourn for their own ſins and others, and often for the loſs of Chriſt's preſence; and are ſwift in flying to him for ſafety and protection. Under this character the church is ſaid to be in the clefts of the rock, the uſual place where the dove makes its neſt, Jer. xlviii. 28. or retires to it for ſafety[r]. Adrichomius ſays[s], there was a ſtone tower near Jeruſalem, to the ſouth of the mount of Olives, called petra columbarum, the rock of the doves, where often five thouſand were kept at once, to which there may be an alluſion here; or elſe it may have reſpect to the place where doves are forced to fly when purſued by the hawk, even into a hollow rock, as deſcribed by Homer[t]; and may be expreſſive of the ſtate of the church under perſecution, when obliged to flee into holes and corners, and caves of the earth; when the Lord is an hiding-place to her, in his love, and grace, and power; and particularly Chriſt is the rock of his people, ſo called for height, ſtrength, and duration, and they are the inhabitants of this rock; and who was typified by the rock in the wilderneſs, and particularly by that into the clefts of which Moſes was put, when the glory of the Lord paſſed before him: moreover, the clefts of this rock may deſign the wounds of Chriſt, which are opened for the ſalvation of men; and where ſaints dwell by faith, and are ſecure from every enemy[u]. The Ethiopic verſion is, in the ſhadow of the rock, to which Chriſt is compared, Iſa. xxxii. 2. and ſo the Septuagint verſion, in the covering of the rock, which is no other than the ſhade of it. Likewiſe the church is ſaid to be in the ſecret places of the ſtairs; Chriſt is the ſtairs or ſteps by which ſaints aſcend up to God, have acceſs to and communion with him; and the ſecret places may have reſpect to the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and atonement by him, hidden to other men, but revealed to them; and whither in diſtreſs they betake themſelves, and are ſheltered from ſin, law, hell, and death, and dwell in ſafety. Though as ſuch places are dark and duſty, and whither the dove, or any other creature, may in danger betake itſelf, ſo upon the whole both this and the preceding clauſe may deſign the dark, uncomfortable, and ſolitary condition the church was in through fear of enemies; in which ſituation Chriſt addreſſes her, ſaying, let me ſee thy countenance, or face; and encourages her to appear more publicly in his houſe and courts for worſhip, and preſent herſelf before him, and look him full in the face, and with open face behold his glory, and not be ſhamefaced and fearful; not to be afraid of any thing, but come out of her lurking holes and be ſeen abroad by himſelf and others, ſince the ſtormy weather was over, and every thing was pleaſant and agreeable. Let me hear thy voice; in prayer to him and praiſe of him, commending the glories and excellencies of his perſon, and giving thanks to him for the bleſſings of his grace. For ſweet is thy voice; pleaſant, harmonious, melodious, having a mixture of notes in it, as the word ſignifies; and ſo exceeds the voice of a natural dove, which is not very harmonious: Herodotus[w] makes mention of a dove that ſpoke with an human voice; and ſuch a voice Chriſt's dove ſpeaks with, and it is ſweet; that is, pleaſant and delightful to him, who loves to hear his people relate the gracious experiences of his goodneſs, and ſpeak well of his truths and ordinances; prayer is ſweet muſic to him, and praiſe pleaſes him better than all burnt-offerings. And thy countenance is comely; fair and beautiful, and therefore need not cover her face, or hang down her head, as if aſhamed to be ſeen, ſince ſhe was in the eye of Chriſt a perfection of beauty.

℣. 15. Take us the foxes, &c.] Of which there were great numbers in Judea; ſee Judges xv. 4. theſe words are directed not to angels, nor to civil magiſtrates, but to miniſters of the word; but whether the words of Chriſt, or the church, is not eaſy to determine; ſome think they are the words of the church, who had hitherto been relating what Chriſt ſaid to her, and who having neglected her vineyard, chap. i. 6. and now ſtirred up by Chriſt to a greater care of it, expreſſes her concern for its flouriſhing; and therefore calls upon her attendants and companions, to aſſiſt in taking and deſtroying thoſe which were hurtful to it: but rather, they ſeem to be the words of Chriſt continued; ſince they not only ſhew the care of his vines, the churches; but expreſs power and authority over thoſe they are ſpoken to: and perhaps they may be the words of them both jointly; ſince the church, with Chriſt, and under him, has a right to ſtir up her officers to do their work, and fulfil their miniſtry, they have received of Chriſt for her ſervice. By foxes, may be meant falſe teachers, to whom the falſe prophets of old were compared, Ezek. xiii. 3, 4. foxes are crafty and ſubtil creatures, malignant and miſchievous, hungry and voracious, full of deceit and diſſimulation, are of an ill ſmell, and abominably filthy; ſo falſe teachers walk in craftineſs, uſe good words and fair ſpeeches, and thereby deceive the hearts of the ſimple; their doctrines are pernicious, their hereſies damnable, and they bring deſtruction on themſelves and others; they are hungry after worldly ſubſtance, are greedy of it, and can never have enough; devour widows houſes, and make merchandize of men, to enrich themſelves; they put on ſheeps cloathing, transform themſelves into angels of light, mimic the voice of goſpel-miniſters, uſe their phraſes and expreſſions, that they may not be eaſily diſcovered; and are abominable in their principles and practices, and to be ſhunned by all good men. Now miniſters of the goſpel are ordered to take theſe, to detect them, and refute their errors, and reprove them ſharply for them; and, after proper ſteps taken, to reject them, to caſt them out of the vineyards, the churches, and keep them out. Even the little foxes; hereſies and heretics are to be nipped in the bud, before they increaſe to more ungodlineſs; otherwiſe errors, which may ſeem ſmall at firſt, ſoon grow larger and ſpread themſelves, and become fatal to the churches: That ſpoil the vines; as foxes do, by gnawing the branches, biting the bark, making bare the roots, devouring the ripe grapes, and infecting all with their noxious teeth and vicious breath [x]: ſo falſe teachers make diviſions and ſchiſms in churches; diſturb their peace; unſettle ſome, and ſubvert others; ſap the foundation of religion, and corrupt the word of God; and therefore by all means to be taken, and the ſooner the better. For our vines have tender grapes; or flowers; as in ℣. 13. ſee the note there. The vines are the churches; the tender grapes, or flowers, young converts, which Chriſt has a particular regard unto, Iſa. xl. 11. and xlii. 3. and theſe, having but a ſmall degree of knowledge, are more eaſily impoſed upon and ſeduced by falſe teachers; and therefore, for their ſakes, ſhould be carefully watched, and vigorouſly oppoſed, ſince otherwiſe a promiſing vintage is in danger of being ſpoiled. Chriſt, in this addreſs, intimates, that not only he and the church, but the miniſters alſo, had an intereſt in the vines and tender grapes, as they have; ſee chap. viii. 11, 12. and therefore ſhould be the more concerned for their welfare; hence he calls them ours; intereſt carries a powerful argument in it.

℣. 16. My beloved is mine, and I am his, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church; who, having had ſuch evidences of Chriſt's love to her, and care of her, expreſſes her faith of intereſt in him, and ſuggeſts the obligations ſhe lay under to obſerve his commands. The words are expreſſive of the mutual intereſt and property Chriſt and his church have in each other: Chriſt is the church's, by the Father's gift of him to her, to be her Head, Huſband and Saviour; and by the gift of himſelf unto her, to be her Redeemer and ranſom-price; and by marriage, having eſpouſed her to himſelf, in righteouſneſs and loving-kindneſs; and by poſſeſſion, he living and dwelling in her, by his Spirit and grace: the church alſo acknowledges herſelf to be his, as ſhe was by the Father's gift of her to Chriſt, as his ſpouſe and bride, his portion and inheritance; and by purchaſe, he having bought her with his precious blood; and by the conqueſt of her, by his grace in effectual calling; and by a voluntary ſurrender of herſelf unto him, under the influence of his grace: hence all he is, and has, are her's, his perſon, fulneſs, blood and righteouſneſs; and therefore can want no good thing. Moreover, theſe words ſuggeſt the near union there is between Chriſt and his church; they are one in a conjugal relation, as huſband and wife are one; which union is perſonal, of the whole perſon of Chriſt to the whole perſons of his people; it is a ſpiritual one, they having the ſame Spirit, the one without meaſure, the other in meaſure; it is a vital one, as is between the vine and its branches; and it is a myſterious one, next to that of the union of the Three perſons in the Godhead, and of the two natures in Chriſt; it is an indiſſoluble one, the everlaſting love of Chriſt being the bond of it, which can never be diſſolved; and from this union flow a communication of the names of Chriſt to his church, conformity to him, communion with him, and an intereſt in all he has. Likewiſe theſe phraſes expreſs the mutual affection, complacency and delight, Chriſt and his church have in each other; he is beloved by his church, and ſhe by him; ſhe ſeems to have a full aſſurance of intereſt in him, and to make her boaſt of him; excluding all other beloveds, as unworthy to be mentioned with him: of whom ſhe further ſays, He feedeth among the lilies; which is either an apoſtrophe to him, O thou that feedeſt, &c. thou only art my beloved; or is deſcriptive of him to others, enquiring who he was, and where to be ſeen: the anſwer is, he is the perſon that is yonder, feeding among the lilies; either recreating and delighting himſelf in his gardens, the churches, where his ſaints are, comparable to lilies; ſee the note on ℣. 1, 2. or feeding his ſheep in fields where lilies grow: and it may be obſerved, it is not ſaid, he feedeth on, or feeds his flock with lilies, but among them; for it is remarked [y], that ſheep will not eat them: or the ſenſe may be, Chriſt feeds himſelf, and feeds his people, and feeds among them, as if he was crowned with lilies, and anointed with the oil of them; as was the cuſtom of the ancients at feſtivals [z], thought to be here alluded to by ſome who read the words, that feeds; that is, ſups in or with lilies, being anointed and crowned with them. The lily is a ſummer-flower [a]; the winter was now paſt, ℣. 11.

℣. 17. Until the day break, and the ſhadows flee away, &c.] Which may be connected with the preceding verſe; either with the former part, my beloved is mine, &c. and then the ſenſe is, as long as night and day continue, and God's covenant with both ſtands ſure; ſo long union to Chriſt, and covenant-intereſt in him, will abide: or with the latter part, he feedeth among the lilies until, &c. even until his ſecond coming: or with the next clauſe in this verſe, turn my beloved; and ſo is a prayer for Chriſt's ſpeedy coming to her, and continued preſence with her, until the day ſhould break:

which may be underſtood, either of the goſpel-day made by the riſing of Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, at his firſt coming in the fleſh; when the ſhadows of the ceremonial law diſappeared, Chriſt, the body and ſubſtance of them, being come, and the darkneſs of the Gentile world was ſcattered, through the light of the goſpel being ſent into it: the words may be rendered, until the day breathe, or blow [b]; and naturaliſts obſerve [c], that, upon the ſun's riſing, an air or wind has been excited, and which ceaſes before the middle of the day, and never laſts ſo long as that; and on Chriſt's, the ſun of righteouſneſs, ariſing with healing in his wings, ſome cool, gentle and refreſhing breezes of divine grace and conſolation, were raiſed, which were very deſirable and grateful: or this may be underſtood of Chriſt's ſecond coming; which will make the great day of the Lord, ſo often ſpoken of in ſcripture; and which ſuits as well with the Hebrew text, and the philoſophy of it, as the former; for, as the ſame naturaliſts [d] obſerve, the wind often blows freſh, and fine breezes of air ſpring up, at the ſetting, as well as at the riſing of the ſun; ſee Gen. iii. 8. and may very well be applied to Chriſt's ſecond coming, at the evening of the world; which will be a time of refreſhing to the ſaints, and very deſirable by them; and though it will be an evening to the world, which will then come to an end; with them there will be no more night of darkneſs, deſertion, affliction and perſecution; the ſhadows of ignorance, infidelity, doubts and fears, will be diſperſed, and there will be one pure, clear, unbeclouded and everlaſting day; and till then the church prays, as follows: Turn, my beloved; that is, to her; who ſeemed to be ready to depart from her, or was gone; and therefore ſhe deſires he would turn again, and continue with her, until the time was come before mentioned: or, turn about [e]; ſurround me with thy favour and loving-kindneſs, and ſecure me from all enemies, until the glorious and wiſhed-for day comes, when I ſhall be out of fear and danger: or, embrace me [f]; as in ỳ. 6. during the preſent diſpenſation, which was as a night in compariſon of the everlaſting day. And be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of Bether; the ſame with Bethel, according to Adrichomius [g]; where were mountains, woody, ſet with trees, full of graſs and aromatic plants; and ſo may be the ſame with the mountains of ſpices, chap. viii. 14. where the Ethiopic verſion has Bethel; and ſo that and the Septuagint verſion, in an addition to ỳ. 9. here; ſee 2 Kings ii. 23, 24. unleſs Bithron is meant, 2 Sam. ii. 29. a place in Gilead, beyond Jordan, ſo called, becauſe it was parted from Judea by the river Jordan: and the words are by ſome rendered, the mountains of diviſion, or ſeparation [h]; which, if referred to Chriſt's firſt coming, may regard the ceremonial law, the wall of partition between Jew and Gentile, broke down by Chriſt, and the two people divided by it, which were reconciled by him; if to his ſpiritual coming, the ſame things may be intended by them as on ỳ 9. but if to his ſecond coming, the ſpacious heavens may be meant, in which Chriſt will appear, and which now interpoſe and ſeparate from his bodily preſence; and therefore the church importunately deſires his coming with ſpeed and ſwiftneſs, like a roe or a young hart, and be ſeen in them; ſee Rev. xxii. 20.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter an account is given of an adventure of the church, in queſt of her beloved; of the time when, and places where, and the perſons of whom ſhe ſought him; and of her ſucceſs upon the whole; with a charge ſhe gave to the daughters of Jeruſalem, ỳ. 1—5. by whom ſhe is commended, ỳ. 6. And then Chriſt, her beloved, is deſcribed by her; by his bed, and the guard about it, ỳ. 7, 8. by the chariot he rode in, ỳ. 9, 10. and by the crown he wore on his coronation-day, ỳ. 11.

ỳ. 1. By night on my bed I ſought him whom my ſoul loveth, &c.] The day being not yet broke, the night of Jewiſh darkneſs ſtill on the church, and the ſhadow of the ceremonial law as yet ſtretched upon her; and having ſome knowledge of Chriſt by types and propheſies, deſires more, and ſeeks it in the uſe of means: though the words may be taken in a more large ſenſe, and repreſent the ſtate and condition of the church and of all true believers in any age, and at one time as well as another; who, when their beloved is abſent, it is night with them; as Chriſt's preſence makes day, his abſence makes night; and it was now night with the church, either of affliction, or of darkneſs and deſertion, and indeed of both. The word is plural, by nights [i]; one night after another, ſucceſſively, ſhe ſought her beloved; which both expreſſes the continuance of her ſtate, and her diligence and conſtancy in ſeeking Chriſt. The place where ſhe ſought him, was her bed; not the ſame as in chap. i. 16. and iii. 7. which was both Chriſt's and her's, and where a different word is uſed; but this was purely her own: either a bed of affliction, when good men uſually ſeek the Lord, Iſa. xxvi. 16. Hoſ. v. 15. or rather, of carnal eaſe and ſecurity, in which ſhe continued, and roſe not up from it to ſeek her beloved; which ſhews the cold, lukewarm, lazy frame, ſhe was in, and formal manner in which ſhe ſought him, and ſo ſucceeded not: however, he was ſtill the perſon whom her ſoul loved, cordially and ſincerely, though not ſo fervently as ſhe had done; true love, though it may be abated, cannot be loſt. I ſought him, but I found him not; becauſe ſhe ſought him not aright; not timely, nor fervently and diligently, nor in a proper place; not in her cloſet, by prayer, reading and meditation, nor in public ordinances, ſhe afterwards did; but on her bed.

ỳ. 2. I will riſe now, &c.] Perceiving ſhe had taken a wrong method, and therefore unſucceſsful, ſhe fixes on another; and, in the ſtrength of divine vine grace, determines to purſue it, and now, at once, immediately, without any delay, riſe from her bed of ſloth and eaſe, and forego her carnal pleaſures, in purſuit of her beloved; which ſhewed the ſincerity of her love to him. And go about the city; not the city of Jeruſalem, though there may be an alluſion to it; but the ſpiritual city, of which ſaints are fellow-citizens, where they dwell, and where the word is preached, and the ordinances are adminiſtered: and going about it, as ſhe propoſed, ſhewed her diligence and induſtry in ſeeking him: and the night being an unſeaſonable time to walk about a city, eſpecially for women; this is a further proof of her great love to Chriſt, in that ſhe not only expoſed herſelf to reproach and ſcandal, but to hurt and danger alſo; but being fired with love, and fearleſs of danger[k], and ſet on finding her beloved, ſhe reſolved to proceed, whatever ſhe ſuffered. Hence ſhe ſought him in the ſtreets, and in the broad ways; that is, of the city, ſuch as commonly are in cities; ſo Troy is deſcribed[l] as a city, having broad ways in it; and alſo Athens[m]: meaning the public ordinances of the goſpel, where he takes his walks, and often ſhews himſelf; in ſeeking him here, ſhe was right, though ſhe did not ſucceed. I will ſeek him whom my ſoul loveth; her love was ſtill the ſame, not abated, more likely to be increaſed through diſappointment; nor was ſhe diſcouraged, but was determined to go on ſeeking, till ſhe found him. I ſought him, but I found him not; this was to chaſtize her for her former negligence; to try her faith, love, and patience; and to ſhew that even the beſt means, though to be uſed, are not to be depended on; and that Chriſt has his own time and way to make himſelf known to his people, which depends on his ſovereign will.

℣. 3. The watchmen, that go about the city, found me, &c.] By whom are meant the miniſters of the goſpel; who are called watchmen, as the prophets were under the Old Teſtament, Iſa. lii. 8. and lxii. 6. Ezek. xxxiii. 7. in alluſion to watchmen in cities; and are ſo called in regard to themſelves, it being their duty to watch over themſelves; and to their doctrine, and all opportunities to preach it, and the ſucceſs of it: their buſineſs with reſpect to others, is to give the time of night; to point out the ſtate and condition of the church; to give notice of danger to ſinners, in the broad road to deſtruction; and to ſaints, through the prevalence of error, hereſy, and immorality; all which require ſobriety, vigilance, prudence, courage, and faithfulneſs; and ſhew the neceſſity and utility of the goſpel-miniſtry, and the awfulneſs of it; and the care Chriſt takes of his churches, in providing ſuch officers in them. Theſe are ſaid to go about the city, denoting their induſtry and diligence; and being in the way of their duty, they found the church, fell upon her caſe in their miniſtry, and hit it exactly; which ſhews the efficacy of the word under a divine direction; which finds out ſinners, and their ſins; ſaints, and their particular caſes, unknown to miniſters: and the church, having met with ſomething ſuitable to her caſe under their miniſtry; took an opportunity privately to diſcourſe with them, and put this queſtion to them, Saw ye him, whom my ſoul loveth? meaning Chriſt; who was ſtill the object of her love, and uppermoſt in her thoughts; whom ſhe thus deſcribes, without mentioning his name, as if he was the only Him in the world, worthy of any regard; which ſhews how much he was in her mind, how much the deſires and affections of her ſoul were towards him, and that theſe miniſters needed no other deſcription of him. No anſwer is returned to her queſtion, that is recorded; not becauſe they were not able to give one, nor becauſe they did not; and if they did not, it might be owing to her haſte, not waiting for one; and if they did, ſhe not being able to apply it to her caſe, no notice is taken of it: however, though ſhe did not find immediate relief by them; yet ſhe met with ſomething from them that was of uſe to her afterwards, as appears by what follows.

℣. 4. It was but a little that I paſſed from them, &c.] Either a ſmall moment of time, as the Targum and Aben Ezra; or a little diſtance of place, that is, from the watchmen or miniſters, from whom ſhe paſſed; not through diſreſpect to them, much leſs contempt of them; nor becauſe ſhe received no benefit at all from them; but her going on ſhews ſhe did not reſt in means, but looked beyond them, and went on farther in the exerciſe of her faith, and hope of finding her beloved: and meeting with him a little after ſhe had paſſed from the miniſters, ſuggeſts, that Chriſt is not far from his miniſters and ordinances; for it follows, but I found him whom my ſoul loveth; which ſhe expreſſes with the utmoſt exultation and pleaſure; which meeting with him muſt give her, after ſuch long and fruitleſs ſearches, and ſo many diſappointments; ſee John i. 41. and for Chriſt to ſhew himſelf, without which there is no finding him, is a proof of the greatneſs of his love, and of the freeneſs and ſovereignty of it; and that means, though to be uſed, are not to be depended on; nor ſhould we be diſcouraged when they fail, ſince Chriſt can make himſelf known without them, as he did here to the church; who ſays, I held him, and would not let him go; which on the part of the church is expreſſive of her faith in him, ſignified by laying hold on him, his perſon, righteouſneſs, grace, and ſtrength, Prov. iii. 18. and of her ſtrong affection to him, graſping and embracing him in her arms of faith and love; and of her fear and jealouſy leſt he ſhould depart from her again; and of her ſteady reſolution to hold him, whatever was the conſequence of it: and on his part, it intimates a ſeeming offer to be gone; and a gracious allowance to lay hold on him; and his wonderful condeſcenſion to be held by her; and the delight and pleaſure he took in the exerciſe of her faith upon him; for it was not againſt but with his will he was held by her; and this ſhe determined to do, and not let go her hold, until, ſays ſhe, I had brought him into my mother's houſe, and into the chambers of her that conceived me; the alluſion is to the tents and apartments women had in former times diſtinct from their huſbands, Gen. xxiv. 67. and xxxi. 33. and all this may be underſtood either of the viſible church, and the ordinances of it, the mother of all true believers, where they are born again, brought up and nouriſhed; and where Chriſt may be ſaid to be brought, when his name is profeſſed, his goſpel is embraced, and his ordinances are ſubmitted to; and here the church is deſirous of introducing Chriſt, that ſhe with others might magnify him, and praiſe him for all the inſtances of his grace and goodneſs, and have communion with him: or elſe the heart, and the inmoſt receſſes of it may be meant; where the incorruptible ſeed of divine grace is caſt; where the new creature is conceived, born, and brought up, until it becomes a perfect man; and where Chriſt is deſired to be, and to dwell by faith, and ſaints may have uninterrupted communion with him: unleſs the heavenly manſions are intended, the houſe of the Jeruſalem above, the mother of us all; where ſaints long to be with Chriſt, enjoy him, and never loſe his preſence more; till then the church reſolves to hold him faſt in the arms of faith, hope, and love, and not let him go.

℣. 5. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jeruſalem, &c.] Which are either the words of Chriſt, adjuring the young converts not to diſturb the church; who had now Chriſt in her arms, taking repoſe with him, being wearied with running about in ſearch of him: or they are the words of the church; who having experienced a long abſence of Chriſt, and having been at much pains in ſearch of him, and now had found him, was very unwilling to part with him; and fearing theſe young converts ſhould by any unbecoming word or action provoke him to depart, ſhe gives them a ſolemn charge. By the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye ſtir not up, nor awake my love, till he pleaſe; ſee the note on chap. ii. 7.

℣. 6. Who is this that cometh out of the wilderneſs, &c.] This is ſaid by the daughters of Jeruſalem, adjured in the preceding verſe; who upon the happy meeting of Chriſt and his church, ſaw a greater glory and beauty in her, than they had ſeen before; and therefore put this queſtion, not as ignorant of her, but as admiring at her. By the wilderneſs ſhe is ſaid to come out of, is meant either a ſtate of nature, as Theodoret; in which all the elect of God are before converſion, and out of which they are brought by efficacious grace; called a wilderneſs, becauſe of the barrenneſs and unfruitfulneſs of perſons in ſuch a ſtate; and becauſe of the perplexed ways and tracks in it, which bewilder a man that he knows not which to take; and becauſe of the want of ſpiritual proviſions in it; and becauſe of the danger men are expoſed unto through holes and pits, and beaſts of prey: in ſuch a ſtate God finds his people, convinces them of it, and brings them out of it; which is an inſtance of ſurprizing and diſtinguiſhing grace: or elſe the world itſelf may be meant, the wilderneſs of the people, Ezek. xx. 35. ſo called becauſe of the roughneſs of the way, the many tribulations the ſaints paſs through in it; and becauſe of the traps and ſnares that are in it, through evil men, the luſts of the fleſh, and the temptations of Satan; becauſe of the many evil beaſts in it, ungodly men, falſe teachers, and Satan the roaring lion; and becauſe of the plentiful table God furniſhes here for his people, feeding them in the wilderneſs with goſpel-doctrines and ſpiritual ordinances, Rev. xii. 14. and becauſe of the many windings and turnings of providence in it, through all which they are led in a right way to the city of their habitation: now though they are in the world, they are not of it; they are called out of it, and quit as much as may be the company and converſation of the men of it; and through the grace of God are more and more weaned from it, and long after another and better world; all which may be intended by their coming out of this: or elſe this may deſign a ſtate of ſorrow and diſtreſs when under deſertion, and without the preſence of Chriſt; which had lately been the caſe of the church, who had been in a bewildered condition, and not knowing where her beloved was, ran about here and there in queſt of him, like one in a wood, ſeeking him and calling after him; but now having ſight of him, and ſome communion with him, is repreſented as coming out of that ſtate. She is farther deſcribed as being like pillars of ſmoke, perfumed with myrrhe and frankincenſe; her heart being inflamed with love to Chriſt, her affections moved upwards, heavenwards, and were ſet on things above; and which were ſincere and upright, roſe up in the form of palm-trees, as the word[n] ſignifies, a very upright tree; and theſe moved ſteadily towards Chriſt, and could not be diverted from him by the winds of temptation, affliction, and perſecution; and tho' there might be ſome degree of dullneſs and imperfection in them, hence called pillars of ſmoke; yet being perfumed with the ſweet ſmelling myrrhe of Chriſt's ſacrifice, and the incenſe of his mediation, became acceptable to God. It is added, with all powders of the merchant; odorous ones, ſuch are the graces of the Spirit, which Chriſt the merchant-man is full of; and makes his people, their affections and prayers, of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour with. Ben Melech interprets it of garments perfumed with ſpices; ſee Pſal. xlv. 8. Some render the words, above or more excellent than all powders of the merchant[o], druggiſt or apothecary[p]; no ſuch drug nor ſpice to be found in their ſhops, that ſmell ſo ſweet as Chriſt, his grace and righteouſneſs.

℣. 7. Behold, his bed which is Solomon's, &c.] Not Solomon the ſon of David, and penman of this ſong, but a greater than he, the antitype of him; ſo it is interpreted of the Meſſiah by many Jewiſh writers[q]: they were both ſons of David and ſons of God, and kings and preachers in Jeruſalem. Solomon was a type of Chriſt in his wiſdom and wealth, in the largeneſs and peaceableneſs of his kingdom; in his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, and in building the temple, a figure of the church: and by his bed is meant the place where ſaints meet together for religious worſhip, his church viſible, which is his reſting and dwelling place; where ſouls are begotten and born again, and have fellowſhip with Chriſt; and which he has a property in by gift and purchaſe: and a behold is prefixed to it as a note of attention, directing the daughters of Jeruſalem to turn off the diſcourſe from her, and from commendation of her, to conſider the greatneſs of Chriſt her beloved; who might conclude, that if his bed was ſo ſtately as after deſcribed, how great muſt he himſelf be; and as a note of admiration to ſhew how much ſhe was affected with the greatneſs of his grace to her, and the privileges ſhe enjoyed of having nearneſs to him, and fellowſhip with him. Threeſcore valiant men are about it, of the valiant of Iſrael; miniſters of the goſpel, ſuch as are Iſraelites indeed, faithful and upright; and who are valiant, and heartily concerned for the good and welfare of Chriſt's people, and are careful that nothing hurt them, nor diſturb their reſt and repoſe. In the number of them, the alluſion may be to the guard about Solomon's bed; which might conſiſt of ſo many, partly for the ſecurity of his royal perſon, and partly for grandeur and majeſty; and were juſt double the number of his father's worthies, he excelling him in greatneſs and glory; though it may be a certain number is put for an uncertain; and this is a competent and ſufficient one.

℣. 8. They all hold ſwords, &c.] Or a ſword[q]; the word is ſingular, which deſigns the word of God, called the ſword of the Spirit, and ſaid to be ſharper than a two-edged ſword, Eph. vi. 17 Heb. iv. 12. which every one of the miniſters of the goſpel hold in their hands; and which denotes not only their apprehenſion, but their retention of it, and firm adherence to it; it cleaves to them, and they to that; they and their ſword cannot be parted, as Guſſetius[r] obſerves the word ſignifies; theſe miniſters could not be prevailed upon to drop it, or part with it, but retained it to the laſt; which ſhews them to be valiant men. Being expert in war; in military affairs, in the ſpiritual war againſt ſin, Satan, and the world, in common with other chriſtians; and in fighting the good fight of faith, againſt all oppoſers of the doctrines of the goſpel; knowing how to uſe to the beſt advantage the ſpiritual ſword, the ſcriptures of truth, to defend the goſpel, and refute error. Every man hath his ſword upon his thigh; as a preparation for war, and an indication of readineſs to engage in it, Pſal. xlv. 3 for being on the thigh it is near, eaſy to come at, at once upon occaſion, and ſo always in a poſture of defence; all which expreſſes the familiar acquaintance miniſters have with the word of God, its nearneſs, ſo that they can eaſily come at it, and furniſh themſelves with a ſufficient proof of truth, and with proper arguments for the refutation of error. And this is done becauſe of fear in the night; when there is moſt danger; hence Cyrus conſidering that men are moſt eaſily taken when eating and drinking, and in the bath, and in bed, and in ſleep, looked out for the moſt faithful men to be his body-guard[s]. By night or nights[t] may be meant the nights of deſertion, temptation, affliction and perſecution; when ſaints are in fear of their ſpiritual enemies, and of being overcome and deſtroyed by them: now Chriſt has provided a guard for his people, to prevent or remove theſe fears, and defend them from ſuch as would make inroads upon their faith and comfort; namely, his miniſters, that by their miniſtrations they may be a means of ſecuring their peace and comfort, and of freeing them from all terrible apprehenſions of things; which as it ſhews the ſafety and ſecurity of the ſaints, ſo the tender care and concern of Chriſt for them.

℣. 9. King Solomon made himſelf a chariot of the wood of Lebanon.] The word tranſlated chariot is only uſed in this place; ſome render it a bride-chamber[u]; others a nuptial bed[w], ſuch as is carried from place to place; it is uſed in the Miſnah[x] for the nuptial bed, or open chariot, in which the bride was carried from her father's houſe to her huſband's. The Septuagint render it by φορειον, a word near in ſound to that in the Hebrew text, and was the lectica of the ancients, ſomewhat like our ſedan; ſome of which were adorned with gold and precious ſtones, and had ſilver feet[y], or pillars, as follows: it ſeems upon the whole to be the nuptial chariot in which, according to Pauſanias[z], three only were carried, the bride, who ſat in the middle, then the bridegroom, and then the friend of the bridegroom: ſomething of this kind is the palki or palanquin of the Indians, in which the bride and bridegroom are carried on the day of marriage on four mens ſhoulders[a]: and by this chariot may be meant either the human nature of Chriſt, in which he deſcended and aſcended to heaven; or his church, in which he ſhews himſelf to his people in his ordinances, where he rides in triumph, conquering and to conquer, by his Spirit and grace, in his word; or the covenant of grace, in which Chriſt ſhews the freeneſs and ſovereignty of his love in being the mediator, ſurety, and meſſenger of it; and in which his people are bore up and ſupported under, and carried through many trials and exerciſes in this life, and are brought triumphantly to heaven; or rather the goſpel, and the miniſtration of it, in which Chriſt ſhews himſelf as in a chariot, in the glory of his perſon, offices, grace, and love; in this he is carried up and down in the world, Acts ix. 15. and by it is conveyed to the ſouls of men; and in it he triumphs over his enemies, and cauſes his miniſters to triumph alſo: and he is the ſubject, ſum, and ſubſtance of it, and the alone author of it; for he is the Solomon here ſpoken of that made it; it is not a device of mens, but a revelation of his, and therefore called the goſpel of Chriſt; and which he gives to men to preach, a commiſſion to preach it, and qualifications for it: and this he does for himſelf, to ſet forth the glories of his perſon and office, to diſplay the riches of his grace, and to ſhew himſelf to be the only way of ſalvation to loſt ſinners: and this chariot being ſaid to be of the wood of Lebanon, cedar, which is both incorruptible and of a good ſmell; may denote the incorruptneſs of the goſpel, as diſpenſed by faithful miniſters, and the continuance and duration of it, notwithſtanding the efforts of men and devils to the contrary; and the acceptableneſs of it to the ſaints, to whom it is the ſavour of life unto life; and it being a nuptial chariot that ſeems deſigned, it agrees with the goſpel, in the miniſtry of which ſouls are brought to Chriſt, and eſpouſed as a chaſte virgin to him, 2 Cor. xi. 2.

℣. 10. He made the pillars thereof of ſilver, &c.] The truths and doctrines of the goſpel are the pillars of it; which, like pillars, are ſolid and ſubſtantial, and continue firm and immoveable, and are of great uſe to ſupport the children of God under the ſeveral trials and exerciſes they are attended with; and for their utility, value, and duration, are ſaid to be of ſilver, and are as carefully to be ſought for and into as that is, and even to be preferred to it, being of more worth than thouſands of gold and ſilver; the miniſters of the goſpel are ſometimes compared to pillars, and the church itſelf is ſaid to be the pillar and ground of truth, Gal. ii. 9. 1 Tim. iii. 15. The bottom thereof of gold; Chriſt, the golden bottom of the goſpel, the ſum and ſubſtance of it, the principal ſubject in it to be inſiſted on; he is laid in it as the bottom, ground, and foundation of faith and hope, and of everlaſting life and ſalvation; and for its richneſs, firmneſs, and duration, may be ſaid to be of gold, as the ſtreet of the new Jeruſalem, Rev. xxi. 21. or its pavement[b], as the word here ſignifies. The Septuagint render it, a reclining[c] place, to ſit and reſt, or lean upon; ſuch is Chriſt. The covering of it of purple; or the top of it; the word ſignifies a chariot itſelf: it may reſpect ſuch doctrines of the goſpel which relate to redemption, pardon of ſin, and juſtification through the blood of Chriſt; and all under the purple covering of the blood of Chriſt are ſecure from wrath to come, and go ſafe to heaven. The midſt thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jeruſalem; the carpet wrought with lovely figures, or with love-ſtories: the doctrines and ordinances of the goſpel are full of love, of God in Chriſt, in providing Chriſt as a Saviour, and ſending him to be one; and of the love of Chriſt in aſſuming human nature, and ſuffering and dying in it for ſinners, even for Jeruſalem ſinners; the goſpel ſets forth the heart of Chriſt as inflamed[d], as the word here uſed ſignifies, with love to the daughters of Jeruſalem, his dear children, which moved him to do all he did and ſuffered for them; and could his heart be looked into, the very images of theſe perſons would be ſeen upon it: the ordinances of the goſpel are deſigned both to ſet forth, in the moſt ſtriking manner, the love of Chriſt to his ſons and daughters, for whoſe ſake he became man, and ſuffered death, and to draw forth their love to him; ſo the words may be rendered, paved with love by the daughters of Jeruſalem[e], or with the love of them[f]: how delightful muſt it be to ride in ſuch a chariot, or ſit under ſuch a miniſtry, where there is nothing but love! moreover the whole deſcription of the bride-chamber, which ſome chooſe to render the word for chariot by, well agrees with the new Jeruſalem-ſtate, as given in Rev. xxi. where the church being as a bride prepared for her huſband, will be introduced, the nuptial feaſt will be kept, and Chriſt will be ſeen by the daughters of Zion in all his regal glory, with the royal diadem on his head, as he is deſcribed in the following verſe.

℣. 11. Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, &c.] The ſame with the daughters of Jeruſalem; the reaſon of the variation is, becauſe Chriſt, here ſo gloriouſly deſcribed, is king of Zion, and they his ſubjects; theſe the church obſerving, being intent on looking at the bed and chariot ſhe had deſcribed, calls them from thoſe objects to look at a more glorious one; to whom Solomon in all his glory, on his coronation or marriage-day, to which the alluſion is, was not equal; wherefore ſhe invites them to go forth and look at him, as people are forward to go out of their houſes to ſee a crowned king paſs along the ſtreets, eſpecially on his coronation-day; and men never ſee any glory and excellency in Chriſt, until they go out of themſelves, and look off of every other object to him alone. And behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his eſpouſals; alluding to a cuſtom with the Jews[g] and other nations[h], to put nuptial crowns on the heads of married perſons, both men and women, on the marriage-day: Chriſt is undoubtedly here meant by Solomon, who is king of Zion, king of ſaints; ſee the note on ℣. 7. by whoſe mother is meant either the church, the Jeruſalem above, the mother of us all, of Chriſt myſtical; or elſe every believer, who is not only his brother and ſiſter but his mother, Matt. xii. 50. and this may refer to the time when Chriſt is firſt made known unto and beheld by a ſenſible ſinner, in the glory of his perſon, and the fulneſs of his grace, as ſitting and riding in the chariot of the everlaſting goſpel; when ſuch honour him, and crown him by venturing on him, and believing in him; for every act of faith on Chriſt, is putting the crown upon his head; and every ſubmiſſion to his ordinances, is an acknowledging him king of ſaints; and every aſcription of ſalvation to him and his grace by any, is caſting their crowns at his feet, and ſetting one on his head; and ſuch a time is the time of his open eſpouſals to them, when ſuch conſent to be his for ever, and give up their whole ſelves to him; there was a ſecret eſpouſal of all the elect to Chriſt, upon the Father's grant of them to him in eternity; and there is an open eſpouſal of them to him perſonally, at their converſion under the miniſtry of the word, when they are eſpouſed as chaſte virgins to Chriſt; at which time there is a large breaking forth of Chriſt's love to them, and of theirs to him: hence it is called the love of their eſpouſals; ſee 2 Cor. xi. 2. Jer. ii. 2. and here the day of the gladneſs of his heart; when Chriſt gladly and chearfully receives ſuch ſouls into his embraces, and rejoices over them as the bridegroom over the bride: now the church would have the daughters of Jeruſalem behold, look at this glorious perſon with an eye of faith and love, with attention and admiration; there being ſuch aſtoniſhing, incomparable, and tranſcendent excellencies in him, which require ſuch looks as theſe.

CHAP. IV.

IN this chapter is contained a large commendation of the church's beauty by Chriſt; firſt, more particularly, by an enumeration of ſeveral parts, as her eyes, hair, teeth, lips, temples, neck and breaſts, ℣. 1—5. and more generally, ℣. 7. And having obſerved where he himſelf was determined to go, he invites her to go with him; which he enforces, partly from the danger ſhe was expoſed unto where ſhe was, ℣. 6, 8. and partly from the comelineſs of her perſon and graces in his eſteem; with which he was raviſhed, and therefore was extremely deſirous of her company, ℣. 9—11. And then enters into ſome new deſcriptions of her; as a garden and orchard, as a ſpring and fountain, ℣. 12—14. all which ſhe makes to be owing to him, ℣. 15. And the chapter is cloſed with an order from Chriſt to the winds, to blow on his garden, and cauſe the ſpices of it to flow out; and with an invitation of the church to Chriſt, to come into his garden, and recreate himſelf there, ℣. 16.

℣. 1. Behold, thou art fair, my love, behold, thou art fair, &c.] The ſame as in chap. i. 15. here repeated by Chriſt, to introduce the following commendation; to expreſs the greatneſs of his love to his church; and ſhew that he had the ſame opinion of her, and eſteem for her, notwithſtanding what had paſſed between that time and this. Thou haſt doves eyes within thy locks; the ſame compariſon as in chap. i. 15. ſee the note there; only with this difference, here her eyes are ſaid to be within her locks: which, whether underſtood of the miniſters of the goſpel; or of the eyes of the underſtanding, particularly of the eye of faith, as has been obſerved on the above place; do not ſeem ſo much to deſign the imperfection of the ſight of the one or of the other, in the preſent ſtate, as eyes within, or under locks, and in ſome meaſure covered with them, hinder the ſight of them; as the modeſty of either of them; locks being decently tied up, as the word ſignifies[i], is a ſign thereof, as the contrary is a ſign of boldneſs and wantonneſs. Doves eyes themſelves are expreſſive of modeſty and humility, and, this phraſe added to them, increaſes the idea; ſuch miniſters, who have the largeſt gifts, greateſt grace, light and knowledge, are the moſt humble, witneſs the apoſtle Paul; and this phraſe expreſſes the beauty of them, not only in the eyes of Chriſt, but in the eyes of thoſe to whom they publiſh the good tidings of ſalvation: and ſo it may denote what an exceeding modeſt grace faith is, which receives all from Chriſt, and gives him all the glory, and takes none to itſelf; and what a beauty there is in it, inſomuch that Chriſt is raviſhed with it, ℣. 9. and ſeems rather to be the ſenſe here. Thy hair is as a flock of goats; like the hair of goats, ſo Ben Melech. Hair adds much to the comelineſs of perſons, and is therefore frequently mentioned, both with reſpect to the bride and bridegroom, in this ſong, chap. v. 11. and vi. 5. and vii. 5. and ſo in all poems of this kind[k]: and one part of the comelineſs of women lies in their hair; "let a woman, ſays Apuleius[l], be adorned with ever ſuch fine garments, and decked with gold and jewels, yet without this ornament, ſhe will not be pleaſing; no, not Venus herſelf." The women[m], in Homer, are deſcribed by their beautiful hair; nor is it unuſual to compare the hair of women, and repreſent it as ſuperior to a fleece of the choiceſt flock[n]. And here the church's hair is ſaid to be like the hair of goats, for that is the ſenſe of the expreſſion; and which is thought to be moſt like to human hair, 1 Sam. xix. 13. and it is compared to that, not ſo much for its length and ſleekneſs, as for its colour, being yellowiſh; which, with women formerly, was in eſteem, and reckoned graceful[o]; this being the colour of the hair of ſome of the greateſt beauties, as Helena, Philoxena; and others, whoſe hair was flaxen and yellow; hence great care was taken to make it look ſo, even as yellow as gold[p]: the Jewiſh women uſed to have their perukes, or falſe hair, of goats hair, and ſtill have in ſome places to this day[q]; and it ſhould ſeem, the Roman women alſo had, to which the poet[r] refers. And the church's hair here is ſaid to be like the hair of a flock of goats, that appear from mount Gilead; or rather, on mount Gilead, as Noldius: Gilead was a mountain in the land of Iſrael, beyond Jordan, famous for paſturage for cattle, where flocks of goats were fed, as was uſual on mountains[s]; and, being well fed, their hair was long, ſmooth, neat and gliſtering; and ſo to ſpectators, at a diſtance, looked very beautiful and lovely; eſpecially in the morning at ſun-riſing, and glancing on them, with its bright and glittering rays, were delightful. So R. Jonah, from the uſe of the word in the Arabic language, which ſignifies the morning, interprets it, which riſe early in the morning; and which, as Schultens[t] obſerves, ſome render, "leading to water early in the morning:" the Vulgate Latin verſion is, that aſcend from mount Gilead, from a lower to a higher part of it; which is approved of by Bochart[u]. Now the hair of the church may be interpreted, either of believers, the ſeveral members of the church of Chriſt; the hairs of the head are numerous, grow upon the head, and have their nouriſhment from it; are weak in themſelves, but depend upon the head, and are an ornament to it: ſo the ſaints, though few in compariſon of the world, yet by themſelves are a great number, which no man can number; theſe grow upon Chriſt, the head of the church, and receive their nouriſhment from him; and though weak in themſelves, have ſtrength from him, and have their dependence on him; and are an ornament and crown of glory to him; and who are cared for, and numbered by him, ſo that no one can be loſt; ſee Ezek. v. 1—5. Or rather, it may be interpreted of the outward converſation of the ſaints; hair is viſible, is a covering, and an ornament, when taken care of and managed aright, and has its dependence and is influenced by the head: the good converſation of the church and its members, is viſible to all, as the hair of the head, and as a flock of goats on mount Gilead; and is a covering, though not from divine juſtice, yet from the reproaches of men; is ornamental to believers, and to the doctrine they profeſs; eſpecially when their converſation is ordered aright, according to the word of God, and is influenced by grace, communicated from Chriſt, the Head.

℣. 2. Thy teeth are like a flock of ſheep, &c.] That is, like the teeth of a flock of ſheep; as her eyes were like the eyes of doves, and her hair like the hair of goats: and Galen long ago obſerved, that human teeth are much like the teeth of ſheep, in figure, order and ſtructure, as well as are ſmall and white; neatly ſet, innocent and harmleſs, not ravenous and voracious, cropping herbs and graſs only[w]; the whiteneſs of the teeth is chiefly intended, in which the beauty of them lies, for which they are ſometimes compared[x] to Parian marble for whiteneſs. The Targum interprets theſe teeth of the prieſts and Levites; but it is much better to underſtand them of the miniſters of the goſpel: teeth are boney, ſolid, firm and ſtrong, ſharp to cut and break the food, and prepare it for the ſtomach: all which well agree with miniſters; who are ſtrong in the Lord and in his grace, to labour in the word and doctrine; to oppoſe gainſayers, withſtand Satan's temptations; bear the reproaches of the world, and the infirmities of weaker ſaints; and remain firm and unmoved in their miniſtry; unſhaken by all they meet with, from without and from within: they are ſharp to rebuke ſuch who are unſound in the faith, or corrupt in their morals, and to penetrate into goſpel-truths; to cut and rightly divide the word of truth, and break the bread of life to others, and ſo chew and prepare ſpiritual food for ſouls; not raw and crude, nor hard and difficult of digeſtion, but plain and eaſy to be underſtood. And they are like to a flock of ſheep, even ſhorn; on which no wool is left, ſticking out here and there; which is another good property of teeth, that are of equal ſize and bigneſs, do not ſtand out, nor riſe up one above another; and are as if they had been cut, and planed, and made alike[y], as ſome render the word: which may denote the equality of goſpel-miniſters in power and authority; one having no ſuperiority over another; all having the ſame miſſion and commiſſion, employed in the ſame work, preaching the ſame goſpel; and though their gifts are different, yet there is a harmony and agreement in the doctrines they preach. Which came up from the waſhing; white and clean, which is another property of good teeth; as the teeth of ſheep be, and they themſelves are, when juſt come up out of the waſhing-pit: this may ſignify the waſhing of regeneration, and renewing of the holy Ghoſt, which are neceſſary to miniſters of the word, in order to preach it; and more eſpecially the purity of their lives and converſations, in which they ſhould be examples to the flock. Whereof every one bear twins, and none is barren among them; the figures are juſt and beautiful; it is common with ſheep to bear twins, or more, in the eaſtern countries, as the philoſopher obſerves[z]; frequent mention is made of goats bearing twins[a]: theſe may anſwer to the two rows of teeth, and the word for teeth is in the dual number; and when theſe are white and clean, and equal, are well ſet, and not one wanting, none rotten, nor ſhed, nor fallen out, look very beautiful. This may expreſs the fruitfulneſs and ſucceſs of goſpel-miniſters, in bringing many ſouls to Chriſt; and was particularly true of the apoſtles, and firſt miniſters of the goſpel, who were inſtrumental in the converſion of many; and who bore twins to Chriſt, Jews and Gentiles; and none were without their uſefulneſs. Likewiſe all this may be underſtood of believers in general, and of meditation and faith in them; by meditation they feed upon Chriſt, his goſpel, doctrines and promiſes; they chew the cud, and ruminate on the word of God; and are equal, alike partakers of the ſame grace, and bleſſings of it; and are ſanctified, and, in ſome meaſure, cleanſed, from the pollution of their minds and actions; aſcend heavenwards in their thoughts, deſires and affections; and are not barren and unfruitful in the knowledge of Chriſt and his goſpel; and generally, through meditation, bring forth the twins of prayer and praiſe: by faith alſo they feed on Chriſt and his grace; and which is alike, precious faith in all, as to nature and quality; is pure, ſincere and unfeigned; is always fruitful, and bears the twins of love to Chriſt, and of love to his ſaints; and is not barren, but attended with the fruits of righteouſneſs.

ỿ. 3. Thy lips are like a thread of ſcarlet, &c.] To a thread for thinneſs, to ſcarlet for colour: thin, red lips, being beautiful, as well as white teeth; ſo the beautiful Aſpaſia had red lips[b], and teeth whiter than ſnow; hence we read of red and purple lips[c]. Now as lips are the inſtruments of ſpeech, the words of the church, and of all true believers, may be deſigned; what is ſaid by them in their prayers, which are filled, not with great, ſwelling words of vanity, exalting themſelves, and magnifying their works, like the Phariſee; but with humble confeſſions of ſin, and acknowledgments of their unworthineſs of mercy; and they are conſtant, like one continued thread, they go on praying all their days: and the ſcarlet colour may denote the fervency of them, whereby they become available with God; and the acceptableneſs of them to God, through the mediation of Chriſt, whoſe blood, and not any worthineſs of theirs, is pleaded in them: their words of praiſe alſo may be ſignified hereby; which are not filled with big ſwoln encomiums of themſelves, and of what they have done; but with expreſſions of the goodneſs and grace of God to them; and with thankfulneſs for all mercies, both temporal and ſpiritual, beſtowed upon them; and theſe are hearty and ſincere, coming from an heart inflamed with the love of God, which make ſuch lips look like ſcarlet; and that being in great eſteem, may intimate the acceptableneſs of them to God, through the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt. To which may be added, that the doctrines of the goſpel, delivered by the miniſters of the church, who are her lips, may be taken into the ſenſe of this clauſe; which are like a thread, ſpun out of the ſcriptures, and are harmonious and all of a piece, conſiſtent and cloſely connected; the ſubject and matter of which are the blood, ſufferings and death of Chriſt, and the bleſſings that come thereby; and which alſo, like ſcarlet, are valuable and precious. And thy ſpeech is comely; which explains the preceding clauſe; and ſhews, that by her lips, her ſpeech is meant, which is comely, that is, graceful and amiable; as it is when believers ſpeak of Chriſt, of his perſon, offices and grace; and for him, in vindication of his truths and ordinances; when they ſpeak to him, in prayer or in praiſe; and when in common converſation, their ſpeech is with grace. Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate within thy locks; not like a piece of the tree, but of the fruit, when the ſhell of it burſts of itſelf, through the abundance of liquor in it; ſuch the Iſraelites found at one of their ſtations, and therefore called it, Rimmon-parez, the pomegranate of rupture, or the burſtened pomegranate; and in the tribe of Zebulun, was a city called Remmon-methoar, the beautiful pomegranate, Joſh. xix. 13. now the rind being broken[d], it appears full of grains or kernels, of a white colour, interſperſed with a reddiſh, purple juice, like blood, as Pauſanias[e] remarks, and looks very beautiful; and is aptly uſed to ſet forth the church's beauty, who, like her beloved, is white and ruddy: by which may be meant eccleſiaſtical officers, placed on an eminence in the church; to take care, among other things, of the diſcipline of it, according to the laws of Chriſt, 1 Tim. v. 17. Heb. xiii. 17. Rom. xii. 8. The temples, in the Hebrew tongue[f], have their name from the thinneſs and tenderneſs of them, having but little fleſh on them, and covered with a thin ſkin; and, in the Greek tongue[g], from the evident beating of the pulſe in them; and their ſituation is between the ear and the eye: all which denote, that ſuch officers ſhould be ſpiritual men, and have as little carnality in them as may be; that they ſhould uſe great tenderneſs in the adminiſtrations of their office, particularly in giving admonitions and reproofs: and, as by the beating of the pulſe, the ſtate of a conſtitution is diſcerned, whether healthy or not; ſo the ſtate of the church may be judged of by the diſcipline of it; if that is neglected, it is in a bad ſtate, and in a declining condition; but if ſtrictly obſerved, it is in an healthful and flouriſhing one: and the temples being between the eye and the ear, may teach, that, in the management of church-affairs, the officers are to make uſe of both; their ears are to be open to all; and they are not to ſhut their eyes againſt clear and plain evidence: and being ſaid to be within her locks, may be expreſſive of the meekneſs and humility of ſuch officers, who are not to lord it over God's heritage; and of the private manner in which admonitions are to be given, in caſe of private offences; and of the affairs and concerns of a church being kept private, and not blazed abroad. And theſe may be compared to a piece of a pomegranate, becauſe of their being full of gifts, and grace, and good works, viſible to men; and for their harmony and union among themſelves, and with the church and its members; and the ſtrict regard that, in all things, is had to the rules and laws of Chriſt; all which make the officers of the church, and the diſcipline of it, acceptable to him. It may be further obſerved, that the temples, taken largely, include the cheeks alſo; and ſo ſome render the word [h] here; and the purple juice of the pomegranate well expreſſes the colour of them; hence we read of purple cheeks [i]: and this may denote the beauty and modeſty of the church; whoſe bluſhing looks, and ruddy cheeks, made her extremely beautiful in the eye of Chriſt.

℣. 4. Thy neck is like the tower of David, builded for an armoury, &c.] This was either the ſtronghold of Zion; or ſome tower, erected by David for an armoury, wherein his worthies or mighty men hung up their ſhields; Mr Sandys [k] ſays, it ſtood aloft, in the utmoſt angle of a mountain, whoſe ruins are yet extant: though the neck is compared to this, not for its height, ſeeing an high and ſtretched-out neck is a token of pride and haughtineſs with the Jews, Iſa. iii. 16. ſee Pſalm lxxiv. 5. and ſo the phraſe is uſed in Latin writers [l]; but for its being ornamented with ſpoils hung up in it, as golden ſhields after mentioned, as the neck is with pearls, jewels, and chains of gold, chap. i. 10. The word for armoury, is from alaph, to teach; not as being a pattern to teach artificers, as Jarchi; nor to ſhew paſſengers their way, as R. Jonah and others, who think this tower was built as a pharus, for ſuch a purpoſe [m]; but it was as an arſenal, in which young learners of the art of war laid up their weapons, as well as what were taken from an enemy; or what were made and laid up here, as a ſtore, in time of need. By the church's neck may be meant, either the miniſters of the word, ſet in the higheſt part of the body, the church, next to Chriſt the head, and in ſubjection to him; to whom they hold, and whoſe name, cauſe and intereſt, they bear up and ſupport in the world; and are the means of conveying ſpiritual food from him to the ſouls of men; and are adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit: and may be compared to the tower of David, for their integrity and uprightneſs, and for their ſtrength and immoveableneſs, ſtanding firm and unmoved againſt the batteries of Satan and the world, and for the defence of the goſpel; and to that built for an armoury, they being furniſhed with the whole armour of God. An ancient writer [n] ſuppoſes, the apoſtle Paul is particularly meant; that eminent exalter of Chriſt the head, and who was ſet for the defence of the goſpel: or it may be rather, the ſcriptures themſelves are meant; which point out and hold forth Chriſt the head, and make him manifeſt to the ſons of men; and are a means of conveying ſpiritual breath; when attended with a divine power, then are they Spirit and life; and of conveying food to the ſouls of men, very nouriſhing and ſatisfying; and are beſpangled with glorious truths and precious promiſes; where every truth is a golden link, and every promiſe a pearl, to a believer: and they may be compared to the tower of David for their ſublimity, being out of the reach and above the capacity of a natural man; and for their firmneſs and immoveableneſs, which Satan and all his emiſſaries will never be able to remove out of the world; and like to that as built for an armoury, whereon there hang a thouſand bucklers, all ſhields of mighty men: no other armour is mentioned, as in this armoury, but ſhields; they being a principal part of armour, and are eſpecially [o] ſo called, as in the Septuagint verſion of 1 Kings xiv. 26, 27. theſe ſhields are armour of mighty men; mighty, through God and his grace, to perform mighty actions, and do great exploits; being furniſhed, from the ſpiritual armoury, with the whole armour of God, to repel Satan's temptations, to defend the goſpel, and refute error; particularly the miniſters of the word are thoſe mighty men; though it is applicable to all ſaints.

℣. 5. Thy two breaſts are like two young roes that are twins, &c.] Or, two fauns, the twins of a doe: Providence, as Plutarch obſerves [p], has given to women two breaſts, that ſhould they have twins, both might have a fountain of nouriſhment; and are fitly compared to twins of the doe. The hind, for the moſt part, brings but one roe at a time; but there are ſome, the philoſopher ſays [q], bring twins; by which the beauty of the breaſts is expreſſed: young roes may point at the ſmallneſs of them, large breaſts are not accounted handſome; and twins, at their equal ſize and bigneſs, not one larger nor higher than the other, that would be a deformity; twins are generally alike. Which feed among the lilies; and are fat and plump: the alluſion may be to the putting of lilies in the boſom, between the breaſts, as other flowers; lilies are reckoned among the decorations of women, Judith x. 3. or rather, to the creatures mentioned, the roes and hinds, which feed among lilies, in fields where lilies grow; for theſe grew in fields as well as in gardens, and are called the lilies of the field,

Matt. vi. 28. and we read [r] ſometimes of harts and hinds among lilies. By breaſts may be meant, either the miniſters of the word, who impart the ſincere milk of the word, and who deliver out the nouriſhing doctrines of grace, like milk out of the breaſt, 1 Cor. iii. 2. 1 Pet. ii. 2. and may be like to roes for their affection to thoſe who are under their miniſtry; and pleaſant to them, to whom they are made uſeful; and for their ſharp-ſightedneſs and penetration into the myſteries of grace; and for their quick diſpatch in doing their work, tho' through many difficulties, which, like young roes, they leap and ſkip over: and two of them ſhew a ſufficient number of them Chriſt provides for his church; and being twins, expreſs their equal authority, and harmony of doctrine; and feeding among lilies, is where Chriſt himſelf feeds, chap. ii. 16. where Chriſt feeds, they feed; and where they feed, Chriſt feeds, even among his ſaints, comparable to lilies, chap. ii. 2. or theſe breaſts may deſign the two Teſtaments, the Old and New, which contain the whole ſincere milk of the word; are like young roes, pleaſant and delightful to believers; and, as twins, are alike, agree in their doctrines concerning Chriſt, and the bleſſings of grace thro' him; the types, figures, prophecies and promiſes of the one, have their completion in the other; and both abound with the lilies of goſpel-doctrines and promiſes: though rather, theſe breaſts may point at the two ordinances of the goſpel, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper; which are breaſts of conſolation to believers, out of which they ſuck, and are ſatisfied; and through feeding on Chriſt in both, they receive much nouriſhment and ſtrength; and are very amiable and lovely to the ſaints, when they enjoy the preſence of Chriſt in them, and have the diſcoveries of his love to them; and may be ſaid to be twins, being both inſtituted by Chriſt, and both lead unto him, and require the ſame ſubjects; and are received and ſubmitted to by ſaints, comparable to lilies, as before.

℣. 6. Until the day break, and the ſhadows flee away, &c.] Until the day of grace breaks on every elect ſinner, and the ſhadows of darkneſs, ignorance and unbelief, are in a great meaſure fled and gone; or until the everlaſting day breaks, and there will be no more night, nor any darkneſs of affliction, nor any more deſertion, doubts and fears; ſee chap. ii. 17. They are the words of Chriſt, declaring whither he would go till that time came, as follows: I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincenſe; the alluſion may be to the mountains and hills where theſe odoriferous plants grew. It is ſaid of Pompey the Great, that when he paſſed over Lebanon (after mentioned, ℣. 8.) and by Damaſcus, he went through ſweet-ſmelling groves and woods of frankincenſe and balſam [s]; and Lebanon is thought, by ſome [t], to have its name from the frankincenſe that grew upon it; though rather, from the whiteneſs of the ſnow continually on it. By this mountain and hill, may be meant the church of Chriſt, gathered together in goſpel-order, ſo called for its viſibility and immoveableneſs, Iſa. ii. 2. Pſal. cxxv. 1. and for the trees of righteouſneſs which are planted and flouriſh there, the ſaints; and for the fragrancy of their graces; and for the ſweet-ſmelling odour of their ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe; and becauſe of the delight and pleaſure Chriſt takes in his people, and they in him here; where they have mutual communion, ſo that it is to them both a mountain of myrrh and a hill of frankincenſe: particularly, here Chriſt delights to be, and here he reſolves to dwell, until his ſecond coming.

℣. 7. Thou art all fair, my love, &c.] Being juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, waſhed in his blood, and ſanctified by his Spirit; of the title, my love, ſee chap. i. 9. The church is often ſaid by Chriſt to be fair, his fair one, and the faireſt among women, chap. i. 8, 15. and ii. 10. and iv. 1. but here all fair, being a perfection of beauty, and perfectly comely through his comelineſs: this is ſaid to ſhew her completeneſs in Chriſt, as to juſtification; and that with reſpect to ſanctification, ſhe had a perfection of parts, though not of degrees; and to obſerve, that the church and all the true members of it were ſo, the meaneſt and weakeſt believer, as well as the greateſt and ſtrongeſt. It is added, There is no ſpot in thee; not that the ſaints have no ſin in them; nor any committed by them; nor that their ſins are not ſins; nor that they have no ſpots in them, with reſpect to ſanctification, which is imperfect; but with reſpect to their juſtification, as having the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and covered with that ſpotleſs robe, they are conſidered as having no ſpot in them; God ſees no ſin in them, ſo as to reckon it to them, and condemn them for it; and they ſtand unblameable and irreproveable in his ſight; and will be preſented by Chriſt, both to himſelf and to his Father, and in the view of men and angels, not having ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing upon them.

℣. 8. Come with me from Lebanon, my ſpouſe, with me from Lebanon, &c.] This is a new title given the church, my ſpouſe; here firſt mentioned, becauſe the day of eſpouſals was over, chap. iii. 11. and having on the wedding-garment, in which ſhe was ſo fair and ſpotleſs, as before deſcribed, ſhe looked ſomewhat like a bride, and the ſpouſe of Chriſt; and is chiefly uſed by Chriſt, to prevail upon her to go with him, which, relation, duty and affection, obliged her to do. The invitation is to come with him from Lebanon, which is repeated, to ſhew earneſtneſs and vehemency; not Lebanon, literally taken, a mountain to the north of the land of Canaan, famous for odoriferous trees, and where to be was delightful; but figuratively, the temple, made of the wood of Lebanon, and Jeruſalem, in which it was, which in Chriſt's time was a den of thieves, and from whence Chriſt called out his people; or this being a pleaſant mountain, may ſignify thoſe carnal, ſenſual pleaſures, from which Chriſt calls his people off. Some render the words, thou ſhalt come with me, &c. [u] being influenced by the powerful grace of Chriſt, and drawn by his love; and what he invites and exhorts unto, he gives grace to enable to perform. Look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions dens, from the mountains of the leopards; Amana is thought by ſome to be the mountain which divided Cilicia from Syria, taken notice of by ſeveral writers [w]; but it ſeems too diſtant from Lebanon; perhaps it is the ſame with Abana, from whence was a river of that name, 2 Kings v. 12. where, in the keri or margin, it is read Amana; ſo the Targum here explains it, of the people that dwelt by the river Amana, which waſhed the country of Damaſcus: Jarchi takes it to be the ſame with Hor, a mountain on the northern border of Iſrael; and indeed, wherever mention is made of this mountain, the Targum has it, Taurus Umanus; and, according to Ptolemy[x], Amanus was a part of mount Taurus, with which it is joined by Joſephus[y]; and with that and Lebanon, and Carmel, by Ælianus[z]. Shenir and Hermon were one and the ſame mountain, called by different names; Hermon might be the common name to the whole; and that part of it which belonged to the Sidonians, was called by them Sirion; and that which the Amorites poſſeſſed, Shenir, Deut. iii. 9. Now all theſe mountains might be called dens of lions, and mountains of leopards; both becauſe inhabited by ſuch beaſts of prey; hence we read of the lions of Syria[a], and of leopards[b] in thoſe parts; in the land of Moab, and in the tribe of Gad, were places called Beth-nimrah, and the waters of Nimrim, which ſeem to have their names from leopards that formerly haunted thoſe places, Num. xxxii. 36. Iſa. xv. 6. or becauſe inhabited by cruel, ſavage, and tyrannical perſons; particularly Amana, in Cilicia or Syria, as appears from Strabo[c], Lucan[d], and Cicero[e]; and Shenir and Hermon were formerly, as Jarchi obſerves, the dens of thoſe lions, Og king of Baſhan, and Sihon king of the Amorites: unleſs rather, theſe were the names of ſome places near Lebanon; for Adrichomius[f] ſays, "the mountain of the leopards, which was round and high, was two miles from Tripoli northward, three from Arce ſouthward, and one from Lebanon." Now theſe words may be conſidered as a call of Chriſt to his people, to come out from among wicked men, comparable to ſuch creatures; and he makes uſe of two arguments to enforce it: the one is taken from the nature of ſuch men, and the danger of being with them; who are like to lions, for their cruel and perſecuting temper; and to leopards, for their being full of the ſpots of ſin; and for their craftineſs and malice, exerciſed towards thoſe who are quiet in the land; and for their ſwiftneſs and readineſs to do miſchief; wherefore it muſt be both uncomfortable and unſafe to be with ſuch perſons: the other argument is taken from their enjoyment of Chriſt's company and preſence, which muſt be preferable to theirs, for pleaſure, profit and ſafety, and therefore moſt eligible. Beſides, Chriſt choſe not to go without his church; ſhe was ſo fair, as before deſcribed, and ſo amiable and lovely in his ſight, as follows.

℣. 9. Thou haſt raviſhed my heart, my ſiſter, my ſpouſe, &c.] Here another new title is given to the church, my ſiſter, with the repetition of the former, my ſpouſe; for one and the ſame perſon, with the Hebrews, might be ſiſter and ſpouſe; ſee 1 Cor. ix. 5. and this may be uſed in a love-ſtrain, and ſo not improper in a love-poem, as this was[g]; ſee chap. viii. 8. likewiſe the church may be called Chriſt's ſiſter, becauſe of his incarnation, in virtue of which he is not aſhamed to call his people his brethren, and ſo his ſiſters, Heb. ii. 11. and on account of their adoption; in which reſpect, he that is Chriſt's Father, is theirs; and which is evidenced in regeneration; when they, through grace, do the will of his Father, and ſo are his brother, and ſiſter, and mother, Matt. xii. 50. And upon the whole, it is uſed to expreſs the great affection of Chriſt for the church, and his high eſteem of her; and which appears by his ſaying, thou haſt raviſhed my heart; which is but one word in the Hebrew text, and no where elſe uſed, and is variouſly rendered: the Vulgate Latin verſion is, thou haſt wounded my heart[h]; with one of love's darts, chap. ii. 5. thou haſt drawn my heart unto thee, ſo ſome Jewiſh writers[i]; which is ſurpriſing, ſince no love nor lovelineſs are in her of herſelf; this ſhews how free and unmerited the love of Chriſt is: according to the uſe of the word with the Talmudiſts[k], the ſenſe is, thou haſt coupled mine heart with thine; the heart of Chriſt and his church are ſo cloſely knit and joined together in love, that they are but one heart, and can never be ſeparated: others, thou haſt ſeized my heart; or, claimed it for thyſelf[l]; thou art maſter over it; it is no more mine, but thine. The Septuagint verſion is, thou haſt unhearted us; Father, Son, and Spirit; particularly the ſecond Perſon: or thou haſt ſtolen away my heart; I have no heart left in me; which, as it is the caſe through fear, is ſometimes through love: this ſenſe is approved by Aben Ezra. Some render it juſt the reverſe, thou haſt heartened me[m]; put heart into me, animated me, made me of good chear; ſo the word is uſed in the Syriac verſion of Matt. ix. 2. 1 Theſſ. v. 14. The ſenſe may be, that ſuch was the love of Chriſt to his church, and ſo much was he charmed by her, that the thought of his having her company in heaven to all eternity, animated him to endure all ſufferings he did for her ſake, Heb. xii. 2. The Targum is, "thy love is fixed upon the table of my heart;" where the church herſelf was fixed, chap. viii. 6. Thou haſt raviſhed my heart with one of thine eyes; the alluſion may be to the cuſtom of the eaſtern women; who, when they walked or ſpoke to any, ſhewed but one eye, the other, with the reſt of the face, being covered with a veil[n]: the eyes of women are enſnaring to lovers[o]; the church has more eyes than one. Mention is made of the eyes of the underſtanding, Eph. i. 18. faith is one of them, and may be here chiefly intended; by which a ſoul looks on Chriſt, the glories of his perſon, and the fulneſs of his grace; and looks to him for the bleſſings of grace now, and eternal glory hereafter: and with this Chriſt's heart is raviſhed; even with one look from it, or glance of it, as ſome[p] render it. With one chain of thy neck; with the ſeveral graces of the Spirit, linked together as in a chain; which were about the neck of the church, and as ornamental to her as a pearl-necklace, chap. i. 10. and with every link in this chain, Chriſt's heart is raviſhed and delighted. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, with one lock of hair of thy neck; which hung down in it, and looked very beautiful; and with which lovers are ſometimes taken[q].

℣. 10. How fair is thy love, my ſiſter, my ſpouſe! &c.] Of theſe titles, ſee the note on ℣. 8, 9. and of the love of the church to Chriſt, ſee the note on chap. i. 3. here ſaid to be fair, lovely and delightful, grateful and acceptable; as it is to Chriſt, in the ſeveral acts and effects of it, and therefore the word is plural, thy loves[r]; being exceeding beautiful in his eye, and extremely well-pleaſing to him; therefore ſays, how fair! as admiring it, it being hard to ſay how fair it was; and this appears from the large manifeſtations of Chriſt's love to thoſe that love him; and from his cauſing all things to work together for the good of ſuch; and from his preparing and laying up things, unſeen and unheard-of, for them. How much better is thy love than wine! which is ſaying the ſame thing of her love to him, ſhe ſays of his to her, chap. i. 2, 4. her love to Chriſt is more pleaſant, more chearing, and more acceptable to him, than the wine of legal ſacrifices, or than all burnt-offerings; or than any duty whatever, unleſs that is the principle from whence it flows, Mark xii. 33, 34. And the ſmell of thine ointments than all ſpices! the ſame with Chriſt's ointments, commended chap. i. 3. namely, the graces of the Spirit, which are in Chriſt without meaſure, and from him communicated to his people; and when exerciſed by them, are very delightful to him, and preferred by him to all ſpices; even to all thoſe uſed in the holy anointing oil, typical of them, Exod. xxx. 23, 24.

℣. 11. Thy lips, O my ſpouſe, drop as the honeycomb, &c.] Words for ſweetneſs, delight and pleaſure, like that; ſo the ſpeech of perſons, flowing from their mouth and tongue, is ſaid to be ſweeter than the honey-comb[s]; and lovers are ſaid to be ſweeter to one another than the ſweet honey[t]: ſo the lips or words of the church in prayer, as the Targum; or in praiſe of Chriſt, and thankfulneſs to him; or in the miniſtration of the doctrines of the goſpel, which are pleaſant words; or in common converſation, are pleaſing to Chriſt; when, like the honey, they drop freely and without conſtraint; gradually, at proper ſeaſons and opportunities, as prudence directs; and continually, more or leſs, ever dropping ſomething to the glory of divine grace, and the good of ſouls. Honey and milk are under thy tongue; rolled, as a ſweet morſel there: the ancients had a ſort of food of this mixture, a cake made of honey and milk, called by the Greeks meligala[u], and ſometimes candylos[w], which was the ſame compoſition; Galen[x] ſays, it was not ſafe to take goats milk without honey; Jove is ſaid[y] to be nurſed with ſuch a mixture: and this being very grateful to the taſte, the ſpeech of the church for pleaſantneſs is compared unto it; ſo Pindar[z] compares his hymn or ode to honey mixed with milk, as being ſweet and grateful; and in Plautus[a], "your words are honey and milk:" and it may be further obſerved, that ſuch a mixture of milk and honey, with poppies in it, was given to the new-married bride, and drank when brought home to her huſband[b]; which was now the caſe of the church. The doctrines of the goſpel may be meant, comparable to honey and milk; to honey, for their ſweetneſs and acceptableneſs; for their nouriſhing nature; and for their being gathered out of the choice flowers of the ſcriptures, by the laborious miniſters of the word, who are like to bees; ſee Pſalm xix. 10. and cxix. 103. to milk, for the purity of them, and the nouriſhment had by them; for their being eaſy of digeſtion, when mixed with faith; and for their being of a cooling nature, to allay the heat of a fiery law in the conſcience; and for the recovery and reſtoration of ſouls by them, in a declining condition; ſee 1 Pet. ii. 2. theſe may be ſaid to be under the tongue, when they have a place in the heart, are the ſubject of conſtant meditation, a ſweetneſs is taſted in them; and they are had in readineſs to ſpeak of them upon all occaſions. And the ſmell of thy garments is like the ſmell of Lebanon; the ancients formerly ſcented their garments; Calypſo gave to Ulyſſes ſweet-ſmelling garments[c]: ſuch are Chriſt's robe of righteouſneſs, and garments of ſalvation, which are ſaid to ſmell of myrrh, aloes and caſſia; with which the ſaints being arrayed, the ſmell of their raiment is as the ſmell of a field the Lord has bleſſed; and ſo like the ſmell of Lebanon, a mountain abounding with odoriferous trees and plants; ſee Pſalm xlv. 8. Gen. xxvii. 27. Hoſea xiv. 6. Or the outward converſation-garments of the ſaints may be deſigned, the mention of which fitly follows the lips and tongue; for when works go along with words, and practice with profeſſion; when to lips dropping the doctrines of the goſpel, like the honey-comb, are joined the ſweet-ſmelling garments of an agreeable life and converſation; the Chriſtian is very much ornamented, and becomes lovely and amiable.

℣. 12. A garden incloſed is my ſiſter, my ſpouſe, &c.] At a little diſtance from Bethlehem are pools of water, and below theſe runs a narrow, rocky valley, incloſed on both ſides with high mountains, which the Friars, as Mr Maundrell ſays[d], will have to be the incloſed garden here alluded to; but it is more likely that the alluſion is to a garden near Jeruſalem, called the king's garden, Adrichomius[e] makes mention of, which was ſhut up, and only for the king's uſe and pleaſure: to which the church may be compared; for its being diſtinguiſhed from the world's wide waſte, by the ſovereign grace of God; and for the ſmallneſs of it in compariſon of that; and for its pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs, having pleaſant and precious plants of great renown; or conſiſting of perſons of different gifts and graces; in whoſe hearts theſe are not naturally, or do not grow there of themſelves; but are ſown or planted, and raiſed up by the Spirit of God, for which the fallow-ground of their hearts is thrown up: and that every thing may be kept in good order, as in a garden, the plants are watered with the grace of God; the trees of righteouſneſs are pruned by Chriſt's Father, the vine-dreſſer; the fences are kept up, and the whole is watched over night and day; and here Chriſt, the owner of it, takes his delightful walks, and grants his preſence with his people. And the church is like an incloſed garden; for diſtinction, being ſeparated by the grace of God, in election, redemption, effectual vocation, &c. and for protection, being encompaſſed with the power of God, as a wall about it; and for ſecrecy, being ſo cloſely ſurrounded, that it is not to be ſeen nor known by the world; and indeed is not acceſſible to any, but to believers in Chriſt; and is peculiarly for his uſe, who is the proprietor of it; ſee ℣. 16. and v. 1. A ſpring ſhut up, a fountain ſealed; the alluſion may be to the ſealed fountains, great perſonages reſerved for their own uſe; ſuch as the kings of Perſia had, of which the king and his eldeſt ſon only might drink[f]; and king Solomon might have ſuch a ſpring and fountain in his garden, either at Jeruſalem or at Ethan, where he had pleaſant gardens, in which he took great delight, as Joſephus[g] relates: and near the pools, at ſome diſtance from Bethlehem, ſuppoſed to be his, is a fountain, which the Friars will have to be the ſealed fountain here alluded to; and to confirm which, they pretend a tradition, that Solomon ſhut up theſe ſprings, and kept the door of them, ſealed with his ſignet, to preſerve the waters for his own drinking; and Mr Maundrell[h], who ſaw them, ſays, it was not difficult ſo to ſecure them, they riſing under ground, and having no avenue to them, but by a little hole, like to the mouth of a narrow well. Now the church may be thus compared, becauſe of the abundance of grace in her, and in her ſeveral members, which is as a well of living water, ſpringing up unto everlaſting life, John iv. 14. and becauſe of the doctrines of the goſpel, called a fountain, Joel iii. 18. with which goſpel-miniſters water the plants in Chriſt's garden, the members of the church; whereby they are revived, refreſhed, and flouriſh; and their ſouls become as a watered garden, whoſe ſprings fail not. Though ſome read this clauſe in connection with the former; a garden incloſed art thou, with a ſpring or flow of water ſhut up, and with a fountain ſealed[i]; meaning Chriſt and his fulneſs; from whence all grace is received by the church and its members; and with which they are ſupplied, and their ſouls are watered: and the phraſes, ſhut up and ſealed, which, whether applied to the doctrines of grace and truth, in and from Chriſt, may denote the ſecrecy and ſafety of them from the men of the world; or to the grace of Chriſt, communicated by him to the ſaints, may denote the ſecurity of it, the inviſible operations of it, and the ſole exerciſe of it on him: for theſe phraſes denote the inviolable chaſtity of the church to Chriſt, in her faith, love, ſervice and worſhip; ſee Prov. v. 15—18. and are uſed in the Jewiſh writings[k], to expreſs the chaſtity of the bride. Ambroſe affirms[l], that what Plato[m] ſays concerning Jove's garden, elſewhere called by him the garden of the mind, is taken out of Solomon's Song.

℣. 13. Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, &c.] Theſe plants are the members of the church, true converts, believers in Chriſt; pleaſant plants, plants of renown, planted in the church by Chriſt's heavenly Father, and ſhall never be plucked up: or, thy gardens, as it may be rendered[n]; particular churches, well taken care of and watered; theſe make an orchard, or are like one, even a paradiſe, as the word[o] ſignifies: it is generally thought to be a Perſic word; ſee Neh. ii. 8. but Hillerus[p] derives it from פרד to ſeparate, it being a garden, ſeparated and incloſed as before; one like Eden's garden, exceeding pleaſant and delightful: and not like an orchard of any ſort of trees, but of pomegranates, of which there were plenty in Canaan, hence called a land of pomegranates, Deut. viii. 8. many places in it had their names from thence, Joſh. xv. 32. and xix. 13. and xxi. 24. To which believers in Chriſt may be compared, for the various ſorts of them[q], for their largeneſs, fruitfulneſs and uprightneſs; ſaints have gifts and grace, differing from one another as to ſize, but all pomegranates, trees of righteouſneſs; ſome are larger, and excel others, are full of all the fruits of righteouſneſs; but all are, more or leſs, fruitful and upright in heart: and ſo the ſaints of the higher claſs may be here deſigned, as thoſe of a lower are by other trees and ſpices after mentioned. With pleaſant fruits; that are valuable, precious and deſirable, of which an enumeration follows: Camphire, with ſpikenard; or cypreſſes, or cypruſſes with nards[r]; both in the plural number: the former may intend cypreſs-trees, ſo called on account of their berries and fruits growing in cluſters; ſee chap. i. 14. and the latter, becauſe there are different ſorts of them, as nardus Italica, Indica, and Celtica: to theſe ſaints may be compared, becauſe pleaſant and delightful, of a ſweet ſmell, and rare and excellent.

℣. 14. Spikenard and ſaffron, &c.] The former is the beſt ſort of nard, and therefore mentioned and repeated; to which ſaints may be compared, becauſe of the graces of the Spirit in them; which, when exerciſed, give a ſweet odour, and are exceeding grateful to Chriſt; ſee chap. i. 12. and the latter, according to Schindler[s], ſeems to have been read carcos, the ſame with crocus, and is a plant well known by us for its chearing nature; and has its name from the Arabic, zaffran, becauſe of its yellow or golden colour; but crocus, from Corycus[t], a mountain in Cilicia, where it grew; it is properly joined with ſpikenard, ſince itſelf is a ſpica, and is ſometimes called ſpica Ciliſſa[u]. Next follow, Calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincenſe; calamus is the ſweet cane in Iſa. xliii. 24. cinnamon is the rind or bark of a tree; both grow in India[w] and in Arabia[x]; as alſo trees of frankincenſe, which are only in Arabia; hence one of the Arabia's is called thurifera[y], for they do not grow in all Arabia: the two firſt were ingredients in the holy anointing oil, and the latter in the holy perfume, Exod. xxx. 23, 34. Myrrh and aloes, with all the chief ſpices; Solomon's gardens might be furniſhed with all theſe; and with the above trees, plants and ſpices, from Arabia Felix, where, as Appianus[z] ſays, caſſia grew in marſhy places; myrrh and frankincenſe were gathered from trees, cinnamon from ſhrubs, and their meadows naturally produced nard; hence called aromatifera, the ſpicy country[a]: myrrh was alſo an ingredient in the anointing oil; and aloes, according to the Targum, is the ſame, with lign-aloes; ſee Numb. xxiv. 6. not the herb which has a very bitter juice, but the tree of a ſweet a ſweet odour, which Iſidore[b] diſtinguiſhes, and is what is meant in Pſal. xlv. 8. Prov. vii. 17. and were both of a very fragrant ſmell. Now all theſe trees, plants and ſpices, ſignify truly precious ſouls, poſſeſſed of the graces of the Spirit; comparable to them for their valuableneſs and excellency, their ſweet ſmell, and the reviving and refreſhing nature of them; which make the ſubjects of theſe graces very agreeable to Chriſt, and to one another. What a garden is the church thus planted!

℣. 15. A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and ſtreams from Lebanon.] Some[c] take theſe words to be the words of Chriſt continued, ſpeaking ſtill of his church, and explaining and enlarging upon what he had ſaid of her, ℣. 12. but they are rather the words of the church; who, upon hearing herſelf commended, and knowing that all her fruitfulneſs, and the flouriſhing condition ſhe was in, were owing to the grace of Chriſt, breaks forth in theſe words, and aſcribes all to him, ſaying, O fountain of gardens, O well of living waters, &c. for ſo the words may be rendered in the vocative caſe[d]. By the gardens may be meant, particular diſtinct churches, ſuch as were gathered in the firſt times of the goſpel, and ſince, as the churches of Aſia, &c. ſeparated from the world, and planted with trees of righteouſneſs, ſuch as are before deſcribed: and though there are many gardens or churches, there is but one fountain which ſupplies them all with gifts and grace, and that is Chriſt, and his fulneſs, the fountain from whence flow all grace, and the bleſſings of it: who alſo is the well of living waters; a well deep and large, fathomleſs and bottomleſs, dug by ſovereign grace, and full of all grace; ſignified by waters, for the abundance of it; and ſaid to be living, becauſe by it, dead ſinners are quickened, and drooping ſaints revived; and is ever running[e], ever flowing, and overflowing; ſo that there is always a ſupply for all Chriſt's gardens, and for all believers in all ages; who, with the bucket of faith, draw water with joy out of this well, or wells of ſalvation, Iſa. xii. 3. and the flows of grace from hence are like ſtreams from Lebanon, becauſe of the abundance of it; the conſtant and continued ſupplies of it; the rapidity and force with which it comes, bearing down all obſtacles in its way; and for the pleaſure it gives, the flows of it being as delightful and grateful as ſtreams of water in hot countries. Reſpect ſeems to be had to ſeveral places called by theſe names; there was one, called the Fountain of Gardens, which flowed from Lebanon, ſix miles from Tripoli, and watered all the gardens, whence it had its name, and all the country that lay between theſe two places[f]; and there was another, called the Well of living Waters, a little mile to the ſouth of Tyre; it had four fountains, from whence were cut various aqueducts and rivulets, which watered all the plain of Tyre, and all its gardens; which fountains were little more than a bow's caſt from the main ſea, and in which ſpace ſix mills were employed[g]: and there is a rupture in mount Lebanon, as Mr Maundrell[h] ſays, which runs up it ſeven hours travelling; and which, on both ſides, is ſteep and high, and cloathed with fragrant greens from top to bottom; and every where refreſhed with fountains, falling down from the rocks, in pleaſant caſcades, the ingenious work of nature: and Rauwolff[i], who was on this mountain in 1575, relates; "We came, ſays he, into pleaſant groves, by delightful rivulets that aroſe from ſprings, that made ſo ſweet a noiſe, as to be admired by king Solomon, Cant. iv. 15." and theſe ſtreams gave riſe to ſome rivers, as Jordan, Eleutherus, &c.[k] to which the alluſion is here. There were two cities, one in the tribe of Judah, and the other in the tribe of Iſſachar, called Engannim, the fountain of gardens, Joſh. xv. 34. and xix. 21.

℣. 16. Awake, O north wind, &c.] Theſe words, according to ſome[l], are the words of the church continued, praying for the Spirit; to which ſenſe, the order and connection of the words ſeem to incline; though the language ſuits beſt with Chriſt, who has the command of the winds, and a right and property in the garden, the church: nor does it ſeem ſo agreeable, that the church ſhould petition Chriſt to let looſe the north-wind upon her, if by that are meant afflictive diſpenſations of providence; but agrees well enough with Chriſt, ſince theſe come not without his will and order, and by him made to work together for good; by which he nips the corruptions of his people, tries their graces, and cauſes them to come forth into exerciſe: though ſome[m] think, this is a command to the north-wind to remove, and be gone, and blow no longer, ſince it was ſpring, chap. ii. 11. and would be hurtful to the plants in the garden; and the verb blow is ſingular, and only in conſtruction with the ſouth-wind; and beſides, winds diametrically oppoſite[n], cannot blow together in the ſame horizon, with a continued blaſt: though others[o] are of opinion, that both winds are deſigned, being both uſeful to gardens; the one to ſcatter the clouds, and make the air clear and wholſome, and reſtrain the luxuriancy of the plants; and the other, being moiſt and warming, of uſe to bring plants and fruits to maturity; and both may deſign the Spirit of God, in his different operations and effects, through the law and the terrors of it, and by the goſpel and its comforting doctrines. And come thou ſouth, blow upon my garden; the church, Chriſt's property, as ſhe aſſerts in the latter part of the verſe: the Spirit of God is intended by the ſouth, or ſouth-wind; who is compared to the wind, becauſe it blows like that, freely, and as he pleaſes, when, where, and on whom, and imperceptibly, powerfully, and irreſiſtibly, John iii. 8. and to the ſouth-wind, becauſe it is a warm wind, brings ſerenity, and makes fruitful with ſhowers of rain: ſo the Spirit of God warms the cold heart of a ſinner; thaws his frozen ſoul, and comforts with the diſcoveries of divine love; brings quietneſs and peace into the conſcience; and makes fruitful in grace and good works, by cauſing the rain of goſpel-doctrines to deſcend and diſtil upon men. The end to be anſwered is, That the ſpices thereof may flow out; the ſpices in the garden, the odoriferous plants, might emit a fragrant ſmell; though Virgil[p] repreſents the ſouth-wind as hurtful to flowers; ſo it might be in Italy, where it dried them up, as Servius on the place obſerves; and yet be uſeful to them in Paleſtine, where it blew from the ſea, and is ſometimes ſo called, Pſalm cvii. 3. Spices denote the graces of believers, rare, precious and odorous; and their flowing out, the exerciſe of them, their evidence, increaſe, and the ripening of them; when they diffuſe a ſweet odour to Chriſt and others, and make it delightful to walk in his garden; as it is to walk in one after a delightful ſhower of rain, and when the wind gently blows upon it. And hence what is prayed for being granted, the church ſpeaks again, and invites Chriſt, ſaying, Let my beloved come into his garden; which coming is to be underſtood, not of Chriſt's firſt, nor of his ſecond coming; but of his ſpiritual coming, to viſit his people, grant his preſence, and manifeſt his love; which is very deſirable by them; and, when granted, is reckoned a great favour, and is an inſtance of the condeſcending grace of Chriſt, John xiv. 22. the church is his garden by his own choice, his Father's gift, the purchaſe of his blood, and the power of his grace: and here he is invited to come, and eat his pleaſant fruits; meaning either the graces of the Spirit, which are his fruits; and called Chriſt's, becauſe they come from him, and are exerciſed on him, and he is the author and finiſher of them: or the good works of believers, which are performed by virtue of union to him, and abiding in him; are done in his ſtrength, and deſigned for his glory: and both are pleaſant, that is, well-pleaſing and acceptable to him; the graces of the Spirit, when in exerciſe, as appears from ℣. 9, 10. and good works, when done in faith, from a principle of love, and to his glory: and he may be ſaid to eat them, when he expreſſes his well-pleaſedneſs with them, and acceptation of them.

CHAP. V.

THIS chapter begins with Chriſt's anſwer to the church's requeſt; in which he informs her, that he was come into his garden, as ſhe deſired, and gives an account of what he had done there; and kindly invites his dear friends to feaſt with him there, ℣. 1. Then ſhe relates her caſe and circumſtances, which followed upon this, her ſleepy frame, and ungrateful carriage to her beloved; which he reſenting, withdrew from her, and this gave her ſenſible pain, ℣. 2—6. what treatment ſhe met with from the watchmen; her charge to the daughters of Jeruſalem; and the queſtions they aſked about her beloved, ℣. 7—9. which put her upon giving a large deſcription of him, by his ſeveral parts, head, hair, &c. ℣. 10—15. And the chapter is concluded with a general commendation of him and his lovelineſs, and a claim of intereſt in him, ℣. 16.

℣. 1. I am come into my garden, my ſiſter, my ſpouſe, &c.] This verſe ſhould rather have concluded the preceding chapter, being Chriſt's anſwer to the church's requeſt, which was ſpeedily and exactly granted as ſhe deſired; which ſhews it was according to the will of Chriſt, and of which he informs her; for ſometimes he is preſent, when it is not known he is: of the titles uſed, ſee chap. iv. 8, 9. and of Chriſt's coming into his garden, ℣. 16. What he did when come into it, follows: I have gathered my myrrh with my ſpice; to make an ointment of, and anoint his gueſts with, after invited, as was uſual in thoſe times and countries, Luke vii. 38, 46. Mark xiv. 3. oil of myrrh is mentioned, Eſther ii. 12. Theſe may deſign, either the ſufferings of Chriſt; which, though like myrrh, bitter to him, are like ſpice, of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour, to God and to the ſaints; the fruits of which, in the ſalvation of his people, are delightful to himſelf, and which he is now reaping with pleaſure: or the graces of his Spirit in exerciſe in them, in which Chriſt delights; ſee chap. iv. 13, 14. and teſtifies by his preſence; and having got in his harveſt, or vintage, as the word [q] uſed ſignifies, he makes a feaſt for himſelf and friends, as was the cuſtom of former times, and now is. I have eaten my honey-comb with my honey; bread with honey, as the Septuagint verſion, dipped in honey, or honey put upon it; ſee Ezek. xvi. 13. or the ſugar-cane with the ſugar, as Jarchi, approved by Guſſetius [r]: the meaning may be, he plucked up a ſugar-cane, and eat the ſugar out of it, which is called by Arrianus, μελι καλαμινον, as Cocceius obſerves; or rather, a piece of an honey-comb, full of honey, juſt taken out of the hive, had in great eſteem with the Jews; ſee Luke xxiv. 42. the word for honey-comb properly ſignifies wood-honey, of which there was plenty in Judea, 1 Sam. xiv. 25. though this was in a garden, where they might have their hives, as we have. By which may be meant the goſpel and its doctrines, ſweeter than the honey and the honey-comb; and, being faithfully diſpenſed, is pleaſing to Chriſt. I have drunk my wine with my milk; a mixture of wine and milk was uſed by the ancients [s]; and which, Clemens of Alexandria ſays [t], is a very profitable and healthful mixture: by which alſo may be intended the doctrines of the goſpel, comparable to wine and milk; to the one, for its reviving and chearing quality; to the other, for its nouriſhing and ſtrengthening nature; ſeee Iſa. lv. 1. and notes on chap. iv. 11. and vii. 9. Here is a feaſt, a variety of ſweet, ſavoury, wholſome food and drink; and all Chriſt's own, my myrrh, my ſpice, &c. as both doctrines and graces be; with which Chriſt feaſts himſelf, and invites his friends to eat and drink with him: Eat, O friends, drink; yea, drink abundantly, O beloved; the individuals, of which the church conſiſts, are the friends who are reconciled to God by the death of Chriſt, and to himſelf by his Spirit and grace; and whom he treats as ſuch, by viſiting them, and diſcloſing the ſecrets of his heart to them, John xv. 14, 15. and beloved, beloved of God, and by Chriſt, and by the ſaints; there is a mutual friendſhip and love between Chriſt and his people: and theſe he invites to eat of the proviſions of his houſe, of all the fruits of his garden, to which they are welcome; and of his love and grace, and all the bleſſings of it, which exceed the choiceſt wine; and of which they may drink freely, and without danger; yea, be inebriated with loves [u], as the words may be rendered; ſee Eph. v. 18. With the eaſtern people, it was uſual to bid their gueſts welcome, and ſolicit them to feed on the proviſions before them; as it is with the Chineſe now, the maſter of the houſe takes care to go about, and encourage them to eat and drink [w].

℣. 2. I ſleep, but my heart waketh, &c.] Like perſons that are half awake, half aſleep, whom Cicero [x] calls ſemiſomni. Chriſt and the church having feaſted together at his invitation, ſhe ſoon after fell aſleep, as the diſciples did after a repaſt with their Lord; yet not ſo faſt aſleep but that ſhe was ſenſible of it; for this was not the dead ſleep of ſin, in which unconverted men are, and are inſenſible of; nor a judicial ſlumber ſome are given up unto, and perceive it not, a frame of ſpirit unbecoming ſaints, and diſpleaſing to Chriſt; though conſiſtent with grace, which at ſuch a time is not or very little in exerciſe; they are ſlothful in duty, and backward to it, the phraſe is ſometimes uſed to deſcribe a ſluggiſh, ſlothful man [y]; they are indifferent and lukewarm about divine things, content themſelves with the bare externals of religion, without the lively exerciſe of grace, and without fervency and ſpirituality in them, and ſeem willing to continue ſo; ſee the note on Matt. xxv. 6. but the church here was not ſo overcome with ſleep but her heart was awake. Jarchi, and ſome ancient Jewiſh writers [z], interpret this and the former clauſe of different perſons, the former, I ſleep, of the bride; this, my heart waketh, of the bridegroom; and then the ſenſe is, though I am in a ſleepy frame, he who is my heart, a phraſe uſed by lovers [a], my ſoul, my life, my all, he never ſlumbers nor ſleeps, he watches over me night and day, leſt any hurt me; but both clauſes are rather to be underſtood of the ſame perſon differently conſidered, as having two principles of grace and corruption, as the church has, which are repreſented as two perſons; ſee Rom. vii. 18, 20. Eph. iv. 22, 24. Gal. v. 17. as the carnal part in her prevailed ſhe was the ſleeping I, as the new man, or principle of grace appeared, her heart was awake; for notwithſtanding her ſleepy frame, ſhe had ſome thoughts of Chriſt, and ſtirring of affection to him; ſome convictions of her ſin, and ſome deſires of being in her duty perhaps, though overpowered by the fleſhly part; the ſpirit was willing, but the fleſh weak. Chriſt's carriage to his church in this caſe follows, and is obſerved by her; he ſpoke to her ſo loud, that though ſleepy ſhe heard him, and owns it, it is the voice of my beloved; in the miniſtration of the goſpel, which is to be diſtinguiſhed from the voice of a ſtranger, even when dull and ſleepy under hearing it, and little affected with it. Chriſt was the church's beloved ſtill, had an affection for him, though not thoroughly awaked by his voice, but ſleeps on ſtill; this method failing he takes another, or repeats the ſame with an additional circumſtance, that knocketh, ſaying, Open to me; which is to be underſtood not ſo much of his knocking by the miniſtry of the word to awaken her out of ſleep, but in a providential way, by taking in his hand the rod of affliction, or ſcourge of perſecution, and laſhing therewith in order to bring her out of her carnal ſecurity; ſee Rev. iii. 20. and he not only knocked but called, ſaying, Open to me, open the door unto me and let me in; ſo lovers are repreſented as at the door or gate to get admittance, and know not which to call moſt hard and cruel, the door or their lover [b]: there is an emphaſis on the word me; me, thy Lord, thy head, thy huſband, thy friend, that loves thee ſo dearly; to whom her heart was ſhut, her affections contracted, her deſires towards him languid; wherefore he importunes her to open to him, which denotes an enlarging of her affections to him, an exerciſe of grace on him, an expreſſion of the deſires of her ſoul unto him; which yet could not be done without efficacious grace exerted, as in ℣. 4. but the more to win upon her, he gives her good words, and the moſt endearing titles, expreſſive of love and relation, my ſiſter, my love, my dove, my undefiled, which are all made uſe of before, excepting the laſt; ſee chap. i. 9, 14. and iv. 9. that is, my undefiled, which ſhe was, not as a deſcendent of Adam, nor as in herſelf, but as waſhed in the blood of Chriſt, juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and ſanctified by his Spirit; and as having been enabled by divine grace to preſerve her chaſtity, and keep the bed undefiled; not guilty of ſpiritual adultery among all her infirmities, even idolatry and ſuperſtition; ſee Rev. xiv. 4. or my perfect one [c]; not in a legal, but in an evangelical ſenſe, being completely redeemed, perfectly juſtified, fully pardoned, and ſanctified in every part, though not to the higheſt degree; and perfect in Chriſt, though not in herſelf: other arguments follow to engage her attention to his requeſt. For my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night; through ſtanding ſo long at the door, in the night-ſeaſon, waiting to be let in; ſo lovers repreſent their caſe in ſuch circumſtances, as dealt very hardly with [d]: by which may be meant the ſufferings of Chriſt, either in the perſons of his miniſters, who are expoſed to the rage and reproach of men for miniſtring in his name to the church; or which he endured in his own perſon, in his eſtate of humiliation; and particularly in the night he was betrayed, and during the time of darkneſs he hung upon the croſs, when he bore the ſins of his people, and his Father's wrath; compared to dew, and drops of the night, becauſe of the multitude of them he endured in ſoul and body, and becauſe ſo uncomfortable to human nature; though as dew is uſeful and fructifying to the earth, ſo were theſe the means of many fruits and bleſſings of grace, and of bringing many ſouls to glory; now though theſe arguments were expreſſed in the moſt ſtrong, moving, and melting language, yet were ineffectual.

℣. 3. I have put off my coat, &c.] In order to lie down on her bed at night, and take her eaſe; meaning her converſation-garments, which ſhe had not been careful of to keep, but had betook herſelf to carnal eaſe and reſt, and was off her watch and guard, Neh. iv. 23. Rev. xvi. 15. and being at eaſe and free from trouble, affliction, and perſecution, was unwilling to ariſe and go with her beloved, leſt ſhe ſhould meet with the ſame trials and ſufferings as before, for the ſake of him and his goſpel; which may be greatly the ſenſe of her next words. How ſhall I put it on? which ſuggeſts an apprehenſion of difficulty in doing it, it being eaſier to drop the performance of duty than to take it up again; and ſhews ſlothfulneſs and ſluggiſhneſs, being loth and not knowing how to bring herſelf to it; and an averſion of the carnal and fleſhly part unto it; yea as if ſhe thought it was unreaſonable in Chriſt to deſire it of her, when it was but her reaſonable ſervice; vice; or as if ſhe imagined it was dangerous, and would be detrimental to her reſt, and prejudicial to her health. I have waſhed my feet; as perſons uſed to do when come off of a journey, and about to go to bed[e], being weary; as ſhe was of ſpiritual exerciſes, and of the obſervance of ordinances and duties, and ſo betook herſelf to carnal eaſe, and from which being called argues, how ſhall I defile them? by riſing out of bed, and treading on the floor, and going to the door to let her beloved in; as if hearkening to the voice of Chriſt, obeying his commands, and taking every proper ſtep to enjoy communion with him, would be a defiling her; whereas it was the reverſe of theſe that did it: from the whole it appears, that not only theſe excuſes were idle and frivolous, but ſinful; ſhe ſlighted the means Chriſt made uſe of to awaken her, by calling and knocking; ſhe ſinned againſt light and knowledge, ſleeping on, when ſhe knew it was the voice of her beloved; ſhe acted a diſingenuous part in inviting Chriſt into his garden, and then preſently fell aſleep; and then endeavoured to ſhift the blame from herſelf, as if ſhe was no ways culpable, but what was deſired was either difficult, or unreaſonable, or unlawful; ſhe appears guilty of great ingratitude, and diſcovers the height of folly in preferring her preſent eaſe to the company of Chriſt.

℣. 4 My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, &c.] To remove the bolt or bar which kept him from entering in. By the door is meant the door of her heart, which was in a great meaſure ſhut againſt Chriſt, through the prevalence of corruption; and the hole in it ſhews that it was not entirely ſhut up, there was a little love broke out from her to him; a little light broke in from him upon her; but her heart was much narrowed and ſtraitened, her grace low in exerciſe, yet there were ſome faith, ſome love, &c. wherefore Chriſt takes the advantage of the little hole or crevice there was, and put in his hand; which is to be underſtood of powerful and efficacious grace, and the exertion of it on her; which is as neceſſary to awake a drowſy ſaint, and reclaim a backſliding profeſſor, and to quicken to the exerciſe of grace, and performance of duty, as to the converſion of a ſinner, Acts xi. 22. and this is a proof of the greatneſs of Chriſt's love to his church; that notwithſtanding her rude carriage to him, he does not utterly forſake her, but left ſomething behind that wrought upon her; as well as of his mighty power, in that what calls, knocks, raps, good words, and melting language, could not do, his hand did at once. And my bowels were moved for him; the paſſions of her ſoul; her grief and ſorrow for ſin, in uſing him in ſo ill a manner; her ſhame for being guilty of ſuch ingratitude; her fear leſt he ſhould utterly depart from her; her love, which had been chill and cold, now began to kindle and appear in flames; her heart, and the deſires of it, were in motion towards him; and a hearty concern appeared that he ſhould be uſed ſo unfriendly by her; that his company and communion with him ſhould be ſlighted, who had ſo greatly loved her, and endured ſo much for her; other effects follow.

℣. 5. I roſe up to open to my beloved, &c.] As ſoon as touched by the hand of mighty grace, ſhe not only reſolved to riſe, but actually roſe, and that directly, not being eaſy to lie any longer on her bed of carnal ſecurity; being now made heartily and thoroughly willing to let in her beloved, who ſhe ſuppoſed was ſtill at the door; but in that ſhe was miſtaken; however ſhe met with a rich experience of his grace and goodneſs. And my hands dropped with myrrhe, and my fingers with ſweet-ſmelling myrrhe, upon the handles of the lock; when ſhe puts her hand upon it to draw it back, and let her beloved in; the myrrhe, which he had gathered, ℣. 1. and left there when he put in his hand at the hole of the door: the alluſion ſeems to be to lovers ſhut out, who uſed to cover the threſhold of the door with flowers, and anoint the door-poſts with ſweet-ſmelling ointment[f]: as by the door, is meant the heart of the church, ſo by the lock, which faſtened and kept it ſhut, unbelief may be deſigned; and by the handles of it, lukewarmneſs and ſluggiſhneſs, which ſtrengthen unbelief, and keep the heart cloſer ſhut againſt Chriſt; and by her hands and fingers, faith in exerciſe, attended with the fruits of it, attempting to draw back the lock of unbelief; which whilſt the church was trying to do, ſhe met with ſome freſh experience of the grace of Chriſt: her hands and fingers dropped with ſweet-ſmelling myrrhe, paſſing or current[g]; ſuch as weeps and drops from the tree of itſelf, and being liquid, runs upon and overflows the hands and fingers; and being excellent and valuable, is paſſing or current as money; and the odour of it diffuſive, it paſſes afar off: now this is either to be underſtood of myrrhe brought by the church, a pot of ointment of it to anoint her beloved with, who had been long waiting at her door in the night-ſeaſon, to refreſh him with it; and this pot being broke unawares, or deſignedly, or being in a panic her hands ſhook, the myrrhe run over her hands and fingers as ſhe was drawing back the lock; which may denote, that her grace was now in exerciſe and on the flow, in great abundance; which put her on her duty, and which became odorous and acceptable to Chriſt: or it may ſignify myrrhe brought and left there by Chriſt; and may expreſs the abundance of grace from him, communicated by him, to draw and allure her to him, to ſupple and ſoften her hard heart, to take off the ſtiffneſs of her will, and the ruſtineſs of her affections, and make the lock of unbelief draw back eaſier, and ſo open a way for himſelf into her heart; and to excite grace in her, her faith and love, and cauſe her to come forth in exerciſe on him: and her hands and fingers dropping herewith, ſhews that all the grace a believer has is from Chriſt, from whom, in the way of his duty, he receives a large meaſure of it: whilſt the church was on her bed of ſloth there was no flow of ſweet-ſmelling myrrhe; but now ſhe is up and doing her duty, her hands and fingers are overflowed with it.

℣. 6. I opened to my beloved, &c.] Which was what he deſired, and was done in virtue of his putting in his hand by the hole of the door; or by the exertion of his efficacious grace, working in her both to will and to do, without which it would not have been done; namely, her heart dilated, the deſires and affections of her ſoul enlarged towards Chriſt, and every grace drawn forth and exerciſed on him; and though the heart of a believer is ſometimes ſhut to Chriſt, yet when it is opened, it is only patent to him; the church thought Chriſt was ſtill at the door, and might be the more confirmed in it by what ſhe found on the handles of the lock; but lo her miſtake, but my beloved had withdrawn himſelf, and was gone; a ſad diſappointment this! ſhe expected to have ſeen him, and been received in his arms, and embraced in his boſom; but inſtead of that, he was gone out of ſight and hearing: this withdrawment was to chaſtize her for her former carriage, and to ſhew her more the evil of her ſin, and his reſentment of it; to try the truth and ſtrength of her grace, to inflame her love the more, and ſharpen her deſires after his preſence, to prize it more when ſhe had it, and be careful not to loſe it: her uſing two words of the ſame import, he turned himſelf [h] and was gone, ſignifies, that he was really gone, and not in her imagination only; and that he was gone ſuddenly, at an unawares, and as ſhe might fear would never return; and theſe words being without a copulative, had withdrawn himſelf, he was gone, ſhew her haſte in ſpeaking, the confuſion ſhe was in, the ſtrength of her paſſion, the greatneſs of her diſappointment and ſorrow; it is as if ſhe was repreſented wringing her hands and crying, He is gone, he is gone, he is gone. My ſoul failed when he ſpake; or went out [i]; not out of her body, but ſhe fell into a ſwoon, and was as one dead for a while; and this was at or through his word [k], as it may be rendered; through what he ſaid when he turned about and departed, expreſſing his reſentment at her carriage; or rather, at the remembrance of his kind and tender language he uſed when he firſt called her to ariſe, ſaying, Open to me, my ſiſter, my ſpouſe, &c. and when ſhe called to mind how ſadly ſhe had ſlighted and neglected him, it cut her to the heart, and threw her into this fainting fit. I ſought him, but I could not find him; in the public ordinances of his houſe; ſee the note on chap. iii. 2. I called him, but he gave me no anſwer; called him by his name as ſhe went along the ſtreets and broad ways of the city, where ſhe ſuppoſed he might be; praying aloud, and moſt earneſtly and fervently, that he would return to her; but had no anſwer, at leaſt not immediately, and thus he treated her in the ſame manner ſhe had treated him; he had called to her, and ſhe diſregarded him, and now ſhe calls to him, and he takes no notice of her; but this was not in a way of vindictive wrath and puniſhment, as in Prov. i. 24, 28. but of chaſtiſement and correction.

℣. 7. The watchmen that went about the city found me, &c.] Of the city and the watchmen in it, and of their finding the church, ſee the notes on chap. iii. 2, 3. They ſmote me, they wounded me; taking her for a night-walker, they gave her ill words and hard blows; this was not very becoming watchmen to uſe thoſe of the city in this manner; for as Plato [l] ſays, keepers of cities ſhould be mild and gentle towards their own, but to enemies rough and ſevere: if theſe were true miniſters of Chriſt, this they did by reproaching her for and upbraiding her with her lukewarmneſs and unkindneſs to Chriſt, ſharply reproving her for them; and inſtead of comforting her with the doctrines of grace, cut and wounded her with the terrors of the law; or elſe hearing ſome ſweet diſcourſes from them concerning the perſon and grace of Chriſt, her heart was ſmitten and wounded therewith; and hence ſhe charges the daughters of Jeruſalem in the next verſe, that if they found her beloved, that they would tell him, that ſhe was ſick of or wounded with love: but as they rather appear to be falſe teachers, ſince the church would have ſhunned them, nor did ſhe make any application to them, nor any enquiry of them about her beloved, and met with cruel and unkind uſage from them; they may be ſaid to ſmite and wound her by their falſe doctrines and ſcandalous lives, by the diviſions they made, and by the cenſures and reproaches they caſt upon her, the odious names they gave her, and by ſtirring up the civil magiſtrates againſt her; all which agree with antichriſtian miniſters. The keepers of the walls took away my vail from me; there were two ſorts of watchmen in a city, one that went about to ſee that all was right and ſafe within; and others placed on the walls of it, who kept their ſtand, and whoſe buſineſs it was to give notice of an enemy approaching, and to defend the city from outward attacks upon it; and ſuch are the miniſters of the word, Iſa. lxii. 6. but here falſe teachers are meant as before, as appears from their abuſe of the church, taking away her vail from her, ſuch as women wore for ornament, or as a ſign of modeſty, or as a token of ſubjection to their huſbands, Iſa. iii. 23. Gen. xxiv. 65. 1 Cor. xi. 6—10. and may here deſign either their falſly accuſing her good converſation, which was her outward covering; or their attempt to take away from her the doctrine of Chriſt's imputed righteouſneſs, which is her covering, the wedding-garment, the nuptial robe, as Gregory Nyſſene [m] calls the vail here: and ſuch a vail was given by the bridegroom with the Romans, and was called flammeum, from its being of a flame-colour [n], either yellow or red, expreſſive of the bluſhing and modeſty of the new married bride [o]; and the like cuſtom might obtain with the Jews.

℣. 8. I charge you, O daughters of Jeruſalem, &c.] Young converts, as before obſerved; who, upon the hideous outcry the church made in the ſtreets, came to her to know what was the matter, whom ſhe addreſſed as after related; this ſhews the humility and condeſcenſion of the church, in deſiring the aſſiſtance of weaker ſaints in her preſent caſe, and her earneſtneſs and reſolution to make uſe of all ways and means ſhe could to find her beloved; and it becomes ſaints to be aſſiſting to one another; and converſation with one another, even with weak believers, is often uſeful. And theſe the church adjures, or cauſes to ſwear [p]; charged them on oath, as they would anſwer it to God; which ſhews the ſtrength of her love, her ſincerity, and ſeriouſneſs in her enquiry after him: If ye find my beloved; who had but little knowledge of him, and communion with him, ſince at preſent he was yet to be found by them; and it was poſſible, notwithſtanding, that they might find him before ſhe did, as Chriſt ſhewed himſelf to Mary Magdalen, before he did to the diſciples. The charge ſhe gave them is, That ye tell him, that I am ſick of love; or, what ſhall ye, or ſhould ye tell him [q]? not her blows and wounds, the injuries and affronts ſhe had received from the watchmen and keepers of the wall; nor many things, only this one thing, which was moſt on her heart, uppermoſt in her mind, and under which ſhe muſt die, if not relieved, tell him, him, that I am ſick of love; and that for him, thro' his abſence, and her eager longing after him, and the diſcoveries of his love to her; and which, tho' not incurable, nor a ſickneſs unto death, for Chriſt ſuffers none to die through love to him, yet is a very painful one; and is to be known by a ſoul's panting after Chriſt, and its prodigious jealouſy of his love, and by its carefulneſs, diligence and induſtry, to enjoy the manifeſtations of it. Of this love-ſickneſs, ſee more on chap. ii. 5.

℣. 9. What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou faireſt among women? &c.] The ſame title Chriſt gives her, chap. i. 8. and from whom theſe daughters ſeem to have taken it; and in giving it to her, might be aſſured they were right, ſince he, who knew her perfectly well, ſo calls her; in what ſenſe ſhe was ſo fair, ſee the note there: and this they uſed to ſhew their eſteem of her, and that they were willing to do all the ſervice they could for her; and what made them ſo attentive to her charge, and ſo deſirous of knowing her beloved; ſince they concluded, he muſt be ſome extraordinary perſon, that one ſo fair and beautiful as ſhe was, ſhould make the object of her love and choice; for this queſtion they put, not in a ſcornful and diſdainful way; nor to ſhift off any trouble from themſelves, through the charge ſhe gave them; nor as altogether ignorant of her beloved, for ſome knowledge they had, though but ſmall; but as deſirous of knowing more of him, and of hearing his excellencies ſet forth, and eſpecially thoſe which diſtinguiſhed him from the beloveds of all others: with ſome, the world, its riches and grandeur, are their beloved; with others, the ſinful luſts and pleaſures of this life; with others, the praiſes and applauſe of men; and with others, near and dear relations; and with all, ſelf: but with a true believer in Chriſt, he is preferable to them all; to riches, pleaſures, honours; to all creatures, and creature-enjoyments; and ſelf, in every ſenſe of it, is parted with for him; he is fairer, wiſer and richer, than all others. And this queſtion is repeated by the daughters, What is thy beloved more than another beloved? to ſhew their ſurprize at the charge given them; the ſuſpicion they had of peculiar excellencies in her beloved; and to declare their ſeriouſneſs and earneſtneſs to know more of Chriſt; and their importunity to have a ſpeedy anſwer; and the rather for what follows: That thou doſt ſo charge us? ſo awfully and ſolemnly, ſo ſeriouſly and ſtrictly, with ſo much warmth and vehemence.

℣. 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, &c.] This, and the following verſes, contain the church's anſwer to the queſtion of the daughters; ſhe firſt gives a general deſcription of her beloved, and then deſcends to particulars: the deſcription of him in general is, that he is white and ruddy; having the whiteneſs of the lily, and the redneſs of the roſe, chap. ii. 1. which make a perfect beauty. Some underſtand this of the two natures in Chriſt, divine and human; with reſpect to his divine nature white, expreſſive of his ſimplicity, purity and holineſs; which colour, Cicero ſays[r], is chiefly becoming God, it being ſimple, and having no mixture and compoſition in it: with reſpect to his human nature red, being a partaker of the ſame fleſh and blood with his people. Others, only of the human nature; white, denoting the purity and holineſs of it, being without either original or actual ſin; red or ruddy, his bloody ſufferings in it for the ſins of his people. But it may denote in general, his fairneſs, beauty and glory; being, as a divine perſon, the brightneſs of his Father's glory; as man, fairer than the children of men; as the Mediator, full of grace and truth; and in all his offices, as Prophet, Prieſt and King, and in all the relations he ſtands in to his, as Father, Huſband, Brother and Friend, he appears moſt lovely and amiable. The chiefeſt among ten thouſand; whether angels or men; he is the Creator of angels, the object of their worſhip; and has a more excellent name and nature than they, to whom they are ſubject, and are miniſtering ſpirits; he is ſuperior to men, good and bad, high and low; Lord of all, King of kings, and Head of ſaints, and has the preeminence over all creatures. The Septuagint verſion is, choſen out of or from ten thouſand; Chriſt, as man, is choſen of God, from among the myriads of the individuals of human nature, to union with the divine Word, or Son of God; ſee Pſalm lxxxix. 19. as God-man and Mediator, to be the alone Saviour and Redeemer of his people; to be the Head of the body, the church; and to be the Judge of quick and dead: and he is choſen by ſenſible ſinners, to be the object of their love; to be their only Saviour; and to be their ruler and governor, whoſe laws, commands and ordinances, they chooſe to obey; ſee Pſalm lxxiii. 24. The words may be rendered, the ſtandard-bearer, or one ſtandarded by or over ten thouſand[s]; the church is militant, and has many enemies; in the name of the Lord, ſhe ſets up her banners againſt them, and the banner over her is the love of Chriſt, chap. ii. 4. and he is the ſtandard-bearer, who has a multitude of angels and ſaints under his ſtandard; and how ſtately and majeſtic does he look, and what a noble ſight is it to ſee him bearing the ſtandard before ſuch a company! Rev. vii. 9. Or the ſenſe is, Chriſt is a more excellent ſtandard-bearer than all others[t]; there may be ten thouſand perſons that carry a flag, but none to be compared with him, for comelineſs, ſtrength and courage: or he is lifted up, as a ſtandard, above others, angels and men; as he was upon the croſs, and now, in the miniſtry of the word, that ſouls may gather unto him, and enliſt themſelves in his ſervice; ſee Iſa. xi. 10.

℣. 11. His head is as the moſt fine gold, &c.] Here the church enters into a particular deſcription and commendation of her beloved, which continues to the end of the chapter; and ſhe begins with his head, which ſhe compares to the moſt fine gold. Some think that ſome ornament of the head is meant, as a diadem or crown of gold; or elſe the hair of the head, which, though afterwards ſaid to be black, yet being powdered with gold-duſt, looked of the colour of gold, eſpecially in the rays of the ſun upon it; as did the hair of Solomon's youths that attended him, being thus decorated, as Joſephus[u] relates; and which cuſtom of powdering the hair with gold-duſt, was uſed by ſome of the Roman emperors[w]. The gold here is called gold of Phaz, or Uphaz, as in Dan. x. 5. Fez, with the Arabs, ſignifies gold; the city of Fez had its name from hence; in a place where it was built, a quantity of gold was found in it, which gave it its name[x]: according to Schultens[y], gold is called phaz, phaz, from its leaping as it were out of the clods of the earth, and ſhining forth and gliſtering after a ſhower of rain falling on the earth, where there is a mine of it, by which means it is diſcovered; and of ſuch gold, as the fineſt and pureſt, Diodorus Siculus[z] ſpeaks, as found in Arabia; and which, from the purity of it, was called apyron, becauſe it needed no purifying by fire: and this being the beſt and fineſt, is uſed to expreſs the ſuperlative excellence of Chriſt; for it may be rendered, the gold of gold[a], there is none like it. By Chriſt's head, ſome underſtand the Father of Chriſt, ſaid to be the head of Chriſt, 1 Cor. xi. 3. not as Chriſt is a divine perſon, but as man and Mediator, who, as ſuch, was ſubject to his Father, ſupported and upheld by him; and who, for his excellent glory, is compared to the moſt fine gold, there being no glory like his. Or elſe the divine nature in Chriſt may be meant, which is the head, the chief and principal nature in him; which puts a glory on him, and an efficacy in all he did and ſuffered; and which is like pure, fine, ſhining gold, in which all the perfections of deity ſhine reſplendently. Or rather, the headſhip of Chriſt over his church is meant; as Nebuchadnezzar's monarchy is repreſented by an head of gold, Dan. ii. 32, 37, 38. ſo Chriſt's, becauſe his kingdom is great and glorious, pure and ſpiritual, ſolid and ſubſtantial, laſting and durable, yea everlaſting. His locks are buſhy, and black as a raven; which figures are uſed to ſet forth the beauty and comelineſs of Chriſt: thick, buſhy, well-ſet hair, or pendulous[b], as ſome render the word, hanging down upon the forehead and cheeks in a beautiful manner, makes very comely; and black hair was reckoned comely[c]; and the blackneſs of a raven is accounted a very fine black: and naturaliſts[d] ſay, that the eggs, brains and blood of ravens, have been uſed to make the hair black. By theſe buſhy and black locks of Chriſt, ſome underſtand the thoughts and purpoſes of God, the head of Chriſt; which, like hair, and like black, buſhy hair, are intricate, dark and obſcure, unſearchable and incomprehenſible; and yet, ſo far as known, are beautiful and delightful; eſpecially as they appear in the ſcheme of ſalvation, drawn in the eternal mind: or rather, as by others, believers in Chriſt are meant, for their numbers, dependence on Chriſt, and nouriſhment from him; ſee the note on chap. iv. 1. and, being like locks of hair beautifully ſet, as when congregated and united together in goſpel-order, are an ornament to Chriſt the head, and afford a delightful ſight to ſpectators, Col. ii. 5. and theſe being like criſped or curled hair[e], as ſome render the word, may denote the hardineſs and ſtrength of believers, to perform duty, withſtand enemies, and endure hardneſs, as good ſoldiers of Chriſt; curled hair being the hardeſt and ſtrongeſt[f]. But it ſeems beſt to underſtand by them, the adminiſtrations of Chriſt's kingly office; which are executed with the utmoſt prudence, vigour and ſtrength; for curled hair is a ſign of a dry brain[g], which produces acuteneſs and ſharpneſs of wit, as well as of vigour, ſtrength and courage; and which, how dark and obſcure they may ſeem to be, and to carry in them ſeverity to his enemies; yet being managed with wiſdom, as before obſerved, and alſo according to the rules of juſtice and equity, look very beautiful when made manifeſt, and are admired by the ſaints, Rev. xv. 3, 4.

℣. 12. His eyes are as the eyes of doves, &c.] As the church's eyes are ſaid to be, chap. i. 15. and iv. 1. which are her miniſters, endowed with dove-like gifts in meaſure, as Chriſt is without meaſure, in fulneſs: but theſe are Chriſt's eyes, which may ſignify his omniſcience, who has ſeven eyes, Zech. iii. 9. and iv. 10. eſpecially as that has reſpect unto, and is concerned with, his people in a way of grace and mercy, and ſo muſt look very beautiful in their view: his eyes are like doves eyes; not fierce and furious, but loving and lovely; looking upon his people, under all their trials and afflictions, with ſympathy and concern, to deliver them out of them: and like the eyes of doves by rivers of waters: Sanctius thinks, the alluſion is to the humours in which the eye is incloſed, and as it were ſwims in; hence the eyes are called natantia lumina, by Virgil[h]; but it denotes eyes like thoſe of doves, quick and lively, as clean as milk-white doves, as if they had been waſhed in milk; clear and perſpicuous, ſharp-ſighted, and behold all perſons and things, in all places, and at once: and as doves look only to their mates, ſo Chriſt's eyes of love are only on his church; he looks to none but her, with his eye of ſpecial and peculiar love. Moreover, his eyes are like the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters; which denotes the fixedneſs and conſtancy of them: doves, by the river-ſide, keep their eyes fixed on the purling ſtreams, and in drinking, as Pliny[i] obſerves, do not erect their necks, and lift up their heads, but, keeping their eyes upon the water, drink a large draught, in the manner the beaſts do; and they delight in clean water, of which they drink, and with which they waſh[k]: Chriſt, being greatly delighted with his people, has fixed his eyes on them, and he never withdraws them from them; for theſe waters may point at the object of Chriſt's love, even goſpel-churches, conſiſting of ſuch as are juſtified and ſanctified by his grace, compared to clean water; among whom the doctrines of the goſpel are powerfully preached, the ordinances purely adminiſtered, the waters of the ſanctuary flow, by which ſouls are delighted and refreſhed; and to theſe Chriſt looks, Iſa. lxvi. 2. and his eyes being like doves eyes, waſhed with milk, may denote the purity of them, being purer eyes than to behold iniquity; and the meekneſs and mildneſs of them, not red and wrathful, but full of mercy, pity and compaſſion, as if they had been waſhed with milk. And they are ſaid to be fitly ſet; or ſitting in fulneſs[l]; ſuch as exactly fill up their holes; are ſet neither too high, nor too low; neither ſunk in too much, nor ſtand out too far; but are like precious ſtones, in an incloſure of gold or ſilver, to which the alluſion is; as diamonds ſet in a ring; or as the precious ſtones in the high-prieſt's breaſt-plate, which exactly filled the cavities made for them, and hence are called ſtones of fulneſs, Exod. xxv. 7. and xxviii. 17, 20. or, ſet by fulneſs[m]; that is, by full channels of water, where doves delight to be; and may denote the fulneſs of grace, and the flows of it, by which Chriſt ſits and dwells, and leads his people to, Rev. vii.17. or, ſetting upon fulneſs [n]; on the world, and the fulneſs of it, which is his, and he gives as much of it to his people as he thinks fit; and on the vaſt numbers of perſons and things in it, and the vaſt variety of actions done therein; which ſhews the extenſiveneſs of his omniſcience: and on the fulneſs of time, fixed by him and his Father, for his coming into the world, to do the great work of redemption in it; and which, before it came, he was looking, waiting and watching, and as it were longing, till it came: and on his fulneſs, the church, which is the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all, until he has gathered them all in, and filled them with all the gifts and graces of the Spirit, deſigned for them: and on the fulneſs of the Gentiles, until they are all brought in: and on his own fulneſs; both perſonal, the fulneſs of the Godhead, which he had his eyes upon, when he undertook the work of redemption, and which ſupported him in it, and carried him through it; and upon his diſpenſatory fulneſs, or fulneſs of grace, as Mediator, to ſupply the wants of his people, under all their ſtraits and difficulties, temptations and afflictions: all which muſt make him exceeding lovely in the eyes of his people.

℣. 13. His cheeks are as a bed of ſpices, as ſweet flowers, &c.] Which may intend the preſence of Chriſt with his people in his word and ordinances; often called his face, which he ſhews, and they ſeek after, than which nothing is more deſirable; walking in the light of his countenance, is preferable to walking among ſpicy beds, where fragrant plants and odoriferous flowers grow: or the cheeks, being the ſeat of modeſty and bluſhing, may denote the great humility of Chriſt, ſeen in his aſſumption of our nature, throughout the whole courſe of his life, and eſpecially at his death, and which renders him very delightful to his people; how lovely does the meek and lowly Jeſus look! how beautiful are thoſe bluſhing cheeks of his, who, being equal with God, took upon him the form of a ſervant! The cheeks may intend, not bare cheeks, but with the hair growing upon them, the hair of the beard; which puts forth itſelf, and grows upon the cheeks or jaws [o], as it may be rendered, which makes a man look graceful and majeſtic; ſo Aben Ezra interprets the word of the beard, and ſo many chriſtian [p] interpreters, which puts out like aromatic plants on ſpicy beds. This was literally true of Chriſt, who was a grown man when he ſuffered, and gave his cheeks to the ſmiters, and who plucked off the hair of his beard: and in a myſtical ſenſe it may intend, either believers in Chriſt, who are the hair of his cheeks, as well as of his head; and who, like ſpicy beds and fragrant flowers, are odoriferous to Chriſt and to one another; or as towers of perfumes [q], as ſome, which aſcend upwards in the exerciſe of faith, hope and love: or rather, the graces of the Spirit in Chriſt, as man and Mediator; which, like the hair of the beard, are in Chriſt, in great numbers, without meaſure, and make him very lovely and graceful; and are like beds of ſpices and ſweet flowers, for the variety and ſweet-ſmelling ſavour of them. Though it ſeems, beſt of all, to be expreſſive of the manlineſs, courage, prudence, gravity and majeſty of Chriſt; of which the beard, thick ſet and well grown, is an indication; all which appeared in the whole conduct and deportment of Chriſt among men; in his miniſtry, in his life and converſation, at his apprehenſion, arraignment, condemnation, ſufferings and death. The cheeks riſing and being a little elevated, are fitly deſcribed by beds in a garden, by towers of perfumes, or fragrant flowers and fruit-trees, reared up in the form of towers or pyramids; or by a diſh of ſweetmeats, placed in ſuch a figure: and the hair of the cheeks, or beard, are aptly repreſented by ſpices, riſing up from a bed of them; and all denote the beauty, ſavour, and majeſty of Chriſt. Or, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, as beds of ſpices ſet by confectioners; not as aromatic plants, ſet in rows by the gardener; but the ſpices themſelves, ſet in rows by the confectioner in veſſels [r], placed in his ſhop in rows to be ſold; which being of various colours, eſpecially white and red, the cheeks, for colour and eminence, are compared unto them. His lips like lilies dropping ſweet-ſmelling myrrh; by which are meant the words of Chriſt, which drop from his lips; which are like lilies, for their purity, thinneſs, and beautiful colour: the words of Chriſt are pure words, free from all pollution, deceit, and human mixtures; nor are his lips big with his own praiſes, but with expreſſions of regard for his Father's glory; and are very pleaſant, gracious and graceful. But then the compariſon is not between them and white lilies, for not white, but red lips, are accounted the moſt beautiful; ſee chap. iv. 3. wherefore rather, red or purple lilies are reſpected, ſuch as Pliny [s], and other writers [t], ſpeak of; ſuch as grew in Syria [u], a neighbouring country; and alſo in Egypt [w], grew lilies like to roſes. Some [x] think the alluſion is to crowns, made of red or purple lilies, wore at nuptial feſtivals, on which were poured oil of myrrh, and ſo dropped from them; but the phraſe, dropping ſweet-ſmelling myrrh, is not in conſtruction with lilies, but with lips; ſignifying, that the lips, or words of Chriſt, were like to lilies; not ſo much, or not only for their thinneſs and colour, as for the ſweet ſmell of them, very odorous, grateful and acceptable; as are the doctrines of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, life and ſalvation, to ſenſible ſouls, delivered in the miniſtry of the word: the manner of which delivery of them, is expreſſed by dropping gradually, by little and little, as Chriſt's church and people can bear them; ſeaſonably, and at proper times, as their wants require; conſtantly, as while Chriſt was here on earth, ſo now he is in heaven, by his miniſters, in all ages, to the end of the world; and yet ſweetly and gently refreſhing, and making fruitful; ſee Deut. xxxii. 2. Moreover, the kiſſes of Chriſt's lips, or the manifeſtations of his love, may be taken into the ſenſe of this clauſe; which, together with the grateful matter, and graceful manner of his words, render him very acceptable to his church; ſee chap. i. 2. and ſuch a ſentiment is expreſſed, in much the ſame language, by others [y].

℣. 14. His hands are as gold-rings, ſet with the beryl, &c.] Beryl is with great propriety mentioned, becauſe it was uſual to wear it on the fingers [z]. This was one of the precious ſtones in the breaſtplate of the high-prieſt, a type of Chriſt, Exod. xxviii. 20. one of the pearl-foundations of the new Jeruſalem, Rev. xxi. 20. the appearance of the wheels in Ezekiel's viſion was like it, Ezek. i. 16. the body of the glorious perſon, ſeen by Daniel, is ſaid to be as that, Dan. x. 6. ſo that it is no wonder the hands of Chriſt ſhould be compared to gold-rings ſet with it. The word tarſhiſh, here rendered by beryl, is ſometimes uſed for the ſea; and naturaliſts [a] tell us, that the beſt beryl is that which moſt reſembles the colour of the ſea; ſo all the three Targums, on Exod. xxviii 20. call it כרום ימא from its ſea-colour; and ſome verſions have it here, the ſea-coloured beryl [b]. Some think the chryſolite is meant, ſo called from Tarſhiſh, a city in the Indian ſea, from whence it was brought, 1 Kings x. 22. which is a precious ſtone, of a golden colour. Others take it to be the hyacinth, or jacinth, which is of a violet or purple colour. Cocceius is of opinion, that the ſardonyx is intended, a compoſition of the ſardius and onyx-ſtones; and is of a white and ruddy colour, and much reſembles the nail of a man's hand; which it was uſual to ſet in rings wore on the hand; and an hand adorned with a ring ſet with a ſardonyx, Martial calls ſardonychata manus [c]. Now Chriſt's hands, which are the inſtruments of action, may be compared to gold-rings, ſet with one or other of theſe ſtones; becauſe of the variety of his works in nature, providence, and grace; and becauſe of the preciouſneſs and value of them; and becauſe of their perfection and completeneſs; the circular form being reckoned the moſt perfect: and never do the hands of Chriſt appear as thus deſcribed, and look more beautiful and lovely, than when he is beheld as graſping, holding, and retaining his people in his hands, out of which they can never be plucked; and who are as ſo many gold-rings, jewels, pearls, and precious ſtones, in his eſteem; and as holding the bright ſtars, the miniſters of the word, in them, who ſparkle in their gifts and graces, like ſo many gems there: and particularly this may be expreſſive of the munificence and liberality of Chriſt, in the diſtribution of his gifts and graces to his people, ſo freely and generouſly, ſo largely and plenteouſly, and ſo wiſely and faithfully, as he does; and a beautiful ſight it is, to the eye of faith, to behold him with his hands full of grace, and a heart ready to diſtribute it. His belly is as bright ivory, overlaid with ſapphires; which moſt of the ancient interpreters underſtand of the human nature of Chriſt, deſcribed by one part of it, becauſe of its frailty and weakneſs in itſelf; and is compared to bright ivory, partly becauſe of its firmneſs and conſtancy in ſuffering, and partly becauſe of its purity, holineſs and innocence; and is ſaid to be overlaid with ſapphires, becauſe of its exaltation and glory at the right hand of God. The words may be rendered, his bowels are as bright ivory, &c. [d] as in ℣. 4. and may expreſs the love, grace, mercy, pity and compaſſion of Chriſt to the ſons of men; compared to ivory, or the elephant's teeth, for the excellency of it, Chriſt's love being better than life itſelf; and for the purity and ſincerity of it, there being no hypocriſy in it; and for the firmneſs, conſtancy and duration of it, it being from everlaſting to everlaſting, without any change or variation; and to an overlay or enamel of ſapphires, for the riches, worth and value of it, it being preferable to all precious ſtones, or that can be deſired. Some interpreters are of opinion, that not any part of the body, the belly or bowels, are here meant, but rather, ſome covering of the ſame; for it ſeems not ſo agreeable with the rules of decency, nor conſiſtent with the ſpouſe's modeſty, to deſcribe her beloved by thoſe parts to the daughters of Jeruſalem; nor with the ſcope of the narration, which is to give diſtinguiſhing marks and characters, by which they might know him from another. Aben Ezra thinks the girdle is meant; which either may be his royal girdle, the girdle of righteouſneſs and faithfulneſs; or his prieſtly girdle, ſaid to be of gold; ſee Iſa. xi. 5. Rev. i. 13. or his prophetic girdle, the girdle of truth. The alluſion may be to the embroidered coat of the high-prieſt; in the holes and inciſures of which, as Jarchi ſays, were put jewels and precious ſtones: or rather, to the ephod with the breaſt-plate, in which were twelve precious ſtones, and among theſe the ſapphire; and which may repreſent Chriſt, as the great High-prieſt, bearing all his elect upon his heart in heaven; having entered there, in their name, to take poſſeſſion of it for them, until they are brought into the actual enjoyment of it.

℣. 15. His legs are as pillars of marble, ſet upon ſockets of fine gold, &c.] The alluſion may be to the femoralia, or garments on the thighs of the high-prieſt, when he miniſtered in holy things, who was a type of Chriſt; which were made of fine twined linen, and, as the Rabbins ſay [e], of thread ſix times doubled; and ſo muſt ſit very full and ſtiff, and be like pillars of marble, for colour, firmneſs and ſtiffneſs; and below which was the hem of the holy robe; and, round about that, were pomegranates and golden bells, and which may be alluded to in the next clauſe, ſet upon ſockets of fine gold: or elſe the alluſion may be to the cuſtom [f] of the eaſtern countries; where they wore ſandals, bound about the feet with golden ribbands; or had their ſhoes adorned with gold and precious ſtones; or were made of gold, as were thoſe which Demetrius wore: ſnow-white feet with golden knots, as Manilius [g] expreſſes it, muſt look very beautiful; and marble legs or feet, as the poet [h] calls them, with golden ſhoes, ſuggeſt the ſame idea. Now if a covering of the thighs is alluded to, this may reſpect the pure and ſpotleſs righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and the glory and excellency of it; which covers the nakedneſs of ſaints; hides all their impurities, their ſins, original and actual; and renders them acceptable in the ſight of God: or the legs of Chriſt being thus compared, may denote the ſtrength and power of Chriſt, to bear up and ſupport what has been or is laid upon him; as the whole univerſe, the earth, and all that is in it; the covenant of grace, its bleſſings and promiſes, which he is the baſis and foundation of; the whole church, the perſons of all the elect, whom he repreſented in eternity, and now in time; all their ſins and tranſgreſſions, laid upon him and bore by him, in his body on the croſs; the government of his people on his ſhoulder; their burdens, and them under all their trials, temptations and afflictions; and as all the veſſels, ſo all the glory of his Father's houſe: and theſe may ſet forth alſo the power of Chriſt, in treading under and trampling upon all his and his people's enemies, both when on the croſs, and now in heaven, where he muſt reign until all enemies are put under his feet. Or legs, being the inſtruments of walking, may intend, either his ways of love, grace and mercy, in the covenant before time, in favour of his people; and which, like marble pillars, are pure, firm and conſtant, and like ſuch in golden ſockets, glorious and excellent: or his walk and converſation, when incarnate and in his ſtate of humiliation; which was always upright, even and conſtant; and upon which were a beauty, glory and luſtre, anſwerable to the metaphors here uſed: or his walks in the churches, his golden candleſticks; among whom he delights to be, and to whom his preſence is deſirable, beautiful and glorious: or his providential diſpenſations towards his people; which are ſtraight, upright and equal, holy and righteous, firm and ſure; the baſis of which are his eternal purpoſes and decrees. His countenance is as Lebanon; his ſhape, form, perſonage, appearance and mien; which was a goodly mountain on the north of Judea, high, pleaſant, and ſet with fruitful and fragrant trees, and made a very delightful appearance: to which Chriſt may be compared for his height, being higher than the kings of the earth, than the angels of heaven, and than the heavens themſelves; and for pleaſantneſs, being more glorious and excellent than that or any other mountain; and for the fruitful and fragrant trees of righteouſneſs that grow upon him, have their root in him, and their fruitfulneſs from him; and which diffuſe a grateful odour, by their graces and good works, to Chriſt and his ſaints; and who himſelf more eſpecially, like this mountain, emits a fragrant ſmell, in his perſon, grace, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, to all paſſers by, and true believers in him. It is added, Excellent as the cedars; which grew on Lebanon; being the choiceſt, and preferable to all others: to which Chriſt may be compared, for tallneſs, ſtatelineſs, fragrancy and durableneſs [i]; eſpecially the former, which is always thought to add gracefulneſs and majeſty to men; ſee the note on 1 Sam. ix. 2.

℣. 16. His mouth is moſt ſweet, &c.] Or ſweetneſs itſelf [k]; yea, ſweetneſſes [l]; exceeding ſweet. That is, the words of his mouth, the doctrines of the goſpel, the precious promiſes of it, the kind invitations given, and the comfortable things ſpoken in it; yea, the commands of Chriſt in his word are not grievous, but pleaſant and delightful: or the kiſſes of his mouth may be meant, the ſenſible manifeſtations of his love, chap. i. 2. Some think the voice of Chriſt is intended, and the ſound of it [m], whether the word be tranſlated mouth, throat, or roof of the mouth, as it may ſignify either; all which are inſtruments of the voice, and nothing is more common with lovers than to admire each other's voice; ſee chap. ii. 14. and may be applied to the voice of the goſpel, which is ſweet, delightful, charming and alluring, being a voice of love, grace and mercy, peace, pardon, life and ſalvation. The word may be rendered taſte, as in chap. ii. 3. and which may be taken, either actively, for the diſtinguiſhing taſte of Chriſt between things perverſe and good, and between carnal and ſpiritual ones, and ſo for the proviſion of ſavoury food he makes for his people; or paſſively, of his being, in his perſon, offices and grace, ſweet to the taſte of a believer. Some interpret it of the breath of his mouth; which being moſt ſweet, recommends him to the affections of his people; and may deſign the expreſſions of his love to them, and his interceſſion for them. Yea, he is altogether lovely; in his perſon, offices, people, word and ordinances; his lovelineſs is perfect, nothing wanting in it; he is ſo to all, to his Father, angels and ſaints: or, he is all deſires [n]; exceeding deſirable, having all excellencies, perfections, and fulneſs in him; and being ſo in all his characters, offices and relations, he ſtands in, to his people; to whom he is all things [o], even all in all; they deſire none but him. And now, by this deſcription of him, the daughters of Jeruſalem could not be at a loſs to know who he was, and that he muſt be preferable to all other beloveds. And the church cloſes the account, by claiming intereſt in him; her faith in him, and love to him, being increaſed, whilſt ſhe was ſpeaking of him: This is my beloved; whom ſhe had often called ſo; and ſtill was her beloved; for though ſhe had ſuffered much for him, nothing could ſeparate from her love to him: and ſhe adds another endearing character, And this is my friend; which appeared by his eſpouſal of her; by his becoming a ſurety for her; by his aſſumption of her nature, and ſuffering in her room and ſtead; by paying her debts, and purchaſing her perſon; by entering into heaven in her name, taking poſſeſſion of it for her, and acting the part of an advocate on her account; by gracious viſits to her, and familiar converſe with her; by granting her large ſupplies of grace, and affording her ſuccour and relief in all times of need; by giving good and wholſome counſel to her, and by diſcloſing the ſecrets of his heart unto her, John xv. 15. and he is ſuch a friend that ſticks cloſer than a brother; that loves at all times; is conſtant and faithful, and always to be confided in; he is a rich, powerful, everlaſting and unchangeable friend. All this the church ſays, in the ſtrength of faith, with the greateſt affection, in the moſt exulting ſtrains, and as glorying in him, and boaſting of him: and now, as if ſhe ſhould ſay, O ye daughters of Jeruſalem, is not this enough to deſcribe my beloved to you, to diſtinguiſh him from all others? can you blame me for my affection to him, making ſuch a ſtrict enquiry after him, and giving ſuch a ſolemn charge to you concerning him? is it not enough to draw out your love unto him, and ſet you a ſeeking after him with me? And ſuch an effect it had upon them, as appears from the following chapter.

CHAP. VI.

THE diſcourſe between the church and the daughters of Jeruſalem is continued in this chapter: they enquire whither her beloved was gone, in order to ſeek him with her, ỷ. 1. ſhe tells them where he was gone, and for what purpoſe he went thither, and what he was doing there; and claims and aſſerts her intereſt in him, ỷ. 2, 3 Then follows a commendation of the church by Chriſt, who admires her beauty, and deſcribes her by her eyes, hair, &c. ỷ. 4—7. and prefers her to all others; being a ſingular and choice one to him, and the praiſe of others, ỷ. 8—10. and next he gives an account of his going into his garden, and his deſign in it, and of what happened to him there, ỷ. 11, 12. And the chapter is concluded with a charge to the Shulamite, to turn herſelf, that ſhe might be looked upon; which occaſions a queſtion, to which an anſwer is returned, ỷ. 13.

ỷ. 1. Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou faireſt among women? &c.] The title is the ſame, uſed by them, and by Chriſt before them, chap. i. 8. and v. 9. and here repeated, to aſſure her that they were ſerious in aſking this queſtion, and that it was in great reſpect to her they put it; and which, to the ſame ſenſe, in other words, is expreſſed, Whither is thy beloved turned aſide? which way did he take? on what hand did he turn, to the right or left, when he went from thy door? They aſk no longer who or what he was, being ſatisfied with the church's deſcription of him; by which they had gained ſome knowledge of him, and had their affections drawn out unto him; and were deſirous of knowing more of him, and of being better acquainted with him, and to enjoy his company and preſence; though as yet they had but little faith in him, and therefore could not call him their beloved, only her beloved: and this queſtion is put and repeated in this manner, to ſhew that they were ſerious and in earneſt; yea, were in haſte, and impatient to know which way he went, That, ſay they, we may ſeek him with thee; it was not mere ſpeculation or curioſity that led them to put the above queſtions; they were deſirous to go into practice, to join with the church in the ſearch of Chriſt, to ſeek him with her in the word and ordinances; upon which they were determined, could they get any hint from her whither he was gone, and where it was moſt likely to find him: for ſo the words may be rendered, and we will ſeek him with thee [p]; this they had reſolved on among themſelves, and only wanted directions which way to ſteer their courſe, or a grant to go along with the church in queſt of her beloved.

ỷ. 2. My beloved is gone down into his garden, &c.] Which may be ſaid by Solomon, in alluſion to what he himſelf was wont to do, as Joſephus [q] relates; who uſed to go very early in a morning in great pomp to Etham, about two miles from Jeruſalem, a pleaſant place, abounding with gardens and flows of water: or reſpect may be had to the king's gardens nearer Jeruſalem, which were at the deſcent of mount Zion, and reached to the lower pool [r]; ſee Neh. iii. 15. and which lying lower than the king's palace, he might be ſaid to go down to it. And this may point at the low eſtate of the people of God on earth, depreſſed with ſorrows, afflictions and perſecutions; and the condeſcenſion of Chriſt in viſiting them in their low eſtate, and granting them his gracious preſence: of the garden of Chriſt, and of his coming into it, ſee the notes on chap. iv. 12, 16. and v. 1. and the church might remember what he ſaid, I am come into my garden, chap. v. 1. though ſhe ſoon fell aſleep and forgot it, and now calls it to mind, and ſo could direct the daughters where he was. She adds, To the beds of ſpices; of odoriferous plants; to which particular believers, planted regularly in the churches of Chriſt, may be compared, for the excellency and fragrancy of their graces; and among whom Chriſt delights to be; ſee chap. iv. 13, 14. Guſſetius [s] thinks the words, both here and in chap. v. 13. ſhould be rendered rivers of ſpices; an hyperbolical expreſſion, ſhewing that a man, walking by rivers of waters, where aromatic plants and fragrant flowers grow, perceives ſuch a ſweet odour, that, whilſt he is refreſhed with the moiſture of the waters, he ſeems to be walking by rivers of ſpices. The end of her beloved's going thither is, To feed in the gardens; to feed his flocks there; not on commons and in fields, but in gardens, which is unuſual: and by which are meant particular churches, where Chriſt feeds his people, by his Spirit and by his miniſters, word and ordinances, with himſelf, the bread of life; with the diſcoveries of his love, better than wine; and with the doctrines and promiſes of the goſpel: or to feed himſelf, or that he himſelf might be fed [t] there; by beholding with pleaſure how the plants grow, and the ſpices flow out; by taſting the pleaſant fruits of the garden; and by obſerving, with delight, the graces of the Spirit in his people in lively exerciſe. And to gather lilies; to crop them with the hand [u]; lilies are liable to be cropped, hence Horace [w] calls the lily, breve lilium, the ſhort-lived lily: to theſe, ſaints may be compared, for the glory, ſplendor and beauty, they receive from Chriſt; ſee chap. ii. 2. there was a gathering of theſe at the death of Chriſt, Eph. ii. 10. John xi. 51, 52. and there is a gathering of them in effectual vocation, and into a church-ſtate, and into nearer communion with Chriſt; but here it ſeems to ſignify a gathering them by death, when fully ripe, to enjoy everlaſting fellowſhip with him.

ỷ. 3. I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine, &c.] Expreſſive of intereſt in Chriſt, and union to him, and of her faith therein; which ſtill continued, notwithſtanding her unbecoming carriage to Chriſt, and her many infirmities, chap. v. 2, 3. Aben Ezra connects the words with the preceding, my beloved is gone, &c. but though he is, and I am left alone, I know I am his, and he is mine; which throws a beauty upon the words, and declares the excellency and ſtrength of her faith; for herein lies the glory and excellency of faith, to believe in an unſeen Chriſt: though it may be, the ſhekinah was with her, as the Targum has it; or Chriſt had now appeared to her, and was found by her, and therefore, like Thomas ſays, my Lord and my God. He feedeth among the lilies; ſee the note on chap. ii. 16.

℣. 4 Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, &c.] Theſe are the words of Chriſt, who had been abſent ſome time, and till now ſilent; but like another Joſeph, could not refrain any longer, but makes himſelf known to his church, and burſts out in ſtrong expreſſions of love to her, and in high commendations of her; for, notwithſtanding her carriage to him, ſhe was his love ſtill, and as beautiful and as comely in his ſight as ever: and for which he compares her here to Tirzah; which is either the name of ſome beautiful woman, well known in thoſe times; ſo one of the daughters of Zelophehad is called by this name, Numb. xxvii. 1. but whether from her beauty, is no where ſaid: or rather a city of this name is here meant, ſince, in the next clauſe, the church is compared to the city of Jeruſalem for the ſame reaſon. There was a city in the land of Canaan, called Tirzah, formerly the ſeat of one of the ancient kings of Canaan, and, in after-times, of Jeroboam and ſome of his ſucceſſors; and which, no doubt, was a very pleaſant and delightful place, as its name imports, either for its ſituation or buildings, Joſh. xii. 24. Adrichomius[x] ſays, it was an heroic city, ſituated on a high mountain. In ſome of the Greek verſions, it is read as an appellative, and rendered, as good will or good pleaſure[y], and ſo may reſpect the ſweetneſs of her temper and diſpoſition; which is heightened by uſing the abſtract, ſhe was all good-nature and good-will; not only ſweet, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, but ſweetneſs itſelf, as ſhe ſays of him, chap. v. 16. and this may be ſaid of her, as ſhe was the object of God's good-will and pleaſure in election, of Chriſt's in redemption, and of the Spirit's in effectual vocation; and as ſhe was the ſubject of good-will, bearing one to God, to Chriſt, to his people, word, worſhip, ways and ordinances. The word comes from a root, which ſignifies to be grateful and accepted; and ſo Jarchi interprets the word here, acceptable; and ſo ſome ancient writings of the Jews[z]: and may denote the acceptableneſs of the church in Chriſt, with whom God is well pleaſed in him for his righteouſneſs-ſake, in which ſhe appears exceeding fair and lovely. And for the ſame reaſon is ſaid to be comely as Jeruſalem; the metropolis of Judea, and ſeat of the kings of it, and, as Pliny[a] ſays, was far the moſt famous of any of the cities of the eaſt; it was a city well built and compact together, beautiful for ſituation, very rich in Solomon's time, the place of divine worſhip, and was ſtrongly fortified by nature and art: and hence the church of God often bears this name, both in the Old and New Teſtament, Iſa. xl. 2. Heb. xii. 22. being the city of the great King, built on Chriſt, the rock; conſiſting of ſaints, fitly and cloſely united together; rich with the unſearchable riches of Chriſt; where the ſeveral parts of ſpiritual and evangelic worſhip are performed; poſſeſſed of many privileges, and well ſecured by the power and ſalvation of God. Yet terrible as an army with banners; to her enemies, though ſo lovely to Chriſt. This ſhews that not a ſingle perſon is meant all along, who could not, with propriety, be compared to an army; but a collective body, as the church is; and that the church on earth is militant, and like a well-diſciplined army, in good order, and provided with proper officers and ſuitable armour, and in a poſture of defence, and ready to fight when attacked; and ſo terrible to her enemies, Satan and his principalities, wicked men and falſe teachers; who are terrified by their having ſuch a general at the head of them as Chriſt, and being under ſuch banners as his, and provided with ſuch good weapons of warfare, as are mighty through God; by their cloſe union to one another; and by the conſtancy, undauntedneſs, and invincibleneſs of their faith; and are awed by their pious converſation and good examples. Perhaps ſome reſpect may be had by Chriſt to the church's courage and conſtancy in ſeeking after him; the force of whoſe faith and love he felt, which he could not withſtand, and therefore ſays, as follows.

℣. 5. Turn away thine eyes from me, &c.] Her eyes of faith and love; not through diſlike of them, but as raviſhed with them; his paſſions were ſo ſtruck by them, and his heart pierced with them, that he could ſtand it out no longer againſt her; ſee chap. iv. 9, 10. Some render the words, turn about thine eyes over againſt me[b]; this being the firſt time of meeting after her ungrateful treatment of him, ſhe might be filled with ſhame and confuſion for it, and therefore hung down her head, or looked on one ſide; wherefore he encourages her to look him full in the face, with an holy confidence; for ſuch looks of faith are very agreeable to Chriſt; ſee chap. ii. 14. For they have overcome me; that is, her eyes, they had made a conqueſt of his heart; which does not imply weakneſs in Chriſt, but condeſcending grace, that he ſhould ſuffer himſelf, as it were, to be overpowered by the faith and love of his people, who has conquered them and all their enemies. This clauſe is very differently rendered: by ſome, they have ſtrengthned me[c]; his deſire towards his church, and the enjoyment of her company: by others, the reverſe, are ſtronger than me, or have taken away my ſtrength[d]; ſo that he was ſpiritleſs, and as one dead, or in an extaſy: by others, they have made me fly away[e]; that is, out of himſelf; ſo that he was not maſter of himſelf, could not bear the force and brightneſs of her eyes: by others, they have lifted me up[f]; revived, cheered, and comforted him, through ſympathy with her, in virtue of their near union: by others, they have made me proud, or prouder[g]; ſee Iſa. iii. 5. Chriſt has a kind of pride as well as pleaſure in his church; he is proud of the beauty he has put upon her, of the graces he has wrought in her; and eſpecially of her faith, when in exerciſe; ſee Matt. viii. 10. and by others, they have made me fiercer[h]; not with anger and indignation, but with love; there is a force, a fierceneſs in love, as well as in wrath; love is ſtrong as death, and jealouſy is cruel as the grave, chap. viii. 6. it is ſo in the church, much more in Chriſt. All which ſhews the power of faith, to which mighty things are aſcribed, Hebrews xi. and here the conqueſt of Chriſt himſelf. Thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Gilead; from mount Gilead, chap. iv. 1. ſee the note there.

℣. 6. Thy teeth are as a flock of ſheep, &c.

℣. 7. As a piece of a pomegranate are thy temples within thy locks, &c.] The ſame deſcriptions are given in chap. iv. 2, 3. ſee the notes there: and theſe are repeated, to ſhew the reality of the church's beauty, and for the ſake of confirmation; and that it ſtill continued the ſame, notwithſtanding her failings and infirmities; and that Chriſt had the ſame eſteem of her, and love to her, he ever had. That part of the deſcription, reſpecting the church's lips and ſpeech, in chap. iv. 3. is here omitted, though added at the end of the ſixth verſe by the Septuagint; but is not in the Hebrew copies, nor taken notice of in the Targum; yea, the Maſorah, on chap. iv. 2. remarks ſome words as only uſed in that place, and therefore could not be repeated here in the copies then in uſe.

℣. 8. There are threeſcore queens, and fourſcore concubines, and virgins without number.] In this and the following verſe, the church is commended as ſhe ſtood related to others; and is compared with them, and preferred to them. The words may be conſidered, either as an aſſertion, there are, &c. or as a ſuppoſition, though there be, &c. yet Chriſt's church is but one, and excels them all. Queens are principal, and lawful wives of kings: concubines, ſecondary, or half-wives, as the word[i] ſignifies; who were admitted to the bed, but their children did not inherit: virgins, unmarried perſons, maids of honour, who waited on the queen. The alluſion is to the cuſtom of kings and great perſonages, who had many wives, and more concubines, and a large number of virgins to wait on them; ſee 1 Kings xi. 3. or to a nuptial ſolemnity, and the ceremony of introducing the bride to the bridegroom, attended with a large number of perſons of diſtinction; and ſo Theocritus[k] ſpeaks of four times ſixty virgins, attending the nuptials of Menelaus and Helena; ſee Pſalm xlv. 9. By all which may be meant, either the kingdoms and nations of the world; by queens, the more large, rich and flouriſhing kingdoms; by concubines, inferior ſtates; and by virgins without number, the vaſt multitudes of inhabitants that fill them; but all put together, are not equal to the church; ſee chap. ii. 2. or elſe falſe churches; by queens, ſuch who boaſt of their riches and number, as the church of Rome, Rev. xviii. 7. by concubines, ſuch as are inferior in thoſe things, but equally corrupt, as Arians, Socinians, &c. and by virgins without number, the multitudes of poor, weak, ignorant people, ſeduced by them; and what figure ſoever theſe make, or pretenſions to be the true churches of Chriſt, they are none of his, his ſpouſe is preferred to them all. Or rather, true believers in Chriſt, of different degrees, are here meant; by queens, thoſe that have the greateſt ſhare of gifts and grace, moſt nearneſs to Chriſt, and communion with him; by concubines, believers of a lower claſs, and of a more ſervile ſpirit, and yet ſometimes are favoured with fellowſhip with Chriſt; and by virgins, young converts, who have not ſo large an experience as the former; and this diſtribution agrees with 1 John ii. 13, 14. and the rather this may be the ſenſe, ſince each of theſe are ſaid to praiſe the church in the next verſe, who is preferable to them, and includes them all.

℣. 9. My dove, my undefiled is but one, &c.] Of theſe titles, ſee chap. ii. 14. and v. 2. Chriſt's church is called one, in diſtinction from the many before mentioned; and either deſigns her ſmall number, in compariſon of the nations of the world, and of falſe churches, like one to ſixty or eighty, and even to an innumerable company; ſee Eccl. ix. 14. Luke xii. 32. Rev. xiii. 3. and xvii. 15. or elſe her unity in herſelf, being but one general aſſembly, and church of the firſt-born, made up of various, particular congregated churches; and one body, conſiſting of various members, united together in affection, and partakers of the ſame grace, bleſſings and privileges; actuated by one ſpirit, the Spirit of God; and having but one head, Chriſt Jeſus: and it may ſignify that the church is the ſpouſe of Chriſt; that though other princes may have ſixty queens, and eighty concubines, and virgins without number, to wait on them; Chriſt had but one, and was well pleaſed with her, and deſired no other. She is the only one of her mother; the Jeruſalem above, the mother of us all: or the ſenſe is, ſhe was to Chriſt as a mother's only child, moſt tenderly beloved by him. She is the choice one of her that bare her; eſteemed and loved beſt, of all her mother's children. The word may be rendered, the pure or clean one[l]; ſo the church is, as cloathed in clean linen, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; cleanſed from ſin in his blood; ſprinkled with the clean water of the covenant, and of an unſpotted converſation. The daughters ſaw her, and bleſſed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praiſed her: it may ſeem ſtrange that concubines ſhould praiſe a queen; but it was not unuſual in the eaſtern countries; with the Perſians, as the queen admitted of many concubines by the order of her lord the king, ſo the queen was had in great veneration, and even adored by the concubines[m]: which may reſpect either the great eſteem the church had, or ſhould have in the world, even from the great men of it, as ſhe will have in the latter day, Iſa. xlix. 23. and lx. 3, 10, 11. or which young converts have for her; who may, more eſpecially be meant by the daughters and virgins, who, in ℣. 1. call the church the faireſt among women: theſe bleſſed her, and pronounced her happy, and wiſhed all happineſs to her; they praiſed her, ſpoke well of her, and commended her for her beauty; which was pleaſing to Chriſt, and therefore obſerved by him.

℣. 10. Who is ſhe that looketh forth as the morning? &c.] Theſe words may be connected with the preceding, by a ſupplement of the word ſaying; and ſo may expreſs what the daughters ſaid, when they bleſſed and praiſed the church, wondering at her beauty, it being like the riſing morning; ſo Helena is ſaid to ſhew her beautiful face, αως αντελλοισα, as the morning, when it ſprings forth[n]: there was a city in the tribe of Reuben, called Zereth-baſhahar, the beauty or ſplendor of the morning, Joſh. xiii. 19. Homer often deſcribes the morning by her roſy fingers[o], and as cloathed with a ſaffron garment[p]; and as beautiful, and divine[q], and fair-haired[r]; and as on a golden throne and beautiful[s]. And as theſe words deſcribe the progreſſive gradations of light, ſo they may ſet forth the ſtate and condition of the church in the ſeveral ages of the world; its firſt ſtate in this clauſe, which may reach from the firſt dawn of light to Adam, Gen iii. 15. increaſing in the times of the patriarchs, Noah, Abraham and Jacob, and in which and to whom were various diſplays of goſpel-light and grace; to the time of the giving of the law by Moſes, when the church might be ſaid to be fair as the moon; which, though it receives its light from the ſun, yet ſplendor and brightneſs are aſcribed to it, Job xxxi. 26. and, by other writers [s], is repreſented as fair and beautiful; and the beautiful form of perſons is expreſſed by it [t]: and very fitly is the ſtate of the church under the law ſignified by the moon, by which the ceremonial law ſeems intended, in Rev.xii.1. that lying much in the obſervation of new moons, by the which, the ſeveral feſtivals under the law were regulated; and which law gave light in the night of Jewiſh darkneſs, into the perſon, offices, and grace of Chriſt; and though it was imperfect, variable, waxed old, and at length vaniſhed away, yet the church under it was fair; there being a beauty and amiableneſs in the worſhip of that diſpenſation, Pſalm xxvii. 4. and lxxxiv. 1. The next clauſe, clear as the ſun, may deſcribe the church under the goſpel-diſpenſation; when the ſun of righteouſneſs aroſe, and made the famous goſpel-day; when the ſhadows of the old law fled away, Chriſt, the ſubſtance, being come; when there were more light and knowledge, and a clear diſcerning of ſpiritual and evangelic things: and, in all thoſe periods, the church was terrible as an army with banners; to her enemies, being in a militant ſtate; ſee the note on ℣. 4. The whole of this may be applied to particular believers; who, at firſt converſion, look forth as the morning, their light being ſmall, but increaſing; and as to their ſanctification, are fair as the moon, having their ſpots and imperfections, and deriving all their light, grace and holineſs, from Chriſt; and as to their juſtification, clear as the ſun, being cloathed with Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, Rev.xii.1. and ſo all fair and without ſpot; and terrible as an army with banners, fighting the good fight of faith, under the banners of Chriſt, againſt all ſpiritual enemies.

℣. 11. I went down into the garden of nuts, &c.] This is very properly taken notice of in this ſong of love; it being uſual for new-married perſons to get nuts, and throw them among children, to make paſtime; to ſignify, among other things, that they now renounced childiſh things [u]. Theſe are the words of Chriſt, declaring to the church where he went, and what he employed himſelf about, when he departed from her; ſee ℣. 2. Of the garden, as it intends the church, ſee the note on chap. v. 12. into which he was invited to come, and did, as here; ſee chap. iv. 16. and v. 1. here it is called a garden of nuts, which may deſign a ſpot in it deſtined for this fruit; by which ſome underſtand nutmegs, which is not very likely, ſince ſuch grew not in thoſe parts: rather walnuts, which the Arabs call gauz or geuz, which is the ſame word that is here uſed; Piſtacia nuts were well known in Syria [w], which joined to Judea. And by nuts, which grew in the garden, the church, true believers may be deſigned; who, like them, have a mean outward appearance, but are valuable within, having the true grace of God in them; and becauſe of their divers coverings, their outward converſation-garments, the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and the internal ſanctification of the Spirit, which anſwer to the huſk and ſhell, and the thin, inward ſkin over the nut; and becauſe of their hardineſs in enduring afflictions and troubles, the ſhell may repreſent; and becauſe of their beſt and moſt excellent parts being hidden, even grace, the hidden man of the heart, ſignified by the kernel, and which will not fully appear until the ſhell or tabernacle of the body is broken down; and becauſe of their ſafety from hurt and pollution, amidſt the ſtorms of afflictions, perſecutions, and temptations, and pollutions of the world, the principle of grace, like the kernel, remains unhurt and undefiled; and becauſe of the multitude of believers, united and cleaving together, which is delightful to behold, like cluſters of nuts in a nut-garden. Some render it, the pruned garden, or garden of pruning [x]; whoſe plants, trees and vines, are pruned and kept in good order, by Chriſt's Father, the huſbandman and vine-dreſſer; ſee chap. ii. 12. and v. 12. The ends of Chriſt in going into it were, To ſee the fruits of the valley; to obſerve the graces of his Spirit; the actings, exerciſe and growth of them in humble ſouls, among whom he delights to be, Iſa. lvii. 15. the Septuagint verſion is, the ſhoots of the brook or river; and may denote the fertile ſoil in which believers are planted, even by the river of divine love; with which being watered, they flouriſh, Pſalm i. 3. To ſee whether the vine flouriſhed; particular churches, or believers, compared to vines; who may be ſaid to flouriſh, when they increaſe in numbers, and are fruitful in grace and good works; ſee chap. ii. 13. And the pomegranates budded; of which, ſee chap. iv. 13. the buddings of them may deſign the beginnings, or firſt puttings forth of grace in the ſaints; which Chriſt takes much notice of, and is highly pleaſed with.

℣. 12. Or ever I was aware, my ſoul made me like the chariots of Amminadib.] Theſe are either the words of the church or of Chriſt, ſaying, I know not [y], as the firſt clauſe may be rendered: if the words of the church, the ſenſe may be; that though ſhe knew not where her beloved was gone, when he went from her, yet ſhe ran about in ſearch of him as ſwiftly as the chariots of Amminadib; and when ſhe did know that he was gone down into the garden, immediately, on a ſudden, at an unawares, ſuch was the ſtrength of her love and affection to him, that ſhe moved as ſwiftly after him, as if ſhe had been in one of thoſe chariots; and this may ſignify alſo her courage and reſolution, that, notwithſtanding all difficulties and diſcouragements ſhe met with, ſhe drove on as briſkly and as courageouſly after him, as ever Amminadib did, in one of his chariots, in the field of battle: or, I know not; whether in the body or out of the body; ſuch was the rapture and extaſy ſhe was in, when ſhe heard her beloved ſay, I went down into the garden of nuts, &c. or when ſhe heard the daughters commendations of her, ſhe did not think that ſuch belonged to her, and therefore ſaid, I know not; however, this cauſed her to make the greater haſte to anſwer ſuch characters, and to enjoy the company of her beloved. But rather they are the words of Chriſt, who was now in his garden, obſerving the condition it was in, and ſays, I know not, or do not perceive [z], that it was in a fruitful and flouriſhing caſe, and therefore took all the ſpeedy methods he could to bring it into a better; or being in a tranſport of love to his church, it cauſed him ſpeedily to return unto her, and grant her his preſence; offer all neceſſary aſſiſtance, and be as chariots to her, to carry her through difficulties, and to protect and defend her from all enemies: and this his ſoul cauſed him to do, not her worth and worthineſs, love and lovelineſs, but his own good-will and pleaſure, and cordial affection for her. Many take Amminadib to be the proper name of a perſon, who was one of Solomon's chariot-drivers, that underſtood his buſineſs well, and drove ſwiftly, and with ſucceſs, to whom Chriſt compares himſelf, when returning to his church with haſte: but I rather think, with Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and others, that it is an appellative, conſiſting of two words, ammi, my people, and nadib, willing or princely, and may be rendered, the chariots of my willing or princely people [a]; meaning, not angels, nor miniſters, but the people of Chriſt themſelves, to whom he is as chariots; for ſo I ſhould chooſe to tranſlate the words, my ſoul made me as chariots to my willing or princely people; and ſo deſcribes the perſons who ſhare in this inſtance of his grace; they are ſuch who are made willing by Chriſt, in the day of his power on them, to be ſaved by him, and ſerve him, Pſalm cx. 3. and who are of a free, princely and munificent ſpirit, Pſalm li. 12. being princes, and the ſons and daughters of a prince, chap. vii. 1. to theſe Chriſt makes himſelf as chariots, as he now was to the church, and took her up along with him to enjoy his preſence, ſhe had ſought for and deſired. Wherefore the daughters of Jeruſalem, who had accompanied her hitherto in ſearch of him, perceiving ſhe was going from them, ſay what follows.

℣. 13. Return, return, O Shulamite, return, return, &c.] By whom the church is meant, ſo called, from her being the ſpouſe of Chriſt, the true Solomon; it being common for the wife to have the ſame name with her huſband; thus, with the Romans, if the man's name was Caius, the woman's name was Caia: is the name of Chriſt Solomon? the church's name is Shulamite; ſee Jer. xxiii. 6. and xxxiii. 16. 1 Cor. xii. 12. The word from which this is derived, ſignifies both perfection and peace; and the church may be called the Shulamite from her perfection, not in herſelf, but in Chriſt, in whom ſhe is complete, and perfectly comely through his righteouſneſs; and is alſo denominated from the peace which ſhe has from Chriſt, and he has made for her through his blood, and he gives unto her by his Spirit; and from what ſhe does or ſhould enjoy in her members, and from what ſhe will be poſſeſſed of to all eternity. Now the church, the Shulamite, is very importunately deſired by the daughters of Jeruſalem to return; which is ſaid no leſs than four times, which ſhews how vehemently deſirous they were of her company: and perceiving ſhe was about to go from them, moſt earneſtly preſs her to return, or to turn [b]; to turn herſelf, that her beauty and comelineſs might be more plainly ſeen; for this is the end propoſed by them, That we may look upon thee; that they might ſtill have more opportunity of viewing her, and more narrowly to examine her beauty, for which ſhe was ſo much commended; and that they might enjoy more of her company and converſation, which had been, and they might hope would be, more uſeful and inſtructive to them. A queſtion upon this follows, What will ye ſee in the Shulamite? which queſtion is put, either by the daughters among themſelves; ſome wiſhing for her return, and others aſking what they expected to ſee in her, ſhould ſhe return: or rather, it is put by the church herſelf; who aſks the daughters, what they expected to ſee in her, a poor, mean, unworthy creature, not fit to be looked on, having nothing extraordinary, nor indeed valuable or of worth, in ſeeing of her? Which queſtion is thus anſwered, As it were the company of two armies; either by the daughters, declaring what they expected to ſee in the church; either ſuch a glorious and joyful meeting between Chriſt and her, as is often between great perſons, attended with ſinging and dancing; ſo the word for company, is rendered by the Septuagint [c] choroi, a company of thoſe that dance and ſing; ſee Pſalm lxviii. 24, 25. or ſuch an appearance as an army makes at the reception of their prince, when it is divided into two bands, for the ſake of greater honour and majeſty. Or rather, this anſwer is returned by the church herſelf; ſignifying, that nothing was to be ſeen in her but two armies, fleſh and ſpirit, ſin and grace, continually warring againſt each other; which ſurely, ſhe thought, could be no deſirable and pleaſing ſight to them; ſee Rom. vii. 23. Gal. v. 17.

CHAP. VII.

IN this chapter, Chriſt gives a freſh commendation of the beauty of his church, in a different order and method than before; beginning with her feet, and ſo riſing upwards to the hair of her head, and the roof of her mouth, ℣. 1—9. And then the church aſſerts her intereſt in him, and his deſire towards her, ℣. 10. and invites him to go with her into the fields, villages and vineyards, and offers various reaſons, by which ſhe urges him to comply with her invitation, ℣. 11—13.

℣. 1. How beautiful are thy feet with ſhoes, &c.] It is no unuſual thing to deſcribe the comelineſs of women by their feet, and the ornaments of them; ſo Hebe is deſcribed by Homer [d], as having beautiful feet, and Juno by her golden ſhoes: particular care was taken of, and proviſion made, for the ſhoes of queens and princeſſes in the eaſtern countries; Herodotus [e] tells us, that the city of Anthylla was given peculiarly to the wife of the king of Egypt, to provide her with ſhoes; which cuſtom, he ſays, obtained when Egypt became ſubject to Perſia; ſee the note on Eſther ii. 18. Shoes of a red, or ſcarlet, or purple colour, were in eſteem with the Jews; and ſo the Targum here is, "purple ſhoes:" the word uſed is thought by ſome [f], to ſignify a colour between ſcarlet and purple; ſee Ezek. xvi. 10. and alſo with the Tyrian virgins [g]; and ſo with the Romans [h]; and with whom likewiſe white ſhoes [i] were much in uſe. That this is ſaid of the church, is plain from the appellation of her, O prince's daughter! the ſame with the king's daughter, Pſal. xlv. 13. the daughter of the King of kings; for, being eſpouſed to Chriſt, his Father is her Father, and his God her God: beſides, ſhe is born of him who is the Prince of the kings of the earth, 1 John ii. 28. ſhe is both a prince's wife, and a prince's daughter. It may be rendered, O noble, or princely daughter [k]! being of a free, princely ſpirit, in oppoſition to a ſervile one, Pſal. li. 12. of a bountiful and liberal ſpirit, as in Iſa. xxxii. 5—8. in diſtributing temporal things, to the neceſſities of the poor; and in communicating ſpiritual things, to the comfort and edification of others. Some take theſe to be the words of the daughters of Jeruſalem, wondering at the church's beauty, on turning herſelf to them as they deſired: but they are rather the words of Chriſt; who, obſerving the church ſpeak ſo meanly of herſelf, in order to encourage her, gives an high commendation of her in this and ſome following verſes, and begins with her feet; not her miniſters, who are ſhod with the preparation of the goſpel of peace, and who appear beautiful in the eyes of thoſe who have any knowledge of the good things they publiſh and proclaim; for they are ſet in the higheſt place in the church: but here the loweſt and meaneſt members of the church are meant; whoſe outward walk, the feet are the inſtruments of, may be ſaid to be beautiful with ſhoes, when they are ready to every good work; when their converſation is ordered aright, is agreeable to the word of God, and as becomes the goſpel of Chriſt; and which, like ſhoes, is a fence againſt the briars and thorns, the reproaches and calumnies of the world; and when there is ſuch a luſtre upon it, that it cannot but be ſeen and obſerved by ſpectators, by which they are excited to glorify God; it is ſo beautiful in the eyes of Chriſt, that to ſuch he ſhews the ſalvation of God. The joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman; a ſkilful artificer, a goldſmith or jeweller: the alluſion ſeems to be to ſome ornaments about the knees or legs, wore by women in thoſe times; ſee Iſa. iii. 18. and this may ſerve to ſet off the luſtre and beauty of the church's converſation. And ſince it ſeems not ſo decent to deſcribe the parts themſelves mentioned, the words may rather deſign the femoralia, or garments, with which they were covered; and may ſignify the garments of ſalvation, and robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, whereby the church's members are covered, ſo that their nakedneſs is not ſeen; but with them are as richly adorned, as the bridegroom and bride with their ornaments and jewels; and which are not the bungling work of a creature, but of one that is God as well as man, and therefore called the righteouſneſs of God. Some have thought that the girdle about the loins is meant, the thighs being put for the loins, Gen. xlvi. 26. and ſo may intend the girdle of truth, mentioned along with the preparation of the goſpel of peace, the feet are ſaid to be ſhod with, Eph. vi. 14, 15. and the metaphor of girding is uſed when a goſpel-converſation is directed to, Luke xii. 35. 1 Pet. i. 13. But it ſeems beſt by theſe joints, or turnings of the thighs [l], by which they move more orderly and regularly, to underſtand the principles of the walk and converſation of ſaints, as one obſerves [m]; without which it cannot be ordered aright; for principles denominate actions, good and bad; and the principles of grace, by which believers move in their chriſtian walk, are as valuable and as precious as jewels, ſuch as faith and love, and a regard to the glory of God; and which are curiouſly wrought by the finger of God, by his holy Spirit, who works in them both to will and to do of his good pleaſure.

℣. 2. Thy navel is like a round goblet, &c.] According to ſome, not the navel itſelf is meant; but a covering of it, a jewel or plate of gold in the ſhape of it; and becauſe the word for round, in the Chaldee language, ſignifies the moon, and ſo Ben Melech interprets it, ſome have thought of the round tire like the moon, Iſa. iii. 18. though that was rather an ornament about the neck. Biſhop Patrick is of opinion, that it refers to the cloathing of wrought gold, Pſal. xlv. 13. which had on the part that covered the belly, a raiſed, emboſſed work, reſembling an heap or ſheaves of wheat; about which was an embroidery of curious flowers, particularly lilies; and, in the midſt of the whole, a fountain or conduit, running with ſeveral ſorts of liquor, into a great bowl or baſon: and Fortunatus Scacchus [n] interprets it of a garment, covering this part, embroidered with lilies. All which may repreſent the beautiful robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, the church is adorned with. But rather, the part itſelf is meant, and deſigns the miniſters of the goſpel; who, in the adminiſtration of the word and ordinances, are that to the church as the navel is to an human body; that is in an eminent part of it, is the ſtrength of the inteſtines, conduces much to the health of the body, and by which the child in the womb is ſuppoſed to receive its nouriſhment: miniſters are ſet in the higheſt place in the church; are ſtrong in themſelves, through the grace and power of Chriſt, and the means of ſtrengthening others; and of keeping the church in a good plight and healthful ſtate, by the wholſome words and ſound doctrines they preach; and alſo of nouriſhing ſouls in embryo, and when new-born, with the ſincere milk of the word: and as the navel is ſaid to be like a round goblet, cup, bowl or baſon, this aptly deſcribes that part; and may expreſs the perfection of goſpel-miniſters, their gifts and grace, not in an abſolute, but comparative ſenſe, the round or circular form being reckoned the moſt perfect; and alſo the workmanſhip beſtowed on them, the gifts and grace of the Spirit, a round goblet being turned and formed ed by ſome curious artiſt; and likewiſe their capacity to hold and retain goſpel-truths. And they are compared, not to an empty one, but to one which wanteth not liquor; meaning the large, and never-failing ſupplies of gifts and grace from Chriſt; ſo that they never want the liquor, the oil and wine of goſpel-truths, to communicate to others, Zech. iv. 12. The word uſed ſignifies a mixture, or a mixed liquor [o], as of wine and milk, chap. v. 1. or rather of wine and water, much uſed in the eaſtern countries; ſo the wine of Sharon uſed to be mixed, two parts water and one wine [p]: and this deſigns, not a mixture of divine truths and human doctrines, which ought not to be made; but the variety of goſpel-truths, miniſters deliver to others, and that in a manner they are moſt capable of receiving them. Some [q] render the words as a wiſh, let there not want, &c. and ſo they declare the tender concern of Chriſt, that his church might have a continual ſupply in the miniſtry of the word. Thy belly is like an heap of wheat; which denotes the fruitfulneſs of the church, in bringing ſouls to Chriſt, comparable to a pregnant woman; and whoſe fruit, young converts born in her, are compared to an heap of wheat, for their number, choiceneſs and ſolidity, being able to bear the fan of perſecution: it was uſual with the Jews to ſcatter wheat on the heads of married perſons at their weddings, three times, ſaying, Increaſe and multiply [r]; ſee Iſa. lxvi. 8. Matt. iii. 12. This heap of wheat is ſaid to be ſet about, or hedged, with lilies [s]; which ſuggeſts, that it was not an heap of wheat on the corn-floor which is meant, but a field of ſtanding wheat, incloſed and fenced, not with thorns, but lilies; and theſe lilies may ſignify grown ſaints, who are often compared to lilies in this book, by whom young converts are encompaſſed and defended; or the beauties of holineſs, in which they appear as ſoon as born again, Pſalm cx. 3.

℣. 3. Thy two breaſts are like two young roes that are twins.] See the note on chap. iv. 5.

℣. 4. Thy neck is as a tower of ivory, &c.] Two things recommend the neck, erectneſs and whiteneſs; both are here expreſſed, the one by a tower, the other by ivory; hence a fine, beautiful neck, is called an ivory one [t]; and for the ſame reaſon it ſometimes has the epithet of ſnowy [u], and ſometimes of marble [w]. Of the church's neck, as it may deſign either the miniſters of the word, or the ſcriptures of truth, ſee the note on chap. iv. 4. where it is compared to the tower of David, and here to a tower of ivory: Marckius conjectures, that they may be the ſame, or that this is the name of ſome ancient ſtructure known at this time; however, it is uſed as expreſſive of the purity of the lives of goſpel-miniſters, and the evenneſs of their doctrines, and of the purity, beauty, glory, and harmony of the ſcriptures. Thine eyes like the fiſh-pools in Heſhbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim; Heſhbon was formerly the ſeat of Sihon, king of the Amorites, Numb. xxii. 26. of which, Bath-rabbim was one of its gates; ſo called, either becauſe it led to Rabbath, a city near it, and mentioned with it, Jer. xlix. 3. or becauſe of the great numbers that went in and out by it; for it may be rendered, the daughter of many, or of great ones [x]: near this gate, it ſeems, were very delightful fiſh-pools, to which the eyes of the church are compared. In the Hebrew language, the word for eyes and fountains is the ſame; the eyes having humours in them, and ſo fitly compared to fiſh-pools. Of the eyes of the church, as they may deſign either the miniſters of the word, or the eyes of her underſtanding, particularly faith, ſee the note on chap. i. 15. here they are ſaid to be like fiſh-pools, whoſe waters are clear, quiet, conſtant and immoveable; and, ſeen at a diſtance between trees and groves, look very beautiful: and, if applied to miniſters, may denote the clearneſs of their ſight in diſcerning the truths of the goſpel; and their being filled with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt; and their being bleſſings to the churches of Chriſt, and to the ſouls of men: the word for fiſh-pools, comes from a word which ſignifies to bleſs [y]; and ſuch being obſerved as were near the gate of Bath-rabbim, may have reſpect to the multitude that attend their miniſtry, and receive benefit by it; in which they are conſtant and invariable, and all of a piece, and appear very beautiful to thoſe to whom they are uſeful. And if applied to the church's eyes of underſtanding, thoſe of faith and knowledge, may denote the perſpicuity of them in the diſcernment of ſpiritual things; and the fixedneſs and immoveableneſs of them on the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; looking alone to him, and off of every other object, and ſo very attractive to him, and beautiful in his ſight; as well as their abounding with the waters of evangelic repentance and humiliation; ſee chap. iv. 9. and vi. 5. Thy noſe is as the tower of Lebanon, which looketh towards Damaſcus; a tower on that part of mount Lebanon, which fronted Damaſcus, which lay in a plain, and ſo open to view, as well as expoſed to winds; hence called, by Lucan [z], Ventoſa Damaſcus; which tower was ſo high, as Adrichomius ſays [a], that from thence might be numbered the houſes in Damaſcus: by which alſo may be meant the miniſters of the word; nor need it ſeem ſtrange, that the ſame ſhould be expreſſed by different metaphors, ſince the work of miniſters is of different parts; who, as they are as eyes to ſee, ſo like the noſe to ſmell; and having a ſpiritual diſcerning of goſpel-truths, both ſavour them themſelves, and diffuſe the ſavour of them to others; and are both the ornament and defence of the church: the former is ſignified by the noſe, which is an ornament of the face, and the latter by the tower of Lebanon, and this as looking towards Damaſcus, the inhabitants of which were always enemies to the people of Iſrael; and ſo may denote the vigilance and courage of faithful miniſters, who watch the church's enemies, and their motions, and, with a manful courage, face and attack them. Moreover, this deſcription may reſpect the majeſty and magnanimity of the church herſelf; the former may be intimated by her noſe, which, when of a good ſize, and well proportioned, adds much grace and majeſty to the countenance; and the latter, by its being compared to the impregnable tower of Lebanon, looking towards Damaſcus, ſignifying, that ſhe was not afraid to look her worſt enemies in the face: or the whole may expreſs her prudence and diſcretion in ſpiritual things; by which ſhe can diſtinguiſh truth from error, and eſpy dangers afar off, and guard againſt them.

℣. 5. Thine head upon thee is like Carmel, &c.] Set with hair, thick and long, as Carmel with plants and trees. Now Chriſt is the church's head in various ſenſes; he is her federal and repreſentative head in eternity and time; her political head, as a king to his ſubjects; an oeconomical head, as the huſband to the wife, as parents to their children, and a maſter to ſervants: and, as ſuch, may be compared to Carmel; for the multitude dependent on him, whom he repreſents, and is connected with under various relations; for his height, being higher than the kings of the earth, and all other heads; and for fruitfulneſs, all the fruits of the church, and of all true believers, coming from him. Some render the word, as crimſon, or ſcarlet [b]; which may ſet forth his royal dignity and majeſty, this colour being wore by kings and great perſonages; or the ardent love of Chriſt to his body, the church, and the members of it; or his bloody ſufferings for them. And the hair of thine head like purple; purple-coloured hair has been in great eſteem. Of this colour was the hair of king Nyſus, according to the fable [c]; and ſo the hair of Evadne, and of the muſes [d], were of a violet colour; the hair of Ulyſſes is ſaid [e] to be like to the hyacinth-flower, which is of a purple or violet colour; and Milton [f] calls the firſt Adam's hair, hyacinthine locks; and here, in a figurative ſenſe, the ſecond Adam's hair is ſaid to be like purple. By which, believers that grow on Chriſt, the head of the church, may be meant, who have their dependence on him, and their ſtrength and nouriſhment from him; ſee chap. iv. 1. and v. 11. and theſe may be ſaid to be like purple, becauſe of their royal dignity, being made kings unto God by Chriſt; and becauſe of their being waſhed in the purple blood of Chriſt; and becauſe of the ſufferings they endure for his ſake; and eſpecially ſuch may be ſo compared, who have ſpilt their blood, and laid down their lives on his account. The king is held in the galleries; the ſame with the Head of the church, the King of Zion, and King of ſaints, whoſe kingdom is a ſpiritual and everlaſting one: and by the galleries in which he is held, may be meant the ordinances of the goſpel; where Chriſt and his people walk and converſe together; where he diſcloſes the ſecrets of his heart to them, leads them into a further acquaintance with his covenant, and the bleſſings and promiſes of it; and from whence they have delightful views of his perſon and fulneſs; ſee the King in his beauty, and behold the good land which is afar off: the ſame word as here, is rendered rafters, and by ſome canals, in chap. i. 17. ſee the note there. Now Chriſt being ſaid to be held in theſe galleries, may ſignify his fixed habitation in his houſe and ordinances; where he has promiſed to dwell, and delights to be; and where he is as it were faſtened to them, and bound in them.

℣. 6. How fair and how pleaſant art thou, O love, for delights!] Theſe are the words of the King in the galleries, wondering at the church's beauty, it being incomparable and inexpreſſible, it could not be ſaid well how great it was; and expreſſing the ſtrength of his love to her, which was invariably the ſame as ever. Of the fairneſs of the church, and of this title, love, ſee chap. i. 9, 15. and ii. 7. and here ſhe is ſaid alſo to be pleaſant to him, as his ſpouſe and bride, in whom he takes infinite delight and pleaſure, loving her with a love of complacency and delight; and therefore adds, for delights, which he had in her before the world was, Prov. viii. 31. She was all delight [g] to him; her words, her actions and geſtures, her comely countenance, her ſweet and pleaſant voice in prayer and praiſe, her raviſhing looks of faith and love, her heavenly airs, and evangelic walk; in all which ſhe appeared beautiful and delightful, beyond all human thought and expreſſion.

℣. 7. This thy ſtature is like to a palm-tree, &c.] Made up of the above parts commended, and others had in view, as appears from the relative this. The word for ſtature, properly ſignifies height, tallneſs and erectneſs; and which were reckoned agreeable in women, as well as men; ſee the note on 1 Sam. ix. 2. hence methods are often made uſe of to make them look taller, as by their head-dreſſes, their ſhoes, and by ſtretching out their necks, Iſa. iii. 16. and the ſimile of a tree is not an improper one: and ſo Galatea is, for height and tallneſs, compared to an alder and to a plane-tree [h]; and Helena, to a cypreſs-tree in a garden [i], on the ſame account; and here the church to a palm-tree: the Egyptian palm-tree is ſaid to be the beſt [k]; and if Solomon here has any reference to Pharaoh's daughter, his wife, he might think of that, which is deſcribed "of body ſtraight, high, round and ſlender [l]," and fitly expreſſes a good ſhape and ſtature. The church's ſtature is no other than the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt; which will be attained unto when all the elect are gathered in, and every member joined to the body, and all filled with the gifts and graces of the Spirit deſigned for them, and are grown up to a juſt proportion in the body; and in ſuch a ſtate, Chriſt ſeems to view his church, and ſo commends her by this ſimile: ſaints are oftentimes compared to palm-trees in ſcripture on other accounts; ſee Pſalm xcii. 12. And thy breaſts to cluſters of grapes; on a vine which might be planted by, and run up upon a palm-tree, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts: though rather, cluſters of dates, the fruit of the palm-tree, are deſigned, ſince this fruit, as Pliny [m] obſerves, grows in cluſters; and, to cluſters of the vine, the church's breaſts are compared in the next verſe. And by theſe breaſts may be meant, either the miniſters of the goſpel, who communicate the ſincere milk of the word to ſouls; and may be compared to cluſters for their numbers, when there is plenty of them, which is a great mercy to the church; and for their unity, likeneſs, neſs, and agreement in their work, in their miniſtrations, and in the doctrine they preach, though their gifts may be different: or elſe, the two Teſtaments, full of the milk of the word; and comparable to cluſters of grapes or dates, becauſe of the many excellent doctrines, and precious promiſes in them; which, when preſſed by hearing, reading, meditation and prayer, yield both delight and nouriſhment to the ſouls of men. Some think the two ordinances of the goſpel, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper, are intended, which are breaſts of conſolation; and, when the preſence of Chriſt, and the manifeſtations of his love are enjoyed in them, they afford much pleaſure and ſatisfaction; and as thoſe breaſts are full in themſelves, they are beautiful in the eye of Chriſt, and as ſuch commended; ſee the note on chap. iv. 5.

℣. 8. I ſaid, I will go up to the palm-tree, &c.] Which is eaſy of aſcent; having, in the bark of the trunk or body of the tree, rings like ſteps, whereby the eaſtern people climb it with incredible ſwiftneſs, as Pliny[n] relates: theſe ſteps are made by the lower boughs being lopped off, whoſe knots, or pollices, as Dr Shaw[o] calls them, being gradually left upon the trunk of the tree, ſerve, like ſo many rounds of a ladder, to climb up the tree; either to fecundate it, or to lop it, or to gather the fruit; and Lucian ſays[p], "thoſe that have ſeen how men get up into palm-trees, in Arabia, Egypt, and other places, muſt needs underſtand what he ſays about climbing the Phalli, in the temple of Hierapolis in Syria, he is deſcribing." By the palm-tree may be meant the church militant, who yet gets the victory over all her enemies, of which the palm-tree is an emblem; and Chriſt's going up to it, is expreſſive of his right to it, and property in it, which he has by his Father's gift, his own purchaſe, and the power of his grace, and may go up to it when he pleaſes; alſo of his preſence with his church, and of the delight he takes in her, viewing her ſtature, fruit, and flouriſhing circumſtances. I will take hold of the boughs thereof; either to crop them, the tops of them, which, of the firſt year's growth, are very tender and ſweet, and may be eaten[q]; the top of the palm-tree is ſaid to be very ſweet[r]; and which ſome call the cerebrum, or brain of it, and is ſpoken of as very pleaſant and nouriſhing[s]: or to gather the fruit on them; his own grace in exerciſe, and good works performed under the influence of it; ſee chap. iv. 16. and v. 1. or to prune them; which he does by the miniſtry of the word, reproving ſin, and refuting error; and, by afflictive providences, purging away ſin; and by ſuffering perſecution to befal his churches, whereby he clears them of carnal profeſſors, and lops off withered and fruitleſs branches. Now alſo thy breaſts ſhall be as cluſters of the vine; round, full, ſoft and ſucculent, like the berries of the vine-tree, the grapes that grow in cluſters on it; of theſe, ſee the note on ℣. 7. And the ſmell of thy noſe like apples; ſee the note on ℣. 4. Here it may denote the inward conſtitution and outward converſation of the church, which were ſound and healthful; ſhe had an inward principle of grace, from whence proceeded a ſavoury converſation, a ſavoury breath, a holy breathing after divine and ſpiritual things: or it may intend the things ſhe had a ſavour of, as divine truths and excellent doctrines, comparable to apples, chap. ii. 5. Prov. xxv. 11. and all ſpiritual and heavenly things, when they have the preſence of Chriſt, and the quickening influences of his Spirit.

℣. 9. And the roof of thy mouth like the beſt wine, &c.] Which may intend, either her taſte, as the word is rendered in chap. ii. 3. by which ſhe can diſtinguiſh good wine from bad, truth from error; or her breath, ſweet and of a good ſmell, like the beſt wine; the breathings of her ſoul in prayer, which are ſweet odours, perfumed with the incenſe of Chriſt's mediation: or, rather, her ſpeech, the words of her mouth; the roof of the mouth being an inſtrument of ſpeech; the ſame word is ſometimes rendered, the mouth, chap. v. 16. Prov. v. 3. and viii. 7. and may denote both her ſpeech in common converſation, which is warming, refreſhing, comforting and quickening; and in prayer and praiſe, which is well-pleaſing and delightful to Chriſt; and eſpecially the goſpel preached by her miniſters, comparable to the beſt wine for its antiquity, being an ancient goſpel; for its purity, unadulterated, and free from mixture, and as faithfully diſpenſed; for its delight, flavour and taſte, to ſuch who have their ſpiritual ſenſes exerciſed; and for its chearing, refreſhing, and ſtrengthening nature, to drooping, weary ſouls. It follows, for my beloved, that goeth down ſweetly; is received and taken down with all readineſs, by thoſe who have once taſted the ſweetneſs, and felt the power of it. Or, that goeth to righteouſneſſes[t]; leading to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt for juſtification, and teaching to live ſoberly and righteouſly: or, that goeth to my beloved, ſtraightway or directly[u]; meaning either to his Father, Chriſt calls his beloved, to whoſe love the goſpel leads and directs ſouls, as in a ſtraight line, as to the ſource of ſalvation, and all the bleſſings of grace; or to himſelf, by a mimeſis, whom the church calls ſo; the goſpel leading ſouls directly to him, his perſon, blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, for peace, pardon, juſtification, and atonement: or, that goeth to my beloved to uprightneſſes[w]; that is, to the church, who is Chriſt's beloved, conſiſting of upright men in heart and life, whom Chriſt calls his beloved and his friends, chap. v. 1. and whom Chriſt treats with his beſt wine, his goſpel; and which is deſigned for them, their pleaſure, profit, comfort, and eſtabliſhment. Cauſing the lips of thoſe that are aſleep, to ſpeak; either ſuch who are in the dead ſleep of ſin, who, when the goſpel comes with power, are quickened by it; and it produces in them humble confeſſions of ſin; cauſes them to ſpeak in praiſe of Chriſt, and his grace, and of the ſalvation which he has procured for loſt ſinners; it brings them to Zion, to declare what great things God has done for them: or elſe, drowſy profeſſors, in lifeleſs frames, and much gone back in religion; who, when arouſed and quickened by the goſpel, and brought out of their lethargy, are ready to acknowledge their backſlidings with ſhame; to ſpeak meanly and modeſtly of themſelves, and very highly of Chriſt, and his grace, who has healed their backſlidings, and ſtill loves them freely; none more ready to exalt and magnify Chriſt, and ſpeak in praiſe of what he has done for them. Some render the words, cauſing the lips of ancient men to ſpeak [x]; whoſe ſenſes are not ſo quick, nor they ſo full of talk, as in their youthful days: wherefore this ſerves to commend this wine; that it ſhould have ſuch an effect as to invigorate ancient men, and give them a juvenile warmth and ſprightlineſs, and make them loquacious, which is one effect of wine, when freely drank [y]; and ſoftens the moroſeneſs of ancient men [z]: wine is even ſaid to make an ancient man dance [a].

ỳ. 10. I am my beloved's, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church, ſtrongly expreſſing the aſſurance of faith ſhe had of her union to Chriſt, and intereſt in him; which ſhews, that that grace is attainable, and that there may be a continuation of the exerciſe of it; it may be expreſſed again and again, as it is by the church in this Song, chap. ii. 16. and vi. 3. and that the exerciſe of it often follows upon the enjoyment of Chriſt's preſence, as here, upon his going up to the palm-tree; and that this grace has no tendency to licentiouſneſs, but excites to duty, and makes more careful in it, of which the next verſe is a proof, Come, let us go forth, &c. Moreover, theſe words may be conſidered as a modeſt acknowledgment of the church's; that all ſhe were and had were Chriſt's, and came from him; all the beauty he had commended in her; all fruitfulneſs in grace, and ſtrength in the exerciſe of it; her light and knowledge in divine truths; her zeal and courage to defend them; her upright ſtature, and holy walk and converſation, and every good thing elſe, were owing to his grace. And here ſhe alſo makes a voluntary ſurrender of all to him again; as ſhe received all from him, ſhe devotes all to him: And his deſire is towards me; and only to her, as his ſpouſe and bride: it was towards her from everlaſting, when he aſked her of his Father, and he gave her to him; and ſo it was in time, to procure her ſalvation; hence he became incarnate, and ſuffered and died in her ſtead: his deſire is towards his people before converſion, waiting to be gracious to them; and, after converſion, to have their company, and their grace exerciſed on him, and to behold their beauty; nor will his deſires be fully ſatisfied, until he has got them all with him in glory. And this phraſe not only ſignifies the conjugal relation of the church to Chriſt, he being her huſband, and ſhe is wife, the deſire of his eyes, as a wife is called, Ezek. xxiv. 16, 18. but takes in the whole care and concern of Chriſt for her, as her huſband; who ſympathizes with her under all her diſtreſſes; protects her from all dangers and enemies; and provides every thing neceſſary for her, for time and eternity. Some render the words, ſeeing his deſire is towards me [b]; therefore ſhe expreſſes her faith in him, and gives up herſelf to him.

ỳ. 11. Come, my beloved, &c.] The word come is often uſed by Chriſt, and here by the church, in imitation of him; ſee chap. ii. 10, 13. and iv. 8. This call, is the call of the church upon Chriſt, to make good his promiſe, ỳ. 8. and is an earneſt deſire after the preſence of Chriſt, and the manifeſtations of his love; which deſire is increaſed, the more it is enjoyed; and it ſhews the ſenſe ſhe had of her own inſufficiency for the work ſhe was going about: ſhe knew that viſiting the ſeveral congregations of the ſaints, would be to little purpoſe, unleſs Chriſt was with her, and therefore ſhe urges him to it; not that he was backward and unwilling to go with her, but he chooſes to ſeem ſo, to make his people the more earneſt for his preſence, and to prize it the more when they have it; and it is pleaſing to him to hear them aſk for it. The endearing character, my beloved, is uſed by the church, not only to expreſs her affection for Chriſt, and faith of intereſt in him, but as an argument to engage him to go along with her. Her requeſts follow, Let us go forth into the field; from the city, where ſhe had been in queſt of Chriſt, and had now found him, chap. v. 7. into the country, for recreation and pleaſure: the alluſion may be to ſuch who keep their country-houſes, to which they retire from the city, and take their walks in the fields, to ſee how the fruits grow, and enjoy the country-air. The church is for going abroad into the fields; but then ſhe would have Chriſt with her; walking in the fields, yields no pleaſure unleſs Chriſt is there; there is no recreation without him: the phraſe expreſſes her deſire of his preſence every where, at home and abroad, in the city and in the fields; and of her being with him alone, that ſhe might tell him all her mind, and impart her love to him, which ſhe could better do alone than in company: it may alſo ſignify her deſire to have the goſpel ſpread in the world, in the barren parts of it, which looked like uncultivated fields, the Gentile world; and ſo, in one of the Jewiſh Midraſhes [c], theſe fields, and the villages in the next clauſe, are interpreted of the nations of the world. Let us lodge in the villages; which, though places of mean entertainment for food and lodging, yet Chriſt being with her, were more eligible to her, than the greateſt affluence of good things without him; and being places of retirement from the noiſe and hurry of the city, ſhe choſe them, that ſhe might be free of the cares of life, and enjoy communion with Chriſt, which ſhe would have continued; and therefore was deſirous of lodging, at leaſt all night, as in chap. i. 13. Some [d] render the words, by, in, or among the cyprus-trees; ſee chap. i. 14. and iv. 13. by which may be meant, the ſaints, comparable to ſuch trees, for their excellency, fragrancy and fruitfulneſs; and an invitation to lodge by or with theſe, could not be unwelcome to Chriſt, they being the excellent in the earth, in whom is all his delight.

ỳ. 12. Let us get up early to the vineyards, &c.] After a night's lodging in the fields, or among the cyprus-trees. By which vineyards may be meant, particular churches, gathered according to goſpel-order, and diſtinguiſhed from the world, planted with fruitful vines, and fenced by almighty power: hither the church propoſes to get up early, betimes in the morning; being willing to take the firſt and moſt ſeaſonable opportunity of viſiting the ſaints, to know their ſtate and condition; and that her viſit might not be in vain, ſhe is for taking Chriſt along with her. Let us ſee if the vine flouriſh; true believers in Chriſt; who, though weak and worthleſs in themſelves, yet being engrafted in Chriſt, the true vine, bring forth fruit, and become flouriſhing in grace and good works; of the flouriſhing or flowering of the vine, ſee the note on chap. ii. 13. Whether the tender grape appear; or when the flower of the vine opens [e], and goes off, and the ſmall grape appears: by which young converts may be meant, who are tender, and have but a ſmall degree of faith and knowledge; and yet theſe are not overlooked, much leſs deſpiſed by Chriſt and his church, but are delighted with the promiſing appearance they make. And the pomegranates bud forth; ſtronger believers, taller, and more fruitful than the former; ſee chap. iv. 13. the actings and exerciſe of whoſe grace are ſignified by budding forth, in an open and viſible manner: the church is concerned for the good and welfare of the ſaints of all ranks and ſizes; of vines and pomegranates, as well as tender grapes; and of the budding of the one, as well as of the opening and flowering of the other. And ſeeing theſe ends propoſed by her, are the ſame with Chriſt's, chap. vi. 11. ſhe might conclude they would prevail upon him to go with her, particularly what follows: There will I give thee my loves; in the fields, villages and vineyards, when alone, and obſerving the ſtate and condition of particular churches and ſaints; and having communion with Chriſt, the church might hope and expect to have her heart enlarged, and drawn forth in love to Chriſt more abundantly; and that ſhe ſhould be able to manifeſt it more largely to him, and give clearer and fuller proofs of it: and this ſhe obſerves in order to gain her point, and get him to go along with her; knowing that her love, in the actings and exerciſe of it, was very acceptable to him, chap. iv. 10. I ſee not why the word for loves, may not be rendered my lovely flowers; as a word nearly the ſame, in the following verſe, is by ſome rendered, theſe lovely flowers give a good ſmell, which ſeems to refer to the flowers here; ſuch as were to be met with in plenty, in fields and vineyards, among vines and pomegranates, as lilies, violets, &c. and may be an alluſion to lovers, who uſed to give to thoſe they loved ſweet-ſmelling flowers [f]; and here may ſignify the graces of the Spirit, and the actings of them, which are fragrant, and acceptable to Chriſt.

℣. 13. The mandrakes give a ſmell, &c.] Or, thoſe lovely flowers, as Junius and Tremellius and Piſcator tranſlate the words; even thoſe the church propoſed to give to her beloved, when in the fields. Some take them to be violets; others, jeſſamin; others, more probably, lilies [g]; as the circumſtances of time and place, when and where they flouriſhed, and their fragant ſmell, and figure like cups, ſhew. Ravius [h] contends, that the word ſignifies, and ſhould be rendered, the branches put forth their ſweet-ſmelling flowers; and thinks, branches of figs are meant, which give a good ſmell, agreeable to chap. ii. 13. and which he ſuppoſes to be the uſe of the word in Jer. xxiv. 1. and to his ſenſe Heidegger [i] agrees; only he thinks, the word branches is not to be reſtrained to a particular ſpecies, but may ſignify branches of ſweet-ſmelling flowers, and fruits in general. Ludolphus [k] would have the fruit, the Arabians call mauz or muza, intended; which, in the Abyſſine country, is as big as a cucumber, and of the ſame form and ſhape, fifty of which grow upon one and the ſame ſtalk, and are of a very ſweet taſte and ſmell; from which cognation of a great many on the ſame ſtalk, he thinks it took the name of dudaim, the word here uſed, and in Gen. xxx. 14—16. But the generality of interpreters and commentators underſtand by it the mandrakes; and ſo it is rendered by the Septuagint, and in both the Targums, of Onkelos and Jonathan, on Gen. xxx. 14. but it is queſtionable whether the ſame plant, that is known among us by that name, is meant; ſince it is of a ſtrong, ill-ſcented and offenſive ſmell; and ſo Pliny ſays [l] of it: though Dioſcorides, Levinus Lemnius [m], and Auguſtine [n], who ſays, he ſaw the plant and examined it, ſay, it is of a very ſweet ſmell; which, though it does not agree with the plant that now bears the name, yet it does with that here intended; for though it is only ſaid to give a ſmell, no doubt a good one is meant, and ſuch Reuben's mandrakes gave. And by them here may be intended, either the ſaints and people of God, compared to them, for their fragrancy; being clad with the garments of Chriſt, which ſmell of myrrh, aloes, and caſſia, and are anointed with the ſavoury ointments of the grace of the Spirit; whoſe prayers are ſweet odours; and their works, with their perſons, accepted with God in Chriſt: or rather, the graces of the Spirit in lively exerciſe may be meant; ſuch as thoſe lovely flowers, of faith, hope, love, repentance, patience, ſelf-denial, humility, thankfulneſs, and others. And at our gates are all manner of pleaſant fruits; in diſtinction from the mandrakes and flowers in the fields, Gen. xxx. 14. and in alluſion to a cuſtom, in many countries, to garniſh the poſts of the door of new-married perſons with branches of trees, and fruits and flowers; and at other feſtivals, beſides nuptial ones [o], which made it inviting to enter in: and theſe all manner of pleaſant fruits, may denote the plenty, variety and excellency of the bleſſings of grace, and of the graces of the Spirit, believers have from Chriſt; and of the doctrines and ordinances of the goſpel, which are for their uſe; and may be ſaid to be at our gates, as being ready at hand, in the hearts of ſaints, and in the mouths of goſpel-miniſters; and open and viſible, held forth to public view in the word and ordinances; and which are adminiſtered at wiſdom's gates, the gates of Zion, where they are to be met with and had. And which are new and old; denoting the plenty of grace, and bleſſings of it, of old laid up in Chriſt, and from whom there are freſh ſupplies continually: or rather, the doctrines of the Old and New Teſtament; tament; which, for matter and ſubſtance, are the ſame; and with which the church, and particularly her faithful miniſters, being furniſhed, bring forth out of their treaſure things new and old, Matt. xiii. 52. Which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved; Chriſt, whom her ſoul loved; for though the above fruits, the bleſſings, promiſes and doctrines of grace, which ſhe laid up in her heart, mind and memory, to bring forth and make uſe of at proper times and ſeaſons, were for her own uſe and benefit, and of all believers, yet in all for the honour and glory of Chriſt, the author and donor of them. Reſpect may be had to a cuſtom with lovers, to lay up fruits for thoſe they love; at leaſt ſuch a cuſtom may be compared with this [p].

CHAP. VIII.

THIS chapter begins with an ardent wiſh of the church, for a free and intimate converſe with Chriſt; declaring what ſhe would do to him, and for him, ſhould ſhe have ſuch an interview with him, ℣. 1, 2. what familiarity ſhould be between them, ℣. 3. charging the daughters of Jeruſalem not to give him any diſturbance, ℣. 4. Upon which, they enquire who ſhe was, that was in ſuch a poſture they ſaw her in, ℣. 5. when the church, inſtead of giving them an anſwer, ſays ſome things concerning her beloved, on whom they ſaw her leaning; and makes ſome requeſts to him for more nearneſs to him, and manifeſtations of his love to her; urged from the ſtrength of her love and affections to him, which was invincible, ℣. 6, 7. Next follows a ſpeech of the church about her little ſiſter; expreſſing a concern for her, and what ſhe would do to her and with her, ℣. 8, 9. and the anſwer of the little ſiſter, declaring what ſhe was, and what ſhe enjoyed, ℣. 10. then the words of the church again, concerning her huſband's vineyard; the place, keepers, and profit of it, ℣. 11, 12. And the chapter, and with it the Song, is concluded with a requeſt of Chriſt to the church, that he might hear her voice, ℣. 13. and with a petition of her's to him, that he would come quickly to her, ℣. 14.

℣. 1. O that thou wert as my brother, &c.] Or, who will give thee as a brother to me [q]? an uſual form of wiſhing, Deut. v. 29. Job xxiii. 2. Pſalm xiv. 7. The church here not only requeſts that Chriſt would be like a brother to her, but appear to be really one, and to act the part of one towards her; with whom ſhe might as freely converſe, as brother and ſiſter may. Several Jewiſh [r] writers own, that the King Meſſiah is intended here; and in ſuch a relation Chriſt does ſtand to his church and people, by virtue of his incarnation, Heb. ii. 11, 14, 17. hence many of the ancients take this to be a wiſh of the Jewiſh church, for the coming of Chriſt in the fleſh; and alſo through their adoption, he and they having one Father, John xx. 17. and by being of a like nature, diſpoſition and practice, Matt. xii. 50. Rom. viii. 29. as well as on the ſcore of love and friendſhip, Prov. xviii 24. and this relation Chriſt fills up, by the intimacy and familiarity he uſes them with; by his compaſſion on them, and ſympathy with them, in all their afflictions; by the help, ſuccour and relief, he gives them; by his condeſcenſion to their weakneſſes, and by his great love and affection for them. As a further deſcription of him as a brother, it is added, That ſucked the breaſts of my mother; which may denote the truth and reality of Chriſt's incarnation, being a ſucking infant; and the near relation of Chriſt to his people, being a brother by the mother's ſide, reckoned the neareſt, and their affection to each other the ſtrongeſt: by her mother, may be meant Jeruſalem above, the mother of us all; and, by her breaſts, the ordinances, of which, Chriſt, as man, partook when on earth, and now may be ſaid to ſuck, as formed in the hearts of his people. When I ſhould find thee without; or, in the ſtreet [s], in public ordinances, where Chriſt is to be found; or without Judea, in the Gentile world, where, after his coming in the fleſh, his goſpel was preached, the ordinances adminiſtered, and he was there to be found; or in the moſt public place and manner, where ſhe ſhould not be aſhamed to own him, his truths and ordinances, before men. I would kiſs thee; not only with a kiſs of approbation, Prov. xxiv. 16. but of love and affection, of faith and confidence, of homage and ſubjection, of worſhip and adoration; ſee Pſalm ii. 12. this is an uſage with relations and friends, brothers and ſiſters, at meeting; hence Heuniſchius refers this to the time when the ſaints ſhall meet Chriſt in the clouds, who will be admitted to the neareſt embraces of him, with unſpeakable pleaſure, and enjoy him to all eternity. Yea, I ſhould not be deſpiſed; for taking ſuch freedom with Chriſt, her brother. Or, they would not deſpiſe me [t]; neither men nor angels, for ſuch an action, and ſtill leſs God, the Father, Son, and Spirit; which ſhe might conclude from the relation between them, it being no more unſeemly than for a ſiſter, to uſe ſuch freedom with an own brother, even in the ſtreet; and from the reception ſhe had reaſon to believe ſhe ſhould meet with from Chriſt; who would not turn away his face from her, when ſhe offered to kiſs him, which would occaſion ſhame and bluſhing. The whole expreſſes her boldneſs in profeſſing Chriſt, without fear or ſhame, in the moſt public manner.

℣. 2. I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's houſe, &c.] The general aſſembly and church of the firſt-born, is mother to the church viſible, to particular churches and believers, where they are born, educated, and brought up; for which they have a great affection, as perſons uſually have for the place of their nativity and education. And here the church deſires to have Chriſt with her; either to conſummate the marriage between them, Gen. xxiv. 67. or to have the knowledge of him ſpread among her relations, thoſe of her mother's houſe, who belonged ed to the election of grace; or to enjoy his preſence there, with great delight and pleaſure: the act of leading thither, ſhews great familiarity with him, great love and reſpect for him, a hearty welcome to her mother's houſe; and was treating him becoming his majeſty, great perſonages being led, Iſa. lx. 11. all which is done by prayer in the exerciſe of faith: and the act of bringing, denotes on her part the ſtrength of faith in prayer; and on his part great condeſcenſion; ſee chap. iii. 4. Her end in all was, as follows, Who would inſtruct me; meaning her mother; the alluſion may be to a grave and prudent woman, who, taking her new-married daughter apart, teaches her how to behave towards her huſband, that ſhe may have his affections, and live happily with him: the houſe of God is a ſchool of inſtruction, where ſouls are taught the ways of Chriſt, the doctrines of the goſpel, and the duties of religion; nor are the greateſt believers above inſtruction, and the means of it. Some render the words, thou ſhalt, or thou wouldſt teach me [u]; meaning Chriſt, who teaches as none elſe can; he teaches by his Spirit, who leads into all truth; by the ſcriptures, which are profitable for inſtruction; by his miniſters, called paſtors and teachers; and by his ordinances adminiſtered in his houſe; where the church deſired the preſence of Chriſt, and might expect inſtruction from him, being in the way of her duty; and to hear ſuch marriage-precepts, as in Pſalm xlv. 10, 11. In return, the church promiſes Chriſt, I would cauſe thee to drink of ſpiced wine, of the juice of my pomegranate; or, wine of my pomegranate [w]; of which mention is made in Jewiſh writings [x], and by other authors [y]: there was a city in the tribe of Dan, called Gath-rimmon, Joſh. xxi. 24. the wine-preſs of the pomegranate, or where they made pomegranate-wine. Spiced wine was much uſed by the ancients, and in the eaſtern countries: ſo Phœnician wine, or wine of Byblis, is ſaid to be odoriferous [z]; ſo the wine of Lebanon, Hoſ. xiv. 7. the Babylonians had a wine they called nectar [a]: ſpiced wine was thought leſs inebriating [b], and therefore the ancients ſometimes put into their wine, myrrh and calamus, and other ſpices [c]; ſometimes it was a mixture of old wine, water and balſam; and of wine, honey and pepper [d]. Now theſe ſorts of wine being accounted the beſt and moſt agreeable, the church propoſes to treat Chriſt with them; by which may be meant, the various graces of the Spirit, and the exerciſe of them in believers; which give Chriſt pleaſure and delight, and are preferred by him to the beſt wine; ſee chap. iv. 10. and v. 1. With the Hebrew writers, pomegranates are ſaid to be a ſymbol of concord [e]: the pomegranate was a tree of Venus [f].

Or the words are a petition that ſo it might be, let his left hand, &c. [g] or a declaration of what ſhe did enjoy, his left hand is under my head, &c. [h] as in chap. ii. 6. ſee the note there.

℣. 4. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jeruſalem, &c.] The phraſe, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, uſed in chap. ii. 6. and iii. 5. is here omitted; not as if the charge was leſs vehement and earneſt here, for the form of expoſtulation ſeems rather to expreſs more earneſtneſs: for the words may be rendered, Why will ye, or why ſhould ye ſtir up, and why awake my love [i]? being apprehenſive they were about to do it; and which ſhe diſſuades from, as unreaſonable and dangerous, and might be prejudicial to them as well as to her. The alluſion is to virgins, that ſung ſongs at marriages; one in the evening, lulling to ſleep; and another in the morning, awaking and ſtirring up from it [k].

℣. 5. (Who is this that cometh up from the wilderneſs? &c.] Which words are ſpoken by the daughters of Jeruſalem, occaſioned by her charge to them, by which they were excited to look more earneſtly at her, whom Chriſt had indulged with ſo much nearneſs to him; at which, they expreſs their ſurprize, and deſcribe her by her aſcent from the wilderneſs; that is, of the world, out of which ſhe was choſen and called; and from a ſtate of nature, out of which ſhe was brought; and was riſing up in a ſtate of grace to a ſtate of glory; ſee the note on chap. iii. 6. Leaning upon her beloved;) faith in Chriſt, whom her ſoul loved, and who loved her, is ſignified hereby; ſee Iſa. l. 10. which is the grace by which believers lean on the perſon of Chriſt, for acceptance with God; on his righteouſneſs, for juſtification; on his fulneſs, for the ſupply of their wants; and truſt in his blood, for pardon and cleanſing. The word is only uſed in this place, and is differently rendered: by ſome, caſting herſelf [l] on him; as ſenſible ſinners do at firſt converſion, when they venture their ſouls on Chriſt, commit the care and keeping of them to him, and truſt their whole ſalvation with him: by others, joining, aſſociating [m]; cleaving to him, keeping company with him, from the uſe of the word [n] in the Arabic tongue; ſo ſuch ſouls give up themſelves to Chriſt; cleave to him, with full purpoſe of heart; walk with him, and walk on in him, as they have received him: by others, rejoicing or delighting [o] herſelf in him; in the view of his perſonal glory, tranſcendent excellencies, inexhauſtible fulneſs, and unſearchable riches: the Septuagint verſion is, ſtrengthened, or ſtrengthening herſelf on her beloved; deriving all her ſtrength from him, to exerciſe grace, perform duty, withſtand temptation, and perſevere to the end, conſcious of her own weakneſs; faith, in every ſenſe of the word, is intended. I raiſed thee up under the apple-tree; not the words of Chriſt concerning the church, ſince the affixes are maſculine; but what the church ſaid concerning Chriſt, when leaning on his arm as ſhe went along with him: ſo the words may be connected with the preceding, by ſupplying the word ſaying, as Michaelis obſerves; relating a piece of former experience, how that when ſhe was under the apple-tree, ſat under the ſhadow of it, chap. ii. 3. that is, under the ordinances of the goſpel; where, having no ſenſible communion with Chriſt for ſome time, he being as it were aſleep; ſhe, by her earneſt prayers and intreaties, awaked him, and raiſed him up, to take notice of her; whereby ſhe enjoyed much nearneſs to him, and familiarity with him. There thy mother brought thee forth, there ſhe brought thee forth that bare thee; which may be ſaid, either concerning the Old Teſtament-church, who conceived hope of the coming of Chriſt, waited for it, and was often like a woman in pain until he was brought forth, which at length was done, to the joy of thoſe that looked for him; or of the New Teſtament-church, hoping, looking, waiting for the ſecond coming of Chriſt, in the exerciſe of faith and prayer, and is like a woman in travail, and will be until he makes his appearance; and both may be meant, the one by the former, the other by the latter phraſe, and may be the reaſon of the repetition of it. It may be applied to the apoſtles of Chriſt, who travailed in birth, until Chriſt was brought forth into the Gentile world, through the preaching of the goſpel; and ſo to all goſpel-miniſters, who are in like caſe, until Chriſt be formed in the ſouls of men; which is no other than the new birth, and is attended with pain like that of a woman in travail; and every regenerate perſon may be ſaid, in this ſenſe, to be Chriſt's mother, as well as his brother and ſiſter, Matt. xii. 50. and each of the above things are uſually done under, and by the means of the word and ordinances; which may be ſignified by the apple-tree, or, however, the ſhadow of it.

℣. 6. Set me as a ſeal upon thine heart, as a ſeal upon thine arm, &c.] Theſe are ſtill the words of the church, ſpeaking to Chriſt as ſhe walked along with him, as the affixes in the Hebrew text ſhew; in which ſhe deſires to have a fixed abiding-place in his heart; to continue firmly in his love, and to have further manifeſtations of it; to be always remembered and ſupported by him; to be ever on his mind, and conſtantly under his care and protection; and to have a full aſſurance of intereſt in his love, and in his power, which is the ſealing work of his Spirit, Eph. i. 13. and iv. 30. The alluſion ſeems to be to the high-prieſt, a type of Chriſt, who had the names of the children of Iſrael engraved on precious ſtones, and bore by him on his ſhoulders, and on his heart, for a memorial before the Lord continually; or to the names of perſons, engraved on jewels, wore by lovers on their arms or breaſts, or to their pictures put there; not to ſignets or ſeals wore on thoſe parts, but to the names and images of perſons impreſſed on them: the Ethiopians[p] underſtand it of ſomething bound upon the arm, by which perſons might be known, as was uſed in their country. The church's deſire is, that ſhe might be affectionately loved by Chriſt, be deeply fixed in his heart, be ever in his view, owned and acknowledged by him, and protected by the arm of his power. Her reaſons follow: For love is ſtrong as death; that is, the love of the church to Chriſt, which cauſed her to make the above requeſts: death conquers all; againſt it there is no ſtanding; ſuch was the love of the church, it ſurmounted all difficulties that lay in the way of enjoying Chriſt; nothing could ſeparate from it; ſhe was conquered by it herſelf[q], and could not live without him; a frown, an angry look from him, was as death unto her; yea, ſhe could readily part with life, and ſuffer death for his ſake; death itſelf could not part her from him, or ſeparate him from her love[r]; ſo that her love was ſtronger than death. Jealouſy is cruel as the grave; the jealouſy ſhe had of Chriſt's love to her, which was her weakneſs; and yet it was very torturing and afflicting, tho' at the ſame time it ſhewed the greatneſs of her love to Chriſt: or envy, that is, of wicked men, ſhe was the object of, which exceeds cruel wrath, and outrageous anger, Prov. xxvii. 4. or rather, her zeal[s], which is no other than ardent love for Chriſt, his goſpel, cauſe and intereſt; which eat up and conſumed her ſpirits, as the grave does what is caſt into it, Pſal. cxix. 139. Virgil[t] gives the epithet of cruel to love. The coals thereof are coals of fire; which expreſſes the fervency of her love to Chriſt, and zeal for the honour of his name; which, though ſometimes cold and languid, is rekindled, and becomes hot and flaming; and is, like fire, inſatiable, one of the four things that ſay, it is not enough, Prov. xxx. 16. Which hath a moſt vehement flame; nothing is more common with other writers[u], than to attribute flame to love, and to call it a fire; here a moſt vehement flame. Or, the flame of Jah or Jehovah[w]; an exceeding great one: the Hebrews uſe one or other of the names of God, as a ſuperlative; ſo the mountains of God, and cedars of God, mean exceeding great ones; and here it expreſſes the church's love in the higheſt degree, in ſuch a flame as not to be quenched, as follows: or it ſignifies, that the flame of love in her breaſt was kindled by the Lord himſelf[x], by his Spirit, compared to fire; or by his love, ſhed abroad in her heart by him. Hence it appears to be falſe, what is ſometimes ſaid, that the name of God is not uſed in this Song; ſince the greateſt of all his names, Jah or Jehovah, is here expreſſed.

℣. 7. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it, &c.] The love of the church to Chriſt, which is inextinguiſhable and inſuperable, by the many waters and floods of wicked and ungodly men; neither by their flattery and fair promiſes; nor by their cruel edicts, force and perſecution; by neither can they withdraw the love of the ſaints from Chriſt, nor tempt them to deſert his intereſt: nor by all the afflictions God is pleaſed to bring upon them; rather their love is increaſed thereby, which they conſider as effects of the love, wiſdom and faithfulneſs of God, as deſigned for their good: nor even by their ſins and corruptions; for, though through the aboundings of theſe, their love may wax cold, yet it never becomes comes extinct; it may be left, but not loſt; its fervency may be abated, but that itſelf remains: nor by Satan's temptations, who ſometimes comes in like a flood, threatening to carry all before him; but the Spirit lifts up a ſtandard againſt him, and maintains his own work of faith and love, Iſa. lix. 19. nor by the terrors of the law, and the apprehenſions of divine wrath, they are ſometimes preſſed with, ſignified by waves and floods, Pſal. lxxxviii. 6, 7, 15, 16, 17. nor by all the hardſhips and difficulties, ſcoffs and reproaches, which attend believers in their chriſtian race; which are ſo far from alienating their affections from Chriſt, that they rather endear him the more unto them, and make heaven, and the enjoyment of him there, the more deſirable. If a man would give all the ſubſtance of his houſe for love, it would utterly be contemned; it is true of the love of Chriſt to his people, as alſo what is ſaid before; but is rather to be underſtood of the love of the church to Chriſt; which is a grace ſo valuable, as not to be purchaſed with money: if this, or any other grace is to be bought, it is to be bought without money and without price; it is to be had freely of Chriſt; and, where poſſeſſed, will not be parted with for any thing that may be offered; if a rich man's whole eſtate was offered for it, to a lover of Chriſt; yea, the riches of the Indies, or the vaſt treaſures of the whole globe, on condition of his parting with him, and deſerting his cauſe and intereſt, and dropping or neglecting his love to him, it would be treated by him with the utmoſt diſdain and contempt; ſee Phil. iii. 8. Now all this is uſed by the church, as an argument to gain her requeſt, ſet me as a ſeal, &c. ſince my ſoul is all in flames of love to thee, which cannot be quenched by all I ſuffer on thy account; nor will be parted with for all that the world can give me. This love of the church reaches to Chriſt, and to all that belong to him, even to a little ſiſter, as in the next verſe.

℣. 8. We have a little ſiſter, &c.] Which ſeems to be the Gentile church, ſo called by the Jewiſh church; for as the church catholic, or univerſal, with reſpect to its parts, is called a mother, as often in this Song; ſo theſe parts, with reſpect to each other, as the Jewiſh and Gentile churches, may be called ſiſters; and the rather, as they belong to the ſame Father and family, are partakers of the ſame grace, and are of the ſame faith and religion as to the ſubſtance of them; and the object and nature of their worſhip the ſame, though as to circumſtances different: and it may be obſerved, that the Gentile church is not only ſiſter to the Jewiſh church, but to Chriſt, and therefore ſhe ſays, not I, but we have ſuch a ſiſter; of which relation, ſee chap. iv. 9, 10. and v. 1, 2. alſo that ſhe ſtood in this relation to Chriſt and to the Jewiſh church before the coming of Chriſt, and before the goſpel was preached to her, and ſhe was called and ſeparated from the world; as elect Gentiles are alſo called the ſheep of Chriſt, and children of God, before that time, John x. 16. and xi. 52. This church is deſcribed as a little ſiſter, younger in age than the Jewiſh church, and in ſome reſpects leſs honourable, Rom. iii. 1, 2. and ix. 4, 5. the ſame with the younger ſon and brother, in the parable of the prodigal; little in eſteem among men, eſpecially the Jews, Eph. ii. 11, 12. little in ſtature, light, knowledge and faith, at firſt converſion; and but few in number, particularly at firſt, and in compariſon of the world: and ſo the church of Chriſt, conſiſting both of Jews and Gentiles, is called a little flock, Luke xii. 32. As a further deſcription of her, it is added, And ſhe hath no breaſts; is not arrived to years of ripeneſs, nor marriageable; ſee Ezek. xvi. 7. the time of her open eſpouſal to Chriſt was not yet come: at this time ſhe had no miniſters nor ordinances, from whence ſhe could have the ſincere milk of the word, or communicate it to others; and it was ſome time after the goſpel came among the Gentiles, ere they had a ſettled miniſtry. What ſhall we do for our ſiſter? or, what ſhall be done for her? being moved with pity to her, in her forlorn and helpleſs condition, like a little infant, Ezek. xvi. 4. and willing to do any thing for her that lay in her power, though ſeeming at a loſs to know what to do for her: the believing Jews were very aſſiſting to the Gentiles, in carrying the goſpel among them at firſt; and in ſupplying them with miniſters, and with money too, to carry on the intereſt of Chriſt among them. The Jewiſh church here is not forgetful of the chief and principal agent, Chriſt, and therefore ſays, What ſhall we do? ſhe was willing to do what ſhe could; but ſhe knew all would be inſignificant without Chriſt, his agency and bleſſing. The time, ſhe was concerned what ſhould be done for her in, is, In the day when ſhe ſhall be ſpoken for, or with, or unto[y]; when ſhe ſhould be wooed or treated with for marriage, by the miniſters of the word, at the firſt preaching of the goſpel to her; or be ſpoken to by her enemies, by fair words or ſevere menaces, to deſert the faith. Or, be ſpoken of[z]; the fame of her be ſpread abroad, far and near, for her light, knowledge, and faith; for her profeſſion, and her ſufferings for it; and the concern is, how ſhe ſhould behave under all the noiſe and talk about her: or, be ſpoken againſt[a]; as ſhe would be by unbelieving Jews, and by ignorant heathens, for embracing the chriſtian religion, for receiving the goſpel of Chriſt, ſubmitting to his ordinances, and profeſſing his name, Acts xxviii. 22. Now the old church might be concerned, that ſhe might ſtand firm to her faith and the profeſſion of it, notwithſtanding the reproaches and perſecutions of men.

℣. 9. If ſhe be a wall, &c.] Built upon a ſure foundation; and firmly eſtabliſhed in her faith on Chriſt, and love to him; and is conſtant therein, and ſtands as a wall againſt the attacks of enemies[b]. We will build upon her a palace of ſilver; though at firſt but as a ſide-wall, yet ſhould become a complete habitation, even a palace for Chriſt, the King of kings; and being deſigned for ſo illuſtrious an inhabitant, ſhould be a ſilver one, denoting its worth, value and ſplendor; the builders of it are the church and her miniſters; though Chriſt is the principal builder, Zech. vi. 12, 15. Pſalm cxxvii. 1. Or, a tower of ſilver[c]; ſignifying, that ſhe ſhould be well fortified, and be put into a poſture of defence againſt her enemies: the Gentile church at firſt had but a very ſmall appearance of a building, a foundation juſt laid, a ſide-wall erected; but, in a ſhort time, a noble ſtructure, a ſtately tower, a ſilver palace, were built for God. And if ſhe be a door, we will incloſe her with boards of cedar; if the door of the goſpel was opened among the Gentiles, it ſhould be ſucceeded to the building an holy temple to the Lord; which ſhould be, not only ornamented, but ſo well fenced, that it ſhould not be in the power of their enemies to deface and demoliſh it: or if the door of their hearts was opened to receive Chriſt, and his glorious train of grace, they ſhould be adorned and beautified with a larger meaſure of them; or if being come into a church-ſtate, and the door of it was ſet open to receive good men, and exclude bad men, this would be to their honour, comfort and ſafety: or this phraſe is expreſſive of the finiſhing of the building, the gate or door being ſet up; though it rather ſeems to intend the low and mean eſtate of the Gentile church at firſt, when there was but little appearance of a building, only a door ſet up; which afterwards grew up into a ſtately and magnificent palace, like that of Solomon's, built of cedar-boards of the wood of Lebanon; which may denote her fragrancy, perpetuity and incorruptibleneſs.

℣. 10. I am a wall, &c.] The words of the little ſiſter, or Gentile church; either wiſhing ſhe was what was ſuppoſed, and deſiring to be in a well ſettled ſtate, O that I was a wall! or, as aſſerting[d], that ſhe was in ſuch a ſtate, well walled; God was a wall of fire about her; ſalvation was appointed as walls and bulwarks to her; ſhe was one of the two walls, Chriſt was a corner-ſtone unto, and cemented together; and was a wall built up of lively ſtones, of true believers, built on Chriſt, the foundation; and eſtabliſhed in the doctrine of grace; and conſtant and immoveable in her love to Chriſt. And my breaſts like towers; round, plump and high; ſignifying, that ſhe was now marriageable; and the time of her being preſented as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt, and of her open eſpouſals to him, was now come: of miniſters of the word, of the ſcriptures, and of the ordinances of the goſpel, as ſignified by breaſts, ſee the note on chap. iv. 5. which may be ſaid to be like towers; miniſters of the word, becauſe ſet for the defence of the goſpel; the ſcriptures, becauſe an armoury from whence ſaints are ſupplied with armour, to repel Satan's temptations, refute errors, and defend truth; and the ordinances of the goſpel, becauſe they ſtand firm and immoveable, againſt all the efforts of men to ſubvert and aboliſh them; and theſe are peculiar to the Gentile church, under the goſpel-diſpenſation. Then was I in his eyes, as one that found favour; from the time that the Gentile church became a wall, firmly built on Chriſt, and was formed into a church-ſtate, and had a ſettled miniſtry and goſpel-ordinances, ſhe became acceptable to Chriſt, and was admitted to near communion with him; and not only her perſon, but her ſervices met with a favourable acceptance from him; and theſe privileges and bleſſings were the fruit of his love, favour and good-will, he bore to her; which before was ſecret and hidden, but now her breaſts being faſhioned, her time was a time of love, of the open love of Chriſt to her, and of her eſpouſals to him: and when, as the words may be rendered, ſhe was as one that found peace[e]; peace being made by the blood of Chriſt, and the partition-wall broken down between Jew and Gentile, and they peaceably joined together in a goſpel-church-ſtate; and when ſhe enjoyed inward peace and tranquillity of mind, which is found in Chriſt, the word and ordinances; even all kind of proſperity, which peace, with the Hebrews, includes; every ſpiritual bleſſing, as reconciliation, juſtification, pardon, adoption, and eternal life, which are all the fruits and effects of divine favour, good will, grace and love.

℣. 11. Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon, &c.] The little ſiſter, or Gentile church, goes on to give an account of the ſucceſs of the goſpel, the planting of churches, and the eſtabliſhment of the intereſt of Chriſt in the Gentile world, together with the advantages that accrued to Chriſt from it; for not Solomon literally, but a greater than he is here, Chriſt, the antitype of him, the Prince of peace; ſee the note on chap. iii. 7. By the vineyard is meant the church, eſpecially under the New Teſtament-diſpenſation; ſo called, becauſe ſeparated from the world by ſovereign grace; planted with precious and fruitful plants, which Chriſt has a property in, by his Father's gift and his own purchaſe; and therefore receives of the fruit of it; takes delight and pleaſure to walk in it; and takes care to keep it in order, and to protect and preſerve it: this is ſaid to be at Baal-hamon; perhaps the ſame with Baal-gad, the names ſignifying much the ſame, and where Solomon might have a vineyard, Joſh. xi. 17. the word ſignifies, the maſter, or lord of a multitude[f]; the Gentile world, conſiſting of a multitude of nations; and in which were many churches, and conſiſting of many perſons. He let out the vineyard unto keepers; to his apoſtles, and to miniſters of the goſpel in ſucceeding times; and who have their employment in it; ſome to plant, others to water; ſome to prune, to reprove and correct for bad principles and practices, and others to ſupport and uphold weak believers; and others to defend truth, and preſerve the church from innovation in doctrine and worſhip: the letting it out to theſe, agrees with the parables in Matt. xx. 1, 2. and xxi. 33. where there ſeems to be an alluſion to this paſſage. Chriſt is the proprietor of the vineyard, and the principal vine-dreſſer; yet he makes uſe of his miniſters to take the care of it, watch, and keep it in order; for which purpoſe he lets, or gives[g] it to them, as the word is, for he makes them in ſome ſenſe owners; and they have an intereſt in the churches, and their life and comfort greatly lie in the fruitfulneſs and well-being of them; the vines are called ours, chap. ii. 15. Every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thouſand pieces of ſilver; or ſhekels, amounting to about an hundred and fifty pounds; which ſhews the fruitfulneſs of the vineyard, that its produce ſhould be worth ſo much; and the great uſefulneſs of the goſpel-miniſtry, in bringing ſouls to Chriſt; the fruit of his labour is as dear to him as pieces of ſilver, Luke xv. 8, 9. Chriſt's miniſters are his rent-gatherers, and the collectors of his fruit, John xv. 16. and though they have different talents and ſucceſs; yet, being honeſt and faithful, the meaneſt are reckoned to bring in the ſame as others, or what make for Chriſt's delight, pleaſure, and glory; as will appear, when the reckoning-day comes, and an account will be given in, Matt. xxv. 19—28. Heb. xiii. 17.

℣. 12. My vineyard which is mine, is before me, &c.] Theſe are either the words of Chriſt, aſſerting and confirming his right and property in his vineyard, the church; and which he diſtinguiſhes from, and prefers to all others; and which being ſaid to be before him, denotes his exact knowledge of every vine in it, not a plant eſcaping his watchful eye; his preſence in it, his care of it, the delight and complacency he has therein: or elſe, the words of the church, expreſſing her care, watchfulneſs, and diligence in the vineyard, and her concern for the welfare of the ſeveral vines and plants in it; ſee chap. i. 6. and vii. 12. And certain it is, that the next clauſe is ſpoken by her: Thou, O Solomon, muſt have a thouſand; a thouſand pieces or ſhekels of ſilver, as before: the church is willing Chriſt ſhould have all he deſires and demands, his whole due and full revenue of glory from his people; for he is meant, and not Solomon literally, as many Jewiſh writers[h] acknowledge. And the church being now in his preſence, and uſing familiarity with him, thus addreſſes him, And thoſe that keep the fruit thereof, two hundred; by which may be meant, an honourable maintenance for themſelves and families, and much eſteem and reſpect among the people to whom they miniſter; this is the double honour in 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. Chriſt has the greateſt ſhare, as in reaſon he ſhould, being the proprietor of the vineyard, and having the chief care and overſight of it, and gives it its increaſe: however, faithful miniſters have their reward, which lies greatly in the converſion of ſinners, and edification of ſaints; for that is their joy, and crown of rejoicing; and in eternal happineſs they ſhall enjoy hereafter, 1 Theſſ. ii. 19. 1 Pet. v. 4.

℣. 13. Thou that dwelleſt in the gardens, &c.] Theſe are the words of Chriſt to the church, deſcribing her by her habitation, and may be rendered, O thou inhabitreſs of the gardens[i]; the word uſed being in the feminine gender, which determines the ſenſe of it, as belonging to the church: but the Septuagint verſion renders it by a word in the maſculine gender; and ſo Ambroſe[k], who interprets the words as ſpoken by the church to Chriſt; though he obſerves, that Symmachus and Aquila interpret them as the words of Chriſt to the church. By the gardens, are meant particular congregations, the dwelling-places of the church, and where ſhe has work to do by her miniſters, to plant, water, prune, and dreſs the gardens; and of particular believers, whoſe buſineſs it is to attend on the miniſtry of the word, and other ordinances; and dwelling here, may denote diligence and conſtant attendance here, and which is approved of by Chriſt, and well-pleaſing to him: and it is honourable, as well as profitable and delightful, to have a place in theſe gardens, and eſpecially an abiding one; and indeed thoſe, to whom Chriſt gives a place and a name here, are in no danger of being turned or driven out, as Adam was from Eden. The companions hearken to thy voice; meaning either, the divine Perſons, the Father and the holy Ghoſt, as Piſcator; the companions of Chriſt, of the ſame nature, perfections, and glory with him; who liſten to what the church and true believers ſay to them and to one another, Mal. iii. 16. or the angels, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra, the friends of Chriſt and his people, who hearken to the converſation of believers, in private and public; and eſpecially to the goſpel, preached in the aſſembly of the ſaints, Eph. iii. 10. 1 Pet. i. 12. or rather, the daughters of Jeruſalem, who all along attend the bride in this Song, and are the virgins her companions, Pſalm xlv. 14. and it is a title that belongs to all truly gracious ſouls, Pſalm cxxii. 8. and cxix. 63. who hearken to the voice of the church, to the goſpel, preached by her miniſters; which is a joyful ſound, and gives great delight and pleaſure. Cauſe me to hear it; that is, her voice; ſo ſweet and charming to him, as in chap. ii. 14. her voice in prayer and praiſe; in ſpeaking of him, his perſon, offices and grace, to others, and confeſſing his name before men. Some render the words, preach me[l]; and then the ſenſe is, ſeeing the companions flock unto thee, and liſten with great attention and pleaſure to thy voice, take the opportunity of preaching me unto them; let my perſon, righteouſneſs and grace, be the ſubject of thy miniſtry: and which was done in the firſt times of the goſpel, by the apoſtles; has been, more or leſs, ever ſince by faithful miniſters; and will be continued until the ſecond coming of Chriſt, prayed for in the following verſe.

℣. 14. Make haſte, my beloved, &c.] Theſe are the words of the church to Chriſt, calling him, her beloved; a title often uſed in this Song, ſee chap. i. 13, 14. and is continued to the laſt; for Chriſt was ſtill the object of her love; and ſhe had now a comfortable ſenſe of her intereſt in him, and claimed it; and makes uſe of this title, not only to diſtinguiſh him from others, but to obtain her requeſt the more eaſily, that he would make haſte, and come; which may either be underſtood of his ſpeedy coming in the fleſh, and appearing on mount Zion and in the temple, where the ſpicy and ſweet-ſmelling incenſe was offered; or of his ſpiritual preſence, in his houſe and upon the mountains, and in all the aſſemblies of Zion, where the prayers and praiſes of the ſaints go up to God, as ſweet odours, perfumed with the incenſe of Chriſt's mediation: or the petition may reſpect the firſt ſpread of the goſpel throughout the Gentile world; which, being like a box of ointment opened, would diffuſe the ſavour of the knowledge of Chriſt every where: or rather, it expreſſes the breathings of the New Teſtament-church after the ſecond coming of Chriſt, being the laſt petition of the church in this Song; and with which ſhe cloſes it, as John does the Revelation, and with it the whole canon of ſcripture in like manner, Even ſo, come, Lord Jeſus, that is, come quickly: and when the church ſays, make haſte; ſhe does not deſire Chriſt to come before the appointed time, nor will he; his coming may, and will be haſtened indeed, yet in his own time; but it ſhews her eager and earneſt deſire after it, being as it were impatient for it. The words may be rendered, flee away[m]; not that the church deſired Chriſt to depart from her; ſhe valued his preſence at another rate; but ſhe being weary of a ſinful, troubleſome world, and breathing after everlaſting reſt in another, deſires him to remove from hence, and take her with him to heaven, where ſhe might enjoy his preſence without any diſturbance. And be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart, upon the mountains of ſpices; where ſpices and aromatic plants grow, as on Lebanon: of Chriſt, compared to a roe or a young hart, ſee the note on chap. ii. 9. Theſe creatures being remarkable for their ſwiftneſs [n] in running upon mountains and other high places; ſee Hab. iii. 19. the church deſires that Chriſt would be as ſwift in his motion as thoſe creatures, and come quickly and ſpeedily, and take her with him to the ſpicy mountains, the heavenly ſtate, and all the joys and glories of it; and there have everlaſting and uninterrupted communion with Chriſt; be out of the reach of every troubleſome enemy; be in the utmoſt ſafety and ſecurity; and in the poſſeſſion of pleaſures that will never end. This ſtate may be expreſſed by mountains of ſpices; becauſe of the height and ſublimity of it; and becauſe of the permanency and everlaſting duration of it; and becauſe of its delightfulneſs and pleaſantneſs; where will be fulneſs of joy, and pleaſures for evermore.
